PICKERING—SUMTER
As it is the commendation of a good huntsman to find game in a wide wood, so it is no imputation if he hath not caught all.

PICKERING, Charles Whipple, naval officer, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 23 Dec., 1815; d. in St. Augustine, Fla., 29 Feb., 1888. He was appointed midshipman on 22 May, 1822, became lieutenant on 8 Dec., 1828, and was attached to the Pacific squadron. In 1854 he served as executive officer of the "Gyge" which conveyed Lieut. Isaac G. Strain, jr., and his exploring party to Darien, and afterward rescued them and brought them to New York. He was at the bombardment of Newtown, Nicaragua, in 1854, which was reduced to ashes after four hours' siege. On 14 Sept., 1855, he became commander, and in 1859-61 he was inspector of a light-house district near Key West, Fla. He was commissioned captain on 15 July, 1862, commanded the "Kearsarge" in the Mediterranean and in the West Indies, and was in charge of the "Housatonic" when that vessel was destroyed by a submarine torpedo near Charleston on 17 Feb., 1865. When he had recovered from his wounds he took command of the "Vanderbilt," and in 1865 he was ordered to Portsmouth navy-yard. He was placed on the retired list on 1 Feb., 1867, and made commodore on 8 Dec. of the same year.

PICKERING, John, jurist, b. in Newington, N. H., 22 Sept., 1737; d. in Portsmouth, N. H., 11 April, 1805. He was graduated at Harvard in 1761, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and was a member of the New Hampshire constitutional convention. In 1787 he was elected a member of the convention that framed the constitution of the United States, but he declined to serve. He was judge of the supreme court of New Hampshire in 1790-5, and at one time chief justice, and subsequently judge of the U. S. district court for New Hampshire; but his mind became impaired, and he was removed from office in 1804. Dartmouth gave him the degree of L. L. D. in 1792.

PICKERING, Timothy, statesman, b. in Salem, Mass., 17 July, 1743; d. there, 29 Jan., 1829. He was great-great-grandson of John Pickering, who came from England and settled in Salem in 1642. Timothy was graduated at Harvard in 1763. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1768, but practised very little, and never attained distinction as a lawyer. He served for some time as register of deeds for Essex county, and at the same time showed considerable interest in military studies. In 1766 he was commissioned by Gov. Bernard lieutenant of militia, and in 1775 was elected colonel, which office he held until after he had joined the Continental army. Twelve days after his election he witnessed and peacefully resisted Col. Leslie's expedition to Salem. On 19 April he marched at the head of 300 men to cut off the retreat of the British from Lexington, and at sunset had reached Winter Hill, in Somerville, a few minutes after the British had passed on their disorderly retreat to Charlestown. In later years political enemies unfairly twitted him for failing to effect the capture of the whole British force on this occasion. In the course of that year he published a small volume, illustrated with copper-plate engravings, entitled "An Easy Plan of Discipline for a Militia." It was a useful book, and showed considerable knowledge of the military art. It was adopted by the state of Massachusetts, and was generally used in the Continental army until surpassed by the excellent manual prepared by Baron Steuben. In September, 1775, Col. Pickering was commissioned justice of the peace, and two months later judge of the maritime court for the counties of Suffolk, Essex, and Middlesex. In May, 1776, he was elected representative to the general court. On 24 Dec. of that year he set out from Salem, at the head of the Essex regiment of 700 men, to join the Continental army, and after stoping for some time, under Gen. Heath's orders, at Tarrytown, reached Morristown, 29 Feb., where he made a very favorable impression upon Washington.

The office of adjutant-general falling vacant by the resignation of Col. Reed, Washington at once offered it to Col. Pickering, who at first declined the appointment because he did not consider himself fit for it and because it would conflict with the discharge of his duty in the place that he already held. He afterward reconsidered the matter and resigned all his civil offices, and his appointment as adjutant-general was announced, 18 June, at the headquarters of the army at Middlebrook. He then expressed an opinion that the war would not ought not to last longer than a year, and on several occasions was inclined to criticise impa-

Appletons' Cyclopedia of American Biography.

tently the superb self-restraint and caution of Washington, but for which the war would doubtless have ended that year in the overthrow of the American cause. Col. Pickering was present at the battles of the Brandywine and Germantown, and was elected, Nov., a member of the newly created board of war. On 5 Aug., 1789, he was appointed quartermaster-general of the army, in place of Gen. Greene, who had just resigned. He joined the army at Peekskill, 25 June, 1781, took part in the march to Virginia, and was present in the surrender of Cornwallis, of which he gives an interesting account in his journal. The fact that there was no detention in the course of Washington's wonderful march from Hudson river to Charleston was a reflection upon him and his department's management. At every point the different columns found the needed supplies and means of transportation in readiness. For such a triumph of logistics great credit is due to Col. Pickering. He retained the office of quartermaster-general until it was abolished, 5 July, 1785. He made himself conspicuous, along with other of Gen. Greene's appointees. In executing the harsh and short-sighted vindictive measures that drove so many Tories from the country, to settle in Nova Scotia and Upper Canada.

On leaving the army in 1783, he went into business in Philadelphia as a commission merchant in partnership with Maj. Samuel Hodgson, but he did not find this a congenial occupation. He was assured that if he were to go to Washington and there he would be appointed associate justice of the supreme court of that state, but he refused to enter the suggestion, because he distrusted his fitness for that office. He preferred to remain with his family, to some new settlement on the frontier, and, with some such end in view, and already purchased extensive tracts of unoccupied land in western Pennsylvania and Virginia, and in the valley of the Ohio. In 1787 he settled in Wyoming, and there became involved in the disturbances attendant upon the arrest and imprisonment of John Franklin, leader of the insurgent Connecticut settlers. Col. Pickering's house was attacked by riders, and he would have been seized as a hostage for the release of Franklin; but, he quickly left and thereupon made his way to Philadelphia, where he was chosen member of the convention for ratifying the new constitution of the United States. After his return to Wyoming, toward the end of June, 1788, Col. Pickering was taken from his bed at midnight by a gang of masked men and carried off into the forest. His captors kept him prisoner for three weeks, and prevented upon him to write to the executive council of the state and have Franklin set at liberty. When they found their threats unavailing, and learned that militia were pursuing them, they lost heart, and were glad to compound with Col. Pickering and set him free on condition that he would intercede for them. This affair, the incidents of which are full of romance and interest, and the very next day President Washington sent Col. Pickering on a mission to the Seneca Indians, who had been incensed by the murder of two of their tribe by white men at Pine Creek, Pa. The mission ended in July, 1791, in the successful negotiation of a very important treaty between the United States and the Six Nations. Col. Pickering was appointed postmaster-general, 14 Aug., 1791, and held that office till 1795. In the mean time was waged the great war with the Indians of the Northwestern territory, and Col. Pickering was called upon several times to negotiate with the chiefs of the Six Nations and keep up the alliance with them. He knew how to make himself liked and respected by the red men, and in these delicate missions was eminently successful. On the resignation of Knox he was appointed secretary of war, 2 Jan., 1795. The department then included Indian affairs, since transferred to the department of the interior. It also included the administration of the navy. In these capacities Col. Pickering was instrumental in the purchase of the French frigates "Constellation," "United States," and "Constitution," that were by and by to win imperishable renown. On the resignation of Randolph in the autumn of 1796, Col. Pickering for a while acted as secretary of state, and after three months was appointed to that office. He continued in that situation for a period of seven years, during which his name was John Adams, until the difficulties with France, growing out of the X. Y. Z. papers, had reached a crisis and led to a serious disagreement between Mr. Adams and his cabinet (see Adams, John.) Then Col. Pickering was dismissed from office, 12 May, 1800.

From the department of state to a log-cabin on the frontier was a great change indeed. Col. Pickering spent the summer and autumn with his son Henry and a few hired men in clearing a farm in what is now Susquehanna county, near the northeastern corner of Pennsylvania. He had always been poor, and was now embarrassed with debt. To relieve him of this burden, several citizens of Boston subscribed $25,000, and purchased from him some of his tracts of unoccupied land. After payment of his debts, the balance in cash was $14,055.35, and being thus placed in comfortable circumstances he was prevailed upon to return to Massachusetts, where he settled upon a modest farm, which he hired, in Danvers. In 1802 he was appointed chief justice of common pleas, and was a candidate for the legislature. When the elections were held, but Jacob Crowninshield was elected over him. The next year Col. Pickering was elected to the U. S. senate, to fill the vacancy left by Dwight Foster's resignation. In 1804 he was elected to the senate for six years, and became conspicuous among the leaders of the extreme Federalists. He disapproved of the Louisiana purchase, and afterward made himself very unpopular in a large part of the country by his energetic opposition to the embargo. In 1809 he was hanged in effigy by a mob in Philadelphia, and in the following year an infamous attempt was made to charge him with embezzlement of public funds, but the charge was too absurd to gain credence. In 1811 he was formally examined by the senate for a supposed violation of theNeutrality laws by certain documents communicated by the president before the injunction of secrecy; but as this measure was too plainly prompted by vindictiveness, it failed to injure him. In 1812, having failed of a reelection to the senate, he retired to the farm he had purchased some time before in Wenham, Mass., but he was returned to Washington so soon as he expected. In the November election he was chosen a member of congress by an overwhelming majority. To this office he was again elected in 1814, and would have been elected a third time had he not declined a renomination. During 1817 he was member of the executive council of Massachusetts, its last public office. The last years of his life were spent in Salem, with frequent visits to the Wenham farm. On Sunday, 4 Jan., 1829, sitting in an ill-warmed church, he caught a cold, which he muriately directed to the Federalist party to which Col. Pickering belonged was led by a group of men known as the "Essex Junto," comprising Parsons, Cabot, Selwigg, H. G. Otis, and the Lowells, of Massachusetts, with Griswold and Reeve, of Connecticut. In 1804, and again in 1809, the question of a dissolution of the Union and the formation of a separate Eastern States or Confederation, was discussed by these Federalist leaders, and in 1814 they were foremost in the proceedings that led to the Hartford convention. Attempts to call such a convention had been made in 1808 and 1812. The designs of the convention were not clearly understood, but the suspicion of dishonour tendencies that clung to it sufficed to complete the ruin of the Federalist party, which did not survive the election of 1816. In the work of the conventionists of 1814 Col. Pickering took no direct part, and he was not present at Hartford. Col. Pickering married, 8 April, 1776, Rebecca White, who was born in Bristol, England, 18 July, 1754, and died in Salem, 14 Aug., 1828. Their wedded life was extremely happy. Col. Pickering's biography, with copious extracts from his own and other papers, was published by his son, Octavius Pickering,—Life of Timothy Pickering," (vol. i., Boston, 1837)—and after the death of the latter, was finished by Charles W. Upham (vols. ii.-iv., 1873). See also Adams's "Documents relating to New England Federalism" (Boston, 1877) and Schouler's "History of the United States," vols. i. and ii., 1882.—Timothy Pickering, the eldest son of John Pickering, was born in Newbury, Mass., 7 Feb., 1777. In Boston, Mass., 5 March, 1816, was graduated at Harvard in 1796, and then studied law with Edward Tighman in Philadelphia. In 1797 he became secretary to William Smith, on the appointment of the latter as U. S. minister to Portugal, and two years later he became private secretary to Rufus King, then minister to Great Britain. In 1801, returning to Salem, he resumed his legal studies, and, after being admitted to the bar, practised in Salem until 1827. Mr. Pickering then removed to Boston, and was appointed city solicitor, which office he held until shortly before his death. Notwithstanding his large practice, he also devoted his attention to politics. He was three times in the lower house of the legislature, twice a state senator from Essex county and once from Suffolk county, and a member of the executive council. In 1833 he served on the commission for revising and arranging the statutes of Massachusetts, and the part that is entitled "Of the Internal Administration of Government" was prepared by him. Mr. Pickering became celebrated by his philological studies, which gained for him the reputation of being the chief founder of American comparative philology. He began as a young man, when he accompanied his father on visits to the Six Nations of central New York, and as he grew older they increased by his study abroad until, according to Charles Sumner, he was familiar with the English, French, Portuguese, Italian, Spanish, German, Romanic, Greek, and Latin languages. For the study of these and with Dutch, Swedish, Danish, and Hebrew, and had explored with various degrees of care, Arabic, Turkish, Syriac, Persian, Coptic, Sanscrit, Chinese, Cochin-Chinese, Russian, Egyptian hieroglyphics, Malay in several dialects, and particularly the Indian languages of America and the Polynesian islands.

With this great knowledge at his command, he early used it in the preparation of valuable articles in reviews, transactions of learned societies, and encyclopedias. Among these are the "Adoptions of a Vocabulary of the Indian Languages of North America" (1800); "Remarks on the Indian Languages of North America" (1836); and "Memoir on the Language and Inhabitants of Lord North's Island" (1845); also, in blockform, "A Vocabulary or Collection of Words and Phrases which have been Supposed to be Peculiar to the United States of America" (Boston, 1816), and "A Compendious Biography of the Greek Language" (1826). The latter passed through numerous editions at home and was reprinted abroad. In 1806 he was elected Hancock professor of Hebrew in Harvard, and later was invited to fill the chair of Greek literature in that university, both of which appointments he declined, as well as that of provost of the University of Pennsylvania. He was an active member of the board of overseers of Harvard from 1818 till 1824, and received the degree of LL. D. from Bowdoin in 1822, and from Harvard in 1825. Mr. Pickering was one of the founders of the American oriental society, and its president until his death, also president of the American academy of arts and sciences, and a member of various learned societies both at home and abroad. He was the author of many literary works, among which are: "The Agrarian Laws," "Egyptian Jurisprudence," "Lecture on the Alleged Uncertainty of Law," and "Review of the International Mercantile Question" (1825). See "Life of John Pickering," by his daughter, Mary Orme Pickering (Boston, 1857).—Timothy's third son, Henry, poet, b. in Newburg, N. Y., 8 May, 1821, was born in the historic Husebruck house, better known as Washington's headquarters, while his father was with Washington at the siege of Yorktown. He accompanied the family to Boston in 1801, and engaged in business in Salem, acquiring in a few years a moderate fortune, from which he contributed largely to the support of his father's family and to the education of his younger members. In consequence of losses he removed to New York in 1825, and endeavored to retrieve his fortune, but without success. He then resided at Rondout and other places along the Hudson, where he devoted his leisure to reading and writing poetry. His writings appeared in the "Evening Post," and include "Ruins of Persia" (Salem, 1822); "Athene and other Poems" (1824); "Poesis" (1829); and "The Buckwheat Cake" (1834).—Another son of Timothy, Otav-"ius, lawyer, b. in Wyoming, Pa., 2 Sept., 1791; d. in Boston, Mass., 29 Oct., 1868, was graduated at Harvard in 1810, and then studied law with his brother, John Pickering. In March, 1816, he was admitted to the bar of Suffolk county, and opened an office in Boston. He assisted in preparing the debates and proceedings of the Massachusetts constitutional convention of 1820. In 1822-24 he was reporter of the supreme court of Massachusetts. During these years he prepared the "Reports of Cases in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts." (24 vols., Boston, 1822-40). On retiring from office he visited Europe and spent seven years in England and France, where he took an active interest in natural history, was a fellow of the American academy of arts and sciences, and one of the founders, in December, 1814, of the New England society for the promotion of natural history, which subsequently became the Linnaean society of New England, and out of which has grown the Boston society of natural history. His literary work included, besides various legal papers, A Report of the Trial by Impeachment of James Prescott, in 1853; a History of William H. Gardiner (Boston: 1882), and he prepared the first volume of the "Life of Timothy Pickering by his Son" (4 vols., 1857–73), of which the remaining volumes were issued by Charles W. Upham.—Timothy's grandson, Charles, physician, b. in Susquehanna county, Pa., 10 Nov., 1803; d. in Boston, Mass., 15 March, 1887, was graduated at Harvard in 1823, and at its medical school in 1827, and settled in the practice of his profession in Philadelphia. Meanwhile he developed interest in natural history and became a member of the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences, to whose transactions he contributed valuable papers. In 1832–42 he was naturalist to the U. S. exploring expedition under Capt. Charles Wilkes. On his return he was a year in Washington, and then visited eastern Africa, travelling from Egypt to Zanzibar, and thence to India for the purpose of more thoroughly studying the people of those parts of the world that had not been visited by the expedition. Nearly two years were occupied in these researches, after which he devoted himself to the preparation of "The Races of Man and their Geographical Distribution" (Boston: 1843), and the second volume of the "Reports of the U. S. Exploring Expedition," and was reprinted in "Bohn's Illustrated Library." (London, 1859). He followed with his "Geographical Distribution of Animals and Man" (1854) and "Geographical Distribution of Plants" (1861). Dr. Pickering was a member of the American academy of arts and sciences, the American philosophical society, and other learned bodies, to whose proceedings he contributed. At the time of his death he left in manuscript "Chronological History of Plants: Man's Record of his own Existence illustrated through their Names, Uses, and Companionship" (Boston, 1879).—Timothy's great-grandson, Edward Charles, astronomer, b. in Boston, Mass., 19 July, 1846, was graduated in the civil engineering course at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1865. During the following year he was called to the Massachusetts institute of technology as assistant instructor of physics, of which branch he held the full professorship from 1868 till 1877. Prof. Pickering devised plans for the construction and management of the Harvard observatory, and introduced the experimental method of teaching physics at a time when that mode of instruction had not been adopted elsewhere. His scientific work during these years consisted largely of researches in physics, notably investigations on the polarization of light and the laws of its reflection and dispersion. He also described a new form of spectroscope and applied it to the study of the telephone-receiver, which he publicly exhibited. He observed the total eclipse of the sun on 7 Aug., 1868, with the party that was sent out by the Naval nautical office, at Mount Pleasant, Iowa, and was a member of the U. S. coast survey expedition to Xeras, Spain, to observe that of 22 Dec. 1879, having on that occasion changed the polariscopes. In 1876 he was appointed professor of astronomy and geodesy, and director of the observatory at Harvard, and under his management this observatory has become one of the foremost in the United States. More than twenty assistants now take part in investigations under his direction, and the invested funds of the observatory have increased from $170,000 to $850,000 during his administration. His principal work since he accepted this appointment has been the determination of the relative brightness of the stars, which is accomplished by means of a meridian photometer, an instrument which has been specially devised for this purpose, and he has prepared a catalogue giving the brightness of over 4,000 stars. Since 1878 he has also made photometric measurements of Jupiter's satellites while they are undergoing eclipse, and of the satellites of Mars and other very faint objects. On the death of Henry Draper, his close friend and collaborator, the spectra of the stars by photography has thus been undertaken on a scale that was never before attempted. A fund of $250,000, left by Uriah A. Boyden (d. 1879) to the observatory, has been utilized for the special study of the advantages of very elevated observing stations. Prof. Pickering has also devoted attention to such subjects as mountain-surveying, the height and velocity of clouds, papers on which he has contributed to the Appalachian club, of which he was president in 1877, and again in 1882. He is an associate of the Royal astronomical society of London, from which in 1886 he received its gold medal for photographic researches, and, besides membership in other scientific societies, he has been elected in 1873 to the National academy of sciences, by which body he was further honored in 1887 with the award of the Henry Draper medal for his work on astronomical physics. In 1876 he was elected a vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science, and presented his retiring address before the section of mathematics and physics of the Nashville convention. Among his many papers, which number about 100, he prepared annual "Reports on the Department of Physics" for the Massachusetts institute of technology, and the "Annual Reports of the Director of the Astronomical Observatory," likewise editing the "Annals of the Astronomical Observatory of Harvard College." He has also edited, with notes, "The Theory of Color in its Relations to Art and Art Industry," by Dr. William von Bezold (Boston, 1876), and he is the author of "Elements of Physical Manipulation" (2 parts, Boston, 1873–74).—Edward Charles's brother, William Henry, astronomer, b. in Boston, Mass., 15 Feb., 1858, was graduated at the Massachusetts institute of technology, and has devoted himself to the study of physics in that institution. In March, 1887, he was called to the charge of the Boyden department of the Harvard observatory, which place he still fills. He founded in 1882, in connection with the Institute of technology, the first regular laboratory where dry-plate photography was systematically taught to numerous pupils. Mr. Pickering served as an observer on the eclipse expedition to Xeras, Spain, in 1878, and in 1886 conducted an expedition to the West Indies to observe the total eclipse of that year. In 1887 he led an expedition to Colorado to make astronomical observations for the purpose of selecting the most suitable site for an astronomical observatory. In addition to various articles on photography in technical periodicals, and connections of the American academy, he has published "Walking Guide to the Mount Washington Range" (Boston, 1888). his plantation. He served in the Creek war in 1836. He was the author of a "History of Alabama" (2 vols., Charleston, 1851), and at the time of his death was preparing a comprehensive history of the southwest. See "Biography of Gen. Albert J. Pickett," by Crawford M. Jackson (Montgomery, 1859).

PICKETT, George Edward, soldier, b. in Richmond, Va., 23 Jan., 1825; d. in Norfolk, Va., 30 July, 1875. His father was a resident of Henrico county, Va. The son was appointed to the U. S. military academy from Illinois, and graduated in 1846. He served in the war with Mexico, was made 2d lieutenant in the 2d infantry, 3 March, 1847, was at the siege of Vera Cruz and was engaged in all the battles that preceded the assault and capture of the city of Mexico. He was transferred to the 7th infantry, 13 July, 1847, and to the 8th infantry, 18 July, 1847, and brevetted 1st lieutenant, 8 Sept., 1847, for gallant and meritorious conduct at Contreras and Churubusco, and captain, 13 Sept., for Chapultepec. He became captain in the 9th infantry, 3 March, 1855, after serving in garrisons in Texas from 1849, and in 1856 he was on frontier duty in the northwest territory at Puget sound. Capt. Pickett was ordered, with sixty men, to occupy San Juan island then, during the dispute with Great Britain over the northwest boundary, and the British governor, Sir James Douglas, sent three vessels of war to eject Pickett from his position. He forbade the landing of troops from the vessels, under the threat of firing upon them, and an actual collision was prevented only by the timely arrival of the British admiral, by whose order of 30 Sept., 1856, the enterprise was postponed. For his conduct on this occasion Gen. Harney in his report commended Capt. Pickett "for the cool judgment, ability, and gallantry he had displayed," and the legislature of Washington territory passed resolutions thanking him for it. He resigned from the army, 35 June, 1861, and after great difficulty and delays reached Virginia, where he was at once commissioned colonel in the state forces and assigned to duty on Rappahannock river. In February, 1862, he was made brigadier-general in Gen. James Longstreet's division of the Confederate army under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, which was then called the Army of the Potomac, but afterward became the Army of Northern Virginia. His brigade, in the retreat before McClellan up the peninsula and in the seven days' battle around Richmond, won such a reputation that it was known as "the game-cook brigade." At the battle of Gaines's Mills, 27 June, 1862, Pickett was severely wounded in the shoulder, and he did not rejoin his command until after the first Maryland campaign. He was then made major-general, with a division that was composed entirely of Virginians. At the battle of Fredericksburg the division held the centre of Lee's line. For an account of Pickett's charge at Gettysburg, 3 July, 1863, see the articles Lee, Robert E., and Meade, George G. Pickett was afterward placed in command in lower Virginia and eastern North Carolina. In May, 1864, he defended Petersburg and saved it from surprise and capture by Gen. Benjamin F. Butler. In the attack on Gen. Butler's forces along the line of the railroad between Richmond and Petersburg, Pickett's division captured the works. Gen. Lee, in a letter of thanks and congratulation, dated 17 June, said: "We are glad to see the men from capturing the breastworks of the enemy, but could not do it." At Five Forks his division received the brunt of the National attack, and was entirely disorganized. After the war Gen. Pickett returned to Richmond, where he spent the remainder of his life in the life-insurance business. His biography by Edward A. Pollard is in Pollard's "Life and Times of Robert E. Lee and his Companions in Arms." (New York, 1871). See also "Pickett's Men," by Walter Harrison (1870).}

PICKETT, James C., commissioner of patents, b. in Fauquier county, Va., 6 Feb. 1793; d. in Washington, D. C., 10 July, 1872. He removed with his parents to Mason county, Va., in 1796, and received a good education. He became 3d lieutenant of U. S. artillery in 1813, and was promoted 3d lieutenant in 1814, but left the service at the close of the war with England. He served again as deputy quartermaster-general from 1818 till 1821, when he resigned, returned to Mason county, and practised law. He edited the "Mayville Eagle" in 1815, was a member of the legislature in 1822, secretary of the state from 1825 till 1828, and secretary of justice of the commonwealth in 1828, acting part of the time as charged affairs. He was commissioner of the U. S. patent-office in 1833, fourth auditor of the treasury in 1833-5, minister to Ecuador in 1838, and charged affairs in Peru from 1838 till 1845. For a few years he edited "The Congressional Globe" in Washington, D. C.

PICKNELL, William Lamb, artist, b. in Ipswich, Suffolk, England, 18 Sept., 1807; d. in Boston, Mass., 8 Aug., 1897. He studied under Inness, in Rome, and with Gérôme, in Paris. Then for four years he worked in Brittany, where he painted under Robert Wylie, but in 1882 he returned to the United States. He received honorable mention at the Paris salon in 1880, and medals in Boston in 1881 and 1883, a membership in the American Watercolor Society, and in 1889, and of the Society of American artists in 1884. Among his works are "Route de Concarneau" (1860); "On the Border of the Marsh," in the Academy of fine arts, Philadelphia (1860); "A Stormy Day" (1881); "Coast of Ipswich," in Boston art museum (1863); "A Shining and Drifting Sand" (1883); "A Sultry Day" (1884); "Winter March," 1887; "A Blank December" and "After the Storm" (1886); and "November Solitude" (1887).

PIQUET, Francois, French missionary, b. in Bourg sur Bresse, 6 Dec., 1708; d. in Verjon, 15 July, 1781. He was the son of poor laborers, but by his intelligence interested the vicar of his parish, who sent him to school. He was employed in missionary work among peasants when he was eighteen years old, united with the congregation of St. Sulpice in 1729, and, after being ordained priest, was sent at his request to Canada. He arrived in Montreal in December, 1735, and fixed his residence in 1737 among the Indians near Lake Temiscaming, founding there a mission, which prospered from the outset. He induced the Algonquins and Nipissings, in alliance, to abandon their old quarters in 1740, and established them in the fertile regions around the lake, thus securing Montreal from possible invasion from the north. He re-received 5,000 livres from Louis XIV, and employed it to build a limestone fortress, which was afterward of great value to the colony during the struggle with the English. He then induced the Indians to cultivate the soil, kept up a correspondence with the northern and southern tribes, and was often chosen as arbitrator between the natives and the colonial authorities. During the war of 1742 he armed and disciplined the Indians of his mission, and did good service. He obtained in 1749 from Gros-Chatillon a permission to begin a new settlement, and built La Presentation (now Kew-ston). In 1752 he was summoned to Paris by the secretary of the navy to report on his mission, and received from the king a present of 3,000 livres and some books. Returning to Canada in the spring of 1754, he took an active part in the following war, twice saved Quebec from invasion, destroyed the English forts and establishments upon the southern shores of Lake Ontario, also participating in the defeat of Gen. Braddock. He fought under Montcalm, was slightly wounded at Quebec in 1759, and after the surrender of that place resolved to return to France, as the English had put a price on his head. Assuming Indian dress, he succeeded in reaching France during a stormy night, rejoining his Indians, and by the end of the summer, had crossed the northern province of Canada and Michigan, went by way of Illinois and Mississippi rivers to New Orleans, where he arrived in the spring of 1760. Being detained twenty-two months in the latter city, he occupied his time in studying the natural resources of the country.
In October, 1762, he landed in Bordeaux after a dangerous journey, in which the vessel was twice chased by English cruisers. The assemblies of the dairy of France that met in 1765 and 1770 recom-manded him to the king and twice voted him a present of 1,200 livres for his labors in Canada. In 1767 Pope Pius VI, summoned him to Rome, paid the expenses of his journey, gave him a public appointment, appointed him a chamberlain, and made him a present of 5,000 livres. Despite these high recommendations, Louis XV, who felt that the loss of Canada was owing to his neglect of the best interests of France, disliked everything that might remind him of his former possession, and refused to provide for Piequet, who died in great poverty at the house of his sister, a peasant-woman of the little village of Verpin. The English, who had learned of his death, sent a deputation to his name of the Great Jesuit of the West, but Piequet had never any connection with that company, of which he was an opponent. The astronomer Lalande wrote an account of Piequet's life, which was published in the "Lettres edifiantes" (Paris, 1786). Piequet published "Memoire sur l'etat de la colonie du lac des Deux Montagnes," (1754); "Memoire sur les Algéniens et Nipissing" (1754); "Histoire du rôle joué par les Indiens lors de l'incursion du Canada en 1756," which was written at the suggestion of Pope Pius VI. (1758); and "Histoire des établissements de la foî fondés par la congrégation de Saint-Sulpice dans la Nouvelle France du Nord et du Canada" (2 vols., 1780).

PITON, J ohn Malvoin, M.D., physician, b. in Woodbury, N. J., 17 Nov., 1804; d. in New Orleans, La., 28 Oct., 1859. His father, Rev. Thomas Pit-on, was chaplain and professor of geography, history, and ethics in 1818-25 in the U. S. military academy, where the son was graduated in 1824.
He was assigned to the 24 artillery, but resigned his commission in March, 1832, and in that year was graduated in medicine at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania. He settled in New Orleans, where he practised his profession for thirty-two years, acquiring reputation as an operator.
He served for many years as home surgeon in the New Orleans charity hospital, and was president of the medical department of the University of Louisiana.
He was a founder of the New Orleans school of medicine in 1856, in which he was professor of obstetrics from 1856 till 1858. — His cousin, Thomas, journalist, b. in New York city, 9 May 1822; d. there, 29 Feb., 1891, entered the University of New York, where he was graduated in 1840. After studying for the ministry, he became a teacher.
Several years later he visited Europe, and, after travelling over the continent, resided in the environ of Paris, participating in the Revolution of 1848 as an officer of the 2d legion of the Banche.
Upon his return to New York he began the publication of "The Era" in 1850 in conjunction with Henry W. Herbert, and in 1851 he became one of the editors of "The Sachem," afterward entitled "The True American," a vigorous advocate of the Associated order of united Americans. A little later he edited the "True National Democrat," the organ of the Free-souliers. On the reorganization of the "Saturday Mercury" he became one of its editors, and contributed to the paper a series of articles entitled "McClary's Quarterly." These were subsequently published in book-form, and had an extensive sale. At the beginning of the civil war he raised a battalion, which was consolidated with the 35th New York regiment, with which he went to the field. During the reign of Maximilian in Mexico, Mr. Piton was employed in the service of the Liberals, and wrote a "Defence of Liberal Government" which was widely read for distribution among the statesmen of this country.
He translated some of the best modern romances from the French, and several of his light dramas are popular.
He was the author of "Rappinices of a Sporting Journalist," issued in serial form, and, besides the works mentioned, edited "Frank Forester's Life and Writings" (New York, 1881).

PIDAN SAT DE MAIROBERT. Mathieu Francois, French author, b. in Chauxore, Chamagne, 20 Feb., 1757; d. in Paris, 29 March, 1759.
He was brought up in the house of Madame Dub-bois, who was a member of the committee of the literary society that held meetings there, and contributed to the manuscript journal of the society, which was utilized afterward in the preparation of the "Memoires secrets" (1760). Pidansat became in 1760 royal censor for new publications, and was elected an associate member of the Academy of Gen., but, having been involved in the noted trial of Marquis de Brune, fell into melancholy and shot himself. He published many works, which enjoyed a great reputation in their time. Those that relate to this country are the most curious, as the author had access to secret documents that were afterward lost during the French revolution. They include "Lettres sur les véritables limites des provinces de l'Amérique Amerique" (Bale, 1753); "Reponse aux serz escrits des Anglais sur les limites de l'Amérique Angloise" (Paris, 1755); "Memoire sur l'état de la Compagnie des Indes Occidentales" (Bale, 1756); "Principes sur la marine" (Paris, 1756); "Discussions sommaires sur les anciennes lignes de l'ancien Treaty" (Bale, 1758); "Annexion de Marque au traité de Paris" (Bale, 1758); "L'Observeur Anglais" (4 vols., Amsterdam, 1758-9), which was continued after his death, and several times reprinted under the title "L'Espion" PIEPER, Franz August Otto, clergyman, b. in Carritz, Pommerania, Germany, 27 June, 1852. He received his preliminary training at the Dom-Gymnasium, at Colberg, Pommerania. After his settlement in this country he was graduated at Northwestern university, Watertown, Wis., in 1872, and at the Seminary of St. Louis, Mo., in 1875. In the same year he was ordained to the ministry at Centreville, Wis., where he remained until 1878. In that year he became professor of theology in Concordia Seminary, St. Louis, Mo. This post he held until June, 1887, when he was elected president of the institution. He is a frequent contributor to denominational periodicals, and has published "Das Grundgedanken- mess der ev.-lutherischen Kirche, mit einer ge- schichtlichen Einleitung und kurzen erklärenden Anmerkungen versehen" (St. Louis, 1890).

PIECE, Byron Root, soldier, b. in East Bloomfield, Ontario co., N. Y., 20 Sept., 1829. He received an academic education at Rochester, N. Y., and, removing to Michigan, early became interested in military matters. At the beginning of the civil war he enlisted in the 3d Michigan volunteers, and was commissioned successively captain, major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel of that regiment, which served throughout the war with the Army of the Potomac. He was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 7 June, 1863, brevetted major-general, 6 April, 1865, and mustered out of the service on 24 Aug. Next (1868) he became command-ant of the Soldiers' home at Grand Rapids, Mich.

PIECE, Franklin, fourteenth president of the United States, b. in Hillsborough, N. H., 23 Nov., 1804; d. in Concord, N. H., 8 Oct., 1869. His father, Benjamin Pierce (b. in Chelmsford, Mass., 25 Dec., 1757; d. in Hillsborough, N. H., 1 Apr., 1830), on the day of the battle of Lexing- ton enlisted in the patriot army and served until its disbandment in 1784, attaining the rank of captain and brevet major. He had intense political convictions, was a Republican of the school of Jefferson, an ardent admirer of Jackson, and the leader of his party in New Hampshire, of which he was elected governor in 1827 and 1829. He was a farmer, and trained his children in his own simple and sincere creed. His son, Franklin, second in distinction in his son Franklin, he gave him an academic education in well-known institutions at Hancock, Francetown, and Exeter, and in 1829 sent him to Bowdoin college, Brunswick, Me. His college-mates there were John P. Hale, his intimate political rival, Prof. Calvin E. Stowe, Sergeant S. Preston, he disc of the editor, Colonel Longfellow, and Nathaniel Hawthorne, his future biographer and life-long personal friend. His ambition was then of a martial cast, and as an officer in a company of college students he enthusiastically de- voted himself to the study of military tactics. This was the reason why he found himself at the foot of his class at the end of two years in college. Struck by a dis of the editor, he devoted the two remaining years to hard study, and when he was graduated in 1824 he was third in his class. While in college, like many other eminent Americans, he taught in winter. After taking his degree he be- came the study of law at Portsmouth, in the North of New Hampshire, where he remained about a year. He afterward spent two years in the law- school at Northampton, Mass., and in the office of Judge Edmund Parker at Amherst, N. H. In 1827 he was admitted to the bar and began practice in his native town. Soon afterward he argued his first jury cause in the court-house at Amherst. This effort is often the case with emi- nent orators was a failure. But he was not des- pendent. He replied to the sympathetic expres- sions of a friend: "I will try nine hundred and ninety-nine cases, if clients continue to trust me, and if I fail just as I have today, I will try the thousand. I shall live to argue cases in this low-town in civil and criminal that will morris neither myself nor my friends." With his popular qualities it was inevitable that he should take a prominent part in the sharp political contests of his native state. He espoused the cause of Gen. Jackson with ardor, and in 1829 was elected to represent his native town in the legisla- ture, where, by three subsequent elections, he served four years, the last two as speaker, for which office he received three fourths of all the votes of the house. In 1838 he was elected to represent his na- tive district in the lower house of congress, where he remained four years. He served on the judici- ary and other important committees, but did not participate largely in the debates. That could not be expected of so young a man in a body contain- ing the ablest lawyers in the country. He had already acquired a national reputation. But in February, 1834, he made a vigorous and sensible speech against the Revolutionary claims bill, con- demning it as opening the door to fraud. In De- cember, 1833, he spoke and voted against receiving petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. In June, 1836, he spoke against a bill making appropriations for the military academy at West Point. He contended that that institution was aristocratic in its tendencies, that a profes- sional soldier and standing armies are always dangerous to the liberties of the people, and that in war the republic must rely upon her citizen militia. His experience in the Mexican war afterward convinced him that such an institution is necessary, and he frankly acknowledged his error. It is hardly necessary to add that while in congress Mr. Pierce sustained President Jackson in opposing the so-called internal improvement policy. In 1837 he was elected to the U. S. senate. He was the youngest member of that body, and had barely arrived at the legal age for that office when he took his seat. In January, 1840, he spoke upon the bill to organize the United States militia for war from the attacks of his political opponents. In December of the same year he advocated and carried through the senate a bill granting a pension to an aged woman whose husband, Isaac Davis, had been among the first to fall at Concord bridge on 19 April, 1775. In July, 1841, he spoke against the bank bill, and in favor of an amendment prohibit- ing members of congress from drawing the money of the bank. At the same session he made a strong speech against the removal of government officials for their political opinions, in violation of the pledge to the contrary which the Whig leaders had given to the country in the canvass of 1840. During the five years that he remained in the sen- ate it numbered among its members Benton, Bain- chum, Clay, Cram, Wilmot, Webster, and Silas Wright, an array of veteran statesmen and intel- lectual giants who had long been party leaders, and who occupied the whole field of debate. Among such men the young, modest, and comparatively obscure member from New Hampshire could not, with what his biographer calls "his exquisite sense of propriety," force himself into a conspicuous position. There is abundant proof, however, that he won the friendship of his fellow associates.
In 1842 he resigned his seat in the senate, with the intention of permanently withdrawing from public life. He again returned to the practice of law, settling in Concord, N. H., whither he had removed his family in 1838, and where he ever afterward resided. In 1845 he was tendered by the governor of New Hampshire, but declined, an appointment to the U. S. senate to fill the vacancy occasioned by the appointment of Levi Woodbury to the U. S. supreme bench. He also declined the nomination for governor tendered to him by the Democratic state convention. He declined, too, an appointment to the office of U. S. attorney-general, offered to him in 1845 by President Polk, by a letter in which he said that when he left the senate he did so "with the fixed purpose never again to be voluntarily separated from his family for any considerable time, except at the call of his country in time of war." But while thus evincing his determination to remain in private life, he did not lose his interest in political affairs. In the councils of his party in New Hampshire he exercised a very great influence. He zealously advocated the annexation of Texas, declaring that, while he preferred it free, he would take it with slavery rather than have it at all. When John P. Hale, in 1845, accepted a Democratic renomination to congress, in a letter denouncing annexation, the Democratic leaders called another convention, which repudiated him and nominated another candidate. Through the long struggle that followed, Pierce led the Democrats of his state with great skill and unflinching courage, though not always to success. He found in Hale a rival worthy of his steel. A debate between the two champions, in the old North church at Concord, aroused the keenest interest throughout the state. Each party was satisfied with its own advocate; but to contend against the rising anti-slavery sentiment of the north was a hopeless struggle. The stars in their courses fought against slavery. Hale was elected to the U. S. senate in 1846 by a coalition of Whigs and Free-soilers, and several advocates of free-soil principles were elected to congress from New Hampshire before 1850.

In 1846 the war with Mexico began, and New Hampshire was called on for a battalion of troops. Pierce's military ability was rekindled. He immediately enrolled himself as a private in a volunteer company that was organized at Concord, enthusiastically began studying tactics and drilling in the ranks, and was soon appointed colonel of the 9th regiment of infantry. On 3 March, 1847, he received from President Polk the commission of brigadier-general in the volunteer army. On 27 March, 1847, he embarked at Newport, R. I., in the bark of Repliquer with Col. Randam, three companies of the 9th regiment of infantry, and the officers of that detachment, arriving at Vera Cruz on 28 June. Much difficulty was experienced in procuring mules for transportation, and the brigade was detained in that unhealthy locality, exposed to the ravages of yellow fever until 14 July, when it began its march to join the main army under Gen. Winfield Scott at Puebla. The junction was effected (after a toilsome march and several encounters with guerillas) on 6 Aug., and the next day Gen. Scott began his advance on the city of Mexico. On 19 Aug. the battle of Contreras was fought. The 9th regiment was kept in reserve, and when the troops, occupied a strongly intrenched camp. Gen. Scott's plan was to divert the attention of the enemy by a feigned attack on his front, while his flank could be turned and his retreat cut off. But the flanking movement being much delayed, the attack in front (in which Gen. Pierce led his brigade) became a desperate struggle, in which 4,000 raw recruits, who could not use their artillery, fought 7,000 disciplined soldiers, strongly intrenched and raining round shot and shells upon their assailants. To reach the enemy, the Americans who attacked in front were obliged to cross the pedregal, or lava-bed, the crater of an extinct volcano, bristling with sharp, jagged, splintered rocks, which afforded shelter to the Mexican skirmishers. Gen. Pierce's horse stepped on one of these, fell, breaking his own leg and throwing his rider, whose knee was seriously injured. Though suffering severely, and urged by the surgeon to withdraw, Gen. Pierce refused to leave his troops. Mounting the horse of an officer who had just been mortally wounded, he rode forward and remained in the saddle until eleven o'clock at night. The next morning Gen. Pierce was in the saddle at daybreak, but the enemy's camp was stormed in the rear by the flanking party, and those of its defenders who escaped death or capture fled in confusion toward Churubusco, where Santa Anna had concentrated his forces. Though Gen. Pierce's injuries were intensely painful, and though Gen. Scott advised him to leave the field, he insisted on remaining. His brigade and that of Gen. James Shields, in obeying an order to make a detour and attack the enemy in the rear, struck the Mexican reserves, by whom they were largely outnumbered, and a bloody and obstinate struggle followed. By this diversion Gen. Worth and Pillow were enabled to carry the head of the bridge at the front, and Gen. Pierce won the victory with overwhelming numbers. In the advance of Pierce's brigade his horse was unable to cross a ditch or ravine, and he was compelled to dismount and proceed on foot. Overcome by the pain of his injured knee, he sank to the ground, unable to proceed, but refused to be taken from the field, and remained under fire until the enemy were put to flight. After these defeats, Santa Anna, to gain time, opened negotiations for peace, and Gen. Scott appointed Gen. Pierce one of the commissioners to agree upon terms of armistice. The truce lasted a fortnight, when Gen. Scott, discovering Santa Anna's insincerity, again began hostilities. The singularly battles of Molino del Rey and Chapultepec soon followed, on 14 Sept., 1847, the city of Mexico was capitulated, and the war was virtually over. Though Gen. Pierce had little opportunity to distinguish himself as a general in this brief war, he displayed a personal bravery and a regard for the welfare of his men that won him the highest credit. He also gained the ardent friendship of those with whom he came in contact, and that friendship did much of his future elevation. On the return of peace in December, 1847, Gen. Pierce returned to his home and to the practice of his profession. Soon after this the New Hampshire legislature presented him, in behalf of the state, with a fine sword.
In 1850 Gen. Pierce was elected to represent the city of Concord in a constitutional convention, and when that body deliberated he was framed for promotion by a nearly unanimous vote. During his session he made strenuous and successful efforts to procure the adoption of an amendment abolishing the religious test that made none but Protestants eligible to office. But that amendment failed of adoption by the people, though practically and by common consent the decision was disregarded. On 1852, Gen. Pierce was again engaged in his profession. As an advocate he was never surpassed, if ever equalled, at the New Hampshire bar. He had the external advantages of an orator, a handsome, expressive face, an elegant figure, graceful and impressive gesticulation, and a clear, musical voice, which kindled the blood of his hearers like the notes of a trumpet, or moved them to tears by its pathos. His manner had a charm that sprang from the kindness of his heart and contributed much to his political and professional success. His perceptions were keen, and his mind seized at once the vital points of a case, while his ready command of language enabled him to present them to an audience so clearly that they could not be misunderstood. He had an intuitive knowledge of human nature. The masterly illustrations that he drew from the daily lives of his strong-minded auditors made his speeches doubly effective. He was not a diligent student, nor a reader of many books, yet the keenness of his intellect and his natural capacity for reasoning often enabled him, with but little preparation, to argue successfully intricate questions of law. The success of the democratic party in the free states so strongly favored the exclusion of slavery from the territory ceded by Mexico that their leaders were compelled to yield, and from 1847 till 1850 their resolutions and platforms advocated free-soil principles. This was especially the case in New Hampshire, and even Gen. Pierce's great popularity could not stem the tide. But in 1850 the passage of the so-called "compromise measures" by Congress, the chief of which were the fugitive-slave law and the admission of California as a free state, raised a new issue. Adherence to those measures became to a great extent a test of party fidelity in both the Whig and Democratic parties. As a Whig candidate Gen. Pierce zealously championed them in New Hampshire, and at a dinner given to him and other personal friends in the home of Gen. Wm. C. C. Claflin at his farm-house in Franklin, N. H., Pierce, in an eloquent speech, assured the great Whig statesman that if his own party rejected him for his 23d of March speech, the Democracy would "lift him so high that his feet would not touch the stars." Finally the masses of both the great parties gave to the compromise measures a substantial acquiescence, on the ground that they were the best means to any adjustment of the question. The Democratic national convention met at Baltimore, 12 June, 1852. After thirty-five balloting for a candidate for president, in which Gen. Pierce's name did not appear, the Virginia delegation brought it forward, and on the 49th ballot he was nominated by 282 votes to 11 for all others. James Buchanan of Pennsylvania, and William L. Marcy, of New York, were his chief rivals. Gen. Winfield Scott, the Whig candidate, was unsatisfactory both to the north and to the south. Webster and his friends leaned toward Pierce, and in the election in November, Scott carried only Massachusetts, Vermont, Kentucky, and Tennessee, with 42 votes, while Pierce carried all the other states with 254 votes. The Whig party had received its death-stroke, and dissolved.

In his inaugural address, 4 March, 1853, President Pierce maintained the constitutionality of slavery and the fugitive-slave law, defended slavery constitution, and hoped that "no sectional orambitions or factional excitement might again threaten the durability of our institutions, or obscure the light of our prosperity." On 7 March he announced as his cabinet William L. Marcy, of New York, secretary of state; James Guthrie, of Kentucky, secretary of the treasury; Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, secretary of war; Gideon Welles, of Connecticut, secretary of the navy; and Caleb Cushing, of Massachusetts, attorney-general. This cabinet was one of eminent ability, and is the only one in our history that remained unchanged for four years. In 1853 a boundary dispute arose between the United States and Mexico, which was settled by negotiation and resulted in the acquisition of a part of the territory, which was organized under the name of Arizona in 1853. Proposed routes for a railroad to the Pacific were explored, and voluminous reports thereon published under the direction of the war department. A controversy with Great Britain respecting the fisheries was adjusted by the treaty of 1854, concluded by Mr. A. T. C. Kotaska, a Hungarian refugee, who was seized at Smyrna by an Austrian vessel and given up on the demand of the captain of an American ship-of-war, excited great interest in Europe and redounded to the credit of our government. (See INGRAHAM, DUNCA N NATHANIEL.) In 1854 a treaty was negotiated at Washington between the United States and Great Britain providing for commercial reciprocity for ten years between the former country and the Canadian provinces. That treaty and one negotiated by Gen. Perry with Japan, which opened the ports of that hitherto unknown country to commerce, were ratified at the same session of the Senate. In the spring of 1854, Greytown in Nicaragua was bombarded and mostly burned by the U. S. frigate "Cyane," in retaliation for the refusal of the authorities to make reparations for the property of American citizens residing there, which had been stolen. In the following year William Walker, with a party of filibusters, invaded Nicaragua, and in the autumn of 1856 won an ephemeral success, which induced President Pierce to recognize the minister sent by him to Washington. In the winter of 1856 President Pierce and the home of Gen. Wm. S. Crampton, the British minister at Washington, recruits for the British army in the Crimea were secretly enlisted in this country. President Pierce demanded Mr. Crampton's recall, which being refused, the president dismissed not only the minister, but also the British consul at New York, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati, for their illicit expenditures. These claims were finally adjusted by negotiation, and a new British legation was sent to Washington. In 1855 President Pierce signed bills to reorganize the diplomatic and consular system of the United States, to organize the court of claims, to provide a retired list for the navy, and to confer the title of lieutenant-general on Winfield Scott. President Pierce was pardoned the acts of conviction which Jefferson and Jackson had insisted on. In 1854 he vetoed a bill making appropriations for public works, and another granting 10,000,000 acres of public lands to the states for relief of indigent insane. In February, 1855, he vetoed a bill for the payment of the French spoilation claims, and in the following month another increasing the appropriation for the Collins line of steamers.
The policy of Pierce's administration upon the question of slavery evoked an extraordinary amount of popular excitement, and led to tremendous and lasting results. That policy was based on the theory that the institution of slavery was imbedded in and guaranteed by the constitution of the United States, and that therefore it was the duty of the National government to protect it. The two chief measures in support of such a policy, which originated with and were supported by Pierce's administration, were the conference of American diplomats that promulgated the so-called "Ostend Manifesto," and the opening of the territories of Kansas and Nebraska. Frightening expeditions, sent from the United States to Cuba under Lopez, in 1859 and 1861, aroused anxiety in Europe as to the attitude of our government toward such enterprises. In 1852 Great Britain and France proposed to the United States a tripartite treaty by which the three powers should disclaim all intention of acquiring Cuba, and disavow any such attempt by any power. On 1 Dec., 1852, Edward Everett, who was then secretary of state, declined to act, declaring, however, that our government would not recognize Spain's title to the island. On 16 Aug., 1854, President Pierce directed James Buchanan, John Y. Mason, and Pierre Soule, the American ministers to Great Britain, France, and Spain, to meet and discuss the Cuban question. They met at Ostend, 10 January, 1855, and the triple ministerial conference to their government that famous dispatch known as the "Ostend Manifesto." It declared that it was "not improbable that the United States may at some time be placed in the situation of having to discriminate between a French and a British claim to Cuba, and it is our duty to the Union that may be involved to determine which of these claims is entitled to recognition." Doubtless such was then his hope and belief. In the following January, Mr. Douglas, chairman of the senate committee on the territories, introduced a bill to organize the territories of Kansas and Nebraska, which permitted slavery north of the parallel of 36° 30', a region from which it had been forever excluded by the Missouri compromise of 1820. That bill was Mr. Douglas's bill for the presidency. Southern politicians could not reject it and retain their influence at home. Northern politicians who opposed it gave up all hope of national pretense, which then seemed to depend on southern support. The defeat of the bill seemed likely to sever and destroy the party. Slavery had won but there never was a more costly victory. The remainder of Pierce's term was embittered by civil war in Kansas and the disasters of his party in the free states. In 1854, with a Democratic majority in both houses of the New Hampshire legislature, the influence of the national administration could not secure the election of a Democratic U. S. senator, and at the next election in 1855 the Democracy lost control of the state. The repeal of the Missouri compromise was soon followed by organized efforts in the free states to fill Kansas with anti-slavery settlers. To such movements the south responded by armed invasions. On 30 March, 1855, a territorial legislature was elected in Kansas by armed bands from Missouri, who crossed the border to vote and then returned to their homes. That initiative gave to the pro-slavery men a technical advantage, which the Democratic leaders were swift to recognize. The pro-slavery legislature met at Platte Grove on 2 July, 1855, and enacted an intolerant and oppressive slave-law code, which was mainly a transcript of the laws of Missouri. The free-state settlers thereupon called a constitutional convention, which met on 25 Oct., 1855, and framed a state constitution, which was adopted by the people by a vote of 1,531 to 46. A general assembly was then elected under such constitution, which, after passing some preliminary laws, met on 20 Jan., 1856, and began to frame a code of laws, and took measures to apply to congress for the admission of Kansas into the Union as a state. Andrew H. Reeder was elected by the free-state men their delegate to congress. A majority of the actual settlers of Kansas were in favor of her admission into the Union as a free state; but all their efforts to that end were treated by their opponents in the territory, and by the Democratic national administration, as rebellion against lawful authority. This conflict kept the territory in a state of confusion and bloodshed, and excited party feeling throughout the country to fever heat. It remained unsettled, to vex Buchanan's administration and further develop the gerrys of disunion and civil war. On 26 Jan., 1856, a national Democratic convention met at Cincinnati to nominate a candidate for president. On the first ballot James Buchanan had 143 votes, Pierce 122, Douglas 33, Cass 6, Pierce's vote gradually diminished, and on the 14th ballot Buchanan was nominated unanimously. In August the house of representatives attached to the army appropriation bill a proviso that "no part of the army should be employed to enforce the laws of the Kansas territorial legislature until congress should have declared its validity." The senate refused to concur, and congress adjourned without passing the bill. It was immediately conveyed by proclamation, and passed the bill without the proviso. The president's message in his message of 26 Nov., 1856, which followed was mainly devoted to Kansas affairs, and was strenuously hostile to the free-state party. His becrowned on 3 March, 1857, and he returned to his home in Concord. Soon afterward he visited Madeira, and extended his travels to Great Britain and the continent of Europe. He remained abroad nearly three years, returning to Concord early in 1860. In the presidential election of that year he took no active part, but his influence was cast against Douglas and in favor of Breckinridge.

In a letter addressed to Jefferson Davis, under date of 6 Jan., 1860, he wrote: "Without discussing the question of right, of abstract power to secede, I have never believed that actual disruption of the Union can occur without bloodshed; and If, through the madness of northern Abolitionists, that dire calamity must come, the fighting will not be along Mason and Dixon's line merely. It will be within our own borders, in our own streets, between the two classes of citizens to whom I have referred. Those who defy law and scout constitutional obligations will, if ever resolved at all, must meet one's keenest weapon at last. I have tried to impress upon our own people, especially in New Hampshire and Connecticut, where the only elections are to take place during the coming spring, that, while our Union meetings are all in the right direction and well enough for the present, they will not be worth the paper upon which their resolutions are written, unless we can overthrow abolitionism at the polls and repeal the unconstitutional and obnoxious laws, which in the cause of 'personal liberty' have been placed upon our statute-books."

On 21 April, 1861, nine days after the disunionists had begun civil war by firing on Fort Sumter, he addressed a Union mass-meeting at Concord, and urged the people to sustain the government against the avalanche of Pennsylvania that time until his death he lived in retirement at Concord. To the last he retained his hold upon the hearts of his personal friends, and the exquisite urbanity of his earlier days. His wife and his three children had preceded him to the tomb.

Some years after Pierce's death the legislature of New Hampshire, in behalf of the state, placed his portrait beside his speaker's desk in the hall of the house of representatives at Concord. Time has softened the harsh judgment that his political foes passed upon him in the heat of party strife and civil war. His generosity and kindness of heart are gratefully remembered by those who knew him, and particularly by the younger members of his profession, whom he was always ready to aid and advise. It is remembered that in his professional career he was ever willing, at whatever risk to his fortune or popularity, to shield the poor and obscure from oppression and injustice. It is remembered, too, that he sought in public life no opportunities for personal gain. His integrity was above suspicion. After nine years' service in congress and in the senate of the United States, after eight years of successful professional career, and four years in the presidency, his estate hardly amounted to $72,000. In his whole political career he always stood for a strict construction of the constitution, for economy and frugality in public affairs, and for a strict accountability of public officials to their constituents. No political or personal influence could induce him to shield those whom he believed to have defrauded the government. Pierce had ambition, but greed for public office was foreign to his nature. Few, if any, instances can be found in our history where a man of thirty-eight, in the full vigor of health, voluntarily gave up a seat in the U. S. Senate, which he was apparently sure to retain as long as he wished. His refusal at the age of forty-one to leave his law-practice for the chair of attorney-general in Polk's cabinet is almost without a parallel. Franklin Pierce, too, was a true patriot and a sincere lover of his country. The Revolutionary services of a father whom he revered were constantly in his thoughts. Two of his brothers, with that father's consent, took an honorable part in the war of 1812. He was a gallant and not a mean warrior. Mr. Neil, as gallant an officer as ever fought for his country. To decline a cabinet appointment and exist as a private soldier in the army of his country were acts which one who knew his early training and his chivalrous character might reasonably expect of him. But for slavery and the questions growing out of it, his administration would have passed into history as one of the most successful in our national life. To judge him justly, his political training and the circumstances that enveloped him must be taken into account. Like his honored father, he believed that the statesmen of the Revolution had agreed to maintain the legal rights of the slave-holders, and that without such agreement we should have had no Federal constitution or Union. He believed that good faith required that agreement to be performed. In that belief all or nearly all the leaders of both the great parties were agreed. However divided on other questions, on that the south was united. The price of its political support was compliance with its demands, and both the old parties (however reluctantly) paid the price. Political leaders believed that, unless it was paid, civil war and secession would result, and their patriotism re-enforced their party spirit and personal ambition. Among them all there were probably few whose conduct would have been essentially different from that of Pierce had they been in the same situation. He gave his support to the repeal of the Missouri compromise with great reluctance, and in the belief that the measure would satisfy the south and thus avert from the country the doom of civil war and disunion. See the lives by Nathaniel Hawthorne (Boston, 1852) and D. W. Barbell (Auburn, 1853), and "Review of President Pierce's Administration," by A. E. Carroll (Boston, 1856). The steel plate is from a portrait by George P. A. Healy. The vignette on page 8 is a view of President Pierce's birthplace, and that on page 10 represents his grave, which is in the cemetery at Concord, N. H.—His wife, Jane Means Appleton, b. in Hampton, N. H., 12 March, 1807; d. in Andover, Mass., 2 Dec., 1863, was a daughter of the Rev. Jesse Appleton, D. D. (q. c.), president of Bowdoin College. She was brought up in an atmosphere of cultivated and refined Christian influences, she was thoroughly educated, and grew to womanhood surrounded by most congenial circumstances. She was married in 1834. Public observation was extremely painful to her, and she always preferred the quiet of her New England home to the glare and glitter of fashionable life in Washington. A friend said of her: "How well she filled her station as wife, mother, daughter, sister, and friend, those only can tell who knew her in these private relations. In this quiet sphere she found her joy, and here her gentle but powerful influence was deeply and constantly felt, through wise counsels and delicate suggestions, the purest, finest tastes, and a devoted life." She was the mother of three children, all boys, but none survived her. Two died in early youth, and the youngest, Benjamin, was killed in an accident on the Boston and Maine Railroad while running from Andover to Lawrence, Mass., on 6 Jan., 1853, only two months before his father's inauguration as president. Mr. and Mrs. Pierce were with him at the time, and the boy, a bright lad of thirteen years, had been amusing them with his conversation just before the accident. The car was thrown from the track and dashed against the rocks, and the lad met his death instantly. Both parents were deeply affected by the shock of the accident, and Mrs. Pierce never recovered from it. The sudden bereavement shattered the small remnant of her remaining health, yet she performed her task at the White House nobly, and sustained the dignity of her husband's office. Mrs. Robert E. Lee wrote in a private letter: "I have known many of the ladies of the White House, and none more truly excellent than the afflicted wife of President Pierce. Her health was a bar to any great effort on her part to meet the expectations of the public in her high position, but she was a refined, extremely religious, and well-educated lady." She was buried by the side of her children, in the cemetery at Concord, N. H., where also the remains of Gen. Pierce lie.

PIERCÉ, Frederick Clifton (parson), author, b. in Worcester county, Mass., 30 July, 1836. He received an academic education, was connected with the press in Massachusetts, and in 1850 removed to Illinois. He has served in the Illinois militia, and he also held the rank of colonel on the staff of the Governor of the state. Mr. Pierce is a member of the principal historical societies in this country, and he is the author of "Pierce History and Genealogy" (Boston, 1879); "The Harwood Genealogy" (1879); "History of Barre, Mass." (1880); "History of Grafton, Mass." (Worcester, 1880); "Pierce History and Genealogy" (1880); "History of Rockford, III." (Rockford, 1886); "History of Andover, Mass." (Andover, 1887); "Genealogy of the Piers, Piers, Harwood, and Hare Families." (Andover, 1887). He has been a great observer and has published "The Free-soil party in Massachusetts". He was a member of the Massachusetts legislature in 1869-70, and in 1869 was instrumental in getting a bill passed by both branches of the legislature removing the statutory prohibition upon the formation of military companies composed of colored men. He was elected to congress as a Republican to fill the vacancy caused by the death of William Whiting, was re-elected for the next congressional term, and served from 1 Dec., 1873, till 3 March, 1877, when he declined a renomination. In the presidential election of 1884 he was prominent in organizing an independent movement in support of Cleveland, and had since taken a leading part in the effort to check legislation and reduce the taxes on imports. He was mayor of Boston in 1872, and again in 1878. More than half a million of his large fortune was left for public objects and institutions and $200,000 presented to a poet and his family. His brother, Edward Lillie, author, b. in Stoughton, Mass., 29 March, 1855, was elected to Congress in 1878. He was graduated at Brown and at Harvard law-school, receiving the degree of LL. D. from Brown. He was a delegate to the National Republican convention in 1860. At the beginning of the civil war he enlisted as a private in the 3d Massachusetts regiment, and served till July, 1861, when he was detailed to collect the negroes at Hampton and set them to work on the intrenchments of that town. This was the beginning of the employment of negroes on U. S. military works. In December, 1861, the secretary of the treasury despatched Mr. Pierce to Port Royal to examine into the condition of the negroes on the sea islands. In February, 1862, he returned to Washington and reported to the government, and in March he was appointed to examine negroes and plantations on those islands. He took with him nearly sixty teachers and superintendents, established schools, and suggested the formation of freedmen's aid societies, by means of which great good was accomplished. In June, 1862, Mr. Pierce made his second report to the government setting forth what he had done. These reports were afterward printed in the "Rebellion Record," and were favorably reviewed both in Europe and the United States. The care of the negroes on the islands having been transferred to the war department, he was asked to continue in charge under its authority, but declined. He was offered the military governorship of South Carolina, but was not confirmed by the Senate. He was elected for the 3d Massachusetts district from October, 1863, till May, 1866, district attorney in 1866-69, secretary of the board of state charities in 1869-74, and a member of the legislature in 1875-6. He was a member of the Republican national conventions of 1876 and 1884, and in December, 1878, was appointed by President Hayes assistant treasurer of the United States. He was also one of a deputation of 29 given to the white and colored people of St. Helena island, the scene of his former labors, a library of 800 volumes. He also originated the public library of Milton, Mass., where he resided, and had been a trustee since its organization. He had been a lecturer at the Boston law-school since its foundation. In 1843 Mr. Pierce visited Europe several times. His second visit was for the inspection of European prisons, reformatories and asylums, and the result is given in his report for 1853 as secretary of the board of state charities. Mr. Pierce was a frequent contributor to newspapers and periodicals, and published numerous articles and addresses, and "American Railroad Law" (New York, 1857); "Memorials of Old Masters," (Boston, 1862); "Piers, Piers, Harwood, and Hare Families," (Andover, 1887). He also edited "Walter's American Law" (1869), and compiled "Index of the Special Railroad Laws of Massachusetts," (1874).

PIERCÉ, Henry Niles, P. E. bishop, b. in Pawtucket, R. I., 19 Oct., 1829; d. in Fayetteville, Ark., 5 Sept., 1859. He was graduated at Brown in 1842, was ordained to the Gospel ministry in April, 1848, by Bishop Freeman, and priest, in the same church, 3 Jan., 1849, by the same bishop. He spent the early years of his ministry in missionary work in Washington county, Tex., held charges in New Orleans and in Rainwater, N. J., in 1854-57, and became rector of St. John's church, Mobile, Ala., in 1857. He removed to Illinois in 1858 and accepted the rectory of St. Paul's church, Springfield. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Alabama in 1862, and that of LL. D. from William and Mary in 1869. He was elected missionary bishop of Arkansas and Indian territory, and was consecrated in Christ church, Mobile, 25 Jan., 1859. The next year Arkansas was made an independent diocese, and Bishop Pierce became dean, still retaining charge of the Indian territory mission. Bishop Pierce has published numerous occasional sermons, essays, and addresses, and is author of "The Agnostic and other Poems" (New York, 1884).

PIERCE, John antiquary, b. in Dorchester (now part of Boston), Mass., 14 July, 1773; d. in Brookline, Mass., 24 Aug., 1849. He was a descendant in the sixth generation from Robert and Anne (Greenway) Pierce, who were among the first settlers of the town of Dorchester. He was graduated at Harvard in 1793. He taught two years at Leicester academy, then studied theology with Rev. Thaddeus Mason Harris, of Dorchester, on 3 Dec., 1796, settled at Brookline, Mass., and was ordained pastor there, 15 March, 1797. In 1822 Harvard conferred on him the degree of D. D. He continued the sole pastor of the church in Brookline for fifty years. In 1837, on his semi-centennial, March 15, 1847, he preached a Jubilee sermon in which he gave much historical and statistical information relating to the church and town. In October, 1848, Rev. Frederick X. Knapp was settled as his colleague. Dr. Pierce was well known for his genealogical and historical researches, and was an authority on these subjects. He was a member of various historical societies, for many years secretary of the Massachusetts Historical Society, of which he was one of the founders, and was an earnest worker in the cause of temperance and all other social reforms. He was devoted to the interests of Harvard, of whose board of overseers he was secretary for thirty-three years. He was present at sixty-three commencements, and for fifty-four years led the singing of the hymn of "Phanerosis" at the commencement dinner. In the contest that divided the Congregational church of Massachusetts he would willingly have avoided taking sides, and preferred being called simply a Christian, although his feelings and affiliations were with the Unitarians, with which body his church finally united. His published works consist chiefly of sermons and addresses, but his memoirs, in eighteen quarto manuscript volumes, were bequeathed by him to the Massachusetts Historical Society, and give a full and faithful account of the theological history of his times, which, from his habits of research, exactness, and absolute and unquestioned truthfulness, may be relied upon as the best authority. They can be consulted at the society's library, but restrictions limit their circulation.

PIERCE, John Davis, elder, b. in Chesterfield, N. H., 18 Feb., 1797; d. in Medford, Mass., 5 April, 1882. He was brought up in Massachusetts, where he remained till 1817, and was graduated at Brown in 1822. He then became principal of an academy in New England, entered the theological seminary at Princeton, and in 1824 became pastor of a Congregational church in Oneida county, N. Y., where he remained till 1830. In that year he was principal of Goshen academy, Conn., and in 1831 he went to reside in Michigan. In 1847-8 he was a member of the legislature, and of the State constitutional convention in 1850. While in the legislature he secured the passage of the bill for the protection of women in their rights of property, the first of its kind that was passed in any state. He was superintendent of public instruction for two years, during that time edited and published the "Journal of Education," and also edited at one time the "Democratic Exponent" at Marshall. He is credited with being the author of the Michigan free-school system.

PIERCE, Nathaniel, elder, b. in Halifax county, N. C., 17 March, 1787; d. in Sparta, Ga., 9 Nov., 1839. Early in life his parents moved to Barnwell county, N. C., where, after six months' schooling, he entered the ministry of the Methodist church in 1804. In 1809 he moved to Greene county, Ga., and during the war of 1812 he was a chaplain in the army. He then studied medicine, was graduated at Philadelphia, and removing to Greensborough, practised and preached there for several years. He was a delegate to the general conference of his church in 1836, 1838, and 1841, and after the organization of the southern church in 1846 sat in its highest court. He took part in the Louisville conference of 1874, where he had a son and a grandson, and, notwithstanding his great age, he preached occasionally until within a few months of his death. In 1878 he published a series of theological essays,—his son, George Forster, early in E. b. in Greensborough, Ga., 1817; d. near Spartanburg, S. C., 9 Sept., 1884, was graduated at Franklin college, Athens, in 1829, and afterward studied law, but, abandoning it for theology, was received in 1831 into the Georgia conference of the Methodist Episcopal church. For one year he was a member of the South Carolina legislature. He soon attained great popularity as a public speaker, and was appointed to Augusta, South Carolina, and Charleston before he had been in the ministry five years. In his fifth year he was returned to Augusta, and in his sixth, seventh, and eighth he was presiding elder of that district. He filled various important pastoral and collegiate posts, the last of which was the presidency of Emory college, Oxford, Ga. While he was there he was elected an honorary member of the Western University of Pennsylvania. In 1854 Bishop Pierce was a man of great eloquence, and had many friends in all parts of the country. Notwithstanding the alienation of the two branches of his church, he was frequently invited to deliver addresses in the north. His conversational powers were remarkable, and in wit he had few superiors. On one occasion a young man, trying out his oratorical powers in vainly stating "Bishop, our heads are the same size." "Yes," said the bishop, "outside." The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Transylvania university, and that of LL.D. by Randolph Macon college. He was personally the most popular of the bishops of his church; somewhat autocratic and self-complacent, but very kind and persuasive; an admirable oracle of sound and well-considered opinions. In his early years he was in infirm health, but he often made great oratorical efforts at a time when most men would have considered themselves too ill to venture abroad. He was the author of "Incidents of Western Travel" (Nashville, 1854).

PIERCE, William, statesman, b. in Georgia about 1740; d. in Savannah, 10 Dec., 1789. He entered the army of the Revolution, was aide-de-camp to Gen. Nathaniel Greene, and was presented with a sword by congress in recognition of his gallant services. He was a delegate from Georgia to the Continental congress in 1776-7, and to the convention that framed the constitution of the United States, but, being opposed to the plan that was adopted, withdrew without signing the document. He published his impressions of the members of the convention in a Savannah newspaper long afterward, and they are now in the Force collection in the library of congress.

PIEROLA, Nicolas de (pey-oh-roh-lah), Peruvian naturalist, b. in Campana, department of Arequipa, in 1758; d. in Lima, 24 Jan., 1817. He began the study of law at the University of San Marcial, and went in 1814 to Madrid, where he was admitted to the bar in 1815, and began the practice of his profession. He was elected deputy to the Cortes for his native province in 1820, appointed professor of jurisprudence in the Central university of Madrid, and began the study of natural history. After the independence of his country was established he resigned his post, returned to Peru, and was elected in 1827 deputy to the national congress. In 1828 he was appointed director-general of mines, but he resigned in 1833 to become the founder of the scientific weekly "El Telégrafo." He was elected director of the National museum of Lima in 1845, and founded in 1847 another scientific and literary paper, "El Ateneo." He was appointed a member of the committee on public instruction, and in 1852 called by President Castilla to his cabinet as-secretary of the traverse department, but in 1854 he resigned, and lived therefor entirely for science. He wrote in conjunction with his friend and colleague, Mariano Eduardo Rivero, who contributed the matter on the mineral kingdom, "Memorial de Çienenas Naturales" (Lima, 1856). His name has been given to a new species of violet found in the Amazon valley, the Viola Pierolana. His son, Nicolás, b. in Camana, 5 Jan., 1839, was educated in the College of Santo Toribio in Lima, admitted to the bar in 1869, and founded a review, "El Progreso Catolico." In 1864 he became editor of "El Tiempo," in which he defended the administration of Gen. Juan A. Pezet. When Prado's revolution was successful, he went to Europe, where he traveled extensively, but in January, 1869, he was appointed by the Peruvian government to accompany the ships of commerce to Callao, and thenceforth prized the privilege he shared with his credit the charge of the great public works that were executed by the latter, and the discredit of the munificent loans that were contracted to perform them. After the death of Batta, Pierola was impeached under Prado's administration for misappropriation of public funds, and, although he was honorably acquitted of dishonest practice, he never recovered the position he had acquired. He went to Peru but was defeated by Admiral Lizardo Montero, Cuesta de los Ángeles. He continued to conspire, and in 1877 invaded Peru, but was taken prisoner and banished to Chili. At the beginning of the war between Peru and Chili he offered his services to his country, and he was elected by the President to return to Peru in 1879. After the flight of Prado several battles of the guerrilla war were fought, and Pierola, at the head of one of them, marched against the government palace, but was defeated by the minister of war, and took possession of Callao on 22 Dec. The archbishop of Lima intervened, and on the next day Pierola made his entry into the capital, and was proclaimed by the masses supreme chief of the republic. He made strenuous efforts to hurry reinforcements and arms to the front, and when the Chilian army appeared before Lima he organized the defense, and, assuming the command-in-chief, fought at Chorrillos and Miraflores in January, 1881. When all was lost, Pierola retired to the town of Callao, in the mountains, sending Montero, his brother (b. in Lima, 10 Sept. 1838; d. in Vergennes, Vt., 6 Jan., 1882) to receive a common-school education, studied law in Litchfield law-school, and was graduated in 1882. He began practice at Pittsford, Vt., and in 1832 removed to Vergennes. He was representative of his town in the legislature in 1841, and state senator in 1854-7. In 1857 he was elected associate judge of the supreme court of the state. In 1865 he became chief justice of Vermont, which office he held by continuous elections till his death.

PIERRE, surname of Pieard (pe-air), French buccaneer, b. in Albeville, France, about the year 1624; d. in Costa Rica, Central America, in 1659. He followed the sea for several years, but in 1652, his vessel stopping at the island of Tortuga, he was induced to desert and to join the buccaneers. He attached himself to the fortune of Jacques Nan, called L'olonnis (q. v.), in 1700, became his most trusted lieutenant, participated in the expeditions against the Spanish main, and commanded also a division of the fleet under Sir Henry Morgan that pillaged the Isthmus of Panama. When L'olonnis proposed to attack Guatemala, Pierre refused to accompany him, and, going to the coast of Costa Rica, ravaged the Spanish establishments on Chagres river, took and burned the fortress of Veraguas, and in the interior he was defeated and compelled to re-embark with little booty. In the following year he attacked the coast of Guayaquil, and in 1692 landed at Leogane, pillaging the surrounding country. In 1674, with Moyn Van Vin, he attacked Maracaibo, but without success, and during the following years, either alone or in association with other chieftains, he pillaged the Bay of Honduras and the coasts of Venezuela and Santo Domingo, and amassed enormous riches. He purposed to return to France, when in a last cruise he was shipwrecked off the coast of Costa Rica and perished with all his crew.

PIERREPONT, or PIERPONT, James, clergyman, b. in Roxbury, Mass., in 1639; d. in New Haven, Conn., 14 Nov., 1714. He was the grandson of James Pierrepont, of London, who died in Massachusetts while on a visit to his son John, who came to this country before the Revolution and settled in Roxbury, was a representative to the general court in 1672, and died, 30 Dec., 1690, leaving James his son. James was graduated at Harvard in 1681, and in July, 1685, became pastor of the church at New Haven. In 1688 he was one of three ministers that concerted the plan of founding a college, which took effect in the establishment of Yale in 1700. He was one of the original trustees of that institution, and it was principally through his influence that Elihu Yale was induced to contribute to the college the object of his liberal benefactions. He was a member of the synod at Saybrook in 1709, for the purpose of forming a system that would better secure the ends of church discipline and the benefits of communion among the churches, and is reputed to have drawn up the articles that were adopted as the result of the synod which constitute the "Saybrook platform." He was twice married, and his daughter by the third wife married Jonathan Edwards. Among the clergymen whose names belong to the early history of New England he was the most distinguished for nobility of character, the purity of his aspirations, and the spirituality of his temper. Sereno Edwards Dwight, in his Life of Jonathan Edwards, says that Mr. Pierrepont read lectures to the students in Yale college, as professor of moral philosophy; but this statement is doubted by other authorities. His only publication was a sermon that he preached at Boston, in Cotton Mather's pulpit, in 1712, entitled "Sundry False Hopes of Heaven Discovered and Deceived." In 1887 his portrait, which is shown in the illustration, was presented to Yale by his descendant, Edwards Pierrepont.—His grandson, Hezekiah Beers (Pierrepont), merchant, b. in New Haven, Conn., in 1759; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1818, was educated for commercial pursuits by his father, Isaac Beers, spent several years in the New York custom-house, and then became agent for Messrs. Watson and Greenleaf, of Philadelphia, in the purchase of the National debt, realizing a fortune thereby. In 1782 he established the commercial house of Leffingwell and Pierrepont, in New York city, and did a large business in shipping vessels to the coast of Africa, and in the purchase of私人信息... he has since been actively identified. By his father's will he was charged with the care and development of all the Brooklyn property and the wild lands in Franklin, St. Lawrence, and Lewis counties. On the Brooklyn estate he excavated Furman street, built a retaining wall 750 feet in length to sustain the heights, and created five acres of wharf property by erecting a new bulkhead on the waterfront. Mr. Pierrepont was the first president of the Brooklyn academy of music, and for many years has been active in various Brooklyn societies and financial institutions, also in organizations of the Protestant Episcopal church. — James's great-grandson, Edwards Pierrepont, jurist, b. in North Haven, Conn., 4 March, 1809; d. in Greenpoint, Brooklyn, 30 Aug. 1874. Younger son of John, Jr., was graduated at Yale in 1837 and at the law-school in 1840. In 1845 he removed to New York city, where he became eminent at the bar. In 1857 he was elected a judge of the superior court of the city of New York, in place of Chief-Justice Thomas J. Oakley. A speech that he made a year and a half before the fall of Sumter, in which he predicted the civil war, attracted much attention. In October, 1860, he resigned his seat on the bench and returned to the practice of law, and in 1862 he was appointed by President Lincoln, in consultation with Gen. John A. Dix, to try the prisoners of state that were confined in the various prisons and forts of the United States. In 1864 he was active in organizing the War Democrats in favor of the re-election of Abraham Lincoln. In April, 1866, he was elected a member of the convention for forming a new constitution for the state of New York, and one of the executive committee. He was employed to conduct the prosecution on the part of the government of John H. Surratt, indicted for aiding in the murder of President Lincoln. Judge Pierrepont had been engaged in many celebrated causes, and he was much employed by railroads and other corporations. At the beginning of the civil war he was an active member of the Union defense committee, and one of three that were appointed to proceed to Washington to confer with the government, when all communication was cut off by war of Baltimore after the attack upon the Massachusetts troops. In the presidential elections of 1868 and 1872 he was an ardent supporter of Gen. Grant, by whom he was appointed in 1869 U. S. attorney for the southern district of New York, which office he resigned in July, 1870. In the autumn of that year he was one of the most active members of the committee of seventy in opposition to the Tweed ring. In May, 1873, Judge Pierrepont was appointed U. S. minister to Russia, but declined, and in April, 1875, he became attorney-general of the United States, remaining in the cabinet of President Grant until May, 1876, when he was sent as U. S. minister to Great Britain. During his term of office as attorney-general he was called upon by the secretary of state to give an opinion upon a question of international law, in which were discussed the questions of natural and acquired nationality. This opinion gave him a wide reputation. During Gen. Grant's visit to London, Judge Pierrepont urged upon the queen's ministers the propriety of according the same precedence to him as had been given to the ex-ruler of France. This was done, and other governments followed the example of Great Britain. Judge Pierrepont devoted large attention to the financial system of England. On his return in 1878 he engaged actively in his profession, but afterward retired and had taken especial interest in the financial policy of the country, writing several pamphlets upon the subject. In one, issued in 1877, he advocated an international treaty and claimed that by convention the common rule of law could be established. He had published various orations, including one before the alumni of Yale, (1874). Judge Pierrepont received the honorary degree of LL. D. from Columbia college, Washington, D. C., in 1871. In 1873 the same degree was conferred upon him by Yale. While he was in England Oxford gave him that of D. C. L.—His son, Edwards, b. in New York city, 39 June 1869; d. in Rome, Italy, 14 April, 1885, entered Christ church, Oxford, while his father was minister to Great Britain, and was graduated in June, 1882. After spending a summer in travel upon the continent he returned to the United States and entered Columbia law-school. In May, 1883, accompanied by his father, he journeyed to far North Alaska, publishing on his return "From Fifth Avenue to Alaska" (New York, 1884), for which he was made a fellow of the Royal geographical society of England. In the spring of 1884 he was appointed secretary of legation at Rome, and upon the resignation of the minister, William W. Astor, he was made charge d'affaires, and in 1884 held the position of Envoy Extraordinary. At a later date he moved to New York city.

PIERREON Jean French missionary, b. in France; d. there toward the end of the 17th century. He belonged to the Society of Jesus, and arriving in Canada on 27 June, 1667, devoted himself to the study of the Mohawk language, and was soon able to preach in that dialect. He preached constantly in the seven Mohawk towns, and his success was such that he was considered a skilled artist, and effected more conversions by exhibiting vivid pictures, symbolizing the deaths and destinies of a Christian and pagan Indian, than by his sermons. In his efforts to gain converts he followed the Mohawks everywhere, even to battle. He drew pictures on cards symbolizing the Christian life from the cradle to the grave, and formed with them games which the Indians learned by their camp fires. Once he was ordered from the council by a chief who wished to perform a superstitions ceremony which he knew the missionary would not sanction; but Pierreon turned the insult to his advantage, and, by hints of what might happen if he left the Mohawk valley, excited the fears of the chiefs, who, till then friendly to the French, assembled in the chapel, promised to renounce their god, Ateko, and to abandon their worship of evil spirits and their superstitions dances. The medicine-men buried their turtle-shell rattles and the other badges of their office. There were eighty-four baptisms during the year. Christianly mild persuasion among the tribes. These results were not lasting, however, and when Pierreon was recalled to govern the mission of St. Francis Xavier at La Prairie, most of the Mohawks relapsed into paganism. He continued his missionary labors up to 1679 and perhaps later. He returned to France, but nothing is known of his life afterward, or of the time of his death.
PIERSON, Abraham, clergyman, b. in Yorkshire, England, in 1608; d. in Newark, N. J., 9 Aug. 1678. He was graduated at Cambridge in 1632, and ordained to the ministry of the established church, but, becoming a Nonconformist, emigrated to New Netherland in 1639, and united with the church in Boston. He accompanied a party of emigrants to Long Island, N. Y., a short time afterward, and in 1640 became pastor of the church at South Hampton. He removed with a small part of his congregation to Branford, Conn., in 1647, organized a church there, and was its pastor for twenty-three years. His ministry was eminently successful, especially in his efforts to evangelize the Indians, to whom he preached in their own language, also preparing a catechism (1654). He served as chaplain to the forces that were raised against the Dutch in 1674. In the controversies between the colonies of Connecticut and New Haven in 1642-5 he opposed their union, and, when it took place, resolved to remove with his people out of the colony. He accordingly left Branford in June, 1667, and settled in Newark, N. J., carrying away the church records, and leaving the town with scarcely an inhabitant. Mr. Pierson exercised a commanding influence in the colony. Geo. John Winthrop, who was his personal friend, pronounced him a godly man, and Cotton Mather said of him: "Wherever he came, he was universally regarded as "Some Helps for the Indians in New Haven Colony, to a Further Account of the Progress of the Gospel in New England" (1659).—His son, Abraham, educator, b. in Lynn, Mass., in 1645; d. in Killingworth, Conn., 5 March, 1707, was graduated at Harvard in 1668, ordained to the ministry the next year, and was subsequently pastor in South Hampton, L. I., and in Connecticut. He was a graduate of N. Y. Coll. (1728) and of Killingworth, Conn. He was one of the ten principal clergymen who were elected to "found, form, and govern a college in Connecticut" in 1709, and the next year was chosen its first president, under the title of "rector of Yale," holding office until his death. He composed a system of natural philosophy, which was used as a manual in the college for years, and published "An Answer to the Book of Sermons" (New Haven, 1709). A bronze statue of him, by Lautm Thompson, was erected in the grounds of Yale in 1874.—The first Abraham's descendant, Hamilton Wilcox, clergyman, b. in Bergen, N. Y., 22 Sept., 1817; d. there, 7 Sept., 1888. He was graduated at Union college and at Union theological seminary, in 1848, and became an agent of the American Bible Society in the West Indies. He labored in Kentucky in 1853-8, then became president of Cumberland college, Ky., and in 1862-5 taught freedmen and colored troops, and was a secretary of the Christian commission. Union college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1860. He had published "Thomas Jefferson at Monticello, or the Private Life of Thomas Jefferson, 1743-1803" (London, 1864); "History of the Brush or Old-time Social, Political, and Religious Life in the Southwest" (1884); edited the "American Missionary Memorial" (1853); and contributed to the religious press.

PIAGETTA, Francesco Antonio (pe-gah-feet-ta), Italian navigator, b. in Venice in 1491; d. there in 1533. After receiving a good education, he spent some of his youth in the service of the Venetian republic, and in 1518 he went to Madrid and obtained leave to serve as volunteer under Magellan (q. v.). While awaiting the arrival of the navigator in Seville, Pigafetta occupied his time in studying the exact sciences and the theory of navigation. He embarked on the admiral's ship, and kept a diary of events and of his personal observations. He named the Tehuelche Indians, Patagonians, and is responsible for the story that they were a race of giants. On the return of the expedition in 1522 Pigafetta went immediately to Valladolid, presented Charles V, with a copy of his journal, and received tokens of the monarch's satisfaction. He passed afterward to Rome, where Pope Clement VII. appointed him an honorary officer in his guard, and through the pontiff's intercession he obtained the favor of King Philip II of Spain. He was given leave to proceed to Rhodes, where Pigafetta took the order on 30 Oct., 1524. At requests of Clement VII. and the grand master, Pigafetta wrote a circumstantial relation of Magellan's expedition, of which only three copies were made, one for the grand master, one for the Lateran library, and one for Louisa of Savoy, but this last found its way into the Milan library, while the princess received only an abridged copy. Pigafetta's narrative is the only account of Magellan's expedition, as the history that was written by D'Anghiera by order of Charles V. was destroyed during the storming of Rome by the army of the Constable of Bourbon in 1527. Until the beginning of the 19th century Pigafetta's relation was only known by the abridged copy of the original manuscript which was written by Ambroise Fabre under the title "Le voyage et navigation faites par les Espagnols et les Moluques, des illes qu'ils ont trouve autant voyage, des roys d'Indes, de leur gouvernement et maniere de vivre, avec plusieurs autres choses" (Paris, about 1540). Ramusio translated it into Italian, and published it in his "Voyages" (1566). For nearly three centuries it was the only opinion of Pigafetta's original manuscript that was written in French, when, in 1798, Amadretti discovered in Milan one of the three original copies written in a mixture of French, Italian, and Spanish, which he translated into French as "Relation du premier voyage autour du monde, fait par le Chevalier Pigafetta sur l'escadre de Magellan pendant les années 1519-1520, 1521, 1522" (Paris, 1801). He worked on the original copy of the dialects of the nations that were visited by Pigafetta, and in particular of the inhabitants of Philippine and Molucca islands. The remainder of Pigafetta's life is unknown, but the date of his death is recorded in the archives of Vicenza. He left also a treatise on navigation.

PIGOT, Robert, engraver, b. in New York city, 20 May, 1735; d. in Sycksville, Md., 23 July, 1887. An early inclination to drawing determined him to study engraving, and with that object he went to Philadelphia and became a student under David Edwin, whose manner he closely followed. Upon reaching his majority, he entered into a business arrangement with a fellow-student, Charles Goodman, with whom he associated during several years. At the plates he worked upon bear the firm-name of Goodman and Pigot. Although an engraver of no mean ability, and ardent in his love for his art, he soon abandoned it for holy orders in the Protestant Episcopal church, and was ordained by Bishop White, 30 Nov., 1839. He held several charges in Pennsylvania and Maryland, and was also called to the parochial rectory of Holy Trinity parish, where he remained until his death, attending to his parochial duties until within four years of his decease, and retaining all his faculties unimpaired. He received the degree of D. D.
He was major of the 10th foot in 1784, and lieutenant-colonel in 1784. He commanded the left wing of the British force in the battle of Bunker Hill, and much of their success in that action was due to his bravery and activity. He was promoted colonel of the 38th foot for that battle, became major-general in 1777, had a command in Rhode Island in 1778, and was commissioned lieutenant-general the same year. He succeeded to the baronetcy in 1784.

PIKE, Albert, lawyer, b. in Boston, Mass., 29 Dec., 1806; d. in Washington, D. C., 2 April, 1891. After a course at Harvard he became principal of Newburyport grammar-school. In 1831 he set out for the partially explored regions of the west, travelling by stage to Cincinnati, by steamer to Nashville, thence on foot to Paducah, then by keel-boat down the Ohio and by steamer up the Mississippi. In August, 1831, he accompanied a caravan of ten wagons as far as Taos, New Mexico, and returned to New York, where he spent the winter of 1832-33. In 1834 he took a trip by boat up the Missouri to the mouth of the Platte, and returned by the same route. In the fall of 1836 he moved to St. Louis, where he remained the rest of his life, engaged in the practice of law.

PIKE, Austin Franklin, senator, b. in Jefferson County, Va., 14 Oct., 1819; d. in Franklin, N. H., 8 Oct., 1896. He was educated in the academies of Plymouth, N. H., and Newbury, N. H., studied law under George W. Nesmith in Franklin, was admitted to the bar in 1848, and established a large practice. Five years afterward he began his political career by a successful candidacy for the legislature, was re-elected in 1851-2, served in the state senate in 1857-8, and as its presiding officer the latter year, and in 1858-9 was speaker of the house. He was a delegate to the National Republican conventions in 1856 and 1860, and from the former year until his death was an active member of that party, being chairman of the state central committee and of that party's state committee in 1858-60. He was elected to congress in 1872, served one term, and was defeated as a candidate for the next canvass, as he alleged, by frauds. He subsequently devoted himself to his profession for many years, and took high rank at the state bar. In 1883 the contest for the United States senator from New Hampshire, which continued during more than a month's ballots, ended in the election of Mr. Pike as a compromiser candidate. Portsmouth gave him the degree of A. M. in 1888.

PIKE, Frances West Atherton, author, b. in Prospect, Me., 17 March, 1819. She was graduated at Free street seminary in Portland, Me., in 1837, and married the Rev. Richard Pike in 1843. She has published "Step by Step" (Boston, 1853); "Here and Hereafter" (1858); "Katherine Morris" (1864); "Sunset Stories" (6 vols., 1863-65); "Climbing and Sliding" (1866); and "Striving and Gaining" (1869).

PIKE, James Shepherd, journalist, b. in Calais, Me., 8 Sept., 1814; d. there, 29 Nov., 1882. His father was a merchant of that place. He entered mercantile life in his fifteenth year, and subsequently became a journalist. He was the Washington correspondent and associate editor of the New York "Tribune" in 1856-60, and was an able and aggressive writer. He was several times a candidate for important offices in Maine, and a potent influence in uniting the anti-slavery sentiment in that state. In 1861-5 he was U.S. minister to the Netherlands. He supported Horace Greeley for the presidency in 1872, and about that time visited South Carolina and collected materials for his principal work, "A Prostrate State" (New York, 1875). He also published "The Restoration of the Currency" (1869); "The Financial Crisis, its Evils, and their Remedy" (1860); "Horace Greeley in 1872" (1873); "The New Puritan" (1878); and "The First Blows of the Civil War" (1879). His brother, Frederick Augustus, congressman, b. in Calais, Me., 9 Dec., 1817; d. there, 2 Dec., 1886, spent two years at Bowdoin, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1840. He served eight terms in the Maine legislature, was its speaker in 1866, was elected to congress as a Republican, retaining his seat in 1861-9, and serving for six years as chairman of PIKE, Zeображен Montgomery, soldier, b. in Lamberton, N. J., 3 Jan., 1779; d. in York (now Toronto), Canada, 27 April, 1853. His father, Zebulon Jr., in New Jersey in 1751; d. in Lamberton, Ind., 27 July, 1841, was a captain in the Revolutionary army, was in Gen. Arthur St. Clair's defeat in 1791, and was brevetted lieutenant-colonel in the regular army, 10 July, 1812. While the son was a child his father removed with his family to Bucks county, Pa., and thence in a few years to Easton, where the boy was educated. He was appointed an ensign in his father's regiment, 3 March, 1799, 1st lieutenant in November, and captain in August, 1806. While advancing through the lower grades of his profession he supplemented the deficiencies of his education by the study of Latin, French, and mathematics. After the purchase of Louisiana from the French, Lieut. Pike was appointed to conduct an expedition to trace the Mississippi to its source, and, leaving St. Louis, 9 Aug., 1805, he returned after nearly nine months' exploration and constant exposure to hardships, having satisfactorily performed this service. In 1806-7 he was engaged in geographical explorations in Louisiana territory, in the course of which he discovered "Pike's peak" in the Rocky mountains, and reached Rio Grande river. Having been found on Spanish territory, he and his party were taken to Santa Fe but, after a long examination and the seizure of his papers, they were released. He arrived at Natchitoches, 1 July, 1807, received the thanks of the government, and in 1810 published a narrative of his two expeditions. He was made major in 1808, lieutenant-colonel in 1809, deputy quartermaster-general, 3 April, 1812, colonel of the 15th infantry, 6 July, 1812, and brigadier-general, 12 March, 1813. Early in 1813 he was assigned to the principal army as adjutant- and inspector-general, and selected to command an expedition against York (now Toronto), Upper Canada. On 25 April the fleet was concentrated near Fort George (now Niagara). On 3 May York reached the harbor of that town, and measures were taken to land them at once. Gen. Pike landed with the main body as soon as practicable, and, the enemy's advanced parties falling back before him, he took one of the redoubts that had been constructed for the main defence of the place. The column was then halted until arrangements were made for the attack on another redoubt. While Gen. Pike and many of his soldiers were seated on the ground, the magazine of the fort exploded, a mass of stone fell upon him, and he was fatally injured, surviving but a few hours.

PILAT, Ignatz Anton, landscape-gardener, b. in St. Agatha, Austria, 27 June, 1820; d. in New York city, 15 Sept., 1879. He received a collegiate education at Vienna, and studied at the botanical gardens in that city and Schönbrunn. His first work of magnitude was laying out Prince Metternich's grounds. He remained attached to the imperial botanical gardens in Schönbrunn from 1843 till 1855, when he came to this country and became chief gardener on Thomas Metcalf's estate near Augusta, Ga. He held this post till 1856, when he returned to the botanical gardens; but after a short stay in his native land he returned to New York, and in 1857 was appointed chief landscape-gardener in Central park. In addition to his personal supervision of the entire park, which continued till his death, he planned and superintended many improvements in the public squares of the city of New York. He wrote a work on botany (Vienna), and a small one on landscape-gardening (Linz, Austria).

PILCHER, Elijah Homes, clergyman, b. in Athens, Ohio, 2 June, 1810; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 7 April, 1887. He was educated at Ohio university, and, entering the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church, held pastorates both in this country and in Canada. He represented his denomination in the national convention in Michigan in 1858, and in the conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, was for four years a member of its book committee, and aided in establishing the Michigan "Christian Advocate," and in founding Albion college, in which he was professor of history and belles-lettres. He was a regent of Michigan university five years, one of the originators of the Agricultural college at Lansing, and was secretary of the Detroit conference nine years. He was the author of "History of Protestantism in Michigan" (Detroit, 1878).

PILE, William A., soldier, b. near Indianapolis, Ind., 11 Feb., 1829; d. in Monrovia, Cal., 7 July, 1889. He studied theology, and became a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal church and a member of the Missouri conference. He joined the National army as chaplain of a regiment of Missouri volunteers in 1861, and took command of a light battery in 1862. He was subsequently placed at the head of a regiment of infantry, promoted brigadier-general of volunteers, 26 Dec., 1863, and served till the close of the war, being mustered out, 24 Aug., 1865. He was elected to Congress from Missouri, and served from 4 March, 1867, till 3 March, 1869. In 1872 he was defeated as the Republican candidate for the next congress. Mr. Pile was appointed by President Grant governor of New Mexico, served in 1869-70, and was minister resident at Venezuela from 25 May, 1871, till his resignation in 1874.
PILLING, James Constantine, philologist, b. in Washington, 16 Nov., 1846; d. in Olney, Ill., 26 July, 1885. He was educated at Gonzaga college, and became connected with the geological survey of the Rocky mountain region under Minor Powell. In this relation he continued until 1879, and was constantly among the Indian tribes of the west, engaged in tabulating the vocabularies of their various dialects. He then became chief clerk of the bureau of ethnology, and in 1881 was appointed to a similar office in the U. S. geological survey. Mr. Pike was a member of many scientific societies, and, in addition to memoirs on ethnological subjects, is the author of "Bibliography of the Languages of the North American Indians" (Washington, 1856); "Bibliography of the Eskimoan Languages" (1881); and "Bibliography of the Seman Languages" (1887), all of which have been issued under the auspices of the government.

PILLOW, Godron Johnson, soldier, b. in Williamson county, Tenn., 8 June, 1820; d. in Lee county, Ark., 6 Oct., 1878. He was graduated at the University of Nashville, Tenn., in 1847, practised law at Columbia, Tenn., was a delegate to the National Democratic convention in 1854, and aided largely in the nomination of his friend, James K. Polk, as the candidate for president. In 1861, having been called into service, he was placed in command of Tennessee volunteers in the Mexican war. He served for some time with Gen. Zachary Taylor on the Mexican frontier, subsequently joined Gen. Scott at Vera Cruz, and took an active part in the siege of that city; afterward being one of the commissioners that received its surrender from the Mexican authorities. The battle of Chapultepec, in which Gen. Scott led the right wing of the American army, and was severely wounded. He was promoted to major-general 13 April, 1847, was engaged in the battle of Churubusco, Molino del Rey, and Chapultepec, where he was wounded. He differed with Gen. Scott in regard to the convention of Tacubaya, and the differences led to such results that Gen. Pillow requested a court of inquiry to try him on charges of insubordination that were made by Scott. The court was ordered, and he was honorably acquitted. After the Mexican war he resumed the practice of law in Tennessee, and was also largely engaged in planting. In the Nashville southern convention of 1859 Gen. Pillow took conservative ground, and opposed the secession plan. He received five votes for the nomination for the vice-presidency at the Democratic National convention in 1852. On 9 May, 1861, he was appointed by Gov. Isham G. Harris a major-general in the provisional army of the state of Tennessee, and aided largely in the organization of its forces. On 9 June, 1861, he was made a brigadier-general in the provisional Confederate army, and commanded the division of Gen. Leonidas Polk at the battle of Belmont, Missouri, 7 Nov., 1861, and was second in command under Gen. John B. Floyd at Fort Donelson in February, 1862. He declined to assume the chief command and to surrender the forces at this fort, so, turning the place over to Gen. Simon B. Buckner, he evacuated this post, and subsequently led a detachment of cavalry and served under Beauregard in the southwest. He was also chief of conscripts in the western department.

PILLSBURY, Amos, prison-reformer, b. in New Hampshire in 1805; d. in Albany, N. Y., 14 July, 1873. His father was a soldier in the war of 1812, and was warden of state prisons in New Hampshire and Connecticut for many years. The son was appointed warden of the state prison of Connecticut at Wethersfield, and held the post for many years. After leaving Wethersfield he was warden of prisons in other states for several years, and for a short time superintendent of police in New York city. The new penitentiary at Albany was planned according to his suggestions, and he became its superintendent, and continued there till his death. He was severe and rigorous in his rule, but possessed great organizing ability, and caused prisons and penitentiaries under his superintendence to become sources of revenue to the state. He was a member of the New York State Reformatory Association, of which he was the first president. In 1872 attended the prison congress in London and took part in its discussions.

PILLSBURY, Parker, reformer, b. in Hamilton, Mass., 22 Sept., 1800; d. in Concord, N. H., 7 July, 1898. He was employed in farm-work at Hemiker till 1855, when he entered Gilman theological seminary. He was graduated in 1858, studied a year at Andover, supplied the Congregational church at New London, N. H., for one year, and then abandoned the ministry in order to engage in antislavery work. He was a lecturing agent of the New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and American anti-slavery societies from 1840 till the abolition of slavery, and edited "The Herald of Freedom," at Concord, N. H., 1840 and 1857-58. "The Slavery Standard," in New York city in 1866. In 1866-70 he was the editor of the "Revolutions," a woman suffrage paper in New York city. Afterward he was a preacher for Free religious societies in Salem and Toledo, Ohio, Battle Creek, Mich., and other western towns. Besides pamphlets on reform subjects, he published, "Across the Anti-Slavery Deserts" (Boston, 1856), "The Slavery Standard," in New York city in 1867. In 1886-95 he was the editor of the "Revolutions," a woman suffrage paper in New York city. Afterward he was a preacher for Free religious societies in Salem and Toledo, Ohio, Battle Creek, Mich., and other western towns. Besides pamphlets on reform subjects, he published, "Across the Anti-Slavery Deserts" (Boston, 1857). His brother, Oliver, b. in Hemiker, N. H., 16 Feb., 1817; d. in Concord, N. H., 22 Feb., 1888, was educated at Hemiker academy, taught in New Jersey in 1829-37, occupying a prominent place among the educators of the state, returned to New Hampshire with impaired health, and was a farmer for the next seventeen years. He served three terms in the legislature, was a state commissioner in 1862 and 1863, displaying executive ability and energy in business connected with the New Hampshire quota of troops, and in 1869 was appointed the first insurance commissioner of the state, holding the office till his death.

PILMORE, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Tadmouth, Yorkshire, England, 25 Oct., 1739; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 Feb., 1798. He was educated in John Wesley's school at Kingswood, and undertook the work of an itinerant or lay preacher under Wesley's direction. In 1759 he came to this country on a mission to establish Methodism in Philadelphia. He preached from the steps of the state-house on Chestnut street, from stands in race-fields, and rode the circuits with his banner in his head-dress, gaining the first foundation of Methodism in Philadelphia in a pot-house in Lacey's court, and establishing the first church that was owned by the Methodists in Philadelphia. It is the present church of St. George, and was an unfinished building purchased from the Germans, which the British seized, when they were in possession of the city, and used as a military prison. After the close of the rebellion, Mr. Pilmore sought for orders in the Protestant Episcopal church. He was ordained deacon, 23 Nov., 1783, by Bishop Seabury, and priest two days later, by the same bishop, and became rector of three united parishes in the vicinity of Philadelphia. From 1789 till 1794 he served as assistant to Rev. Dr. Samuel Magaw. He was then called to Christ church, New York city, where he remained ten years. In 1804 he succeeded Dr. Magaw in the rectorship of St. Paul's church, Philadelphia. He received the degree of B. D., from the University of Pennsylvania in 1807. Dr. Pilmore bequeathed half his fortune to the Protestant Episcopal church, and half to the Society of St. George, an organization for the aid of English emigrants. He published "Narrative of Labors in South Wales" (Philadelphia, 1823), and left in manuscript an account of his "Travels and Trials and Preaching" in various American colonies.

PINHEIRA, Jose Antonio (pin-kei-ah), Chillan guerrilla, b. in Concepcion about 1891; d. in Concepcion about 1890. He formed in early life with his two brothers and other adventurers a band of robbers, which for many years desolated the country south of Maule river. In November, 1825, Pinheira joined a Spanish force of twenty-five to aid in a fight against and routed a band of robbers. He refused the pardon of the royalist cause, so that the government sent an army against him. Being hard pressed, he passed the Andes and invaded the province of Mendoza, the government of which made a regular treaty of peace with him. In 1839

PINIX, Ramon (peen-yah). Cuban author, b. in Havana in 1819; d. there in 1861. He studied in his native city, where he was admitted to the bar and practised his profession, at the same time cultivating literature. His comedies, "No quiero ser como," "Las Equiniones," and "Jesucristo y sus junkies," were performed in Havana with success. In 1857 he went to Spain, where he published his novel, "Geronimo el bondado" (Madrid, 1858), and "Historia de un brillon dichoso" (1859), which were praised for the purity of their style. His "Conventos al las leyes Atencio"es (1860) are considered remarkable for learning.

PINCIAK, Pinkeye Benton Stewart, governor of Georgia, b. in Macon, Ga., 10 May, 1837. He is of African descent. In 1846 he was sent to school in Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1848 his father died, and he became a boatman. In 1862 he ran the Confederate blockade at Yazoo City and reached New Orleans, then in possession of the National troops. He enlisted, and was soon detailed to assist in raising a regiment, but, owing to his race, was compelled to resign, 3 Sept., 1862. He was subsequently authorized by Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks to raise a company of colored cavalry. In 1867 he organized in New Orleans the 4th ward Republican club, became a member of the state committee, and was made inspector of customs on 22 May. He was a member of the Constitutional convention of 1868, state senator in 1869, and was director of the city of New Orleans, and on 6 Dec., 1871, he was elected president pro tempore of the state senate, and lieutenant-governor to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Oscar Dunn. He was acting governor during the impeachment of Gov. Warmoth from 9 Dec., 1872, to 13 Jan., 1873. He was nominated for governor in 1872, but withdrew in the interest of party peace, and was elected congressman for Georgia to the 42nd congress. He was chosen to the U. S. senate, 15 Jan., 1873, but after three years' debate he was disallowed his seat by a vote of 32 to 29, although he was given the pay and mileage of a senator. On 24 April, 1875, he was appointed a commissioner to the Vienna exposition from Louisiana, and in 1877 he was appointed a member of the state board of education by Gov. Francis F. Nicholls. On 8 Feb., 1879, he was elected a delegate to the Constitutional convention of the state. Mr. Pinckack was appointed surveyor of customs of New Orleans in 1882, and a trustee of Southern university by Gov. McEnery in 1883 and 1885. He graduated at the law department of Straight university, New Orleans, and at the law in 1886.
the Chilian government resolved to exterminate the guerrillas, and sent Col. Buhes with an army against them. The latter penetrated into the mountain regions and began a regular campaign against Pincheira, capturing part of his forces at Salto Guamuhu, 11 Jan., 1782, and on the 14th defeating him near the lagoon of Pampamahu, where Pincheira’s brother, Pablo, was killed, and the latter escaped with only fifty-two men. At last, surrounded on all sides, he surrendered, 14 March, under capitulation that insured him a pardon. This was strictly kept by the government, and Pincheira retired to Concepcion.

PINCKNEY, Charles Cotesworth, statesman, b. in Charleston, S. C., 25 Feb., 1746; d. there, 16 Aug., 1825. His father, Charles, was chief justice of South Carolina in 1762. The son was sent to England to be educated at seven years of age, studied at Westminster school, and was graduated at Christ-church, Oxford, read law in the Middle Temple, and passed nine months in the said Cambre military academy at Ghent, France. He returned to his country in 1769, settled as a barrister in Charleston, and became attorney-general of the province.

He was a member of the 1st Provincial congress of South Carolina in 1775, was appointed by that body a captain of infantry, and in December of that year was promoted major. He assisted to successfully defend Fort Sullivan on 28 June, 1776, became colonel, 16 Sept., and left the Carolinas to join Washington, to whom he was appointed aide-de-camp, participating in the battles of the Brandywine and Germantown. He returned to the south in the spring of 1777, and took part in the unsuccessful expedition to Florida. In January, 1778, he presided over the assembly of South Carolina. He defeated resolutions and integrity in the rapid march that saved Charleston from the attack of the British under Gen. Augustine Prevost, and in the invasion of Georgia his regiment formed the second column in the assault on the lines at Savannah, and in the second attack on Charleston in April, 1780, he commanded Fort Moultrie with a force of 300 men. The fleet entered the harbor without engaging the fort, and he then returned to the city, and aided in sustaining the siege. In the council of war that was held in the latter part of the month he voted “for the rejection of all terms of capitulation, and for continuing hostilities to the last extremity.” He became a prisoner of war on the surrender of the city in May, 1780, and for two years suffered a rigorous confinement. But “nothing could shake the firmness of his soul.” He was ordered into closer confinement from the death-bed of his son, but he wrote to the commanding British officer: “My heart is altogether American, and neither severity, nor favor, nor poverty, nor slavery can ever induce me to swerve from it.” He was exchanged in February, 1782, and was commissioned brigadier general in 1783, but the war was virtually over, and he had no opportunity for further service. He then returned to the practice of his profession, in which he won great reputation and large profits. He was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of the United States in 1787, took an active part in its debates, and was the author of the clause in the constitution that “no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the authority of the United States.” He also moved to strike out the clause that allowed compensation to senators, on the ground that that body should be composed of persons of wealth, and consequently above the temptations of poverty. He became an ardent Federalist on the adoption of the constitution, and served in the convention that ratified it on the part of South Carolina, and in the State constitutional convention of 1790. He declined the office of associate justice of the U. S. supreme court in 1791, the portfolio of war in 1784, and that of state in 1795, and in 1796 accepted the office of J. S. minister to France, resigning his commission of major-general of militia, which he had held for several years. The Directory refused to receive him, and he was reminded that the law forbade any foreigner to stay more than thirty days in France without permission. On his refusal to apply, he was required to return to the republic. He retired to Amsterdam, and subsequently returned to America. While on this mission he made the famous reply to an intimation that peace might be secured with money: “Millions for defence, but not a cent for tribute.” On his return, war being imminent with France, he was commissioned major-general by Washington, but second to Alexander Hamilton, who had been his junior during the Revolution. When his attention was directed to that fact, he said: “Let us first dispose of our enemies; we shall then have leisure to settle the question of rank.” He was a Federalist candidate for the vice-presidency in 1800, and for the presidency in 1804 and 1808. In 1801 he was elected first president of the board of trustees of the College of South Carolina, and for more than fifteen years before his death he was president of the Charleston Bible society. Charles Chauncey said of him that “his love of honor was greater than his love of power, and deeper than his love of self.” He was third president-general of the Cincinnati. He married the sister of Arthur Middleton. Their daughter, Mary, published no works in the defense of 1772.—Charles’s brother, Thomas, diplomatist, b. in Charleston, S. C., 20 Oct., 1754; d. there, 2 Nov., 1825, accompanied his brother to England in 1784, and was educated at Westminster and Oxford. He then studied law in the Temple, was admitted to the bar in 1776, and, returning to Charleston in 1778, practised in that city. He joined the Continental army as a lieutenant in 1775, and in 1778, was aide-de-camp to Gen. Benjamin Lincoln, and served in a similar capacity under Count d’Estaing at the siegé of Savannah. He participated in the battle of Stono Ferry, and, as the able Gen. Horatio Gates was wounded and taken prisoner at Camden. He saw no further service in the Revolution, and returned to his profession. He declined the appointment of U. S. district judge in 1789, became governor in that year, and, in 1790, drew up the act to establish the South Carolina court of equity. He was appointed by Washington U. S. minister to Great Britain in 1792, and on the expiration of his term in 1794 was sent on a mission to Spain, where he arranged the treaty of St. Ildefonsos that secured to the United States the free navigation of Mississippi river. He returned to Charleston in 1796, and was elected for a term in the vice-presidency, and served in congress in 1799-1801. At the beginning of the war of 1812 he was appointed by President Madison major-general, with the charge of the 6th military district, and participated in the battle of Horseshoe Bend, in which the Creek Indians were finally defeated. He then retired to private life, and did much to encourage the development of the agricultural interests of the state. He succeeded his brother as 4th president-general of the Cincinnati.—Charles, statesman, b. in Charleston, 9 March, 1758; d. there, 29 Oct., 1824, was the grandson of William, Charles Cotesworth's uncle. His father, Charles, was president of the South Carolina convention in 1775, of the senate in 1779, and of the council in 1782. The son was educated for the bar, and before he was of age was chosen to the provincial legislature. He was taken prisoner at the capture of Charleston and remained such until the close of the war, when he resumed his profession. He was elected to the Provincial congress in 1785, and subsequently took an active part in preparing a plan of government for the United States. In 1787 he was a delegate to the convention that framed the constitution of the United States, and offered a draft of a constitution, which was referred to the committee of detail, submitted, and some of its provisions were finally adopted. In 1788 he advocated the ratification of the constitution in the South Carolina convention. He was elected governor the next year, president over the state by a majority of 23,000, and when South Carolina was adopted in 1790, was re-elected governor in 1791, and again in 1796, and in 1798 was chosen to the U. S. senate as a Republican. He was a frequent and able speaker in that body, and one of the most active promoters of Thomas Jefferson's election to the presidency. In 1802-5 he was U. S. minister to Spain, and during his residence in that country he negotiated a release from the Spanish government of all right or title to the territory that was purchased by the United States from France. He became governor for the fourth time in 1806, and in 1812 strongly advocated the war with England. He was a member of congress in 1819-21, and opposed the Missouri compromise bill, earnestly warning the south of the effects of the measure. This was his last public service. Mr. Pinckney was the founder of the old Republican party of South Carolina. He possessed liberal views on all subjects, advocated the abolition of the primogeniture laws, was the principal agent in the removal of the civil and political disabilities that had been imposed on Jews in South Carolina, and was the first governor that established free schools. He was an able political writer, and issued a series of addresses to the people under the signature of "Republican" (Charleston, 1800) that were instrumental in the election of Jefferson. He also published in the same year several papers in denunciation of the alien and sedition laws that were enacted during the administration of the elder Adams. Princeton gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1787.—Charles's son, Henry Laurens, congressman, b. in Charleston, S. C., 24 Sept., 1794; d. there, 3 Feb., 1836, was graduated at the College of South Carolina in 1812, studied law in the office of his brother-in-law, Robert Y. Hayne, and was admitted to the bar, but never practised. He served in the legislature in 1816-32, and was chairman of its committee of ways and means for eight years. He was three times Speaker, and three times mayor of Charleston, and in 1829-7 was a member of the house of representatives of South Carolina. During the administration of President Van Buren he was collector of the port of Charleston. In 1845-63 he was tax-collector of the parishes of St. Philip and St. Michael. Mr. Pinckney was a constant and laborious writer and worker during his public life. He founded the Charleston 'Mercury,' the organ of the State-rights party, in 1819, was its sole editor for fifteen years, and published many orations and addresses. He also wrote memoirs of Jonathan Maxey, Robert Y. Hayne, and Andrew Jackson.—Thomas's grandson, Charles Cotesworth, crierman, b. in Charleston, 31 July, 1812; d. in Flat Rock, N. C., 13 Aug., 1898. He was graduated at the College of Charleston, studied at Alexandria seminary, and was admitted to the Protestant Episcopal church. For nearly half a century he was rector of Grace church, Charleston, was for many years chairman of the standing committee of the diocese, delegate to the General convention, and president of the alumni association of his alma mater, from which he received the degree of D. D. in 1875.

PINDB, John Holtham, English colonial educator, 1746-1820; in West Malvern, England, 16 April, 1808. He was graduated at Cambridge in 1766, and was president of Cadlington college, Barbadess, W. L., from 1769 till 1855. Subsequently he was a canon of Wells cathedral, and principal of Wells theological college, which latter office he resigned in 1865. He published "The Candidate for the Holy Orders," "The First Epistle of Timothy" (London, 1857); "Sermons on the Book of Common Prayer" (1857); "Sermons on the Holy Days of the Church" (1859); and "Meditations for Priests on the Ordination Service" (1856).

PINDB, Susan, author, b. near Tarrytown, N. Y., in 1828; d. there, 16 Aug., 1892. Her father, a Russian by birth, and for a time Russian consul to Florida, died in New Orleans. His estate, Pindar's Vale, adjoined Wofford's Roost. She contributed numerous poems to the "Knickerbocker Magazine," and was the author of: "Fireside Fairies, or Christmas at Aunt Elisha's" (New York, 1849) and "Midsummer Fays, or the Holidays at Woodleigh" (1850), which were republished together as "Susan Pindar's Story Book." (1858), and "Legends of the Flowers." (1851).

PINE, Robert Edge, artist, b. in London, England, in 1730, or, according to some authorities, in 1742; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 18 Nov., 1788. The earlier date of birth seems the more probable from the fact that in 1760 he gained the first prize of $100 from the Society for the encouragement of the arts for the best historical picture that was offered, "The Surrender of Calais," with figures as large as life. He was the son of John Pine, the skillful artist who published (1733-5) the beautiful edition of Horace with the text engraved throughout by himself, and embellished with vignettes, and whose portrait by Hogarth, in the style of Rembrandt, is familiar to students of that artist's works. From whom the son gleaned his art instruction is not known, but doubtless the rudiments were instilled by his father. In 1753 he again took a first prize for his picture of "Comte reproving his Countrymen." Both of these prize pictures have been engraved. Between these two dates he had for a pupil John Hamilton Mortimer (1741–29), which would hardly have been the case had he been only between eighteen and twenty. Pine devoted himself to historical composition, and portraits and miniatures, succeeded in the latter branch of art. The most familiar portraits of John Wilkes, whose principles he espoused, and of David Garrick, whose friendship he possessed, are from his hand, and have been repeatedly engraved. He painted at least four different portraits of Garrick, one of which is in the National portrait gallery, London. In 1782 he held an exhibition of a collection of Shakespearean pictures that he had painted, some of which were engraved afterward, and found their way into Boydell's Shakespeare. The next year, or the early part of the following one, Pine brought his family to Philadelphia. His object in coming to this country was to paint portraits of the eminently notable and magnificent persons that were then engaged in several large paintings the principal events of the war, but he never carried out his project. He brought letters to Francis Hopkinson, and the first portrait he is said to have painted after his arrival is the well-known one of that patriot. A letter from this gentleman to Washington, explaining Pine's design and asking him to sit for a picture, were recently published in the "American Museum," and the well-known likeness of Washington was engraved for Irving's "Life of Washington," but is a weak and unsatisfactory picture, as are all of Pine's portraits that were painted in this country. He was generously patronized by well-known people, doubtless owing to his past reputation, and the many years of adoption, and Robert Morris built a house for him in Philadelphia which was adapted for the exhibition of his pictures and the prosecution of his painting. Here he died suddenly of apoplexy. He is described as a "very small man, morbidly irritable. His wife and daughters were also very delicate, and died, and left him a family of piggies." After his death his wife petitioned the legislature of Pennsylvania to be allowed to dispose of her husband's pictures by lottery, which request was granted. A large number of them fell into the possession of Daniel Bowen, who removed them to Boston, where they were destroyed in the burning of the Columbian museum. They served before their death to the public as models for his pupils and for them; many of the portraits are not only the author's, but of others. Pine's portraits were painted in the style of Rembrandt, and are in color—Pine's strong point as an artist. He painted portraits of several of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, including the familiar ones of Robert Morris, George Read, and Thomas Stone. A beautiful portrait of Mrs. John Jay, by Pine, is in the possession of her grandson, John DeWitt Clinton, of New York city.

PINEDA, Juan de (pe-nay'-da). Spanish soldier, b. in Seville about 1520; d. in Nasca, Peru, in 1666. He went to Peru at the time of the war between the younger Diego de Almagro and the royalists, and served under the orders of the governors Cristobal Vaca de Castro and Pedro de la Gasca. He afterward went to Chili, and, under Garcia Hurtado de Mendoza (q. v.), participated in the heroic deeds that are celebrated by Alonso de Ercilla (q. v.) in his famous poem. In the festivities to celebrate the accession of King Philip II, in 1558, Pineda had a quarrel with Ercilla, which ended in a battle between their followers in a church. They were imprisoned and condemned to death by Mendoza; but, the whole army opposing the sentence, it was changed, and both were exiled to Callao. During the voyage Pineda resolved to abandon the military career and enter the order of San Agustin, which he did after his arrival in Lima, 6 April, 1569. He dedicated himself to the conversion of the Indians, and in 1571 went as vicar to Cochabamba, where he worked for the religious instruction of the savages. He was president of the provincial chapter in 1579, and died in the convent of Nasca in Peru.

PINELO, Jacques (pe-nel'), French buccaneer, b. in St. Malo in 1640; d. in Capeterre, Guadeloupe, in 1693. He followed the sea in his youth, but afterward joined the buccaneers in Tortuga, and gained both fortune and reputation by daring expeditions. In 1655, having obtained a land grant in Guadeloupe, he built upon the seaside a fortified castle, and excavated the harbor of Capeterre, which he made the headquarters of his expeditions. He was among the founders of the city of Capeterre, on his land, afforded aid and assistance to the town from his considerable fortune, which was spent in developing the resources of the island. Every summer he went on unmingled expeditions in the Spanish possessions, and amassed great riches. In 1685 he carried off from Santo Domingo a noble lady, and, having wed her, received letters of nobility from Louis XIV. His estate was created a marquisate, and it was the only one that ever existed in the French colonies in South America. The French descendants are among the wealthiest land-owners of the West Indies, and, through alliance with historical families, are connected with several royal houses of Europe. "Rich as Pino del Marmo" is still a saying in the French West Indies, and it is said that he never knew the number of his slaves.

PINELO, Antonio de Leon (pe-nel'), Peruvian historian, b. in Lima, 1590; d. in Seville about 1675. He was educated in the College of the Jesuits of Lima, and, going to Spain about 1612, became attorney of the council of the Indies, and afterward judge of the tribunal of La Contratacion in Seville, succeeding Gil Gonzalez Davila (q. v.) in 1637, in the post of historiographer of the Indies, which he held till his death. As early as 1617 he became much interested in the necessity of collecting methodically all the decrees and ordinances that had been issued either by the home government or by the viceroys of the American possessions. He communicated his scheme to the council, and, receiving encouragement, began his grand work of which he published the first three in 1642 and three more in 1660, under the title de la importancia de la forma, y de la disposicion de la colección de las leyes de Indias" (Seville, 1623). Having obtained the king's approbation and authority to search the archives of Madrid and Simancas, and even a special royal order for having copies made from all documents in the offices of the state secretaries of Mexico, Lima, and Quito, he was enabled to pursue more speedily his work, and published an abridged first part, "Sumario de la recopilacion general" (Seville, 1634). By incessant labor Pine0 had completed the work in 1645, but its publication was deferred till 1699, when Vicente Gonzalez published it under the title: "Recopilacion general de las leyes de las Indias" (4 vols., Madrid, 1680). Pine0's other works are: "Epitome de la Bibliografia oriental y occidental, nautica y geographica" (Mad
In 1889 he was sent as minister to Buenos Aires to organize a court of claims and settle the boundary between the Spanish and Portuguese dominions, but he declined. He became afterward a member of the privy council, and wrote several memoirs, advocating the enfranchisement of the slaves and a parliamentary government for Brazil, and Portugal. In 1859 he was promoted to the rank of captain, and served in the Peninsular War. He was subsequently appointed secretary of the province of Lisbon, and, after the revolution of 1821 became secretary of foreign relations and war, and proposed to the king a plan to quell the rebellion. In spite of his strenuous efforts, the weak monarch determined to return to Lisbon, appointed Dom Pedro regent, and left Bahia in great haste. Pinheiro tried to change the king's resolution, but, all efforts proving unavailing, he accompanied João to Lisbon in 1822, and was secretary of state till the suppression of the constitutional government in April, 1824, when he resigned and resided in Paris, living till 1834, occupied in literary labors. After the expulsion of Dom Miguel he returned to Lisbon, but continued to remain in private life till his death. Pinheiro's works include: "Essais sur l'histoire du règne de la monarchie portugaise" (Bahia, 1851); "Memoria sobre os meios de destruir a escravidão no Brasil" (1852); "Memoria sobre um governo representativo comun ao Portugal e ao Brasil" (1844); "Synopsis de codice do processo civil" (Paris, 1855); "Observações sobre a carta constitucional do reino de Portugal, e a constituição do imperio do Brasil" (3 vols., 1835) and "Principios do direito publico, constitucional, administrativo e dos gense" (1843); "Observações sur la constitution du Brésil, et la charte constitutionelle du Portugal" (1855); and "Projeto de codice para a nação portugueza" (1839).

PENILLOS, Claudio M. de (post-nom.-yos). Count of Villanueva, Cuban statesman, b. in Havana in October, 1782; d. there in 1855. When very young he went to Spain, entered the army, and took part in the war against the French in 1808. He was sent to Cuba in 1814, and in 1825 appointed general superintendent of the finances of the island, filling this office during twenty-five years. In 1825 the income of Cuba was only $2,000,000, but in 1855 it had risen to $37,000,000, which was due in great part to his wise measures. He built many public schools, hospitals, roads, and, in 1854, contributed to the construction of the first railroad in a Spanish-speaking country. To his efforts was due the creation of a nautical college, an extensive chemical laboratory, an aqueduct, and many other public institutions, for the scientific, literary, and industrial development of Cuba. He is considered one of the greatest benefactors of the island.

PINKERTON, Allan, detective, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 25 Aug., 1819; d. in Chicago, Ill., 1 July, 1884. He became a Chartist in early manhood, came to this country in 1842 to escape imprisonment, and settled in Chicago, Ill. He was made deputy sheriff of Kane county in 1846, was subsequently deputy sheriff of Cook county, and in 1859 was appointed the first detective for Chicago. He also established the detective service in that year, and from that date till the emancipation was largely engaged in assisting the escape of slaves. He was the first special U.S. mail agent for northern Illinois and Indiana and southern Wisconsin, organized the U.S. secret service division of the National army in 1861, was its first chief, and subsequently organized and was at the head of the Secret service department of the Gulf till the close of the civil war. He added to his detective agency in Chicago in 1854 a corps of night-watchmen, called Pinkerton's preventive watch. established offices of both agencies in several other cities, and was signal success in the discovery and suppression of crime. While in the employment of the Wilmington and Baltimore railroad company in 1801, he discovered a plan to assassinate Abraham Lincoln on his way to his inauguration in Washington. Among the cases in which he successfully traced thieves and recovered money are the robbery of the Carbonade, Pa., bank of $40,000, and that of the Adams express company of $700,000, on 6 Jan., 1806, from a train on the New York, New Haven, and Hartford railroad, and the taking of $800,000 as an expressman on the Hudson River railroad. He also broke up gangs of thieves at Seymour, Ind., and the "Molly Maguires" in Pennsylvania. He published about fifteen detective stories, the most popular of which are "The Molly Maguires and the Detectives," "The Spy of the Rebellion," and "Thirty Years a Detective."" (New York, 1851); "Criminal Reminiscences." (1867); "The Spies of the Rebellion." (1881); and "Thirty Years a Detective." (1884).

PINKHAM, William Cyprian, Canadian Anglican bishop, b. in St. Johns, Newfoundland, 11 Nov. 1844. He was graduated at St. Augustine's college, Canterbury, England, in 1869, ordained priest in the established church in 1869, came to Canada, became chief superintendent of the Protestant schools of Manitoba in 1874, and in 1887 he was made bishop of the church in Manitoba in 1882. In 1887 he was made bishop of Saskatchewan, and in 1888 he became bishop of Saskatchewan and Calgary.

PINKNEY, William, statesman, b. in Annapolis, Md., 17 March, 1764; d. in Washington, 25 Feb., 1822. His father was an Englishman by birth and was a loyalist during the American Revolution. Young Pinkney showed his independent spirit as a boy by joining the patriotic side, owing to the troubled state of the times, his early education was imperfect, but he made up for this deficiency by diligent application as he approached manhood. He first chose medicine as a profession, but becoming acquainted with Judge Samuel Chase, who offered to take him as a pupil, he began the study of law at Baltimore in 1783, and three years afterward was admitted to the bar. He practised successfully in Harford county, Md., for a few years, and was sent from that district to the state convention in 1788 to the state convention in 1789. As the convention in 1790, he was elected to the house of delegates, in which he continued to represent Harford county until his return to Annapolis in 1792. His speeches in the legislature by his natural eloquence and his pure and felicitous diction won him more than a local reputation. From 1792 to 1795 he was a member of the executive council of Maryland. In 1796 President Washington appointed him a commissioner on the part of the United States, under Jay's British treaty of 1791, to determine the claim of American merchants to compensation for losses and damages by acts of the English government. This was the beginning of his diplomatic career abroad. The particular service, involving the consideration of many nice questions of admiralty law, gave employment to Pinkney's best powers. He remained in England until 1804, when he returned home and resumed the practice of the law in Baltimore. The next year he was appointed attorney-general of the state of Maryland. In 1806 he was again sent to England as commissioner, jointly with James Monroe, to treat with the English government respecting its continued aggression, in violation of the rights of neutrals. When Mr. Monroe retired in 1807, Pinkney was left as resident minister in London, in which post he remained until President Monroe was elected in 1811, at his own earnest solicitation. On his return to Maryland he was elected a member of the state senate, and at the close of the year President Madison appointed him attorney-general of the United States. He was an earnest advocate of the war of 1812, and defended the policy of the government both by his pen and sword, being wounded at the battle of Bladensburg while leading a company of riflemen. In 1814 he resigned his post as attorney-general when the law was passed requiring that officer to reside at the seat of government. In 1815 he was elected to Congress from Baltimore, but he resigned the next year on being appointed by President Monroe minister to Russia upon the retirement of Mr. Pendleton, after having served two years, but feeling the want of his legal income, he resigned in 1818, returned to Baltimore, and resumed the practice of his profession. He was engaged in most of the chief cases in the supreme court of the United States during the next four years. In 1820 he was elected to the U.S. senate, and took an active part in the discussion on the admission of Missouri into the Union, having also his labors in the supreme court, and while engaged in his double duties at the bar and in the senate he was attacked by the illness that terminated his life.—William's son, Edward Coate, author, b. in London, England, 1 Oct., 1802; d. in Baltimore, 11 April, 1829, passed the first nine years of his life in the British metropolis, at the age of six he was brought by his father to America and the home of the family in Baltimore. Soon after his arrival, young Pinkney entered college, but before he had completed his studies he was taken away and placed in the U.S. navy. After remaining six years he resigned on account of a quarrel with Commodore Ridgely, his superior officer, whom he challenged to fight a duel. The challenge was accepted, and the duel was fought on the picnic ground near the bank of the Patapsco, Maryland, one mile from the city of Baltimore. Pinkney was wounded mortally, and died at his residence, and was buried in the family vault, which is situated near the site of the present city of Baltimore. Pinkney was a man of great abilities, and his death was a loss to the country. He left a wife and two children.
intention of joining the patriots, who were fighting for the independence of their country. But the Mexican navy was full, and while waiting for a vacancy he became involved in a quarrel with a native, whom he killed in a duel and was obliged to flee the country. He returned to Baltimore disappointed, discouraged, and almost crushed by sickness and sorrow. The year after his return from Mexico, Pintard was appointed professor of rhetoric and belles-lettres in the University of Maryland. There was no salary attached to the post, but it was given to him in recognition of his brilliant scholarship. In December, 1827, he was chosen editor of the "Marylander," a political newspaper that had been established in the interest of John Quincy Adams, at that time president of the United States. A few months after taking charge of the "Marylander" Pintard's health, which had been declining gradually, failed, and by 1 April, 1828, he was on his deathbed. Another son, Frederick, b. in Easton, Md., 17 Oct., 1804; d. 13 June, 1873, was deputy attorney-general of Maryland, and assistant editor of the "Marylander," and subsequently correspondent of the New York Tribune during the civil war he published poems and songs that became popular. —William's brother, Ninian, author, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1770; d. there, 16 Dec., 1823, entered the U. S. army as lieutenant of infantry in 1799, became captain in 1807, was major of the 5th infantry, and able to Gen. James Wilkinson in 1813, became lieutenant-colonel in 1814, and commanded a battalion of the 7th, for which service he was honorably mentioned in the report of the commanding officer. In 1829 he was promoted colonel. In 1807–8 he made a tour of the south of France, an account of which he embodied in a book entitled "Travels in the South of France and in the Interior of the Province of Provence and Languedoc by a Route Never Before Performed" (London, 1808). Leigh Hunt said of this book: "It set all the idle world to going to France to live on the charming banks of the Loire.‖ —Ninian's son, Ninian, surgeon, b. in Annapolis, Md., 7 June, 1811; d. near Easton, Md., 15 Dec., 1877, was graduated at St. John's college, Annapolis, Md., in 1839, and at Jefferson medical college of Philadelphia graduated the U. S. navy as assistant surgeon in 1824; became surgeon in 1827, and was fleet surgeon of the Mississippi squadron in 1862–3, and became medical director with the rank of commodore in 1871. He received the degree of LL. D. from St. John's college in 1873. Dr. Pinkney delivered many addresses, including "Home and Foreign Policy of the United States before the House of Delegates of Maryland" (1855); one on the presentation of the American flag that was hoisted by Commodore C. Perry in Japan (1853); and an address before the societies of St. John's college (1873). —William's nephew, William, P. E. bishop, b. in Annapolis, Md., 17 April, 1810; d. in Cockeysville, Md., 4 July, 1883, was graduated at St. John's college, Annapolis, in 1827, prepared for the ministry, and was ordained deacon in Christ church, Cambridge, Md., 12 April, 1833, by Bishop Stone, and priest in All Saints' church, Frederick, Md., 27 May, 1836, by the same bishop. For a brief period he was in charge of the parish in Somerset. From that place he removed to Bladensburg, where he became rector of St. Matthias' church. Several years later he accepted the rectoryship of the Church of the Ascension, Baltimore, B. C., which he held when he was called to the episcopate. He received the degree of D. D. from St. John's college in 1855, and that of LL. D. from Columbia university, Washington, D. C., and from William and Mary in 1873. Dr. Pinkney was elected assistant bishop of Maryland, and was consecrated in the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., 6 Oct., 1870. On the death of Bishop Whittingham in October, 1870, he became bishop of the diocese. He published a "Life" of his uncle, William Pinkney (New York, 1859), and a "Memoir of John H. Pintard," the first published in the Maryland historical society (Baltimore, 1867).
In 1876 he was sent to the legislature, and for a time he was also translator of the French language for the government. He edited the New York "Daily Advertiser" in 1802, but he soon relinquished it and visited New Orleans on business. The knowledge of the province of Louisiana that he acquired there led to his being called in 1803 by Alexander Hamilton to the War Department, where he was secretary of the treasury, to express his views as to the natural resources of this colony, and he responded favorably. Indeed, his exact information concerning the value of the province was beyond doubt the most important consideration submitted to the authorities, and the one that led to its purchase.

For many years after 1804 he was first city inspector, and during the war of 1812, he was a surveyor of the state of New York. During the war of 1812, he was a state surveyor of the state of New York, and was principally through his interest that this body was re-established after the war. Mr. Pintard was treasurer of the Sailors' Snug Harbor in 1819-23, and he was instrumental in the purchase of property on Staten island, where the home is now located. In 1804 he was active in founding the New York historical society, to which he presented many valuable works on colonial history, and likewise instrumental in establishing the Massachusetts historical society in 1841, winning the title of "father of historical societies" in this country. Mr. Pintard was also active in the foundation of the American Bible society, served as its secretary and then as its vice-president, and was the first signature of the Tammany society. He was manager of lotteries in New York city when such were fashionable, and it is believed that Columbia college received the gift of the Botanic garden, containing twenty acres, by his intervention and the aid of De Witt Clinton and David Hosack. On 19 Feb., 1805, with others, he began the efforts that resulted in the present free-school system of New York city, and he was a member of all the movements that resulted in the building and completion of the Erie canal. Mr. Pintard projected the plan of streets and avenues that is now in existence in the upper part of New York. From 1800 till near the close of his life there were few enterprises of public utility that he did not further by his pen and purse. Mr. Pintard was one of the chief supporters of the General theological seminary, devising ways and means for its removal from New Haven to New York city, and presenting it with many valuable works. In 1885 Pintard Hall, one of the dormitories of the seminary, was erected in his honor. The degree of LL.D. was conferred on him by Allegheny college in 1882. He published an account of New Orleans in the "New York Medical Repository," and a notice of "Philip Fronceau" in the "New York Mirror" (1833), and translated the "Book of Common Prayer" into French for the Huguenot church in New York city, of which he was a vestryman for thirty-four years. His version is still used.

PICTOR, Bento Teixeira (pem-to), Brazilian poet, b. in Pernambuco in the first half of the 18th century; d. about 1610. He composed and published a poem in eight-line stanzas entitled "Prosoppea," dedicated to Jorge de Albuquerque Coelho (Rio Janeiro, 1601). This work, which had become extremely rare, was presented to the librarians of the Rio Janeiro national and public library from the original copy, which was discovered in the library, where it had lain neglected. In 1601 he also published in Rio Janeiro a "Dialogo sobre as grandezas do Brazil" and a "Narrativo de manifasto de Jorge Coelho em sua viagem de Pernambuco sobre o navio Santo Antonio em 1603," republished in "Historia das tragédias marítimas" (Rio Janeiro, 1852).

PIZON, Francisco Antonio, Chilian statesman, b. in Santiago about 1785; d. there in 1858. He acquired a good education, and when very young was graduated as a lawyer in the University of San Felipe. Soon afterward the revolution of 1810 began, and he took part in the patriotic movement. For a time he was sent to London as a diplomatic agent, and in 1813 he was sent to London with a like commission. He served in 1817 in the Argentine Republic under the orders of Gen. Manuel Belgrano (q. e.), but in 1821 he returned to Chile and went to Peru with the Chilian liberating army. On his return to Chile he was elected vice-president of the republic: when Gen. Francisco Rodriguez resigned the presidency, he assumed the executive. He accomplished many reforms, promoted public instruction, and enlarged the National library. He resigned on 14 July, 1829, and, although in the same year he was re-elected, he resigned again in 1830. Afterward he lived in retirement several years, but later he occupied the office of senator and councillor of state.—His son, Anibal, president of Chili, b. in Santiago in 1824; d. in Valparaiso in 1854, studied in the University of Chile, in 1845 was appointed attaché of the Chilian legation in Rome, and in 1848 promoted secretary. On his return to Chile he was called to the chair of philosophy and the humanities in the university. During the government of Jose Joaqiun Perez (q. e.) in 1892 he was appointed intendant of the province of Concepcion, and during his long administration he embellished the capital and improved its hospitals and highways. He was elected deputy to congress several times, and in 1849 was offered the portfolio of the treasury, which he refused, not wishing to take part in politics. In 1870 he was appointed senator, and was one of the principal promoters of constitutional government, and afterward was president of the Provisional Government of Talcahuano with the province of Osorno. When Federico Errazuig (q. e.) occupied the presidency of Chile in 1871, he called Pinto to organize a cabinet; but the latter declined, accepting only the portfolio of war and the navy, which he occupied three years. In 1876 he was elected president of Chile. During his administration the sagacious Peru and Bolivia began in 1879, and by his energy the means for its prompt prosecution were forwarded to the front. On 8 Sept., 1881, he delivered the executive to his successor, Domingo Santa Maria, and retired into private life.

PINZON, Martin Alonso (pin-thone), Spanish navigator, b. in Palos de Mogdar in 1441; d. there in 1493. He was descended from a family of seamen, and became an able pilot, but retired from active service and was the senior partner of the firm of Pinzon Brothers, ship-builders at Palos de Moguer. According to Francis Parkman in his "Pioneers of France in the New World." Pinzon sailed on board the vessel of one Consin, a navigator of Dieppe, in 1488, and they were on the coast of Africa when their vessel was forced by storms far to the northward, and when they sighted an unknown land and discovered the mouth of a mighty river. On the return voyage Pinzon's conduct became so anxious that Consin made complaint to the admiral, and the offender was dismissed from the maritime service of the town, communicating on his return to Spain the discovery to Columbus. The same fact is cited by Leon Gardin in "Navigateurs Francais," and by Charles Estevanez in "Navigators Normands." But other historians affirm that Pinzon had not navigated for years when, being called to Rome on business, he heard of the projects of Columbus, and made inquiries at the holy office. There he learned of the tides and tithes that had been paid to the holy see before the beginning of the 15th century by a country named China, and of other facts that had been described by the Norman explorers, after which he resolved to trust Columbus. On his return to Spain he was consulted by Queen Isabel's advisers on Columbus's schemes, and gave a favorable answer, which greatly aided the Genoese navigator, and when Columbus obtained permission to arm three ships, Pinzon provided an eighth of the expenses. He took command of the caravel "La Pinta," but from the first showed his desire to rival Columbus, always sailing in advance of the other ships and refusing to obey the admiral. When land was seen, Pinzon pretended to have been the first to discover it, and a Te Deum was sung on board his ship. On 21 Nov., 1492, he separated from the expedition off Cuba for the purpose of taking possession of the treasures that were to be found in that island, according to the natives. When he again met Columbus, on his return voyage in January, 1493, near Cape Monte Cristo, he attributed his parting company to stress of weather, and the admiral feigned to believe his excuses. On the homeward journey he separated from Columbus again in a storm off the Azores, and made all sail to the extreme of the island of the admiral, and claimed the discovery; but he was carried by a hurricane to Galicia, where he was detained several days, and asked by letter an audience from the king. He arrived in Palos on the evening of the same day with the admiral and set out immediately for Madrid, but was met on his way by a messenger who had his appearance at court. Anger, envy, and resentment shattered his health, and he died a few weeks later in Palos de Moguer.—His brother, Vicente Yanez, Spanish navigator, b. in Palos de Moguer about 1460; d. there about 1524, provided also an eighth of the expenses for the expedition of Columbus, and was appointed commander of the caravel "La Nina." Unlike his brother, he was always faithful to the cause at which the flag-ship "Santa Maria" was wrecked, 24 Dec., 1492, off the coast of Hispaniola, he rescued Columbus, who embarked upon Pinzon's vessel. According to Gomez, he accompanied Columbus in his second and third voyages to the New World; but other historians dispute this. In 1499, having obtained a concession for new discoveries, he armed four caravels, with which he set out, under the command of Francisco Martin, and sailed from Palos de Moguer, 13 Nov., 1499. Steering to the southward, he crossed the equatorial line, lost sight of the north star, and on 20 Jan., 1500, discovered land, being thus the first to discover Brazil, and naming the Cape Santa Maria de la Consolacion (now Cape St. Agustinho). He landed with a notary and witnesses to take possession of the country for the king of Spain, but, being attacked by warlike Indians, reembarked, and, toward the north coast of the mouth of the Amazon, which he called Santa Maria de la Mar Dulce, and continued to explore the coast to the Gulf of Paria. He arrived in Spain on 30 Sept., after a disastrous homeward voyage, in which he lost two ships and all his fortune. In 1506 he associated himself with Juan Diaz de Solis (q. v.) for the discovery of a passage from the Atlantic to the Indian ocean, and after landing on the coast of Caribbees, in the island of Guayana, they entered the Gulf of Mexico and discovered Yucatan and the Bay of Campeachy, which they called Natividad. On his return he was summoned to court to consult with Americo Vespucci upon new discoveries to be made. Again, in association with Solis, he went in 1508 on a new expedition to South America, and crossed the line of the Rio de las Plumas to latitude 40° S. He quarrelled with Solis, and on their return to Seville in 1509 they were not received with favor. Solis was imprisoned, and Pinzon escaped punishment only on account of his long services. After that time he gave up navigation and settled in Palos de Moguer. Pinzon's descendants exist in Huelva and Moguer, and they have always been navigators. A list of his expeditions, which is preserved among the manuscripts in the archives of Simancas.—Another brother, Francisco Martin, b. in Palos de Moguer about 1462; d. at sea in July, 1500, served as a pilot under his brother, Martin Alonso, in the expedition of 1492, and was likewise hostile to Columbus. After the death of his elder brother he became the managing partner of the business firm in Moguer, and, having reconciled himself with his brother, Vicente Yanez, he was attached as pilot to the expedition of 1499. During the homeward journey he commanded one of the two ships that went down in a hurricane off Hispaniola, and was lost with all his crew.—Their nephew, Arias Martin, Spanish navigator, b. in Palos de Moguer in 1457; d. there in 1519, was the only son of an elder brother of his explorations, which is preserved among the manuscripts in the archives of Simancas. practises his profession in Chicago, III. Besides contributing to various medical periodicals, he has published a treatise on "Operative Surgery," illustrated with about 2000 drawings by the author (Boston, 1852), and " The Trees of America" (4 parts, 1857, incomplete). He also drew the illustrations for Macleod's " Surgical Anatomy."

PIRES, Francisco (pe-ras), Brazilian missionary, b. in Celo-dor, Portugal, about 1520; d. in Bahia, Brazil, in 1586. He became a Jesuit in 1548, afterward went to Brazil as a missionary, and was for a time the superior of the Bahian province.
He wrote "Cartas Amadas aos Padres da Província de Portugal escriptas na Bahia a 17 de Setembro, 1582" (Italian translation, Venice, 1593) and "Cartas escriptas da Capitania do Espírito Santo ao P. Manoel de Nóbrega em anno de 1588," also published in Italian (1592).

PIRIE, Henry, jurist, b. in Washington county, Ky., 5 June, 1785; d. in Louisville, Ky., 28 March, 1880. His parents were among the early settlers in Kentucky. The son received a good English education, working at intervals on his father's farm, studied law, and after practising five years in Harford, Ohio county, removed in 1825 to Louisville. A few months later he was appointed a judge of the general court to fill a vacancy, which post he resigned in 1832 and engaged in active practice. He was again appointed in 1842, but again resigned in a few days, at the close of the pending term of court. In 1840 he was elected to the state senate, and while chairman of the commitee on Federal relations he made a report that condemned certain state-rights resolutions of the South Carolina and Virgihie legislatures. The same construction of the constitution that was made in this report was laid down several days later by the U. S. supreme court. Judge Pirtle was chancellor of the Louisville chancellor court and professor of constitutional law, equity, and commercial law in the University of Louisville in 1846-58.
He published "Digest of the Decisions of the Court of Errors and Appeals in Louisiana" (New Orleans, 1826-27).

PISE, Charles Constantine, dergman, b. in Annapolis, Md., in 1802; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 26 May, 1866. After graduation at Georgetown college, D. C., he entered the College of the propaganda, Rome, but was obliged to leave, owing to his father's death, and completed his theological course in Mount St. Mary's seminary, Emmitt-burg, at the same time teaching classes in rhetoric and poetry. He was ordained there in 1825, and appointed to a mission in Frederick, Md., but was transferred soon afterward to the cathedral at Baltimore. After doing missionary work for several years his health failed, and he went to Italy.
He had already become recognized as the pioneer of the Catholic church among the persecuted people, and at Rome received the degree of D. D., and was made a knight of the Holy Roman Empire.
On his return he was attached to St. Patrick's church in Washington. He was an intimate friend of Henry Clay, and, partly through the influence of the latter, was appointed chaplain of the U. S. senate, being the only Roman Catholic priest that ever held that office. The same statesman offered Dr.
Pise a chair in Transylvania university; but he preferred active missionary work. He removed to New York on the invitation of Bishop Dubois, and was connected with several churches in the city, also attaining a reputation as a lecturer and preacher. He purchased Emmanuel church, Brooklyn, which became the Roman Catholic church of St. Charles Borromeo, and he assumed the pastorate of it in 1849. His works are "Father Rowland," a tale in answer to " Father Clement " (Balti-mor, 1829); " Indian Cottage, a Unitarian Story (1829); " History of the Church from its Estabishment to the Reformation " (5 vols., 1830); " The Pleasures of Religion, and other Poems" (Phi-delphia, 1834); " Hora Vagabundae," an account of his travels in Ireland: " Aedhla, or Letters on the Truth of the Catholic Doctrine" (New York, 1843);
"The Acts of the Apostles," a poem (1845); "Zen-osus, or the Pilgrim Convert" (1853); "Letters to Asia"; " Lives of St. Ignatius and his First Companions " (New York, 1854); " The Necessity of Christianism; " The Catholic Bride," translated from the Italian (Baltimore, 1848); and "Christianity and the Church" (1859).

PISKARET, Simon, Algoquin chief, b. in Ottawa, Canada, in 1602; d. near Three Rivers in March, 1646. He was champion of the Algoquins, and his marvellous exploits are still recounted among the scattered tribes of the northwestern province, as an enemy of the Junes, but he became a Christian in 1642, in the hope of gaining French favor, and soon afterward was really a convert. His conversion aided the French colonization of Canada, and served a momentary peace between the French and the Indian allies and the Six Nations. This was broken, however, and in the following summer, coming to Parkman in " the Jesuites of North America": In the spring of 1645 Piskaret, with six other converted Indians, set out on a war-party, and after killing fourteen Iroquois, made two prisoners, whom, owing to the instructions of his Jesuit teacher, he treated with unexampled forbearance. He led them to Sillery, and presented them to G. Montmagny, and they were afterward conveyed to Three Rivers, where Champlain, the commandant, after clothing and equipping them, sent them home. The Mohawks felt this kindness deeply, and on 5 July following they sent an embassy to Three Rivers, led by the chief Kioskaton. The result was that, on 17 Sept., a grand council was held at Three Rivers, where the French delegates and representatives of various tribes, at which general peace was concluded, and, although it lasted scarcely a year, it had valuable results for the colonization of Canada. Piskaret now followed agriculture in his domain near Three Rivers. He was killed by surprise by a party of Mohawks toward the close of March, 1646, when peace was partially broken.

PISON, Willem (pesan), Dutch naturalist, b. in Leyden in 1596; d. there in 1681. He studied medicine and practised his profession successively in Leyden and Amsterdam. In 1635 he followed Prince Maurice de Nassau-Siegen (q. v.) to Brazil.
With the help of two German students, one of whom was George Margraff (q. v.), he explored that country for many years, and finally published the peculiarities of its fauna and flora. On his return to Leyden in 1645 with a fine collection, which he presented to the city, he showed his manuscript to Jean de Laet, who inserted it in his " Historia naturalis Brasili-" (Leyden, 1648) Pison's treatise " De Medicina Brasileins, Libri IV." After the death of Prince Maurice, Pison entered the service of the elector of Brandenburg, but, returning later to Holland, he published a revised edition of his former work with many additions, under the title of " De Indis urbisisque non naturali et medicini, Libri XIV." (Amsterdam, 1655). Plunier dedicated this work to Pison a plant of the Nigella family, abor spars horrida Pisonia.
PITCAIN, John, British soldier, b. in Fifeshire, Scotland, about 1729; d. in Boston, Mass., 17 June, 1755. He became captain of marines on 10 Jan., 1755, and major in April, 1751, and was stationed for several years in Boston, where he is said to have been the only British officer that dealt fairly with the people in their disputes with the soldiers. He took part in the expedition that was despatched by Gen. Gage to Lexington on the morning of 19 April, 1775, and was sent in advance with six companies with orders to press on to Concord and secure the two bridges there. At Lexington he found the local militia drawn up and ordered them to disperse. The skirmish that followed, which is known as the battle of Lexington, was begun by the British, according to the received account. The statement that Pitcairn began it by giving the order to fire is adopted as the true one by George Bancroft in his "History of the United States," but other accounts say that there was desultory firing before the order. Pitcairn insisted till his death that the minute-men had fired first. Later, in the retreat from Concord to Boston, Pitcairn was again in the service, and several of his men were wounded. At the battle of Banker Hill he was the first to ascend the redbank in the third and final assault, crying, as he did so, "Now for the glory of the marines," but he was shot by a negro soldier in the last volley that was fired by the provincials. He was buried by his son to a boat and conveyed to Boston, where he died shortly afterward. His widow was given a pension of four pounds a year by the British government. Pitcairn left eleven children, of whom the eldest, David, became an eminent physician in London, and died in 1809.

PITCER, Nathaniel, governor of New York, b. in Litchfield, Conn., in 1777; d. in Sandy Hill, N. Y., 25 May, 1836. He removed early in life to Sandy Hill, N. Y., and was a member of the legislature of that state in 1806 and 1815-17, and of the State constitutional convention in 1821. He was elected to congress as a Democrat, holding his seat in 1819-23, was chosen lieutenant-governor of New York in 1826, and, by the death of Gov. D. Witt Clinton, became governor in February, 1828, serving till January, 1829. He was afterward again in congress in 1831. His brother, Zina, physician, b. in New Haven, N. Y., 13 April, 1757, d. in Detroit, Mich., 5 April, 1872, received an academical education, and in 1802 was graduated in medicine at Middlebury college, Vt. He was appointed assistant surgeon in the U. S. army on 8 May of that year, and surgeon with rank of major on 13 July, 1822, but resigned on 31 Dec., 1836, after seeing service in the south, southeast, and southwest. In 1839 he was president of the army medical board, and from 2 Feb., till 31 Aug., 1839, he served again as assistant surgeon. Meanwhile he had removed to Detroit, where he practised till his death, attaining note in his profession. He was a regent of the University of Michigan in 1837-53, took an active part in organizing the medical department of that institution, and was afterward given the honorary title of covering president of them. Dr. Pitcher was a member of many professional bodies, and at one time served as president of the American medical association. He was for several years an editor of the "Peninsular Journal," and published various addresses, reports, and contributions to professional journals. While he was in the army, studied on his own account the habits, diseases, and remedies of the Indians, and he was the contributor of an article on practical therapeutics among the Indians to Henry K. Schoolcraft's work on the aborigines.

PITCHER, Thomas Gamble, soldier, b. in Rockport, Ind., 23 Oct., 1824; d. in Fort Bayard, New Mexico, 21 Oct., 1855. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1843, and assigned to the 5th infantry, with which he served in Texas. He was transferred to the 8th infantry in 1846, and during the war with Mexico took part in the engagements at Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo, San Antonio, Contreras, and Churubusco, for which he was brevetted 1st lieutenant, Melino del Rey, Chapultepec, and the capture of the city of Mexico. He was promoted to 1st lieutenant, 26 June, 1849, and was on duty at posts in Texas and Arkansas till the civil war, serving as depot-commissary at San Antonio in 1857-9, and receiving his promotion to captain, 19 Oct., 1865, for his defense of Harper's Ferry in June, 1862, and in the Virginia campaign of that year, being brevetted major for services at Cedar Mountain, where he was severely wounded. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers on 29 Nov., 1862, but was disabled by his wound till 10 Jan., 1863. He was on duty as commissary and provost-marshal during the war, attaining the rank of major on 19 Sept., 1863, and receiving all the brevets up to and including brigadier-general in the regular army on 15 March, 1865. He was made colonel of the 14th infantry, 28 July, 1866, served as superintendent of the U. S. military academy from 28 Aug. of that year till 1 Sept., 1871, and was governor of the Soldiers' home at Washington, D. C., in 1875; then, on special duty, was given leave of absence to his retirement on 28 June, 1878, "for disability contracted from the line of duty." From 1 March, 1880, till 15 Oct., 1887, he was superintendent of the New York state soldiers' and sailors' home.

PITCHLYNN, Peter P., Choctaw chief, b. in Rush-luck-wan (now part of Nodaway county, Mass., 30 Jan., 1801; d. in Washington, D. C., in January, 1881. His father was a white man, bearing Gen. Washington's commission as an interpreter, and his mother was a Choctaw. He was brought up like an Indian boy, but manifesting a desire to be educated, he was sent 200 miles to school in Tennessee, that being the nearest to his father's log-cabin. At the end of the first quarter he returned home, but his father then on special duty, he left his home, and never returned. He was sent as an interpreter to the Choctaw people, and was sent as their delegate to the United States, with a view to the conclusion of a treaty with the general government. As he considered the terms of this instrument a fraud upon his tribe, he refused to sign the treaty, and he was removed to the Creek country, where he was received as a member of the nation. He was a member of the Choctaw nation from 1824 to 1857, and was the last time at the point of the treaty a Choctaw. He was the last time at the point of the treaty a Choctaw. He was the last time at the point of the treaty a Choctaw. He was the last time at the point of the treaty a Choctaw. He was the last time at the point of the treaty a Choctaw. He was the last time at the point of the treaty a Choctaw.
Six months were occupied in the journey, and the negotiations were every way successful. Pitchlynn displayed no little diplomatic skill and courage. He negotiated the new navigation with his toode and built a cabin on Arkansas river. He was an admirer of Henry Clay, whom he met for the first time in 1840. He was ascending the Ohio in a steamboat when Mr. Clay came on board at Marietta. The Indian went into the cabin and found two farmers earnestly engaged in talking about their crops. After listening to them for a quarter of an hour, he turned to his traveling companion and said: "If that old farmer with an ugly face had only been educated for the law, he would have made one of the greatest men in this country." He soon learned that the "old farmer" was Henry Clay. At the beginning of the civil war in 1861 Pitchlynn was in Washington attending to public business for his tribe, and assured Mr. Lincoln that he hoped to keep his people neutral; but he could not prevent three of his own children and many others from joining the Confederates. He himself remained a Union man to the end of the war, notwithstanding the fact that the Confederates raided his plantation of 936 acres and captured all his cattle, while the emancipation proclamation freed him his bondsmen. From 1850 to 1855 he served in the House of Representatives from the White House in 1855, his speeches before the congressmen, committee in 1858, and one delivered before a delegation of Quakers at Washington in 1859, abundantly prove. According to Charles Dickens, who met him while on his first visit to the country, Pitchlynn was a handsom man, with dark hair, aquiline nose, beard and mustache, slender complexions and bright, keen, dark, and piercing eyes. He buried in the Congressional cemetery at Washington with Masonic honors, the poet, Albert Pike, delivering a eulogy over his remains. See Charles Dickens' "American Notes" and Charles Lanman's "Reollections of curious characters." Edinburgh, 1881.

PITKIN, William, lawyer, b. near London, England, in 1633; d. in East Hartford, Conn., 16 Dec., 1668. He received an excellent English education, studied law, and settled in Hartford about 1658, where he taught, bought a tract of land on the east side of Connecticut river, and engaged largely in planting. On 9 Oct., 1662, he was admitted a freeman, and in the year 1666 he made a practice for the court, became attorney for the colony by appointment of the king in 1664, was deputy in 1665 and treasurer in 1666-7, and in 1668 he went with Major John Tabboet to negotiate peace with the Narragansetts and other Indian tribes. From 1665 to 1668, with the exception of a brief period, he was a member of the general council, and was one of the agents sent from this colony to the United Colonies. In 1669 he was elected a member of the colonial council, which office he held until his death. In 1663 he was appointed with Samuel Chester and Capt. William Whiting to a commission to run the division-line between Connecticut and the Massachusetts colonies, and in that year he was sent by the General Court to New York to negotiate terms respecting the militia until Capt. Whiting's return from England, whither he had gone for the same purpose. He laid out with John Cawley the first Main and other streets of Hartford on the east side of the river. He owned a building-mill near Barnside, which was burned in 1689, and the locality became known as Pitkin's Falls. Many of his descendants held important places in the civil, political, and military affairs of the colony. He married Hannah, daughter of Osias Goodwin, the progenitor of the Goodwin family of Connecticut, who came to this country with Dr. Thomas Hooker.—Their son, William, d. in Hartford, Conn., in 1664; d. there, 1679, was a member of the committee of war that was appointed with plenary power to send troops into Massachusetts and the frontier towns of Connecticut, and that ordered, on 1 Jan., 1664, 400 men to be in readiness for any sudden occurrence. He studied law with his father, and was judge of the court of common pleas in 1690. He was a member of the committee of assistants from 1702 till 1711 when the superior court was established in place of the court of assistants, and of which he was chief justice in 1713. This office was held by four successive generations of William Pitkin. He was said to have been apt in debate as well as argument, and once, when a lawyer named Fisk, in summing up a case, said, "The court will perceive that the plaintiff is cracked," Mr. Pitkin's reply was: "Not so much cracked, your honor, but he will find it do to stew-odds in yet." In 1692 he was elected one of the council of the colony, serving until his death. He was one of the commissioners to receive the Earl of Bellomont on his arrival in New York, was a commissioner to advertise the measures of the colony, prepared the manuscript laws of the colony in 1696, and again to revise the said laws. In 1718 he was appointed a member of a committee of three to build the first State-house in Hartford, and one of a committee to prepare a map of the course of the Connecticut river from the "mouth of it to the north bounds of the colony, to be inserted in the plan of the colony to be laid out and described to Congress." He built two fulling-mills at Pitkin's falls, in connection with which he conducted a large business in clothing and woollens, which was continued by his sons.—The second William's son, William, Governor of Connecticut, b. in Hartford, Conn., 30 April, 1684; d. in East Hartford, Conn., 1 Oct., 1762, was elected to the colonial assembly from 1722 to 1771, was major of a "train band" in 1750, and rose to colonel in 1759. He was elected to the council in 1734, appointed chief justice of the supreme court in 1741, holding this office until 1766. From 1734 till 1766 he was lieutenant-governor of Connecticut, and was the first to resist the stamp-act passed in 1765. He was chosen one of the commissioners in Albany on 19 June, 1754, and also one of a committee of which Benjamin Franklin was chairman, to prepare the plan of union that was adopted. He was governor of Connecticut from 1756 till 1779, being elected by a great majority, "that the votes were not counted." His urbanity and courtesy of manner were long remembered. William Pitkin, of Hartford, noted for his fine "Bellovet," published in 1769, mention him as "bowing, and scraping, and continual hand-shaking."—His brother, Joseph, b. in 1690; d. in 1762, was justice of the peace, represented the town in the general assembly for twenty years, and was judge of the county court in 1755. He was captain in the militia company and became colonel of the 1st regiment of the Hartford county volunteers for the expedition against Crown Point, which was led there by his brother, John, b. in 1707; d. in 1790, who also served in the legislature, and presented with others a memorial to incorporate the town of East Hartford, which was effected in 1783.—The third William's son, William, d. in Hartford in 1725; d. there, 12 Dec., 1799, was major of the 1st regiment of the colonial forces that were PITKIN, Benn, stenographer, b. in Trowbridge, Wilts., England, 22 July, 1822. He was educated in his native town, and in 1855 assisted his brother in perfecting the latter's system of phonography. From 1845 till 1853 he lectured on the system throughout Great Britain, and had a large share in obtaining letters of introduction to the students. In January, 1853, he gave instruction in phonography, and settled at Cincinnati, where he has since resided. In 1853 he discovered the process of producing relief copper-plates of engraved work by the galvanic process known as electrotype, for which he was awarded a silver medal by the Cincinnati machine complex. By the end of the following year he succeeded in connection with Dr. J. B. Birna in producing stereotype plates by the gravity process in photo-engraving. From his arrival in this country until 1875 Mr. Pitman was chiefly engaged in reporting. In 1863-7, he acted as the official stenographer during the trials of the assassins of President Lincoln, the "K. K. K.", and other impeachment proceedings. He also edited and published reports of these trials. In 1878 he abandoned reporting and became connected with the school of the Cincinnati art academy. He has published "The Reporter's Companion" (Cincinnati, 1874); "The Manual of Phonography," of which 25,000 copies have been issued (1855); "Trials for Treason at Indianapolis" and "The Assassination of President Lincoln, and the Trial of the Conspirators" (1865); and, with Jerome B. Howard, "A History of Stenography and Phonography" (Cincinnati, 1880).

PITMAN, Marie J., d. at Harwick, N. Y., 17 March, 1850; d. in Paris, France, 20 Nov., 1888. She was the daughter of Lucas D. Davis, of the Newport, R. I., "Daily News," was educated by private tutors, and in 1866 married Theophilus T. Pitman. Her pen-name was "Margery Deane," and she wrote many children's stories and sketches of travel, the New York "Transcript" and other journals, and the author of "Wonder World," translations (New York, 1878), and "European Breezes" (Boston, 1880).

PITOU, Louis Ange, French author, b. in Châteaudun, France, in 1769; d. in France about 1828. He entered the prelates, but after the beginning of the French revolution he abandoned his profession. He was a royalist, was arrested several times, and finally transported to Guiana under the Directory. Shortly after his arrival at Cayenne he escaped, and after many adventures among the natives he returned to France. In 1812 he engaged in new conspiracies under the consulate, and was a few years in prison. He published "Relation de mon voyage à Cayenne et chez les anthropophages" (Paris, 1808). This work and his partial inaccuracies excited the public curiosity, and a second enlarged edition was published 2 vols. (1809). After the return of the Bourbons, Pitou received a small pension.
PITT, William, English statesman, b. in Hayes, Kent, 28 May, 1738; d. in Putney, Surrey, 23 Jan., 1806. He was the second son of the Earl of Chatham (q. v.), and was educated at Cambridge. His entire training was directed toward making him a parliamentary orator. He studied law at Lincoln's Inn, and in 1760 became a member of parliament for the borough of Appleby. His first speech, on 26 Feb., 1781, was in favor of Edmund Burke's plan of economical reform, and made a great impression. When explaining the principles and conduct of his father on American affairs, and referring to Lord Westcote, he said: "A noble lord has called the American war a holy war. I affirm that it is a most accursed war, wicked, barbarous, cruel, and unnatural; conceived in injustice, it was brought forth and nurtured in folly: its footsteps are marked with slaughter and devastation, while it mediates destruction to the miserable people who are the objects of the resentments which produced it. Where is the Englishman who can refrain from weeping on whatever side victory may be decided?". The voice was listened to as that of Chatham "again living in his son with all his virtues and all his talents." In the next session Pitt distinguished himself more brilliantly, and on the rise of the Rockingham ministry he was offered the office of vice-treasurer of Ireland, which he declined. At the age of twenty-three he was the only member of his party in the house of commons that had the courage and eloquence to confront Burke, Fox, and the other great orators of the opposition. He became chancellor of the exchequer, and in 1783 prime minister. He secured the passage of important bills, and negotiated the treaty of peace with the United States, but enforced the navigation acts of England on American vessels with much severity. Owing to current events, his ministry became enfeebled, and yet, notwithstanding his failure in foreign expeditions, Pitt's extraordinary genius as a parliamentary leader gave him absolute control of the house of commons and overcame opposition. He resigned his office in March, 1801, and lived in retirement. In May, 1806, when the ambitious schemes of Napoleon forced England to break the peace of Amiens, he appeared in parliament to deliver a speech in favor of the war. In the next year he was recalled to the ministry. He became ill with anxiety and grief at the success of Napoleon, and the surrender of the Austrian army at Ulm gave him a shock from which he never recovered. He died soon after hearing of the battle of Austerlitz, 2 Dec., 1805. Parliament gave him the honor of a public funeral, and buried him near his father's remains in Westminster abbey. See "Life of William Pitt," by Lord Stanhope (4 vols.), and also that by Lord Rosebery (1891).

PITTA, Sebastião da Rocha (pitt-tah), Brazilian historian, b. in Bahia, 3 May, 1860; d. in Paraguaries, 2 Nov., 1888. He studied in his native city and entered the law college of Bahia, and there took the degree of master of arts. At the age of sixteen he went to Portugal, and was graduated in theology at Coimbra university. On his return to Brazil he wrote in Castilian a romance in imitation of the "Palmeirin de Inglaterra," and composed verses of some merit. He resolved to write the history of Brazil, and went to Lisbon to obtain further data, where, in order to secure more material, he studied French, Italian, and Dutch. After devoting half of his life to the work, he published his "História da América Portugueza desde su descobrimento até 1724" (3 vols., 1839).

PITTINGER, William, soldier, b. in Knoxville, Jefferson co., Ohio, 31 Jan., 1840. He studied in the county schools until he had reached the age of sixteen, and enlisted as a private in the 2d Ohio volunteer infantry on 15 April, 1861. He served in the battle of Bull Run, and took part in the noted Andrews railroad raid which began on 2 April, 1862. He escaped execution as a spy, was imprisoned until 18 March, 1863, received a medal of honor, was promoted lieutenant, and returned to the army, in which he served until impaired health forced him to resign in August, 1863. In 1864 he entered the Pittsburg conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, and in 1870 was transferred to the New Jersey conference, in which he now serves. Since 1858 he has been a professor in the National school of elocution and oratory in Philadelphia. He is the author of "Daring and Suffering, a History of the Great Railroad Adventures" (Philadelphia, 1863; enlarged ed. New York, 1883); "Oratory, Sacred and Secular" (Philadelphia, 1884); and "Extempore Speech" (1889).

PITTS, Edmund Irish, lawyer, b. in Yates, N.Y., 23 May, 1839; d. in Medina, N.Y., 11 July, 1898. After receiving an education he was graduated at the State and national law-school in Poughkeepsie, N.Y., in 1860. He was a member of the assembly from 1864 till 1868, its speaker in 1867, and from 1869 till 1873 was U. S. assessor of internal revenue. He was a state senator from 1868 till 1877, serving as president pro tempore in 1886-7.

PITTS, John, merchant, b. in England in 1668. His father, Barth Pitts, was mayor of Lyme Regis, England. The son emigrated to Boston in 1694, became a merchant, and held several offices under the city. Simbert painted portraits of him and his wife.—His son, James, b. in Boston in 1712; d. in 1776, was graduated at Harvard in 1731, and devoted himself to his father's business and fortune. He married Elizabeth Bowdoin, sister of Gov. James Bowdoin, in 1732, and was a member of the king's council from 1760 till 1775. On the death of Gov. Bowdoin, Mr. Pitts became his executor. He and his wife and their six sons took an active part in the Revolution. His house, which stood on the battle spot that is now occupied by the Howard Athenaeum, was a resort of the Adamses and other patriots. In 1770, with Royal Tyler and Samuel Dexter, he was instrumental in persuading Gov. Hutchinson to comply with the popular demand for the removal of the troops from Boston. He was for many years treasurer of the Society for propagating Christian knowledge among the Incuans.—Blackburn painted portraits of both James and his wife.—James's eldest son, John, b. in Boston in 1738; d. in Tynghsboro in 1815, was graduated at Harvard in 1757, was selectman of Boston from 1753 till 1757, represented the city in several provincial congresses, was speaker of the house in 1778, and afterward state senator.—Another son, Lemuel, b. in Boston in 1757; d. in 1878, was a partial in the American Revolution.

—James's grandson, Thomas, soldier, b. in Boston in 1757; d. in 1835, was commissionedlieuten-ant of light artillery in 1808, and captain in 1809, and served through the war of 1812.

PITZER, Alexander White, clergyman, b. in Salem, Ronomoko co., Va., 14 Sept., 1834. He was graduated at Hampden-Sidney in 1854, and at Davyville theological seminary, Ky., in 1857, after which he was pastor of Presbyterian churches in Leavenworth, Kan., Sparta, Ga., and Liberty, Va., and in 1868 organized in Washington, D. C., the Central Presbyterian church, of which he is now (1898) pastor. Since 1855 he has been also professor of biblical history and literature in Howard university in that city. He was a member of the Presbyterian convention of New York city in 1878, and assisted in drafting and reported the doctrinal testimony adopted by the conference. He has taken an active part in promoting the union of the northern and southern divisions of his church. He received the degree of D. D. from Arkansas college in 1876. In addition to numerous contributions to denominational literature, he is the author of "Evangelizing Home," published anonymously (Philadelphia, 1865); "Christ, Teacher of Men" (1875); and "The New Life not the Higher Life" (1878).

Pizarro, Francisco (pe-thar-ro), Spanish soldier, b. in Trujillo, Estremadura, in 1476; d. in Lima, Peru, 26 June, 1541. He was a natural son of Gonzalo Pizarro, a colonel of infantry, and, although he was afterward recognized by his father, he received no education, and was unable to write his own name. According to Francisco Gomara, he was in his youth a swineherd, until he ran away and joined some adventurers that were going to Hispaniola, while Garci-laso and Pizarro's descendants, in a memorial to the king, affirm that he served with his father in Italy. Although it is said that in later years he learned to read imperfectly, and never wrote, in 1493 he was authorized by a special imperial decree to sign recognitions with a stamp. In Hispaniola he joined in Noember, 1509, the expedition of Alonso de Ojeda (q. c.) to Nueva Andalucia, and, when the latter went in quest of re-enforcements and provisions, he left Pizarro in command of the new colony of San Sebastian, promising to return in fifty days. At the expiration of that time Pizarro, finding the necessity, killed the horses for provisions and abandoned the colony, but in Cartagena met the expedition of Martin Fernandez de Enciso (q. e.), with whom he returned to Darien, and took part in the foundation of the colony of Santa Maria de la Antigua.
He also accompanied Vasco Nunez de Balboa in the expedition on which they discovered the Pacific coast of South America; joined in the 1513 expedition across the isthmus to explore the Pearl islands, and in 1517 ordered him to arrest Balboa.
Later he accompanied the governor on his expedition to Veragua, and served creditably in the campaign against the cacique Uraca. In recompense he received a grant of land and Indians near the site of Panama, and settled on his possessions, which he cultivated with his Indian slaves. The expedition of Pascual de Andagoya brought the first news of a rich empire to the south, and Pizarro conceived the project of conquering it.
He formed a partnership with Diego de Almagro and Fernando de Luque, and, by lending Pizarias some money for his expedition to Nicaraguia, the partners
obtained permission to form an expedition, which November, 1524, Pi-
with eighty advent-turers, and some time afterward Almagro followed with sixty men.
Both continued
along the coast to the southward, but in their attempts to penetrate to the interior they met with a determined resistance, lost many men, and, after sustaining terrible hardships, returned to Panama with news of the riches of Peru.
Pedrarias, after much difficulty, permitted them to prepare for another expedition; but the mishapen of the first voyage frightened many adventurers, and they could enlist only 160 men. They sailed again in March, 1526, and, entering San Juan river, captured an Indian town with abundant provisions and $15,000 in gold, with which Almagro returned to Panama, while Pizarro remained, and sent his pilot, Bartolome Ruiz, to explore the southern coast. Pedro de los Rios, who had succeeded Pe-drarias as governor, refused to permit any further enlistment, and sent a vessel to bring the expedition back. But Pizarro, who, with the small remnant of his force, had retired before the warlike Indians to the island of El Gallo, refused to obey, and, drawing a line in the sand with his sword, invited those that wished to follow him to glory and riches to pass the line. Only thirteen followed him, and with these he remained till he was joined by a force under Bartolome Ruiz, which had been despatched by his associates under the pretext of obliging him to return to Panama. He now continued an exploration of the coast farther south, landed in Tumbez, Paita, and Sana, obtained presents of gold, llamas, silver tankards, and other wealthy gifts of the Peruvians, and, hearing of the death of Huina Capac, and seeing the insufficiency of his small forces to subdue this immense empire, returned to Panama toward the end of the year 1527. As the governor still refused to permit another expedition to set sail, the associates resolved to send Pizarro to Spain, and in 1528 he left Nombre de Dios, carrying some Indians that he had brought from Panama together with land, gold and silver plate, and other presents for the court.
On his arrival in Seville he was arrested for a debt on request of Enciso; but he was set at liberty by order of the emperor, and ordered to appear at court in the city of Toledo, where he was well received.
On 26 July, 1539, he obtained from the queen-regent a commission that granted him the right of conquest of Peru, with the title of governor and captain-general for life of all the country to be discovered, and a salary of 720,000 maravedis on condition that he should raise a force of 350 men for the conquest. Hernan Cortes, whom he met at court, gave him some aid, but without being able to raise the whole force that was named in his commission.
Pizarro sailed in January, 1539, with a few adventurers and four of his brothers, for Nombre de Dios. After a disagreement with Almagro, who thought himself neglected, Pizarro yielded him the title of adelantado; but after nine months of increasing efforts he could gather only 150 men and 27 horses, with which he sailed in January, 1531, for Tumbes, while Almagro remained to collect further forces. He was joined in Tumbes by 130 men, with whom came Hernando de Soto and Sebastián de Vela (q. v.). In June, 1532, he founded in the valley of Piura the town of San Miguel, and, contrary to his promise, going in an extraordinary manner southward, on 24 Sept., with 110 infantry and 60 cavalry, and on 15 Nov. they entered the beautiful valley of Cajamarca. Next day they met the emperor Atahualpa, whom they made captive by surprise, and the Peruvian army fled in dismay. The men offered as a ransom to fill with gold the apartment in which he was confined, and the ornaments of the temples and palaces were brought and melted so that, after separating one fifth for the emperor and two large amounts for the garrison of San Miguel and for Almagro's followers, every one of Pizarro's cavallarymen obtained for his share 250 marks of silver and 8,800 pounds of gold, and every foot-soldier half that amount. The total was more than $1,700,000. Notwithstanding this, Almagro's private servants, however, accused him of having killed his brother Huascan, he was condemned to death and executed on 29 Aug., 1533. Pizarro now marched on Cuzco, the ancient capital of the Incas, and entered it on 15 Nov., proclaiming Manco Yupanqui (q. v.) Inca. He determined to build the new capital of his possessions near the sea, and selected the beautiful valley of the river Rimac (q. v.). On 6 Jan., 1533, he founded under the name of Lima, now called Lima, probably a corruption of the name of the river. Shortly afterward disputes between Pizarro and Almagro began over their respective powers; but they were amicably arranged, and, to avoid further difficulties, Almagro set out on 3 July, 1533, for the conquest of Chili. During the latter's absence the Indians rose and besieged Cuzco for a long time, but on his return they retired. Meanwhile a royal decree had arrived appointing Almagro governor of the southern part of the country under the name of Nueva Toledo, and there were new differences between the two conquerors about the possession of Cuzco, which both believed to be included in the limits of their respective domains. Almagro had defeated and captured by Hernando Pizarro, and executed on 8 July, 1538, it is said with the secret acquiescence of his former partner. When these occurrences were reported at court by two commissioners, who had been sent by Almagro's partisans, the emperor decided in 1539 to send out Cristóbal Vaca de Castro as a commissioner to investigate Pizarro's conduct; but before his arrival the feud between Pizarro and Almagro's followers had culminated. On a Sunday morning twenty-one of Almagro's partisans, who were called Chilenos in Lima, penetrated into the governor's palace, and, after a desperate affray, in which Pizarro killed three of their number, assaulted him and proclaimed Almagro's son governor. When the conqueror, who was not informed of the plot, appeared on the streets, it had already been removed and secretly buried by a friend, and later, by King Philip's orders, it was buried in the cathedral of Lima. Pizarro was not married, but had two children by the Indian princess Huaylas Nusta, Atahualpa's sister, a son, who died in infancy, and a daughter Beatriz, who married her uncle, Hernando, in 1551, and whose descendants inherited her father's riches and his title of marquis of the conquest. Pizarro was tall and of commanding presence, possessing extreme courage and fortune; but cruel, cunning, and perfidious. He was grasping in the acquisition of money, yet liberal in its use, and he not only gave largely to his followers, but spent part of the vast treasure, of which he robbed the Incas, in public buildings and improvements.—His half-brother, Gonzalo, b. in Trujillo in 1500; d. in Cuzco, Peru, 10 April, 1548, served in boyhood with his father in the Indian war in 1523—5, and, although he began life as a foot-soldier, yet he continued to be a constant companion and associate of his brother in the wars of conquest. He went to Peru with his brother in 1531, and did good service in the conquest, especially in the campaign of Chacas, in the siege of Cuzco by Manco Yupanqui, and in the defence of that city against Almagro, by whom he was taken prisoner, but escaped a few days after the latter's march from Cuzco. In 1539 he was appointed governor of Quito, and he soon resolved to explore the eastern slope of the Andes, where the popular belief located the famous "El Dorado" and the country of the cinnamon-tree. Early in 1540 he left Quito with an army of 250 soldiers and 4,000 auxiliary Indians, and, after innumerable hardships, reached Napo river, whence he despatched Francisco de Orellana (q. v.) on an exploration which brought him into contact with the upper Amazon river. Having awaited in vain the return of Orellana, he began the homeward journey, and after terrible privations reached Quito in June, 1542, with only eighty half-starved Spaniards on foot and less than half of his Indians. There he received the news of his brother's assassination, and retired to his commandery of Chacas, not taking part in public life, but conducting a prosperous administration of Vaca de Castro. But when, in 1544, the viceroy Blasco Nuñez Vela (q. v.) appeared with the imperial decree that forbade the personal servitude of the Indians, Gonzalo, fearing to lose the advantages of the conquest, went to Cuzco and was proclaimed by the Spanish colonists supreme justice and captain-general of Peru. At the head of the army he marched against the viceroy, who abandoned Lima, and the city was occupied by Gonzalo, 24 Oct., 1544. After various encounters he met the royalist troops at Añaquito, near Quito, where Nuñez was defeated and slain, 18 Jan., 1546, and for a time Pizarro was undisputed master of Peru, until the new royal commissioner, Pedro de la Gasca (q. v.), appointed Aug., 1545, interposed and suspended the royal decree regarding the Indians and a general amnesty. Gasca succeeded in causing the deflection of many of Gonzalo's followers. When the two armies met at last in Náquiquamana, 8 April, 1548, Garcilaso de la Vega, the elder, and many others went over to the royalists, who gained an easy victory. Gonzalo was taken prisoner, sentenced to death, and beheaded in Cuzco two days afterward.—Another brother, Hernando, the only legitimate son of Col. Pizarro and his wife, Isabel de Vargas, b. in Trujillo in 1547; d. there in 1578, received a fair education, and served with his father in Italy under Gonzalo de Cordoba in 1552—5, and in 1542 in Navarre under the Duke of Navarre. In 1555 he came to Peru with his brother, but was only thirty when he died, 25 Jan., 1563, in the conquest; but from the first he showed great hatred of Almagro, so that his brother sent him, in 1533, to Spain with the royal share of the booty. He was well received, made a knight of Santiago, and empowered to equip an expedition in Seville, with which he returned early in 1555 to Peru. There he was appointed governor of Cuzco, which he held from March till August, 1556, against Manco Yupanqui and his warriors. When the city was Hernando was taken prisoner; but he was released a few months afterward on conditions which he broke as soon as he was at liberty, and took the command of the troops against Almagro, whom he defeated at Salinas and ordered his execution. But he was accused at court and, in order to obtain his justification, sailed in the beginning of 1539 with a large quantity of gold as a gift to the crown to Spain. He was safely reached at court and arranged protection for the crown. The court of the Inquisition did not pronounce a final sentence regarding his accusation by Almagro’s executor, Diego de Alvarado, he was imprisoned in 1540 in the fortress of Medina del Campo where he was kept till 1548, although not in rigid seduction, so that he married his niece in 1551. After his release he retired to his native city, where he died at the age of 104 years.—Another brother, Juan, a natural son of Col. Pizarro by the same mother as Gonzalo, b. in Trujillo about 1500; d. in Cuzco in July, 1536, came with his brothers to Peru in 1539, and even in Panama began to show enmity to Almagro. When the army, after the death of Atahualpa, penetrated into the interior, Juan commanded the van-guard, and was the first to discover the rich valley of Jaua. When Francisco Pizarro captured Almagro in 1534, and marched with re-enforcements toward the coast, he left Juan as commander of the garrison in Cuzco, where, by his oppression of Manceo Yapanqui, for the purpose of obtaining gold from him, he gave the first cause for the rebellion of that chieftain, who fled to the mountains, but was captured again by Juan and imprisoned. In 1555 he marched against the Indians and had assassinated some Spaniards. While he was on this expedition his brother Hernando returned, and was appointed by Francisco vice-governor and chief justice of Cuzco, and Juan served under him. Hernando, against the advice of his brothers, set Manceo Yapanqui at liberty, and the man soon rose in rebellion and besieged Cuzco. When the supreme priest, Villac-Uma, had captured the citadel, where he seriously interfered with the safety of the Spanish head-quarters, Juan, whose dauntless courage was generally acknowledged, was ordered by Hernando to the assault of the fortress, and in the attack he was mortally wounded by a stone. He was buried in the Church of Santo Domingo, which had been principally endowed by him and built on the site of the palace of the viceroys which was assigned to him after the capture of Cuzco.

PIZARRO, José Alfonso, Marquis of Villar, Spanish naval officer, b. in Murcia in 1589; d. in Madrid in 1762. He entered, in his youth, the naval service of the knights of Malta, and afterward served in the Spanish navy, attaining the rank of admiral. He often heard of the expedition of the English admiral, George Anson, to the Pacific a fleet of two ships of the line and four frigates, with a regiment of infantry for Chili, was despatched under Pizarro’s command in October, 1740, and arrived, 5 Jan., 1741, in the river Plate. Hearing that Anson was retreating in Santa Catharina for entering the Pacific, he sailed south with his eight ships to intercept him, but lost one ship and one frigate in a storm, was obliged to put back for repairs, and on the second attempt, with two vessels, was again dispersed, and returned to Montevideo. Thence he despatched the frigate “Esperanza” to the Pacific, and passed across the Andes to Peru, where for some time he exercised the functions of naval commander-in-chief. After the peace with England, Pizarro left the frigate on the Pacific station and returned overland to Montevideo, where he found his flagship, the “Asia,” refitted, and sailed in her for Europe in November, 1745. Part of the crew consisted of Indians from the pampas, who one night rose on the Spaniards, and, after killing the watch on deck, gained possession of the vessel, when Pizarro succeeded in killing the ringleader, and in the confusion drove the mutineers into the sea. On his arrival at Cadiz in January, 1746, he was promoted rear-admiral, and in 1749 was appointed viceroys of New Granada; but he resigned in 1753 and returned to Spain.

PLACIDE, Henry, actor, b. in Charleston, S. C., 8 Sept., 1799; d. near Babylon, L. I., 23 Jan., 1870. His father, Alexander, was a French variety performer, who appeared at Sadler’s Wells theatre, London, and came to this country in 1792. For many years he was a professional itinerant, but he became lessee of the playhouse in Charleston, S. C., and in 1811 was one of the managers of the Richmond, Va., theatre; when it was destroyed by fire, with the loss of many lives, Henry appeared as an actor, under his father’s direction, at the Charleston theatre, and in 1814 was seen at the Anthony street playhouse in New York city. Thereafter he became attached to various travelling companies, playing occasionally in some of the southern cities. On 2 Sept., 1829, he appeared at the New York Park theatre as Zekiel Honesup in “The Heir at Law,” and for about twenty-five years, with slight interruptions, he remained attached to that establishment. He made a few brief visits to other cities, and in 1858 played at the Haymarket theatre in London. Being disappointed by his reception, he soon returned, and after the destruction of the Park theatre by fire in 1858 played occasionally at Burton’s theatre and the Winter garden. His final performances were in 1865, after which he retired to his country home. There was never a more conscientious American actor, nor one who filled a wider range of characters. Besides being a comedian, Placide was also a good buffo singer; but his manner was somewhat hard, and his Shakespearean interpretations of some of his parts were rough and labored. He was an artist of remarkably good average performances and the greatest of New York favorites, but never rose to distinction in any particular character. The portrait of Placide represents him as Dromio in the “Comedy of Errors.”—His brother, Thomas, actor, b. in Charleston, S. C., in 1808; d. in Tom’s River, N. J., 20 July, 1877, was attached in his youth to military and naval service, but his real début was made at the Chatham garden theatre in New York city in 1828 as Andrew Bang in “Love, Law, and Physics.” For several years he was connected with the Park theatre, and he afterward led a roving life. From 1850 until 1854 he managed the Varieties theatre in New Orleans, La., and in 1856 he joined the company at Wallack’s theatre, New York city. A little later he retired from the stage. Thomas Placide was a PLAISTED, Harris Merrill, soldier, b. in Jefferson, N. H., 2 Nov., 1828; d. in Bangor, Me., 50 Jan., 1898. He worked on a farm and taught, and was graduated at Wiscasset Academy, Me., in 1853, and at Albany law-school in 1855. He was then admitted to the bar and began practice in Bangor, Me., in 1856. He entered the National volunteer service in 1861 as lieutenant-colonel, was commissioned colonel in 1862, participated in McCollum's peninsular campaign, commanded a brigade before Charleston, and served with Grant before Richmond. He received the brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers in February, 1865, and that of major-general of volunteers in March of the same year. He resumed his profession after the peace, was a delegate to the National Republican convention in 1868, and attorney-general of Maine in 1873-5. He went to Congress as a Republican in 1874 to fill a vacancy, served one term, and was re-elected to Congress in 1875, but deserted the service of Maine in 1881-3. After 1884 he had edited and published "The New Age," in Augusta, Me.

PLASSMANN, Ernst, artist, b. in Sondershausen, Westphalia, 14 June, 1823; d. in New York city, 28 Nov., 1877. At the age of twenty he began to study art under Münstermann, and he continued his studies at Aix-la-Chapelle, Cologne, and Paris. In the last-named place he remained about four years, being employed most of the time in the studio of Mielch Liebard. In 1853 he went to New York, where, the following year, he opened "Plassmann's School of Art," which he carried on until his death. The "Verein für Kunst und Wissenschaft" was founded by him in 1858. His principal works in sculpture, all in New York city, are the figure of Tammany on Tammany hall (1888); the group on the freight-depot of the New York Central railroad (1872); the statue of Benjamin Franklin in Printing-House square (1781-11); and the figures of Franklin and Gutenberg on the "Staats-Zeitung" building, modeled about 1875. He executed also many models for statues and ornamental metal-work, and gained several medals at the Centennial exposition. In 1878 he began to teach carving and plaster models. He published "Modern Gothic Ornaments," with 28 plates (New York, 1855); and "Designs for Furniture" (1877). Of the latter, only three parts were published.

PLATER, George, statesman, b. in St. Mary's county, Md., in 1754; d. in Annapolis, Md., 10 Feb., 1792. He was graduated at William and Mary in 1774, studied law, and won reputation at the bar of Maryland. When the troubles with the mother country began he took an early and active part in resisting the encroachments of the British government upon the rights of the colonists. He was chosen a member of the Maryland convention that assembled at Annapolis, 8 May, 1776, and one of whose members appointed to confer with the British minister. He was appointed to a committee, on 24 May, for the purpose of inviting Robert Eden, the royal governor, to vacate. On 26 May Plater was appointed one of the council of safety, a body created for the express purpose of preparing the state for the conflict that was every day growing more imminent. He represented St. Mary's county in the convention of 1776, and was present when the act of resistance was chosen on the 11th of the same month to act as a declaration and charter of rights and a form of government" for the state of Maryland. From 1778 till 1781 he was a member of the Continental congress from Maryland, and was president of the Maryland convention that, on 28 April, 1788, ratified the constitution of the United States. In 1791 he was elected governor of Maryland.

PLATT, Charles Adams, artist, b. in New York city, 16 Oct., 1861. He studied at the Art league and the National academy, New York, during 1883-84, and in 1893-4 under Bouguereau and Lejoual, in Paris. He has given much attention to etching, in which branch of art he has been very successful. His works include "Interior of Fishhouses," "Fishing Boats," and "Provincial Fishing Village" (1882); "Old Houses near Bruges" (1885); "Devauter, Holland" (1885); "Quai des Orfèvres, Paris" (1886); and "Dippe" (1887). He paints also in oil and in water-color, and has exhibited at the Salon, the National academy, New York, and the American water-color society.

PLATT, Franklin, geologist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 19 Nov., 1844. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, but left in 1862, before graduation, and in 1863 served in the 232 Pennsylvania Gray reserve regiment. In 1864 he was appointed to the Geological Survey, and was assigned to clearing the West of the United States. After 1866 he was appointed to the staff of Gen. Orlando M. Poe, chief engineer of the military division of the Mississippi, and was engaged in this duty until the surrender of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's army in April, 1865. Subsequently, in July, 1865, he was appointed assistant geologist of Pennsylvania, which he held until May, 1881, after which he became chief of the Geologist and Pittsburgh coal and iron company. Mr. Platt is a member of scientific societies, to whose transactions he has contributed frequent papers on geology and kindred subjects. He prepared nine volumes of the reports of the geological survey of Pennsylvania. Those were his exclusive work on "On Clearfield and Jefferson Counties," (Harrisburg, 1853); "Coke Manufacture" (1856); "On Blair County" (1880); and "The Causes, Kinds, and Amount of Waste in Mining Anthracite" (1881).

PLATT, Orville Hitchcock, senator, b. in Washington, Conn., 19 July, 1827. He was educated in the public schools, was admitted to the bar in 1849, and began practice in Meriden, Conn. He was clerk of the state senate in 1857, state senator in 1862-3, and a member of the legislature in 1864-5, serving as speaker in the latter year. He was elected to the U. S. senate as a Republican in 1878, and has since been re-elected. His present term expires in March, 1903. Mr. Platt has been an earnest advocate of the abolition of secret executive sessions of the senate. Yale gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1887.

PLATT, Thomas Collier, senator, b. in Oswego, N. Y., 13 July, 1833. He left Yale in his sophomore year in 1854 on account of failing health, but received the honorary degree of M. A. in 1876 from that college. He entered mercantile life, became president of the Tioga, N. Y., National Bank, and engaged in real estate business in Michigan. He was elected to congress as a Republican in 1872, re-elected in 1874, and on 18 Jan., 1881, was chosen U. S. senator to succeed Francis Kernan, but resigned, 16 May of the same year, with his colleague, Roscoe Conkling (q. c.), on account of a disagreement with the executive regarding New York appointments. He returned to the legislature in 1882, and after an exciting canvass was defeated. He became secretary and a director of the United States express company in 1879, and since 1880 has been his president. He was appointed commissioner of quarantine of New York city in 1880, became president of the board, and held office till 14 Jan., 1888, when he was removed by proceedings instituted on account of his alleged non-residence in New York city. He was a member of the National Republican conventions in 1876, 1880-1, and 1882-6, and for several years of the Republican national delegations was appointed to the senate for the term ending March, 1903.

PLATT, William Henry, clergyman, b. in Ameinia, Dutchess co., N. Y., 16 April, 1821. He received a good education, was admitted to the bar in 1840, and for four years practised in Alabama. He was ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1842, and presbytery in 1852, held rectorships in Selma, Ala., Petersburg, Va., Louisville, Ky., and San Francisco, Cal., and became rector of St. Paul's church, Rochester, N. Y., in 1882. William and Mary gave him the degree of D. D. in 1878, and also that of L. L. D. Dr. Platt's publications include "Art Culture" (New York, 1875); "Influence of Religion in the Development of Jurisprudence" (1877), and several other works on "Unity of Law or Legal Morality" (1879); "God out, and Man in," a reply to Robert G. Ingersoll (Rochester, 1883); and "The Philosophy of the Supernatural."

PLATT, Zephaniah, member of the Continental congress, b. in Dutchess county, N. Y., in 1740; d. in Plattsburg, N. Y., 12 Sept., 1807. He received a classical education, studied law, and practised. He was a delegate from New York to the Continental congress in 1784-6, and was judge of the circuit court for many years. He was one of the originators of the Erie canal, and founded the town of Plattsburg.—His son, Jonas, jurist, b. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 30 June, 1769; d. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 22 Feb., 1834, was educated in the public schools, admitted to the bar in 1790, and the next year settled in Whitesboro, N. Y. He was a member of the assembly in 1796, of congress in 1796-1801, and of the state senate in 1810-13. He was an unsuccessful candidate for governor in 1810, a member of the council in 1813, and in 1814-23 a justice of the New York supreme court. He then engaged in practice in Utica, and subsequently in New York city, where he died. His son, Zephaniah, b. in Plattsburg, N. Y., in 1769; d. in Aiken, S. C., 20 April, 1871, removed to Michigan in early life, studied and subsequently practised law, and was appointed by the U. S. government its attorney to settle its claims on the Pacific coast. He was state attorney-general for several years, and took high rank at the bar. He removed to South Carolina at the close of the civil war, and from 1898 until his death was judge of the 3d circuit.

PLAZA, Manuel (plah'-thah), Peruvian missionary, b. in Riecamba, 1 Jan., 1772; d. in Lima about 1845. He entered the Franciscan convent of Quito, was ordained priest at the age of twenty-three years, and immediately afterward set out as a missionary for the river Napo. After a year he went to the missions of Cayambe and settled in Sarayacu, where he soon gained the esteem of the Indians and founded two new villages. There he remained till 1814, when the viceroy, Jose de Abascal, fearing the success of the revolution, appointed him to open another outlet to Europe by way of Comas and Chunchamayo. He explored the country three months, and, after giving an account of his commission to the viceroy, returned to Sarayacu and continued his missions till 1821, when the Spanish missionaries fled to Brazil, and he was left alone among the savages. He suffered greatly till 1828, when he found his way to Quito, and was well received by the bishop and Gen. Bolivar, who provided him with abundant means, and ordered him to return to his missions. After an exploration of the rivers of the interior by a Peruvian commission, the government resolved to assist the efforts of Father Plaza, and the latter came to Lima in 1830. Congress passed a law that provided a yearly subvention for the missions, and Plaza planned to return in 1846, but died before he could make the journey, and his manuscripts were lost.

PLAZA, Nicomar (plah'-thah), Chilian sculptor, b. in Santiago in 1844. He entered the academy of sculpture of the University of Chili in 1859, and in 1867 the government sent him to Europe for further study. In 1866 he opened a studio in Paris, where he exhibited his "Susanna," "Hercules," and "Caupolican" in 1867. In 1871 he was appointed director of the Academy of sculpture of Santiago. In that city he executed many works that relate to the history of his country, some of which are erected in the public places of Santiago. In 1872, on the occasion of the Santiago centennial, he received a gold medal. In 1874 he was sent to Europe on an artistic mission, and during the first months of his stay there he executed a statue of Andres Bello, which was erected in 1882 in Santiago, in the square of the national congress. He also made a statue of Domingo Eyzaguirre.

PLEASANTS, James, senator, b. in Goochland county, Va., 20 Oct., 1748, and at his residence, "Contention," Goochland county, Va., 9 Nov., 1839. He was a first cousin of Thomas Jefferson. He was educated by private tutors, studied law, was admitted to the bar of his native county, and enjoyed an extensive practice, especially as an advocate. He was a member of the legislature in 1796, having been elected as a Republican, clerk of the house in 1805-11, and from the latter date till 1819 was in congress. He then became U. S. senator, served in 1819-22, when he resigned, and was governor of Virginia for the succeeding three years. During his term of office, in 1824, Lafayette visited Virginia. He was a delegate to the Virginia constitutional convention in 1828-30, and subsequently declined the appointment of judge of the circuit court of the Virginia court of appeals. The county of Pleasants, now W. Va., is named in his honor. John Randolph of Roanoke said of him: "James Pleasants never made an enemy nor lost a friend."—His son, John Hampden, journalist, b. in Goochland county, Va., 4 Jan., 1797; d. in Richmond, Va., 27 Feb., 1846, was educated at William and Mary college, and was admitted to the bar at an early age, but abandoned law for journalism, and founded and became editor of the Lynchburg "Virginian." He subsequently removed to Richmond, Va., and in 1824 founded the "Constitutional Whig and Public Advertiser," and was its chief editor for twenty-two years. He was killed in a duel with Thomas Ritchie, Jr., of the "Richmond Enquirer," a Democratic organ. Mr. Pleasants was a brilliant and daring orator and pamphleteer, and his journal was the principal exponent of the Whig party in Virginia. His brother Whigs erected a monument to his memory, on which his gallant and self-sacrificing patriotism is recorded.

PLEASONTON, Augustus James, soldier, b. in Washington, 18 Aug., 1808; d. in Philadelphia, 25 July, 1894. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, and then served on garrison duty at the Artillery school in Fort Monroe, and on topographical duty until 1830, when he resigned from the army. After studying law, he was admitted to the bar, and engaged in practice in Philadelphia. He had served in the Pennsylvania militia, holding the rank of brigadier-major in 1833, and becoming colonel in 1835, and he was wounded during the conflict with armed rioters in Southwark, Pa., on 7 July, 1844. During the political disturbances in Harrisburg, Pa., in 1838-9, he was assistant adjutant-general and paramour-general of the state. On 16 May, 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general of Pennsylvania militia, and was placed in the organization and subsequent command during the civil war of a home-guard of 10,000 men, including cavalry, artillery, and infantry, for the defence of Philadelphia. In 1839-40 he was president of the Harrisburg, Portsmouth, Mountjoy, and Lancaster railroad company. He had devoted his leisure to the cultivation of a farm near Philadelphia, where, as early as 1861, he began to experiment on the action of different colored rays upon vegetable and animal life. He claimed to have demonstrated that the blue rays of the sun were especially stimulating to vegetation. His experiments were subsequently applied to animals, and afterward to invalids, and wonderful cures were said to have been wrought. The public became excited by his experiments, and for a time a so-called "blue glass craze" prevailed, culminating in 1873-8.

His brother, Alfred, in Washington, 7 June, 1824; d. 17 Feb., 1895, was graduated at the U. S. military academy, served in the Mexican war, and was brevetted 1st lieutenant for "gallant and meritorious conduct" in the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma. He subsequently was on frontier duty with his company, and was commissioned brigadier-general on 5 Aug., 1861, and captain in 1865. He was acting assistant adjutant-general to Gen. William S. Harney during the Sioux expedition, and his adjunct-general from 1886 till 1889 in the campaign against the Seminoles in Florida, and the operations in Kansas, Oregon, and Washington territory. He commanded his regiment in its march from Utah to Washington in the autumn of 1861, was commissioned major of the 2d cavalry in February, 1862, served through the Virginia peninsular campaign, became brigadier-general of volunteers, in July of that year, and commanded the division of cavalry of the Army of the Potomac that followed Lee's invading army into Maryland. He was engaged at Boonesborough, South Mountain, Antietam, and the subsequent pursuit, engaged the enemy frequently at Fredericksburg, and stayed the further advance of the enemy at Chancellorsville. On 2 May, when Jackson's Confederate corps was coming down upon the right flank of Hooker's army, and had already routed Howard's corps, Gen. Pleasonton, by his quick and skilful action, saved the army from a serious disaster. Ordering the 9th Pennsylvania cavalry to charge boldly into the woods in the face of the advancing host, Gen. Alfred Pleasonton delayed Jackson's progress a few minutes—or long enough to throw into position all the artillery that was within reach. He ordered the guns loaded with grape and canister, and depressed enough to make the shot strike the ground half way between their line and the edge of the woods. When the Confederate column emerged, it met such a storm of iron as few could pass. At this time Jackson fell, and before any new maneuvers could be undertaken darkness put an end to the day's work. He received the brevet of lieutenant-colonel for Antietam in 1862, was promoted major-general of volunteers in June, 1863, participated in the numerous actions that preceded the battle of Gettysburg, was commander-in-chief of cavalry in that action, and was brevetted colonel 2 July, 1863. He was transferred to Missouri in 1864, drove the forces under Col. Sterling Price from the state, and in March, 1865, was brevetted brigadier-general in the U. S. army for gallant and meritorious conduct in that campaign, and major-general for services throughout the civil war. He resigned from the army in September, 1865, after several years, and subsequently president of the Terre Haute and Cincinnati railroad. In May, 1888, he was placed on the retired list, with the rank of colonel. U. S. A. He died in Washington.

PÉE, Auguste, French botanist, b. in Pointe à Pitre, Guadeloupe, in 1757; d. in Fort Royal, Martinique, in 1838. He was born in Guadeloupe, but was devoted to natural history, and embarked in 1819 for South America, charged by the government with the mission of exploring the continent as a botanist. After travelling extensively, and forming numerous collections of plants, he fell sick and returned to Martinique. His principal works are "Le Jeune botaniste, ou description et classification des plantes qui se rencontrent dans les colonies françaises et la physiologie végétale," 2 vols., Paris, 1821; and a "Journal de voyage du botaniste Auguste Péé, à travers les Antilles, les Guyanes et le Brésil," 2 vols., Paris, 1828. The administration of the Paris museum published in 1830 a catalogue of Péé's collection in 5 vols.

PLESSIS, Francis Xavier, Canadian clergyman, b. in Quebec, 15 July, 1841. He became a member of the Society of Jesus, and was engaged on the Indian missions. He wrote "Avis et pratiques pour profiter de la mission et conserver le fruit à l'usage des missions du Pére du Plessis de la Compagnie de Jesus." 3 vols., Paris, 1742; and "Lettre au sujet des colonnies publiques par l'intermédiaire des nouvelles écoles," 1749.

PLESSIS, Joseph Octave, Canadian R. C. bishop, b. near Montreal, Canada, in 1762; d. in Quebec, 4 Dec., 1825. He studied classics in the College of Montreal, but refused to continue his education, and his father, who was a Blacksmith, set him to work at the forge. After a short experience at manual labor, he returned to enter the Petit Seminaire of Quebec in 1789. On finishing his course he taught belles-lettres and rhetoric in the College of Montreal, and, notwithstanding his youth, became secretary to Bishop Briand. He was ordained priest on 29 Nov. 1786. Shortly after his ordination he was made secretary to Bishop Hubert, and he exercised so much influence over this prelate that he recommended him for the position of cathedral bishop. In 1792 he was appointed cure of Quebec, Bishop Denault named him his grand vicar in 1797, and at the same time announced his intention of choosing him for coadjutor. The popularity of Plessis with the French Canadians excited the hos-tivity of the English party, and Gen. Prescott, the governor of the province, opposed the appointment, but he finally yielded to the demands of public opinion. Plessis was consecrated bishop in the cathedral of Quebec on 25 Jan., 1801, in presence of the governor and officials of the province. The death of Bishop Denault raised him to the episcopal see of Quebec in 1806. He began his administration under difficult circumstances. Efforts were made to appropriate the property of the Jesuits and of the Seminary of Montreal to the uses of the state, to organize an exclusively Protestant system of public instruction, and to give a power of veto on the nomination of priests and the erection of parishes. An attempt was made to prevent him from taking the oath of allegiance in his capacity of bishop of Quebec. In 1810 Gov. Craig sent a messenger to England to complain of the bishop's conduct; but the authorities adopted a conciliatory policy, Craig was recalled, and Sir George Prevost was sent to replace him. The new governor had several interviews with the bishop, who refused to make any concessions, and finally all his demands in behalf of the Roman Catholic church in Canada were conceded. The part that he took during the war of 1812 in exciting the loyalty and warlike spirit of the French Canadians gained him the good-will of England. He received letters from the government recognizing his title and jurisdiction anew. In 1818 he was nominated archbishop of Quebec, and the rest of British America was formed into four suffragan sees. In the legislative council he was an ardent defender of the religious and civil rights of his co-religionists, and in 1822, when the English government tried to force a union between Upper and Lower Canada, his energetic resistance counted for much in the failure of the plan. The royal visit in 1821 which acknowledged his elevation formed the great end of his life. He resisted successfully efforts to weaken the force of French-Canadian nationality through the medium of a system of popular education. The colleges of Nicolet and St. Hyacinth were founded through his encouragement, and schools and academies were established in every direction. He spent his time and income in searching out young men and educating them at his own expense. Some of the most eminent men of Canada owed their training to him. The passage of the education law of 1824 was to a great extent his work, and his correspondence with Lord Bathurst on this subject proves him a man of great diplomatic force.

Plessis, Plumb, Plessys, Plessis, Plessvs, Pacificus du, French missionary, b. in France in the latter part of the 16th century; d. in Quebec in the first part of the 17th. He was one of the four Recollect missionaries that accompanied Champlain to Canada in 1615, and was employed to instruct the children of the French and Indians that had settled at Three Rivers. His influence over the Indians enabled him to persuade them to remain loyal to the colonists. In 1618 a conspiracy was formed to cut off all the French, and 800 Indians assembled near Three Rivers to carry out the plot. Brother Pacificus was warned by a friendly savage. He gained over some of the chiefs, and with their help prevailed on the others to agree to a treaty of peace, which he undertook to negotiate with Champlain. He sailed with the latter for France the same year, but afterward returned to Canada. His body was discovered near the mouth of Champlain in 1806.

Pleville Le Peley, Georges René (played variously), French naval officer, b. in Granville, 26 June, 1786; d. in Paris, 2 Oct., 1805. He ran away from school when he was twelve years old, and enlisted as a cabin-boy at Havre, under the name of Du Vivier, on a ship-bound for the Newfoundland fisheries. At the beginning of the war of 1792 he joined a privateer as lieutenant, and did good service off the coast of Canada. In 1794 he was taken prisoner by the American frigate which had grounded on a sand-bank in a hurricane. The English admiral presented him with a purse of £90,000, and when afterward, during the war of American independence, his two sons were captured by the English, the admiralty issued orders to release them. In 1798 he became second captain of the "Languedoc," the flagship of Admiral D'E斯塔ing, and during the gale that dismasted the frigate he commanded the ship's boat vessel. After serving creditably in the attack on St. Lucia, and participating in the capture of St. Vincent and Grenada in the West Indies, he urged D'EEstaing, whose confidence he had gained, to utilize the momentary French superiority on the sea in undertaking some great enterprise for the American cause, and was charged with conveying captured English vessels to the United States. The Baltimore merchants were so satisfied with their dealings with him that, after the siege of Savannah, when D'E Estaing opened negotiations for a loan of $860,000 to repair his vessels, they consented to advance the sum upon the personal security of Pleville Le Peley. This conduct is the more memorable when it is remembered that Lafayette, the acknowledged leader of the Sons of Liberty, was unable to raise only $10,000 in 1781 from those same merchants. In the assault on Savannah, 9 Oct., 1779, he commanded a company, and was conspicuous in his efforts to reform the column when it lost its way in a swamp, and became exposed to the British batteries. In 1780 he served under De Guichen, and he fought also at Yorktown under De Grasse in October, 1782. After the defeat of that admiral, 22 April, 1782, he rejoined Vandemirels, and served under him till the conclusion of the campaign. He was promoted commodore in 1785, and employed in several cruises in North America. Adopting in 1789 the principles of the French revolution, he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to Ancona in 1790, and afterward given a like mission to Venice, where, as he was promoted rear-admiral, and in March, 1798, vice-admiral, he held also the naval portfolio from April till July, 1798, was created a senator in 1799, and given the grand cross of the order of the Legion of honor by Napoleon in 1804.

Plumb, Joseph, pioneer, b. in Paris, Oenida co., N. Y., 20 Jan., 1761; d. in Cattaraugus, N. Y., 25 May, 1850. He settled in Pennsylvania in 1786, and after removing to New York city, and subsequently to Buffalo and Geneva, he finally established himself in Gowanda, Erie co., N. Y., on the border of the Cattaraugus reservation of Seneca Indians. He was active in benevolent and educational enterprises in behalf of this tribe, and organized the first schools and church in that community. He was a founder of the Liberty party in 1840, and its candidate for lieutenant-governor in 1844. He owned the land upon which the town of Cattaraugus was built, and disposed of it on condition that no intoxicating liquors should be sold thereon. In one case the matter was carried to the court of appeals, and, after years of litigation, was decided in 1869 in favor of Mr. Plumb, the court sustaining the temperance restriction. He was an early member of the anti-slavery party, and declined a nomination to congress in 1857, and the office of circuit judge. See his "Memorial," (printed privately at Binghamton.) Edward Lee, diplomatist, b. in Gower, N. Y., 17 July, 1827, has been secretary of legation and charge d'affaires in Mexico, consul-general at Havana, and was the agent in procuring the charter of the International railway of Mexico.

PLUMB, Josiah Burr, Canadian statesman, b. in East Haven, Conn., 25 March, 1816; d. in Niagara Falls, 6 Sept., 1882. He was rector of the Episcopal church at East Haven. The son was for many years manager of the State bank at Albany, N. Y., and a director in several banks in Buffalo and Oswego. He was one of a committee that was appointed by the Democrats of New York state to confer with the slave states on the northern border, with a view to prevent the civil war. He subsequently removed to Canada, and was elected to the Dominion parliament for Niagara in 1874, being an active debater on the Conservative side. He was unsung on petition the same year, and re-elected shortly afterward for the same constituency. Through the disqualification of his opponent, who received the majority of votes, he was declared elected again in 1878. In 1877-8 he accompanied Sir John Macdonald in his national politi campaign, rendering efficient service to his party. He was an unsuccessful candidate for North Wellington in 1882, and was called to the senate, 6 Feb., 1883. He presided over the senate during most of the session of 1886, owing to the illness of Sir Alexander Campbell, and was appointed speaker of that body in April, 1887, which office he held until his death.

PLUMB, Preston R., senator, b. in Delaware county, Ohio, 12 Oct., 1817; d. in Washington, 20 Dec., 1891. After receiving a common-school education he went to Kansas. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1861, was a member of the legislature in 1862, subsequently reporter of the Kansas supreme court, and in the latter part of that year entered the National army as a lieutenant. He served throughout the Civil war, and attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He was again in the legislature in 1867-8, was its speaker the latter year, and in 1876 was elected U. S. senator as a Republican. He was re-elected twice, his last term ending in 1893. Mr. Plumb had edited and adapted a work entitled "Practice before Justice Courts in Kansas" (New York, 1853).

PLUMER, William (plum-er), senator, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 25 June, 1799; d. in Epping, N. H., 22 June, 1856. His ancestor, Francis, emigrated from England in 1634, and was one of the original grantees of Newbury. William removed to Epping, N. H., at eighteen years of age, received an academic education, was admitted to the bar in 1787, and soon established a reputation as an advocate. He also took an active part in state politics, was solicitor for Rockingham county for many years, served in the legislature for eight terms, during two of which he was speaker, and was president of the state senate in 1810-11. In 1792 he was a member of the New Hampshire constitutional convention, and was active in the revision of the statutes. He was elected U. S. senator in 1802 to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of James Shute, served till 1807, and was governor of New Hampshire in 1812-13, and again in 1817-18. He was a presidential elector in 1820, casting the only vote in opposition to the re-election of President Monroe, to whom he objected on account of his financial embarrassments. This was his last public service. For the remaining thirty years of his life he devoted himself to literary pursuits, and contributed regularly to the press under the signature of "Cincinnati." He published a biography of the Old Whigs (Washington, 1855) and "Address to the Clergy" (1814), and left valuable historical and biographical manuscripts. See his life, by his son, with a memoir of the latter, edited by Andrew P. Peabody (Boston, 1857).—His son, William, congressman, b. in Epping, N. H., 9 Oct., 1839; d. there, 18 Sept., 1864, was graduated at Harvard in 1859, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1861. He was a U. S. commissioner of lands in 1861-7, a member of the legislature in 1818, and was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving by re-election from 1863 till 1865. He was an ardent Abolitionist, and delivered several speeches in congress in opposition to the admission of Missouri into the Union as a slave state. He was in the New Hampshire senate in 1867-8, and declined a re-election in 1869, and the appointment of district attorney. He subsequently devoted himself to literary pursuits, and his last public service was as a member of the State constitutional convention in 1859. Mr. Plumb was an accomplished speaker and writer. He gave much time to historical and biographical research, and was an active member of the New England historic genealogical society. Two volumes of his poems were printed privately (Boston, 1841 and 1843), and he published "Lawra Sacra" (1845) and "Pastor on the Story of Ruth" (1847), and, in part, edited the life of his father, mentioned above.

PLUMER, William Swan, clergyman, b. in Charleston (S. C.), 27 Apr., 1797; d. in Burlington, Md., 22 Oct., 1880. He was graduated at Washington college, Va., in 1816, studied at Princeton theological seminary in 1816, was ordained the next year, and organized the first Presbyterian church in Danville, Va., in 1827. He then removed to Warrenton, N. C., where he also organized a church, and afterward preached in Raleigh, North Carolina, and New Bern, N. C., and in Prince Edward and Charlotte counties, Va. He was pastor of a church in Petersburg, Va., in 1831-4, and in Richmond in 1835-46. He founded the "Watchman of the South," a religious weekly, in 1837, and for eight years was its sole editor. In 1838 he was instrumental in establishing the Beaufort, dumb, and blind institution in Sumter, Va. He was principal of colleges in Burlington, Md., in 1847-54, and in Alleghany, Pa., in 1855-62, at the same time serving as professor of didactic and pastoral theology in Western theological seminary there. He resided in Philadelphia for the next three years, was in charge of a Presbyterian church in Pottsville, Pa., in 1865-6, and at that date became professor of didactic and pastoral theology in the Theological seminary in Columbia, S. C. He was transferred to the chair of historic, casistic, and pastoral theology in 1875, and held that office until a few months previous to his death. He was moderator of the general assembly. of the Presbyterian church in 1838, and of the southern branch of that body in 1871. He received the degree of D. D. from Princeton, Lafayette, and Washington colleges in 1839, and that of LL. D. from the University of Mississippi in 1857. He was an assistant in the ministry of the Presbyterian church. He was not an orator, but he exercised a strong personal influence over his audiences, and possessed a gift for teaching. His writings were practical, didactic, and of the extreme Calvinistic school. They include "Substance of an Argument against the indiscriminate Incorporation of Churches and Religious Societies" (New York, 1817); "The Bible True and Infallible" (1818); "Plain Thoughts for Little Children" (Philadelphia, 1849); "Short Sermons to Little Children" (1856); "Thoughts Worth Remembering" (New York, 1856); "The Saint and the Sinner" (Philadelphia, 1851); "The Grace of Christ" (1853); "A Plea for the Bible against the Bible against Rome" (1854); "Christ our Theme and Glory" (1855); "The Church and her Enemies" (1856); "The Law of God as contained in the Ten Commandments" (1864); "Vital Godliness" (New York, 1865); "Jehovah's Birch" (Philadelphia, 1866); "Studies in the Book of Psalms" (1866); "The Rock of Our Salvation" (1867); "Words of Truth and Love" (1868); "Commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans" (1870); "Commentaries on the Epistle to the Hebrews" (1871); more than fifty sermons that were published by religious societies; and many occasional sermons.

PLUMIER, Charles, French botanist, b. in Marseilles, France, in 1646; d. in Santa Maria, near Cadiz, Spain, in 1704. He entered the order of Minimes in 1662, and devoted himself to the physical sciences, mathematics, and painting. He attended botanical lectures in Rome, and was selected by the government in 1680 to accompany Surian to the French possessions in the Antilles. The two botanists quarrelled at the end of eighteen months, and Plumer published his results separately on his return to France. Owing to the interest that was excited among scientists, the king sent him on a second mission to the same country. Its success induced him to make a third voyage, which he undertook at the expense and expense of Domingo, as well as Martinique. He also went to the neighboring coast of the main-land, where he made many valuable collections. He sailed for Santa Maria, intending to embark at that port for Peru, but was attacked by fever shortly after landing. Plumer rendered great services to the natural sciences, and particularly to botany. His works are "Description des plantes d'Amerique" (Paris, 1695); "Nova plantarum Americanarum genera" (1703); and "Traite des fougerees d'Amerique" (1705). Plumer also published some other works, and left an immense collection of manuscripts, which are in the library of Paris and in that of the Jardin des Plantes. Among them are "Botanographia America," "Descriptions plateranum ex America," "De naturalibus Antillarum," "Salma, salma Americanum, seu plantarum, piscium, volcumrumque insulis Antillia e San-Dominicana naturalium icones et descriptiones," "Poissons de L'Amercique," and "Ornithographia Americana, quadrupedia, et volatilia continens." There are altogether more than 4,300 designs of plants and more than 1,200 of birds. Although his natural history, drawn by Plumer, probably a larger number than were executed by any other artist. Several dissertations by Plumer were published in scientific periodicals. In the "Journal des savants" of 1691, and in the "Memoires de Trevoux" of September, 1706, he gave the first correct accounts of the origin of echinoderm. The name Plumeria was given by Tournefort to a class of trees in the West Indies.

PLUMNEY, Benjamin Rush, author, b. in Newbury, Bfn., 14 Oct., 1745; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 Dec., 1813. He was early associated with William Lloyd Garrison in abolition movements, subsequently engaged in literary pursuits, and contributed prose and poetical sketches to the magazines. During the civil war he served on the staff of Gen. John C. Frémont, and subsequently he was on the staff of Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks. He afterward settled in Galveston, Tex. His works in manuscript, to be issued in book-form, include "Kathleen McKinley, the Kery Grill, " "Rachel Lockwood," "Laws of the Quakers," which appeared in the "Knickerbocker," and "Oriental Ballads," in the "Atlantic Monthly." formed a stock-company for the manufacture of iron, and built the Durham furnace, where the manufacture has since been continued. The property was purchased in 1864 by Edward Cooper and Abram S. Hewitt. By his will he left £50 to be divided between ten poor housekeepers, five of them to be Friends and five of other denominations. He also gave five shillings to every poor person in the almshouse. His son, William, mayor of Philadelphia, b. in Philadelphia, 7 Nov., 1768; d. there, 10 Aug., 1765, became his father's partner in business, and continued in trade after the latter's death. In 1753 he was chosen to the city council. In 1741, on his return from a voyage to England, it being suggested that he should be called to the provincial council, Gov. Thomas wrote to William Penn: "Will Plunsted is a very worthy young man, but as his father is in the council he will be always looked upon as under his influence, and so can give no reputation to the board. Besides, it is both your brother's opinion and mine that he would not accept it." On the death of Peter Evans, a lawyer of the Inner Temple, in 1743, the office of register-general for the province became vacant, and, at Clement Plunsted's solicitation, it was given to William, who held the office until his death. He was also many years a county judge. When about middle age he renounced Quakerism. In 1748 he was a subscriber to the "Journal," and doubtless, the first edition was bound in Philadelphia. Subsequently he became one of the founders of St. Peter's church, and in 1761, when its house for worship was finished, he was elected a vestryman, and became the first accounting warden. He was one of the original trustees of the university that has since grown to be the University of Pennsylvania. He thus three times chose Philadelphia—in 1750, 1754, and 1755—and at the end of the term gave to the city £75 instead of giving the entertainment that was expected from a retiring mayor. In 1757, although he resided at that time in the city of Philadelphia, he was chosen a member of the assembly from Northampton county. His daughter, Elizabeth, a lady of note, was the wife of Andrew Elliott, and his granddaughter, Elizabeth, daughter of Andrew and Elizabeth (Plunsted) Elliott, became lady of the bed-chamber to the queen of England, and wife of William Schaw Cathcart, who was created Earl Cathcart in 1814.

George Washington, civil engineer, b. in Waltham, Mass., 18 Nov., 1827. He learned the machinist's trade, and then was graduated with the degree of C. E. at Rensselaer polytechnic institute in 1847. For a time he remained at the institute as instructor in mathematics, but in 1850 he turned his attention to professional work in New York state, and later in Cleveland, Ohio, and in 1852 he held the chair of engineering and architecture in Cleveland university. In 1857 he taught chemistry in the State normal school in Albany, N. Y., and in 1865-9 he had charge of physics and engineering in the Normal school in Trenton, N. J. He was called in 1863 to the chair of physical science in the Brooklyn polytechnic institute, and in 1869 was appointed to that of physics and engineering at Cooper Union, New York, on which he was advanced in 1873 to the post of director of the Cooper Union night-school. In 1844-5 he was professor of chemistry and toxicology in the Long Island college hospital, and in 1856-8 he was chief engineer of the water board of Bergen, N. J., having charge of the drainage of that place. Prof. Plympton was appointed commissioner of electrical subways of Brooklyn, and had been very prompt in placing the wires underground. He received the honorary degree of A. M. in 1854 from Hamilton college, and in 1857 that of M. D. from the Long Island college hospital. He is a member of the American society of civil engineers, and other scientific associations. From 1820 till 1886 he edited "Van Nostrand's Engineering Magazine," and he has published "The Blowpipe, a Guide to its Use in the Determination of Salts and Minerals" (Cincinnati, 1858); "The Star Finder, or Planisphere with a Moveable Horizon" (New York, 1878); "The Aerodrome, and how to use it" (1880); and a translation of Jannettaz's "Guide to the Determination of Rocks" (1873).
his mind. On 14 Feb., 1826, he was matriculated at the University of Virginia, where, though a fair student, he spent much time at the gaming-table, and he was not expelled by the faculty, as has been said, nor was he even admonished by them. He had incurred heavy gambling debts, which his foster-father refused to pay, and taking the boy from college at the end of the first year, he placed him in his own counting-room; but shortly afterward Poe left Richmond to seek his fortune. He first went to Boston, where, about midsummer of 1827, he was permitted to publish the first volume of "Tamerlane and Other Poems," which he said in the preface had been written in 1821-2. But his means were soon exhausted, and on 26 May, 1828, he enlisted as a private in the U. S. army, under the name of Edgar A. Perry. He won the goodwill of his superiors, and on 1 Jan., 1829, was promoted sergeant-major for merit, but a little later he made his whereabouts known to Mr. Allan, who, with others, procured his discharge and appointment to a cadetship at the U. S. military academy. Before the latter had been obtained Poe published a new edition of his poems with some additions, entitled: "All Aaran, Tamerlane, and Minor Poems." (Baltimore, 1829), which, like the first, possessed little merit, and met with no favor. He later went to West Point, and at the end of the first half-year stood third in French and seventeenth in mathematics in a class of eighty-seven, but he became dissatisfied, and, as his foster-father refused to sanction his resignation, he purposely neglected his duties and was cashiered early in 1831. Before this he had obtained the subscription of some of his fellow-students to a third collection of "Poems." (New York, 1831), which met with nothing but ridicule.

He now sought literary employment in Baltimore, but with little success till in 1833 he was awarded a prize of $100, which had been offered by the Baltimore "Saturday Visitor," for his tale "A Manuscript found in a Bottle," the judges being Dr. James H. Miller, John H. B. Latrobe, and John P. Kennedy. Another prize of $50 for the best poem was also won by his "Coliseum," but it was ruled out as being by the author of the successful tale. Poe had been in destitution, but he was relieved by Mr. Kennedy, who also procured him literary work, and on Kennedy's recommendation he was engaged as editor of the "Southern Literary Messenger" at $50 a month, and after a year was offered a position at West Point, developing the gloomy and mystical vein for which he afterward became noted, but he gained more attention by his trenchant criticisms, which made him unpopular, especially in New York. While here he also became engaged to his cousin, Virginia Clemm, then a girl of thirteen years, and on 22 Sept., 1835, he obtained a marriage license in Baltimore, but the ceremony was not performed publicly till the following year. His success was now excellent, but in January, 1837, he resigned his post and went to New York. This, as well as the sudden termination of Poe's other editorial engagements, has been the subject of much controversy, some authorities saying that his dissipated habits were the cause, and others ascribing it to his views on the subject of "slavery," which were not in keeping with those of Dr. Francis L. Hawks to become a contributor to the newly established "New York Review." He furnished only one article for this, a review of a book of travels, and then worked on his "Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym," a tale of adventure in antarctic regions, which had been partially published in the "Messenger" (New York, 1836). At this time the principal income of the family was obtained from the borders that Mrs. Clemm, Poe's mother-in-law, received. Among these was William Gowans, the bibliophile, who has testified to Poe's uniformly sober and courteous deportment. In the summer of 1838 he went to Philadelphia and compiled the "Conchologist's First Book" (Philadelphia, 1839), which has raised against him many charges of plagiarism. It was said during his lifetime that the text-book was a simple reprint of Capt. Thomas Brown's "Conchology," an English work; but this is untrue. It has recently been proved that it was much altered from Thomas Wyatt's "Manual of Conchology," at the desire of the author, whose publishers declined to issue a smaller edition of his work. In July, 1839, he became associate editor of William E. Burton's "Gentleman's Magazine" in Philadelphia, and shortly afterward he issued a collection of his prose stories, entitled "Tales of the Grotesque and the Arabesque." 2 vols., Boston, 1839. Though these contain some of his finest work, he received nothing from them, but the copyright and twenty copies for private distribution, and the sale was small. His connection with the "Gentleman's Magazine" lasted until the following year, when he quarreled with Burton. Poe had previously issued the prospectus of a new year-book, "Alaraaf," in which he had first postponed temporarily by his illness, and then indefinitely by his engagement as editor-in-chief of "Graham's Magazine," which had been formed by the purchase of the "Gentleman's" by George R. Graham and its consolidation with Graham's "Casket." About this time he began to take an interest in unravelling difficult problems, a hobby asserted by the "Glossary," in which he concluded that human ingenuity could construct no cryptograph that could not be solved. The result was that compositions of this kind were sent to him from all parts of the country, and he solved all that he received, to the number of more than 100. Not long afterward he wrote his tale "The Gold-Bug," which was founded on the solution of a cryptograph, and for which he obtained a prize of $100 that had been offered by the "Dollar Magazine." In May, 1841, he published a prediction of the plot of "Barnaby Rudge" from the introductory chapters, which is said to have caused Dickens to ask Poe if he was the devil. In April he had published his "Murders in the Rue Morgue," the model of many subsequent detective stories. The tale was afterward stolen by two rival French journals, and a libel suit followed, in the course of which the true author was discovered. This was the beginning of Poe's popularity in France, which became wide and lasting. Meanwhile he continued his critical articles, which, if not always correct, and often apparently spiteful and colored by Poe's peculiar ideas concerning the literary art, were certainly in earnest.

During his stay in Philadelphia, Poe's wife, who had been always delicate, ruptured a blood-vessel in singing, and she never fully recovered. To his anxiety for her Poe attributed his failure to withstand his appetite for stimulants. However this may be, his habits grew more and more irregular, until in the spring of 1842 he lost the editorship of "Graham's." He had not abandoned the dream of issuing a magazine of his own, and early in 1843 appeared the prospectus of "The Stylus," in which Poe was to be associated with Thomas C. Clarke. This was subsequently abandoned, and, after doing some desultory literary work, delivering a few lectures, and suffering much from poverty, Poe returned with his wife and her mother to New York. in April, 1844. His first publication here was his "Balloon-Hoax," a circumstantial account of a balloon-voyage over the Atlantic, which appeared in the news-columns of the "Sun." He soon became connected with the "Evening Mirror," in which, on 29 Jan., 1845, first appeared a poem of "The Raven," from the advance sheets of the "Wing Review" for February. The popularity of this was immediate and wide-spread. In April, becoming dissatisfied with work on a daily paper, he withdrew, and soon afterward was associated with Charles F. Briggs in the management of the "Broadway Journal," a newly established weekly. His connection with this was marked by a series of harsh criticisms of the poet Longfellow, whom he accused of gross plagiarism. Poe afterward became sole editor of the "Journal," and was endeavoring to get it entirely under his control when financial troubles caused its suspension in December, 1845. In October of that year he was invited to deliver an original poem before the Boston Lyceum, and in response read "Al Aaraaf," one of his earliest efforts. There was much dissatisfaction, and Poe on his return to New York asserted in his "Journal" that his action had been intentional, and that he had thought that the poem "would answer sufficiently well for an audience of transcendent taste...it would...receive [an] unanswerable unfavorable comment. At the close of this year Poe issued a new collection of his poems, "The Raven and other Poems" (New York, 1845). Early in 1846 he removed to a cottage in Fordham, now a part of New York city. His chief work at this time was a series of papers in "Godey's Lady's Book" entitled "The Literati of New York." One of these, on Dr. Thomas Dunn English, provides a reply of such a nature that Poe sued the "Mirror," in which it appeared, and recovered $825 and costs. For several weeks before this he had been ill. His constitution had been shattered by overwork, disappointment, and the use of stimulants, and before the end of the year the family was reduced to such poverty that a public appeal was made in its behalf. On 30 Jan., 1847, Mrs. Poe died, but after her life had been endangered, Poe partially recovered before the following summer. He tried to revive his plan of a new magazine, this time to be called "Literary America," and to aid it lectured, on 3 Feb., 1848, in the New York society library on the "Cosmogony of the Universe," a subject on which he had lectured during his former editing. The lecture was elaborated into "Eureka, a Prose Poem" (New York, 1848), which he considered his greatest work, but this judgment was not that of the public nor of his critics. Its physical and metaphysical speculations have little value, and its theology is a mixture of materialism and pantheism. Shortly after this Poe entered into a conditional engagement with George L. Thompson of Providence, R. I., but it was broken off. His health was still feeble, but he now prepared for a southern trip, during which he lectured several times and canvassed for his proposed magazine. While he was in Richmond he offered marriage to a widow of whom he had been enamored in youth, and was accepted. Shortly afterward, probable because of his ill health, he made arrangements for the wedding. Of his movements after this nothing is known with certainty. On 3 Oct., the day of a municipal election, he was found unconscious in Baltimore in a liquor-saloon that had been used as a polling-place, and was removed to a hospital, where he died of delirium tremens. It has been reported that he had dined with some old military friends, became intoxicated, and in this state was found by politicians, who dragged him and made him vote at several places.

Poe's personal appearance was striking. He was erect with a pale face, and an expression of melancholy. His conversation is said to have been fascinating. His tales and poems, though the ability and power that they display are universally acknowledged, have been very differently estimated. The former have been praised for their artistic construction, their subtle analysis, and their vivid descriptions, and condemned for their morbid subjects and morbid meanderings. The poems have been admired for melody and for ingenuous versification, and objected to because they appeal to the imagination and not to the intellect. The author's theory of poetry, which he finally formulated in his lecture on "The Poetic Principle," was peculiar, inscrutable as he contended that beauty was its sole object. He asserted that a "long poem is a contradiction in terms." Says his latest biographer: "In his prose tales he declares repeatedly that he meant not to tell a story, but to produce an effect. In poetry he aimed not to convey an idea, but to make an impression. He was not a philosopher nor a lover; he never served truth nor knew passion; he was a dreamer, and his life was, warp and woof, mood and sentiment, instead of act and thought." The book is a "Two Cents' Worth," by Rufus W. Griswold, preceded by a memoir (3 vols., New York, 1850: 4 vols., 1856). There are also several British editions, of which two of the latest are those with memoirs by Richard Henry Stoddard (London, 1873) and John H. Ingram (4 vols., Edinburgh, 1874). There is a later American edition with the sketch by Ingram (4 vols., New York, 1876); a "Critical Edition" with the notes of a sketch by William Fearing Gill (Boston, 1874); and a limited edition with the memoir by Stoddard (8 vols., New York, 1884). Several volumes of his tales have been translated into French by Charles Baudelaire and William Hughes. There have appeared also collections of his poems, with memoirs, respectively, by James Hamann (London, 1852); Edmund F. Didier (1855); and Charles E. Briggs (New York, 1858); and many illustrated editions of single poems, notably of "The Raven." The memoir by Griswold contains errors of fact, and is written in a hostile spirit. Its accusations have been replied to by Mrs. Sarah Helen Whitman in "Edgar A. Poe and his Critics" (New York, 1859), and by Harry Elwood in "The Life of Edgar Allan Poe" (1857). There is also a life by Eugene L. Didier (1876), and various magazine articles, including one in "Scribner's Monthly" for October, 1875, by Francis G. Fairfield, in which he attempts to show that Poe's peculiarities were due to epilepsy. The latest and most impartial biography is that by George E. Woodberry in the "American Men of Letters." On 17 Nov., 1873, a monument, erected by the school-teachers of Baltimore, was publicly dedicated to Poe's memory in that city. It is of Italian marble in the form of a pedestal eight feet in height, and bears a medallion of the poet. A memorial volume containing an account of the dedication ceremonies was issued by the Baltimore Literary Society (Baltimore, 1877). In May, 1885, the actors of the United States erected in the Metropolitan museum, New York city, a memorial to Poe, at whose dedication an address was made by Edwin Booth, and William Winter read a poem. There has recently been discovered a large amount of manuscript material relating to Poe, including a life by Dr. Thomas Holley Chivers, which may be published at some future time.
POE, Orlando Metcalfe, soldier, b. in Navarre, Ohio, 7 March, 1822; d. in Detroit, 2 Oct., 1865. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy and assigned to the topographical engineers. He became 1st lieutenant, and was on lake survey duty till the beginning of the civil war, when he engaged in the organization of Ohio volunteers. He was chief topographical engineer of the Department of the Ohio from 13 May till 15 June, 1861, being engaged in reconnaissances in northern Kentucky and western Virginia, participated in the battle of Rich Mountain, on the staff of Gen. George B. McClellan. He became colonel of the 21st Michigan volunteers in September, 1861, was in command of his regiment in the battles of Wilson's Creek and Pea Ridge, and took part in the principal battles of the Virginia peninsula during the campaign. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, was engaged at Fredericksburg, commanded a division of the 9th army corps from February to March, 1863, and became captain of U. S. engineers in that month, and subsequently chief engineer of the 21st corps of the Army of the Ohio. He occupied a similar post in the army of Gen. William T. Sherman in the invasion of Georgia, the march to the sea, and through the Carolinas, until the surrender of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston. He received the brevet of major for gallant service at the siege of Knoxville on 6 July, 1864, that of lieutenant-colonel for the capture of Atlanta on 1 Sept., 1864, and became a member of the light-house board in 1874. He was aide-de-camp to Gen. William T. Sherman in 1873-'84, and at the same time was in charge of the river and harbor works from Lake Erie to Lake Superior. In 1882 he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of engineers, and colonel in 1888.

POEPPL, Eduard (puy-pig), German naturalist, b. in Saxony, 10 May, 1797; d. in Leipzig, 4 Sept., 1868. He received his education in Leipzig, and, after obtaining a medical degree, was given by the rector of the university a botanical mission to North and South America. He returned to Germany toward the close of 1832 with valuable collections in zoology and botany, and was appointed in the following year professor of zoology in the University of Leipzig, which post he held till his death. He also contributed to the establishment of a scientific museum in the latter city, and bequeathed to it its collections. He published "Reise nach Chili, Peru, und auf dem Amazonen-Fliesse" (2 vols., Leipzig, 1835); "Nova genera ac Species plantarum quas in regno, Chiliensi, Peruviano, de Terra Amazonica, annis 1825-1830 lecturar" (Crols, 1835-42); "Reisamachon Vereinigten Staaten" (1837); and "Landschaftliche Ansichten und erläuternde Darstellungen" (1839). Poeppl also wrote most of the American articles for the "Allgemeine Encyclopædie," edited by Eresch and Grüber.

POEY, Felipe (po-y), Cuban naturalist, b. in Havana, 25 May, 1799; d. there, 28 Jan., 1880. He was of French and Spanish parentage. He made his studies in his native city, graduating in the University of Madrid, where he was graduated in law. Having a taste for natural history, he abandoned his practice as a lawyer, and began the study of mollusks, insects, and fishes. In 1825 he sailed for Cuba, and thence, with a collection of specimens, for Paris. There he aided in founding, in 1827, the "Société entomologique," and contributed notes and drawings to the "Histoire naturelle des poissons." In 1833 he returned to Havana and devoted himself to the study of natural history, making drawings of specimens with his associate, Juan Gundach (q. v.), and discovering many new species of which a few were described by Pfeiffer's "Monographia Helicorum Viventium." In 1842 Poey was appointed professor of comparative anatomy and zoology in the University of Havana, and from 1851 till 1860 he published at intervals his "Historia Natural de la Isla de Cuba" (2 vols., 1860). In 1863 he was appointed to the chair of botany, mineralogy, and geology, and from 1866 till 1875 he published in the "Repertorios Físico-Natural de la Isla de Cuba," and reprinted in the "Anales de la Sociedad de Historia Natural de Madrid" under the title "Síntesis Biológico Cubense," or "Catalogo razonado de los Peces Cubanos," an atlas of 10 volumes with more than 1,000 illustrations drawn by himself, and the description of about 800 tropical American fishes. This work was purchased by the Spanish government, placed in the "Biblioteca de Ciencias Naturales" at Madrid, and exhibited by the government in the exposition of Amsterdam in 1853, receiving a gold medal and honorable mention. In 1873 Poey was appointed professor of philosophy and belles-lettres, and he held all his chairs in the university during many years thereafter, notwithstanding his advanced age. He was a member of almost every scientific society in Europe and America, and many of his new species in literature have been drawn in the U. S. national museum, the U. S. museum of comparative zoology, and the Spanish museum at Madrid. His other works, besides the two mentioned above, are "Centurie des Lépidoptères de l'Ile de Cuba" (Paris, 1832); "Geografia Universal" (Havana, 1836); "Corona Poeyana" (1844); "Geografía de Cuba" (19 editions); "Cartilla de Geografía..." (1855); and "Cartilla de Mineralogía" (1858). He had contributed for more than sixty years many papers on natural history to the French, Spanish, and Cuban scientific press, and some of his papers occur in the proceedings of the Academy of natural science of Philadelphia, the annals of the New York leen, and other American scientific publications. He also wrote poems of which "El Arroyo" and "A Silvia" are the best known. His son, Andrés, meteorologist, b. in Havana in 1826, was educated in his native city and in Paris. In 1848 he began to contribute to scientific publications, especially on meteorology and natural philosophy. To his efforts was due the creation of a meteorological observatory at Havana, and during the period of war between Spain and America he was director of an establishment of the same kind in Mexico. He has written much in Spanish, French, and English on scientific subjects. Among his writings are "Tratado de Meteorología," "Memoria sobre los huracanes de las Antillas," and "Memoria sobre las POINDEXTER, George, senator, b. in Louisa county, Va., in 1779; d. in Jackson, Miss., 5 Sept., 1835. He was of Huguenot ancestry. He was left an orphan at an early age, and became a lawyer in Milbon, Va., but in 1809 removed to Mississippi territory, where he soon attained note, both at the bar and as a leader of the Jeffersonian party. In 1863 he was appointed attorney-general of the territory, and in this capacity he conducted the prosecution of Aaron Burr when the latter was arrested by the authorities in his first descent to the state, and 18 May, 1824. The case of Federalists resulting in a challenge from Abijah Hunt, one of the largest merchants in the southwest, whom Poinsett killed in the duel that followed. Poindexter was accused by his enemies of firing before the word was given, and bitter and prolonged controversies followed, but the charge was never substantiated. His efforts were crowned by the territorial legislature in 1805, and in 1807 was chosen delegate to congress, where he won reputation as an orator. Here he remained till 1813, when, notwithstanding the renunciation of the majority of the territorial bar, he was appointed U. S. judge for the district of Mississippi. This office, contrary to general expectation, he administered firmly and impartially, doing much to settle the controversies that had arisen from conflicting land grants, and to repress the criminal classes. He had assisted to prepare the people of the territory for the war of 1812, and when the British invaded Louisiana he joined Jackson and served as a volunteer aide at the battle of New Orleans. During this service a soldier brought to him a piece of paper bearing the British commissioned beauty and duty, which he had found on the field. Poindexter took it to Jackson, and it was the cause of much excitement through the country. The Federalists subsequently claimed that the paper had been forged by Poindexter. He was active in the Mississippi constitutional convention of 1817, being chairman of the committee that was appointed to draw up the Constitution for the new state, and, on its admission to the Union in that year, was elected its first representative in congress, serving one term. Here, in 1819, he made his best-known speech, defending Gen. Jackson's conduct in the execution of Arbinhoit and Ambister, and in the occupation of the Spanish ports in Florida (see Jackson), and it was largely due to his efforts that Jackson was not censured by congress. At the end of his term he was elected governor of Mississippi, notwithstanding attempts to show that he had been guilty of gross cowardice at New Orleans. While he held this office the legislature authorized him to revise and amend the statutes, and the result was the code that was completed in 1822 and published as "Revised Code of the Laws of Mississippi" (Natchez, 1824). In 1821 he resumed his practice at the bar, which he continued till his appointment to the U. S. Senate in November, 1830. He was subsequently elected to fill out the term, and served till 1835. Here he gradually became estranged from Jackson, occupying, as he contended, a middle ground between Henry Clay and John C. Calhoun, but his views were practically those of the latter. He especially resisted the appointment of the president's personal friends to office in Mississippi, and he also voted for Clay's resolution of censure. The breach widened, and Jackson finally suspected Poindexter of complicity in the attempt that was made on his life at the capitol. In 1825 he removed to Louisville, Ky., but was disappointed in his hopes of political promotion there, and, after being commissioned by President Tyler to investigate frauds in the New York custom-house, returned to Mississippi, where he affiliated with his old political friends. Poindexter had an unusual ordinary ability, but his career was marred by violent personal controversies and by dissipation, and he was embittered by domestic troubles and by the unpopularity that his opposition to Jackson aroused against him in Mississippi. See a "Biographical Sketch" of him (Washington, 1853).

Republican government of Chili, and, attacking the Spaniards, retook the ships. He was at Valparaiso during the fight between the "Essex" and the "Phebe" and "Cherub" (see PORTER, David), and wished to return home at once to enter the army, but the British naval authorities refused to let him go by sea, and, after crossing the Andes in April and meeting with various delays, he reached the U.S. in July 1840. During his absence, on his return he was elected to the South Carolina legislature, where he interested himself in projects of internal improvement, and secured the construction of a road over the Saluda mountain. He was afterward chosen to congress as a Federalist, and served two terms in 1821-5, advocating the cause of the South American republics and that of Greek independence. In 1822 he discharged an important special mission to Mexico during the reign ofurbide, and in 1825 he returned to that country as U.S. minister. During his term of office, which lasted till 1829, he negotiated a treaty of commerce, and maintained his independence with spirit and courage in the midst of many revolutionary outbreaks. He was accused by the Church party of opposing the anti-masonic course, and just before his return, at the request of Freemasons in Mexico he sent for charters for their lodges to the Grand Lodge of New York, and he was consequently accused of introducing Masonry into the country. On his return to his native state he became the leader of the Union party there in the struggle against nullification, opposing it by his speeches and in the public press, and has been credited with the military organization of the supporters of the National government in Charleston. He was authorized by President Jackson to obtain arms and ammunition from the government supplies in the harbor, and it was said by some that he had been secretly commissioned a colonel. During Van Buren's administration he held the portfolio of war in the cabinet. In this office he improved the field-artillery of the army, and in 1840 strongly recommended that congress should aid the states in reorganizing their militia. This was his last public office, and he afterward lived in retirement. He was an earnest opponent of the Mexican war. Poinsett was the author of various essays and orations on manufacturing, most notable of which is "On the Promotion of Science" (1844) at the first anniversary of the National institution, to which he gave a valuable museum. He took much interest in botany, and the "Poinsettia Pulcherrima," a Mexican flower, which he introduced into this country, was named for him. He was also the founder of an academy of fine arts at Charleston, which existed for several years, and published "Notes on Mexico, made in 1822, with an Historical Sketch of the Revolution" (Philadelphia, 1824). He left a mass of correspondence and other papers, which remain unpublished. Columbia gave him the degree of LL.D. in 1825. A portrait of Poinsett, by John Wesley Jarvis, was presented to the city of Charleston by William Courtenay in 1857.

POINSETT, Jean Bernard Louis Desjeux (pwan-tee), Baron de, French naval officer, b. in Brittany in 1815; d. in Champaign, near Paris, 24 April, 1870. He entered the navy when he was sixteen years old, and was promoted chef d'escadre in 1893. In 1896 he presented a memoir to Louis XIV., in which he proposed an attack on Carthagena with the intention of capturing the city; the plan should provide for the expenses of the expedition in consideration of receiving half the profits. He sailed from Brest, 9 Jan., 1897, and was joined in the Santo Domingo by Ducasse, the governor of Tortuga, at the head of 600 buccaneers. He arrived off Carthagena on 12 April, and, landing three miles from the city, summoned it to surrender; but the Spaniards refused, and the French were driven back in several attacks. But, after the storming of the fort of Boca Chica and several other important points of defense, the city capitulated on condition that the French should be allowed to take possession. The price amounting to $15,000,000 was secured by Poinsett, who also imposed upon the city a ransom of $600,000. Ducasse, being appointed governor, left the buccaneers in garrison at Boca Chica; but they learned that Poinsett tried to keep them out of their share of the plunder, and, although Ducasse restrained them for some time, they finally entered Carthagena, and pillaged and burned for three days, committing all kinds of atrocities. After destroying the fortifications of the place, the French reembarked on 1 June, and, defecting two English fleets, anchored in Brest, 29 Aug., 1897. A medal was struck in commemoration of the expedition. Poinsett afterward commanded a fleet, and besieged Gibralter in 1824-5, but retired from active service in 1825.

POIRIER, Pascal, Canadian senator, b. in Shediac, New Brunswick, 14 Feb., 1832. He is of Acadian descent. He completed his course of studies at St. Joseph's college, Memramcook, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Quebec in 1857. In 1872 Mr. Poirier was appointed postmaster of the Dominion parliament, which post he held till his appointment to the senate, 9 March, 1885. At an early age he contributed to the press, both French and English, and he has published "L'Origine des Acadiens" (Montreal, 1874).

POISSON, Modest Jules Adolphe, Canadian author, b. in Gentilly, province of Quebec, 14 March, 1848. He was educated at the Seminary of Quebec, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1875. He is now a newspaper editor, and a member of the provincial government of that province. He is the author of "Chants Canadiens" (Quebec, 1890), "Heures Perdues" (1894), and has contributed to French Canadian periodicals.

POITIS, John Scroggs, soldier, b. in Princeton, Ind., 14 Oct., 1836; d. in Asheville, N. C., 8 Aug., 1898. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy and appointed in the 21st infantry, July, 1861. Subsequently he served with the Army of the Potomac, engaging in the battle of Bull Run, and with that army in the following campaigns, until after the battle of Gettysburg, when he was on duty in the defenses of Washington. Meanwhile he had been promoted captain, and had received the brevets of major and lieutenant-colonel. In 1865 he was assigned to the U. S. military academy, where he remained for four years as assistant professor of geography, history, ethics, and drawing. During the ten years that followed he served principally on frontier duty, becoming, on 15 Dec., 1880, major of the 18th infantry, and in 1881-5, he was chief of the department of law at the U. S. infantry and cavalry school in Leavenworth, Kansas, where he had charge of the development of military drawing. On 1 March, 1886, he was promoted lieutenant-colonel of the 21st infantry. Col. Poland has published "Digest of the Military Laws of the United States from 1861 to 1868" (Boston, 1868) and "The Conventions of Geneva of 1864 and 1868, and St. Petersburg International Commission" (Leavenworth, 1886).

POLAND, Luke Potter, jurist, b. in Westminster, Vt., 1 Nov., 1851; d. in Waterville, Vt., 2 July, 1887. He attended the common schools, was employed in a country store and on a farm, taught at Morristown, Vt., studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1836. He was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1843, and prosecuting attorney for the county in 1844-5. In 1848 he was the Free-soil candidate for lieutenant-governor, and in the same year he was elected a judge of the Vermont supreme court. He was re-elected each successive year, becoming a supreme court judge in 1878, until he was appointed in November, 1885, on the death of Jacob Colburn, to serve out his unexpired term in the U. S. Senate. On his conclusion he entered the house of representatives, and served from 1867 till 1875. While in the senate he secured the passage of the bankrupt law, besides originating a bill for the revision and consolidation of the statutes of the United States, and was a member of a committee on revision in the house, he superintended the execution of his scheme of codification. He was chairman of the committee to investigate the outrages of the Ku-Klux Klan, and of the investigation committee on the credit mobber transactions; also of one on the reconstruction of the Arkansas state government. Several times, while serving on the committee on elections, he came into conflict with other Republicans on questions regarding the admission of Democratic members from the south. He was chairman of the Vermont delegation to the Republican national convention of 1876, and presented the name of William A. Wheeler for the vice-presidency, for which office he himself had been brought forward as a candidate. Mr. Poland was a representative in the state legislature in 1878. He was elected to congress again in 1882, and served from 1882 till 3 March, 1885.

POLETTES, Antoine, Canadian jurist, b. in Pointe-aux-Trembles, Quebec, 25 Aug., 1807; d. in Three Rivers, 6 Jan., 1887. He studied law, became an advocate in 1829, entered parliament in 1848, and was appointedQuite, and was given to study, often busied himself with his father's mathematical calculations, and was fond of reading. He went to Switzerland in 1832, spent a year in mastering the English branches when ill health compelled his removal. He was then placed with a merchant, but having a strong dislike to commercial pursuits, he obtained permission to return home after a few weeks' trial, and in July, 1833, was given in charge of a private tutor. In 1835 he entered the sophomore class at the University of North Carolina, of which institution his cousin, William (q. v.), was a trustee. As a student young Polk was correct, punctual, and industrious. At his graduation in 1838 he was officially acknowledged to be the best scholar in both the classics and mathematics, and delivered the Latin oration. In 1847 the university conferred upon him the degree of D. L. In 1819 he entered the law office of Felix Grandy, who was then at the head of the Tennessee bar. While pursuing his legal studies he attracted the attention of Andrew Jackson, who soon afterward was appointed governor of the territory of Florida. An intimacy was thus begun between the two men that in after-years greatly influenced the course of at least one of them. In 1820 Mr. Polk was admitted to the bar and established himself at Columbus, the county-seat of Muscogee county. Here he attained such immediate success as to fall to the lot of few, his career at the bar only ending with his election to the governorship in 1839. At times he practised alone, while at others he was associated

"Address before the Alumni of Rutgers College" (1852). A "Memorial," containing twelve of his sermons, the address at his installation in Newark, by Dr. David H. Riddle, and his funeral discourse, by Dr. John Forsyth, chaplain, U. S. A., was printed after his death.

POLIGNAC, Camille Armand Jules Marie (pol-lo-ne-vak), Count, soldier, b. in France, 6 Feb., 1812. He entered the French army, and was a favorite of Marie Antoinette. At the beginning of the civil war he came to this country, offered his services to the Confederate government, and was made brigadier-general on 10 Jan., 1862, and attached to the Army of Tennessee. Subsequently he was given command of a division and commissioned major-general. In the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71 he served with his countrymen, and he has since been engaged in journalism and in civil engineering. On several occasions he has been sent to Algiers in charge of surveying expeditions by the French government, and his work has received special recognition.

POLK, James Knox, eleventh president of the United States, born near Princeton, N. J., 2 Nov., 1795; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 15 June, 1849. He was a son of Samuel Polk, whose father, Ezekiel, was a brother of Col. Thomas (q. v.), grand-nephew of Robert Polk, or Pollock, who was born in Ireland and emigrated to the United States. His mother was Jane, daughter of James Knox, a resident of Fredell county, N. C., and a captain in the American army. His father, Samuel, was a farmer, removed in the autumn of 1806 to the rich valley of Duck river, a tributary of the Tennessee, and made a new home in a section that was erected the following year into the county of Maury. Besides cultivating the tract of land he had purchased, Samuel at intervals followed the occupation of a surveyor; and grew a name equal to his wants, and lived until 1827. His son James was brought up on the farm, and not only assisted in its management, but frequently accompanied his father in his surveying expeditions, during which they were often absent for weeks. He was inclined to study, often busied himself with his father's mathematical calculations, and was fond of reading. He went to Switzerland in 1832, spent a year in mastering the English branches when ill health compelled his removal. He was then placed with a merchant, but having a strong dislike to commercial pursuits, he obtained permission to return home after a few weeks' trial, and in July, 1833, was given in charge of a private tutor. In 1835 he entered the sophomore class at the University of North Carolina, of which institution his cousin, William (q. v.), was a trustee. As a student young Polk was correct, punctual, and industrious. At his graduation in 1838 he was officially acknowledged to be the best scholar in both the classics and mathematics, and delivered the Latin oration. In 1847 the university conferred upon him the degree of D. L. In 1819 he entered the law office of Felix Grandy, who was then at the head of the Tennessee bar. While pursuing his legal studies he attracted the attention of Andrew Jackson, who soon afterward was appointed governor of the territory of Florida. An intimacy was thus begun between the two men that in after-years greatly influenced the course of at least one of them. In 1820 Mr. Polk was admitted to the bar and established himself at Columbus, the county-seat of Muscogee county. Here he attained such immediate success as to fall to the lot of few, his career at the bar only ending with his election to the governorship in 1839. At times he practised alone, while at others he was associated successively with several of the leading practitioners of the state. Among the latter may be mentioned Aaron V. Brown and Gideon J. Pillow. Brought up as a Jeffersonian and early taking an interest in politics, Mr. Polk was frequently heard in public as an exponent of the views of his party. So popular was his style of oratory that his services soon came to be in great demand, and he was not long in earning the title of the "Napoleon of the stump." He was, however, an argumentative rather than a rhetorical speaker, and convinced his hearers by logic, the force of the facts, and aptness of illustration, ignoring the ad-hominem effects usually resorted to in political harangues. His first public employment was that of chief clerk to the Tennessee house of representatives, and in 1823 he canvassed the district to secure his own election to that body. During his two years in the legislature he was regarded as one of its most promising members. His ability and shrewdness in debate, his business tact, combined with his firmness and industry, secured for him a high reputation. While a member of the general assembly he obtained the passage of a law to prevent the then common practice of duelling, and, although he resided in a community where that mode of settling disputes was generally approved, he was never concerned in an "academic duel." His views were advanced as early as 1826.

In August, 1835, he was elected to congress from the Duck river district, in which he resided, by a flattering majority, and re-elected at every succeeding election until 1839, when he withdrew from the contest to become a candidate for governor. On taking his seat as a member of the 19th congress, he found himself, with one or two exceptions, the youngest of his body. These benefits of laborious application that had previously characterized him were now displayed on the floor of the house and in the committee-room. He was prominently connected with every leading question, and upon all he struck what proved to be the key-note for the action of his party. During the whole period of President Jackson's administration he was one of his leading supporters, and at times on certain issues of paramount importance, his chief reliance. His maiden speech was made in defence of the proposed amendment to the constitution, giving the choice of president and vice-president directly to the people. It was distinguished by clearness and force, copiousness of research, wealth of illustration, and cogency of argument, and at once placed its author in the front rank of congressional debaters. During the same session Mr. Polk attracted attention by his vigorous opposition to the appropriation for the Panama mission. President Adams had appointed commissioners to attend a congress proposed to be held at Panama by delegates appointed by different Spanish-American states, which, although they had virtually achieved independence as such, remained under a dictatorial government in the mother-country. Mr. Polk, and those who thought with him, contended that such action on the part of this government would tend to involve us in a war with Spain, and establish an unfortunate precedent for the future. In December, 1827, he was placed on the committee on foreign affairs, and some time afterward was also appointed chairman. The next session committee of the whole was referred that portion of the message of President Adams calling the attention of congress to the probable accumulation of a surplus in the treasury after the anticipated extinguishment of the national debt. As the head of the latter committee, he made a report denying the constitutional power of congress to collect from the people for distribution a surplus beyond the wants of the government, and maintaining that the revenue should be devoted to the support of the public service. Early in 1833, as a member of the ways and means committee, he made a minority report unfavorable to the Bank of the United States, which aroused a storm of opposition, a meeting of the friends of the bank being held at Nashville. During the entire contest between the bank and President Jackson, caused by the removal of the national deposits, Whig members of the committee, supported the executive. His speech in opening the debate summarized the material facts and arguments on the Democratic side of the question. George McDuffie, leader of the opposition, bore testimony in his concluding remarks to the boldness and manliness with which Mr. Polk had assumed the only position that could be judiciously taken. Mr. Polk was elected speaker of the house of representatives in December, 1835, and held that office till 1839. He gave to the administration of Martin Van Buren the same unhesitating support he had accorded to that of President Jackson, and, though taking no part in the discussions, he approved of the leading measures recommended by the former, including the cession of the public lands and the assumption by the government of the public debt. In 1838 the Whig party nominated him as their candidate for governor of Tennessee, but he was not elected. 1839 was a period of great internal excitement. The public debt had been revived, and the bank of the United States had been closed. The Tyler administration had been viewed with distrust by the Whig party, and Mr. Polk was nominated as their candidate for the presidency. He was the Whig candidate in the campaign of 1840 and received 3,000 votes more than Mr. Clay.
William Henry Harrison to the presidency. In Tennessee the Harrison electoral ticket had received more than 12,000 majority. Although to overrule this was impossible, Mr. Polk entered upon the canvass with his usual energy and earnestness. He could not secure the defeat of James C. Jones, the opposing Whig candidate, one of the most popular members of his party in the state, but he did succeed in cutting down the opposition majority to about 3,000. In 1845 Mr. Polk was once more a candidate; but this time Gov. Jones's majority was only 2,000. In 1839 Mr. Polk had been nominated by the legislature of Tennessee as its candidate for vice-president on the ticket with Martin Van Buren, and other states had followed the example; but Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, seemed to be the choice of the great body of the Democratic party, and he was accordingly nominated. From the date of Van Buren's defeat in 1840 until within a few weeks of the meeting of the National Democratic convention at Baltimore in 1844, public opinion in the party undoubtedly pointed to his renomination, but when in April of the latter year President Tyler concluded a treaty between the government of the United States and the republic of Texas, providing for the annexation of the latter to the former, it involved American politics that was destined to change not only the platforms of parties, but the future history and topography of the country itself. On the question whether Texas should be admitted, the strongest divergence of opinion among public men prevailed. The Whigs at the north opposed annexation on the ground that it would be an act of faith in Mexico, that it would involve the necessity of assuming the debt of the young republic, amounting to ten or twelve millions of dollars, and that it would further increase the area of slave territory. At the south the Whigs were divided, one section advocating the new policy, while the other concurred with their party friends at the north on the first two grounds of objection. The Democrats generally favored annexation, but a portion of the party at the north, and a few of its members residing in the slave states, opposed it. Mr. Van Buren and Mr. Clay agreed very nearly in their opinions, being in favor of annexation if the American people desired it, provided that the consent of Mexico could be obtained at a price which would enable the United States to obtain it. In this crisis Mr. Polk declared his views in no uncertain tones. It being understood that he would be a candidate for vice-president, a letter was addressed to him by a committee of the citizens of Cincinnati, asking for an expression of his sentiments on the subject. In his reply, dated 22 April, 1844, he said: "I have no hesitation in declare annexation of Texas to the government and territory of the United States. The proof is fair and satisfactory to my own mind that Texas once constituted a part of the territory of the United States, the title to which I regard to have been as indisputable as that to any portion of our territory." He added that the country "...[since] Texas was annexed to the Union [in 1819] most unswervingly voted for the annexation..." that the people and government of the republic were most anxious for annexation, and that, if their prayer was rejected, there was danger that she might become "...a dependency..." This letter, strongly in contrast with the hesitating phrases contained in that of President Van Buren of 29 April on the same subject, elevated its author to the presidency. When the Baltimore convention met on 27 May, it was found that while Mr. Van Buren could not secure the necessary two-thirds vote, his friends numbered more than one third of the delegates present, and were thus in a position to dictate the name of the successful candidate. As it was also found that they were inflexibly opposed to Messrs. Cass, Johnson, Buchanan, and the others whose names had been presented, Mr. Polk was introduced as the candidate of conciliation, and nominated with alacrity and unanimity. George M. Dallas was nominated for vice-president, on condition of his letter of acceptance. Mr. Polk declared that, if elected, he should enter upon "...the discharge of the high and solemn duties of the office with the settled purpose of not being a candidate for re-election." After an exciting canvass, Mr. Polk was elected over his distinguished opponent, Henry Clay, by about 40,000 majority, on the popular vote, exclusive of that of South Carolina, whose doctors were chosen by the legislature of the state; while in the electoral college he received 175 votes to 165 that were cast for Mr. Clay.

On 4 March, 1845, Mr. Polk was inaugurated, in his inaugural address, after recounting the blessings conferred upon the nation by the Federal Union, he said: "...To perpetuate them, it must be preserved..." What followed was a statement of the limits to the achievements of free minds and free hands under the protection of this glorious Union. No reason to mankind, since the organization of society, would be equal in atrocity to that of him who would have bestowed on it. He would overthow the noblest structure of human wisdom which predicts itself and its fate. He would stop the progress of free government and involve his country either in anarchy or despotism." In selecting his cabinet, the new president was singularly fortunate. It comprised several of the most distinguished members of the Democratic party, and all sections of the Union were represented. James Buchanan, fresh from his long experience in the senate, was named secretary of state; Robert J. Walker, also an ex-senator and one of the best authorities on the national finances, was secretary of the treasury; to William L. Marcy, ex-governor of New York, was confided the war portfolio; literature was honored in the appointment of George Bancroft as secretary of the navy; Cave Johnson, an honored son of Tennessee, was made postmaster-general and without doubt had been a member of President Tyler's cabinet, was first attorney-general and afterward secretary of the navy. When congress met in the following December there was a Democratic majority in both branches. In his message the president condemned all anti-slavery agitation, recommended a sub-treasury and a tariff for revenue, and declared that the annexation of Texas was a manifest extension of the United States, no foreign country having any right to interfere. Congress was also informed that the American army under Gen. Zachary Taylor had been ordered to occupy, and had occupied, the western bank of the Pecos river, beyond which Texas had never asserted her right to extend her jurisdiction; on 29 Dec., Texas was admitted into the Union, and two days later an act was passed extending the United States revenue system over the doubtful territory beyond the Nueces. Even these measures did not elicit a declaration of war from the Mexican authorities, who still declared their willingness to negotiate concerning the disputed territory beyond the Nueces and the Rio Grande. These negotiations, however, came to nothing, and the president, in accordance with Gen. Taylor's suggestion, ordered a forward movement, in obedience to which officer advanced from his camp at Corpus Christi toward the Rio Grande, and occupied the district in debate. Thus brought face to face with Mexican troops, he was attacked early in May by 6,000 men by Gen. Arista, who was badly beaten at Palo Alto with less than half that number. The next day Arista was defeated at La Palma, and drove him across the Rio Grande.

On receipt of the news of these events in Washington, President Polk sent a message to congress, in which he declared that Mexican troops had at last shed the blood of American citizens on American soil, and asked for a formal declaration of war. A bill was accordingly introduced and passed by both houses, recognizing the fact that hostilities had been begun, and appropriating $10,000,000 for its prosecution. Its preamble read as follows: "Whereas, by the act of the republic of Mexico, a state of war exists between that government and the United States. The Whigs protested against this statement as untrue, alleging that the president had provoked retaliatory action by ordering his army into Mexican territory, and Abraham Lincoln introduced in the house of representatives what became known as the 'spot resolutions,' calling upon the president to designate the spot of American territory whereon the outrage had been committed. Nevertheless, the Whigs voted for the bill and generally supported the war until its conclusion. On 8 Aug., a second message was received from the president, asking for money with which to purchase territory from Mexico, that the dispute might be settled by negotiation. A bill appropriating $2,000,000 for this purpose at once brought up the question of slavery extension into new territory, and David Wilmot, of Pennsylvania, in behalf of many northern Democrats, offered an amendment applying to any newly acquired territory the provision of the ordinance of 1812, to the effect that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall ever exist in any part of said territory except for crime, whereof the party shall first be duly convicted." The Whigs and northern Democrats united secured its passage, but it was sent to the senate too late to be acted upon.

In the same session with England regarding the Oregon question seemed imminent. By the treaties of 1818 with France, and of 1819 with Spain, the United States had acquired the rights of those powers on the Pacific coast north of California. The northern boundary of the ceded territory was unsettled. The United States claimed that the line of 54° 40' north latitude was such boundary, while Great Britain maintained that it followed the Columbia river. By the convention of 1827 the disputed territory had been held jointly by both countries, the arrangement being terminable by either country on twelve months' notice. The Democratic convention of 1844 had demanded the reoccupation of the whole of Oregon up to 54° 40', "with or without war with England," a demand popularly summarized in the campaign rallying-cry of "Fifty-four forty or fight!" The annexation of Texas having been accomplished, the Whigs now began to urge the Democrats to carry out their promise regarding Oregon, and, against the votes of the extreme southern Democrats, the president was directed to give the requisite twelve months' notice. Further negotiations ensued, which were finally broken off. Great Britain to yield her claim to the unoccupied territory between the 49th parallel and Columbia river, and acknowledge that parallel as the northern boundary. As the president had subscribed to the platform of the Baltimore convention, he threw upon the senate the responsibility of deciding whether the claim of the United States to the whole of Oregon should be insisted upon, or the compromise proposed by her majesty's government accepted. The senate, by a vote of 41 to 14, decided in favor of the latter alternative, and on 15 June, 1846, the treaty was signed.

Two other important questions were acted upon at the first session of the 39th congress, the tariff and internal improvements. The former had been a leading issue in the presidential contest of 1844. The act of 1842 had violated the principles of the compromise bill of 1833, and the opinions of the two candidates for the presidency, on this issue, were supposed to be well defined previous to the termination of the senatorial career. Mr. Polk was committed to the policy of a tariff for revenue, and Mr. Clay, when the compromise act was under discussion, had pledged the party favorable to protection to a reduction of the imports to a revenue standard. Previous to his nomination, Mr. Clay made a speech at Raleigh, N. C., in which he advocated discriminating duties for the protection of domestic industry. This was followed by his letter in September, 1844, in which he gave in his adhesion to the tariff of 1842. Probably alarmed at the prospect of losing votes at the south through his opposition to the annexation of Texas, and seeing defeat certain unless he could rally to his support the people of the north, Mr. Clay made one concession after another, until he had virtually abandoned the principle he occupied in 1833, and made himself amenable to his own redline uttered at that time: "What man," he had then asked, "who is entitled to desire the character of an American statesman, would stand up in his place in either house of congress and disturb the treaty of peace and amity?" Mr. Polk, on the other hand, had courted criticism by his "Kane letter" dated 19 June, 1844, which was so ambiguously worded as to give ground for the charge that his position was identical with that held by Henry Clay. In his first annual message, however, he explained his views with precision and ability. The principles that would govern his administration were proclaimed with great boldness, and the objectionable features of the tariff of 1842 were investigated and exposed, while congress was urged to substitute ad valorem for specific and minimum duties. "The terms 'protection to American industry,'" he went on to say, "are of popular import, but they should apply under a just system to all the various branches of industry in our country. The farmer, or planter, who toils away in his fields, is engaged in 'domestic industry,' and is at least entitled to have his labor 'protected' as the manufacturer, the man of commerce, the navigator, or the mechanic, who are engaged also in 'domestic industry' in their different pursuits. The joint labors of all these classes constitute the aggregate of the 'domestic industry' of the nation, and they are equally entitled to the nation's 'protection.' None of them can justly claim to be the exclusive recipients of 'protection,' which can only be afforded by increasing burdens on the 'domestic industry' of others.'

In accordance with the president's views, a bill providing for a purely revenue tariff, and based on a plan prepared by Sec. Walker, was introduced in the house of representatives on 15 June. After an unusually able discussion, a vote was reached on 3 July, when the measure was adopted by 144 votes to 95. The bill passed the senate without further discussion, where the vote was tied, and only the decision of Vice-President Dallas in its favor saved the bill. The occasion was memorable, party spirit ran high, and a crowded senate-chamber hung on the lips of that official as he announced the reasons for his course. In conclusion he said: 'If by thus acting it be my misfortune to offend any portion of those who honored me with their suffrages, I have only to say to them, and to my whole country, that I prefer the deepest obscurity of private life, with an unwounded conscience, to the glare of official eminence snatched by a sense of moral delinquency.'

Regarding the question of internal improvements, Mr. Polk's administration was signalized by the struggle between the advocates of that policy and the opponents thereof. During the session of Congress, including members of both parties, were in favor of a lavish expenditure of the public money. On 24 July, 1846, the senate passed the bill known as the river-and-harbor improvement bill precisely as it had passed the house the previous March, but it was vetoed by the president in a message of unusual power. The authority of the general government in respect to internal improvements within the states was thoroughly examined, and reference was made to the corruptions of the system that expended money in particular sections, leaving other parts of the country without government assistance. Undaunted by the opposition of the executive, the house of representatives, on 29 November, 1846, overrode the veto, by a vote of 72, a second bill making appropriations amounting to $600,000 for the same purpose. It was carried through the senate on the last day of the second session. Although the president could have defeated the objectionable measure by a 'pocket veto,' in spite of the denunciations with which he was assailed by the politicians and the press, he again boldly met the question, and sent in a message that, for thoroughness of investigation, breadth of thought, clearness and cogency of argument, far exceeds any of the state papers to which he has put his name.

The conflict between the friends and opponents of slavery was also a prominent feature of President Polk's administration, and was being constantly waged in the halls of Congress. During the second session of the 29th congress the house attached the Wilmot proviso to a bill appropriating $2,000,000 for the purchase of territory from Mexico, as it had been appended to one appropriating $2,000,000 for the same purpose at the previous session. The senate passed the bill without the amendment, and the house, without even to consider. A bill to organize the territory of Oregon, with the proviso attached, passed by the latter body, was not acted upon by the senate. A motion made in the house of representatives by a southern member to extend the Missouri compromise of 36' 30" to the Pacific was lost by a sectional vote, North against south, 81 to 104. A treaty of peace having been signed with Mexico, 2 Feb., 1848, after a series of victories, a bill was passed by the senate during the first session of the 30th congress, establishing territorial governments in Oregon, New Mexico, and California, with a provision that all questions concerning slavery in those territories should be referred to the U. S. supreme court for decision. It received the votes of the members from the slave-states, but was lost in the house. A bill was finally passed organizing the territory of Oregon without slavery. During the second session a bill to organize the territories of New Mexico and California with the Wilmot proviso attached was passed by the senate, but was refused consideration. In the meantime the latter body attached a bill permitting such organization with slavery to the general appropriation bill as a 'rider,' but, as the house objected, was compelled to strike it off. In his message to congress approving the Oregon territorial bill Mr. Polk said: 'I have an abiding confidence that the sober reflection and sound patriotism of all the states will bring them to the conclusion that the dictate of wisdom is to follow the example of those who have gone before us, and settle this dangerous question on the Missouri compromise or some other equitable compromise which would respect the rights of all, and prove satisfactory to the different portions of the Union.' President Polk was not an abolitionist, nor was he a slaver, but he always opposed the slave-preservatory policy. On the contrary, in the settlement of the Oregon question, he did all in his power to secure the exclusion of slavery from that territory, and, although the final vote was not taken until within a few days after his retirement, the battle was fought and the decision virtually reached during his administration.

Mr. Polk died at Nashville, 19 Feb., 1848, reiterated his decision not to become a candidate again for the presidency, and retired at the close of his term of office to his home in Nashville with the intention not to reenter public life. His health, never robust, had been seriously impaired by the unavoidable cares of office and his habit of devoting himself almost entirely to the execution of details. Within a few weeks after his death, Polk returned to Tennessee he fell a prey to a disease that would probably have only slightly affected a man in ordinary health, and a few hours sufficed to bring the attack to a fatal termination. Thus ended the life of one of whose public career it may still be too soon to judge with entire impartiality. Some of the questions on which he was called upon to act are still nearly forty years after his death, party issues. Mr. Polk evidently believed with Mr. Clay that a Union all slave or all free was an impossible Utopia, and that there was no good reason why the north and the south should not continue to live for many years to come as they had lived since the adoption of the constitution. He deprecated the question of the slavery policy by the abolitionists, and believed that the safety of the commonwealth lay in respecting the compromises that had hitherto furnished a modus vivendi between the slave and the free states. As to the annexation of Texas and the war with Mexico, his policy was undoubtedly the result of conviction, sincerity, and good faith. He believed, with John Quincy Adams and Andrew Jackson, that Texas had been unwisely ceded to Spain in 1819, and that it was desirable, from a geographical point of view, that it should be re-annexed, seeing that it formed a most valuable part of the valley of the Mississippi. He was also of opinion that in a military point of view its acquisition was desirable for the protection of New Orleans, the great commercial mart of the southwestern section of the Union, which in time of war would be endangered by the close proximity of a hostile power having control of the upper waters of Red river. Holding these views and having been elevated to the presidency by an Legislature expressly designed that office, he should be embodied in action, and Texas again made a part of the national domain, he would have indeed been recreant to his trust had he attempted to carry out as president any policy antagonistic to that he had advocated when a candidate for that office. The war in which he became involved in carrying out these views was a detail that the nation was compelled to leave largely to his judgment. The president believed that the representations and promises of the Mexican authorities could not be trusted, and that the only argument to which they would pay attention was that of force. Regarding his famous order to Gen. Taylor to march toward the Rio Grande, it was suggested by that officer himself, and for his gallant action in that engagement earned him the successor of President Polk. The settlement of the Oregon boundary-line was made equally obligatory upon the new president on taking office. He offered Great Britain the line that was finally accepted; but when the British minister hastily rejected the offer, the entire country applauded his suggestion to that power of what the boundary might possibly be in case of war.

But whatever the motives of the executive as to Texas and Oregon, the results of the administration of James K. Polk were brilliant in the extreme. He was loyally upheld by the votes of all parties in congress, abundantly supplied with the sinews of war, and seconded by gallant and competent officers in the field. For $1,500,000, in addition to the direct war expenses, the southwestern boundary of the country was carried to the Rio Grande, while the provinces of New Mexico and Upper California were added to the national domain. What that cession meant in increased wealth it is perhaps even yet too soon to compute. Among the less dazzling but still solid advantages conferred upon the nation during Mr. Polk's term of office was the adoption by congress, on his recommendation, of the public warehousing system that has since proved so valuable an aid to the commerce of the country; the negotiation of the 35th article of the treaty with Grenada, ratified 10 June, 1848, which secured for our citizens the right of way across the Isthmus of Panama; the postal treaty of 15 Dec., 1848, with Great Britain, and the negotiation of commercial treaties with the secondary states of the Germanic confederation by which reciprocal relations were established and growing markets reached upon favorable terms.

Mr. Bancroft, the only surviving member of Polk's cabinet, who has revised this article, in a communication to the senior editor of the "Cyclopaedia," dated Washington, 8 March, 1888, says: "One of the special qualities of Mr. Polk's mind was his clear perception of the character and motives of the two great parties that then divided the country. Of all our public men—I say, distinctly, of all—Polk was the most thoroughly consistent representative of his party. He had no equal. Time and again his enemies sought for grounds on which to convict him of inconsistency, but so consistently had been his public career that the charge was never even made. Never fanciful or extreme, he was ever solid, firm, and consistent. His administration, viewed from the standpoint of results, was perhaps the greatest in our national history, certainly one of the greatest. He succeeded because he insisted on laying its centre, and in overruling and guiding all his secretaries to act so as to produce unity and harmony. Those who study his administration will acknowledge how sincere and successful were his efforts, as did those who were contemporary with him."

Mr. Polk, who was a patient student and a clear thinker, steadfast to opinions once formed, and not easily moved by popular opinion, labored faithfully, from his entrance into public life until the day when he left the White House, to disseminate the political opinions in which he had been educated, and which commanded the regard of the leaders of the national life was upright and blameless. Simple in his habits to abstemiousness, he found his greatest happiness in the pleasures of the home circle rather than in the gay round of public amusements. A frank and sincere friend, courteous and affable in his demeanor with strangers, generous and benevolent, the esteem in which he was held as a man and as a citizen was quite as high as his official reputation. In the world of Washington a friend and associate in office, Vice-President Dallas, he was "temperate but not unsocial, industrious but accessible, punctual but patient, moral without austerity, and devotional though not bigoted." See "Eulogy on the Life and Character of the Late James K. Polk," by George M. Dallas (Philadelphia, 1849); "Eulogy on the Life and Character of James Knox Polk," by A. G. P. Nicholson (Nashville, 1849); "James Knox Polk," by John S. Jenkins (Buffalo, 1850); and "History of the Administration of James K. Polk," by Lucin B. Chase (New York, 1850). His wife, Sarah Childress, b. near Murfreesboro, Rutherford county, Tenn., 4 Sept., 1803; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 34 Aug., 1881. Her father, a farmer in easy circumstances, sent her to the Moravian institute at Salem, N. C., where she was educated. On returning home she married Mr. Polk, who was then a member of the legislature of Tennessee. The following year he was elected to congress, and during his fourteen sessions in Washington Mrs. Polk's courteous manners, sound judgment, and many attainments gave her a high place in society. On her return as the wife of the president, having no children, Mrs. Polk devoted herself entirely to her duties as mistress of the White House. She held weekly receptions, and abolished the custom of giving refreshments to the guests. She also forbade dancing, as out of keeping with the character of these entertainments. In spite of her reforms, Mrs. Polk was extremely popular. "Madam," said a prominent South Carolinian, at one of her receptions, "there is a voice pronounced against you in the Bible." On inquiring his meaning, he added: "The Bible says, 'Who unto you when all men shall speak well of you?" An English lady thus described the president's wife: "Mrs. Polk is a very handsome woman. Her hair is very black, and her dark eyes and complexion remind one of the Spanish donnas. She is well read, has much talent for conversation, and is highly popular. Her excellent taste in dress preserves the subdued though elegant costume that characterizes the lady. Mrs. Polk became a communicant of the Presbyterian church in 1834, and maintained her connection with that denomination until the decade of her career. After the death of her husband she resided in Nashville, in the house seen in the illustration, and known as "Polk Place."
In the foreground is seen the tomb of her husband.
—President Polk's brother, William Hawkins, lawyer, b. in Maury county, Tenn., 24 May, 1815;
d. in Nashville, Tenn., 16 Dec., 1862, was graduate of the University of Tennessee, took part in the bar in 1839, and began to practise at Columbia, Maury co., Tenn. He was elected to the legislatue in 1841 and again in 1843. In 1843 he was appointed minister to Naples, holding the office from 15 March of that year till 31 Aug.
1847, when he was commissioned major of the 3d Dragoons, and saw service in Mexico. He resigned 29 July, 1848. He was a delegate to the Nashville convention of 1850, and was chosen a member of the 32d congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1851, till 3 March, 1853. Maj. Polk was a strong opponent of secession in 1861.

POLK, Thomas, patroon, b. about 1753; d. in Charlotte, N. C., in 1836. He was the great-grandson of Robert Polk, or Pollock, who emigrated to the Southern States from Scotland about which is nothing known. Thomas's father, William, removed from Maryland to Pennsylvania, while the former, in 1755, left his parents and, travelling through Maryland and Virginia, made his home in Mecklenburg county, N. C.
By enterprise and industry he acquired a large tract of land, which enabled him to keep his family in comfort. Personal qualities made Polk a leader in the Southern Southern settlement which he fixed. and in 1769 he was chosen a member of the provincial assembly, where he presented the passage of an act to establish Queen's college in the town of Charlotte. In 1771 he was again a member of the assembly, and then forward he took an active part in the movement that resulted in the Revolution. At the Mecklenburg convention in May, 1775, he was delegated to make a call for the convention whenever, in his opinion, such action was necessary. After the resolutions had been adopted, Polk read them from the steps of the court-house to the people. He was subsequently a member of the committee that on 24 Aug., 1775, prepared a plan for securing the interior peace and safety of the provinces. A few months later he was appointed colonel of the second of two battalions of minute-men in the Salisbury district.
Soon after the South Carolina Tories attacked Gen. Andrew Williamson and drove him into a stockade at Ninety-Six, but were defeated, with the assistance of 700 militia from North Caro-
By the fall of the congress held at Halifax, N. C.
4 April, 1776, Polk was made colonel of the 4th regiment, which formed part of a force that under Brig.-Gen. Nash joined the army under Washington. In November, 1779, the North Carolina troops were sent to re-enforce the southern army under Gen. Benjamin Lincoln at Charleston. Af-fter the fall of the outer works held at Halifex, N. C.
1776, Polk offered the double office of commissary-general for North Carolina and commissary of purchase for the army, which he accepted. His duties as commissioner brought him into antagonism with Gates, on a question of supplying the militia with rations. Gen. Gates suggested that he be ordered to Salisbury to answer for his conduct. Polk offered his resignation, but it was not at first accepted.
Afterward he became district commissary. After the action at Cowan's Ford, Gen. Greene offered the command of the militia of Salisbury district to Col.
Polk, with the commission of brigadier-general, but, in spite of a personal request by Gen. Greene, the latter was not confirmed by the governor and council, and Col. Polk was superseded in May, 1781. After the Revolution he engaged in the purchase, from the disbanded soldiers, of land warrants that had been issued to them by the state for their services, and died possessed of "prunecy estates," which his sons inherited but did not improve. As the "first Liberator of the county of Salisbury, N. C., 9 July, 1776; d. in Raleigh, N. C., 4 Jan., 1834, entered Queen's college, Charlotte, N. C., where he remained until the beginning of the Revolutionary war. In April, 1777, while he was yet a student, he was appointed a 2d lieutenant and assigned to the 3d South Carolina regiment. His company and another were at once ordered to South Carolina to keep the Tories in check, Polk afterward commanded several expeditions. During one of these he made Col.
Thomas Fletcher, a noted Tory leader, a prisoner, and subsequently, in attempting to capture a party of loyalists in December, 1779, he was severely wounded. On 26 Nov., 1776, he was elected major of the 9th regiment of North Carolina troops, with which he served until March 1778. In May, 1778, Maj. Polk was in the battles of the Brandywine and Germantown. Near the close of the latter action, October, 1777, he was again wounded. The following March, through the consolidation of the two North Carolina regiments into four, Polk lost his command. Returning to the south, he was given a position on the staff of Gen. Richard Hedden, and was present at the surrender of York.
He next fought under Gen. William Davidson, and was sent as an envoy to Gov. Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia. On his return he joined Gen. Andrew Pickens, was promoted lieutenant-colonel of the 4th South Carolina cavalry, attached to the command of Gen. Thomas Sumter, and saw much active service notably at the battle of Eutaw Springs. He retired on duty in May, 1783, but remained in the army till the end of the war. In 1783 Col. Polk was appointed by the legislature surveyor-general of the "middle district," now a part of Tennessee, and found his residence at French Lick fort, which occupied the site of the city of Nashville. He remained there until 1786, and was twice chosen a member of the house of commons from Davidson county. During this period all field operations by the surveyors were rendered impracticable by the hostile attitude of the Indians. The following year he was elected to the general assembly from his native county, which he continued to represent until he became supervisor for the district of North Carolina. This office he retained for seventeen years, until the internal revenue law was repealed.
From 1811 till 1819 he served first as director and subsequently as president of the State bank of North Carolina, and then resigned in order to devote more of his time and personal attention to his lands in Tennessee, which comprised an area of 100,000 acres. On 25 March, 1819, he was appointed President Madison with the consent of the senate, a brigadier-general in the regular army.
This commission he declined on personal and political grounds, being a Federalist and not approving the policy of the administration. When Lafayette returned to the United States in 1824, Polk was named one of the commissioners to receive him in behalf of his native state. Referring to William Polk's influence on the rising fortunes of the state of Tennessee, it has been said that the personal friend and associate of Andrew Jackson he greatly advanced the interests and enhanced the wealth of the hero of New Orleans by furnishing him information, taken from his field notes as a surveyor, that enabled Jackson to secure valuable tracts of land in the state of Tennessee; that to Samuel Polk, father of the president, he gave the agency for renting and selling near the White House (William's estate); and that, as first president of the Bank of North Carolina, he made Jacob Johnson, the father of President Andrew Johnson, its first president; so that of the three native North Carolinians who entered the White House through the gate of Tennessee, all were indebted for benefactions and promotion to the same individual. At his death Col. Polk was the last surviving field-officer of the North Carolina line,—William's son, Leonidas, P. E. bishop, b. in Raleigh, N. C., 10 April, 1806; d. on Pine mountain, Ga., 14 June, 1864, was educated at the University of North Carolina, and at the C. S. military academy, where he was graduated in 1827, and at once brevetted lieutenant of artillery. Having, in the mean time, been induced by Rev. (afterward Bishop) Charles P. McElvaine, then chaplain at the academy, to study for the ministry, he resigned his commission the following December, was made deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1830, and ordained priest in 1831. He served in the Monumental church, Richmond, Va., as assistant for a year, when, his health failing, he went to Europe to recuperate. Soon after his return he removed to Tennessee, and became rector of St. Peter's church, Columbia, in 1833. In 1834 he was clerical deputy to the general convention of the Episcopal church, and in 1835 a member of the standing committee of the diocese. In 1838 he received the degree of S. T. D. from Columbia, and the same year he was elected and consecrated missionary bishop of Arkansas and the Indian territory south of 36° 30', with provisional charge of the see of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and of the missions in the republic of Texas. These charges he held until 1841, when he resigned all of them with the exception of the diocese of Louisiana, of which he remained bishop until his death, intending to resume his duties after he had been released from service in the field. In 1856 he initiated the movement to establish the University of the South at Sewanee, Tenn., and until 1860 was engaged with Bishop Stephen Elliott, and other southern bishops, in perfecting plans that resulted in the opening of that institution at Sewanee, Tenn. At the beginning of the civil war he was a strong sympathizer with the doctrine of secession. His birth, education, and associations were alike southern, and his property, which was very considerable in land and slaves, aided to identify him with the project of establishing a southern confederacy. His familiarity with the valley of the Mississippi prompted him to urge upon Jefferson Davis and the Confederate authorities the importance of fortifying and holding its strategic points, and amid the excitement of the time the influence of his old military training became uppermost in his mind. Under these circumstances the offer of a major-generalship by Davis was regarded not unfavorably. He applied for the command of the Mississippi River, which was refused to him, and then referred to him as an exceptional case, he could not advise against its acceptance. His first command extended from the mouth of Red river, on both sides of the Mississippi, to Paducah on the Ohio, his headquarters being at Memphis. Under his general direction the extensive works at New Madrid and Fort Pillow, Columbus, Ky., Island No. 10, Memphis, and other points, were constructed. On 1 Sept., Gen. Polk transferred his headquarters to Columbus, where the Confederates made a large force of infantry, six field batteries, a siegebattery, three battalions of cavalry, and three steamboats. Opposite this place, at Belmont, Mo., on 7 Nov., 1861, the battle of Belmont was fought, Gen. Polk being in command of the Confederate forces. Grant of the National armies claimed a victory. Gen. Polk remained at Columbus until March, 1862, when he was ordered to join Johnston's and Beauregard's army at Corinth, Miss. As commander of the 1st corps, he took part in the battle of Shiloh, Tenn., and in the subsequent operations that ended with the evacuation of Corinth. In September and October he commanded the Army of Mississippi, and fought at the battle of Perryville, during the Confederate invasion of Kentucky. In the latter part of October and November he was in command of the armies of Kentucky and Mississippi and conducted the Confederate retreat from the former state. In October he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general, and commanded the right wing of the Army of Tennessee at the battle of Stone river. In the Chickamauga campaign, he also led the right wing. According to the official report of Gen. Braxton Bragg, it was only through Polk's disobeience of orders at Chickamauga that the National army was saved from annihilation. He was accordingly relieved from his command, and ordered to Atlanta. Subsequently Jefferson Davis, with true confidence, gave him command of the Army of Mississippi, and fought at the battle of Chickamauga, but he declined. He was then appointed to take charge of the camp of Confederate prisoners that had been paroled at Vicksburg and Port Hudson. In December, 1863, he was assigned to the Department of Alabama, Mississippi, and East Louisiana, in place of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, who was assigned to the Army of Tennessee. By skilful dispositions of his forces he managed to hold the valuable position of the National cavalry column under Gen. William Sooy Smith with Gen. Sherman's army in southern Mississippi. Gen. Polk's prestige being restored, he was ordered to unite his command (the Army of Mississippi with that of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, who opposed the march of Sherman to Atlanta. After taking part in the principal engagements prior to the battle of Chickamauga in September, Gen. Polk, on 6 June, was killed by a cannon-shot while reconnoitering on Pine mountain, near Marietta, Ga. His biography was written and published in 1893 by his son, Dr. William M. Polk, of New York. —Leonidas's son, William Mecklenburg, physician, b. in Ashwood, Maury co., Tenn., 15 Aug., 1841, was graduated at Virginia Military Institute, Lexington, Va., 4 July, 1864, and at the New York college of physicians and surgeons in 1869. He entered the Confederate army in April, 1861, as a cadet of the military institute, was commissioned 1st lieutenant in Scott's battery of artillery in 1862, and in 1863 was promoted assistant chief of artillery in his father's corps, Army of the Tennessee. In March, 1863, he was made captain and adjutant in the inspector-general's department. After his graduation as a physician he practised in New York city, and from 1875 till 1879 he was professor of therapeutics and clinical medicine in Bellevue college of medicine, and the diseases of women in the medical department of the University of the city of New York, which he still (1896) holds. He is also surgeon in the department of obstetrics in Bellevue hospital. Dr. Polk has contributed to medical literature "Original Observations upon the Anatomy of the Female Pelvic Organs," "On the Gravid and Non-Gravid Uterus," and "Original Observations upon the Causes and Pathology of the Pelvic Inflammations of Women."—Leonidas's brother, Thomas Gilchrist, lawyer, b. in Mecklenburg county, N. C., 22 Feb., 1790; d. in Holly Springs, Miss., in 1839, was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1810, and at the law-school at Litchfield, Conn., in 1813. He soon after began to practise law in the neighborhood of South Carolina, and entered the lower branch of the North Carolina legislature. He was also at one time in command of the militia. In 1829 he removed to Tennessee, where he purchased a large plantation. Being a staunch Whig in politics, he took an active part in the presidential campaign of 1844 in support of Henry Clay, and against President James K. Polk. — William H. Polk, lawyer, b. in Salisbury, N. C., 10 July, 1833; d. 1 Dec., 1892, was the son of William J. Polk. He was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1852. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the Confederate army as a private under Gen. Patrick R. Cleburne, but was soon commissioned 1st lieutenant, and as such fought at Shiloh, where he was wounded. He was rapidly promoted until he was made brigadier-general in December, 1862, and joined his brigade in time to take part in the battle of Murfreesboro, where his command made a charge, for which he was complimented by Gen. Braxton Bragg in his report of the engagement. Gen. Polk was also present at Ringgold gap, Ga., in 1863, and at many other battles. At the close of the war in the summer of 1864, he was severely wounded by a cannon-ball and disabled for further service. He then retired to a plantation in Mann county, Tenn., where he afterward resided. In 1884 he was a delegate to the National Democratic convention at Chicago, and he was afterward a member of the senate of the state of Tennessee, having been re-elected 19 Jan., 1887.

POLK, Trusten, senator, b. in Sussex county, Del., 29 May, 1811; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 16 April, 1876. He was graduated at Yale in 1831, and then began the study of law in the office of the attorney-general of Delaware, but completed his course at Yale law-school. In 1837 he removed to St. Louis, Missouri, where he resided for the remainder of his profession, soon rose to a high position in the bar. He was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1845, and in 1848 a presidential elector. He was elected governor of Missouri as a Democrat in 1856, and soon after his accession to office was chosen U. S. senator, serving from 4 March, 1857, until his expulsion for dissoluty on 10 Jan., 1862. Meanwhile he had joined the Confederate government and filled various offices of responsibility within its jurisdiction. In 1864 he was taken prisoner, and after his exchange held the office of military judge of the Department of Mississippi. At the close of the war he returned to St. Louis, and there devoted himself to the practice of his profession until his death.

POLLARD, Edward Albert, journalist, b. in Nelson county, Va., 27 Feb., 1828; d. in Lynchburg, Va., 12 Dec., 1872. He was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1849, and studied law at and under William and Mary, and finished his course in Balti-more. Returning to his native state, he engaged in journalism, and was a journalist until 1855, after which he spent some time in northern Mexico and Nicaragua, and then returned to the eastern states. Subsequently he went to Europe, and also travelled in China and Japan. During President Buchanan's administration he became clerk of the judiciary committee in the house of representatives, and he was an open advocate of secession in 1860. At the beginning of the civil war he was without political employment, and was studying for the Protestant Episcopal ministry, having been admitted a candidate for holy orders by Bishop William Meade. From 1861 till 1867 he was principal editor of the "Richmond Examiner," and, while an earnest advocate of the war, was nevertheless a merciless critic of Jefferson Davis. Toward the close of the war he went to England in order to further the sale of his works, and was then captured, but, after a confinement of eight months at Fort Warren and Fortress Monroe, was released on parole. In 1870 he began the publication in Richmond of "Southern Opinion," which he continued for two years, and also in 1888 established "The Political Pamphlet," which ran for a short time during the presidential canvass of that year. Mr. Pollard then made his residence in New York and Brooklyn for several years, often contributing to current literature. His books include "Black Diamonds Gathered in the Porkey House of the South" (New York, 1859); "Letters to the Southern Spy, a Winter at Home, and Elsewhere" (Baltimore, 1861); "Southern History of the War" (3 vols., Richmond, 1862-'74; 4th vol., New York, 1866); "Observations in the North: Eight Months in Prison and on Parole" (Richmond, 1865); "The Lost Cause: A New Southern History of the War of the Confederacy" (New York, 1868); "Lee and His Lieutenants" (1867); "The Lost Cause Regained" (1868); "Life of Jefferson Davis, with the Secret History of the Southern Confederacy" (1869); and "The Virginia Tourist" (Philadelphia, 1870).—His wife, Marie Antoinette Nathalie Granier-Dowell, b. in Norfolk, Va., married James R. Dowell, from whom she separated during the war. In 1865 she married John H. Brown and by that marriage has children. She then made her way, with great difficulty, through the lines of the armies, to her brother's residence in New Orleans, and later returned to Richmond, where she met Mr. Pollard, whom she married after the war. Subsequent to the death of Mr. Pollard, she became a public speaker, and in this capacity she canvassed California for the Democratic party. She has also lectured on the Irish and Chinese questions, advocating greater liberty to these people, and has been active in the temperance movement, holding the office of deputy grand worthy patriarch of the states of New York and New Jersey. Besides contributions to the newspapers, she has published occasional poems.—His brother, Henry Rives, b. in POLLARD, Josephine, author, b. in New York city about 1840; d. there, 15 Aug., 1892. She was educated in her native city, and early acquired reputation as a hymn-writer, her best-known production being "Outside the Gate." Her prose writings include numerous sketches that have been published in "Harper's Magazine" and other periodicals. Her Miscellaneous Works include "Gipsy Books" (6 vols., New York, 1873-74) and "A Piece of Silver" (1876). She had contributed the text to "Decorative Sisters" (New York, 1881); "Elfin Land" (1882); "Boston Teaparty" (1882); "Songs of Bird Life" (1885); "Vagrant Verses" (1886); and, with John H. Vincent, "The Home Book" (1887).

POLLACK, James, b. in Milton, Pa., 11 Sept., 1832; d. in Lock Haven, Pa., 12 April, 1861. He was graduated at Princeton, and, after study of law, was admitted to the bar in 1853, and opened an office in Milton. In 1855 he was chosen district attorney for his county, after which he held various minor offices. He was elected to congress as a Whig, and served from 23 April, 1841, to 3 March, 1849, during which time he was an active member of the committee on public buildings. On 18 April, 1848, he introduced a resolution calling for the appointment of a special committee to inquire into the necessity and practicability of building a railroad to the Pacific coast. As chairman of that committee he made a report in favor of the construction of such a road. This was the first favorable official act on this subject on the part of Congress. In 1850 he was appointed president-judge of the 8th judicial district of Pennsylvania, and in 1854 he was elected governor of Pennsylvania as a Union-Republican. During his administration the whole line of the public works between Philadelphia and Pittsburg was transferred to the Pennsylvania railroad company. By this and other means he reduced the state debt by nearly $10,000,000, and three commissions in Washington in 1861 and after the inauguration of President Lincoln he was appointed director of the U. S. mint in Philadelphia, which place he then held until October, 1866. By his efforts, with the approval of Salmon P. Chase, then secretary of the treasury, the motto "In God we trust" was placed on the National coins. In 1869 he was reinstated as director of the mint, which place he then held for many years. In 1880 he was appointed naval officer of Philadelphia, but resigned in 1884, and resumed the practice of his profession. General Pollack was a careful observer of the various movements tending to promote educational and religious reforms. He received the honorary degree of L. L. D. from Princeton in 1855, and from Jefferson college, Pa., in 1857.

POLLACK, Oliver, merchant, b. in Ireland in 1817; d. in Mississipp, 17 Dec., 1823. He came to this country with his father, and settled in Cumberland county, Pa. Pollack was engaged in business in Havana, Cuba, where he became intimate with Gov. John O'Reilly, and, when the latter was made governor of Louisiana by the king of Spain, Pollack moved to New Orleans. By a wise and generous action, during the scarcity of provisions in that city, he gained a reputation that made him able to be of great use to the Americans in New Orleans. When the Revolutionary war opened, Pollack was in possession of large wealth and much political influence. In 1777 the secret committee of the United States appointed him "commercial agent of the United States at New Orleans," which post he held until the close of the war with great credit to himself and greater good to the United States. He became to the west what Robert Morris was to the east. For his services he was allowed to his country. To his financial aid the United States owes the success of Gen. George Rogers Clark in the Illinois campaign of 1778. During that year he borrowed from the royal treasury, through Gov. Galvez, $70,000, which he spent for Clark's expedition and the defense of the frontier. But the poverty of the United States involved him, as it did Morris, in severe losses. In 1782 he was appointed U. S. agent at Havana, where he was soon imprisoned in 1784 for the debts of the United States, amounting to $150,000. Being released on parole, he returned to this country in 1785. In 1791 Congress discharged this debt, but failed to remunerate Pollack for his services. He retired to Cumberland county, Pa., in 1791, impoverished. In 1797, 1801, and 1806 he was nominated for congress; but, although he received the popular vote, he was not elected. In 1800 he was an inmate of the debtors' prison in Philadelphia, but within a few years he accumulated property again, and in 1815 he moved to Mississippi, where he died. He was a member of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick and the Hibernian society of Philadelphia. See a sketch of him by Rev. Horace E. Hayden (1885).

POLVEREL, Etienne, French revolutionist, b. in Bearne, France in 1742; d. in Paris, 6 April, 1795. He was a lawyer, and was sent as deputy to the states-general in 1759. He belonged to the extreme party in the revolution, and was appointed public prosecutor in 1791. In 1792 he was sent, with two other commissioners, to Santo Domingo to reorganize the coffee. The three commissioners were invested with arbitrary power, and were invested with this power, and it was under this power that led to war of extermination between the whites and negroes. The French colonists that escaped from the island accused the commissioners of cruel and arbitrary acts, while they in turn accused the whites of conspiring to deliver Santo Domingo to the English. The acquittal by the revolutionary tribunal of Gen. Danton, whom they had sent to France as a criminal, created more enemies, who accused them of being friends of the Girondists. An order for the arrest of Polverel was sent out in 1793, but, owing to the distance of the island and the difficulty of communications, he was not brought to Paris until after the fall of Robespierre.
Although he was set at liberty, the opposition of the colonists prevented him from obtaining a bill of indemnity for his actions in Santo Domingo.

POMEROY, Manuel de (Don-bó), Colombian patriot. b. in Popayan in 1836; d. there in 1899. He studied in the College of Resarío in Bogota, and was graduated there in law in 1860. In the next year he went to Spain to practise, and in 1879 he returned to Colombia as judge of the tribunal of commerce of Cartagena. In 1893 he was appointed superintendent of the mint of Bogota, and when the revolution began in 1890 he was elected by the people on 20 June a member of the municipal corporation. He was an ardent patriot, defended his ideas in the press, and published in 1872 his "Acarde José Maria became his brother for most of his life, and "Historia de las causas que for man of antigua eran de los grandes," the manuscript of which disappeared shortly after his death, and has not yet been recovered.

POMEROY, Benjamin, clergyman, b. in Suffield, Conn. 19 Nov. 1764; d. in Hebron, Conn. 22 Dec. 1845. He was graduated at the head of his class at Yale in 1785, and he and his classmate, Eleazer Wheelock, of New London, were the first to remain there after graduation as recipients of the scholarships that had been founded by Bishop Berkeley for superior attainments in the classics. In the mean time he studied theology, and in 1783 began to preach in Hebron, where he was ordained pastor on 16 Dec. 1783. He identified himself with the great revival of 1749, and to the time of his death in 1792, he was accused before the general assembly of disorderly conduct, and with James Davenport (q. v.) was tried in Hartford; but he was dismissed as "comparatively blameless." He was again called to answer charges of violating the law that had been passed to correct disorders in preaching, was found guilty, and compelled to bear the costs of the prosecution. About this time he preached in the parish of Colchester without the permission of the resident minister, and was in consequence deprived of his salary for seven years. During the French and Indian war he was chaplain to the American army, and he filled a like office during the Revolutionary war. He was active in the movement that led to the founding of Hartmouth College; became one of its trustees, and in 1794 he received the degree of D. D. from that college.

POMEROY, John Norton, lawyer, b. in Rochester, N. Y., 12 April, 1888; d. in San Francisco, Cal. 15 Feb. 1889. He was graduated at Hamilton college in 1847, and, after studying law, he was admitted in 1851 to the bar. For several years thereafter he followed his profession in Rochester, but in 1864 he came to New York city and accepted the chair of law in the University of the city of New York, becoming dean of the legal faculty, and also for a time delivering lectures on political science. In 1889 he returned to Rochester and continued the practice of law until 1878, when he was called to the professorship of law in the University of the State of New York, which chair he held until his death. In 1853 he received the degree of LL. D. from Hamilton. Prof. Pomeroy was a frequent contributor to "The Nation," the "North American Review," and the "American Law Review" on topics connected with international law, general jurisprudence, and social science, and in 1883-5 he edited the "West Coast Reporter." He prepared editions, with notes, of "Solzwick's Statutory and Constitutional Law" (New York, 1874) and "Archbold's Criminal Law" (1876), and was the author of: "An Introduction to Municipal Law" (1865); "An Introduction to the Constitutional Law of the United States" (1868); and a volume of "Statutes," and a "Commentary" on "Blackstone's Commentaries," a book at the U.S. military academy and other colleges (Boston, 1868); "Remedies and Remedial Rights according to the Reformed American Procedure." (Boston, 1876); "A Treatise on the Specific Performance of Contract" (New York, 1876); "A Treatise on Equity Jurisprudence" (San Francisco, 1881); and "A Treatise on Riparian Rights" (Boston, 1882).
POINCE DE LEON, Juan (pron-"thay-day-lay-one"), Spanish officer, b. in San Servas, province of Campos, in 1469; d. in Cuba in July, 1521. He was descended from an ancient family of Aragon, was in his youth page of the infante, afterward Ferdinand VII., and served with credit against the Moors of Granada. According to some authorities, he accompanied Columbus in his second voyage to Hispaniola in 1493, but Washington Irving and other modern historians say that he only sailed in 1502 with Nicholas de Ovando (q. v.), who was appointed governor of that island. He took an active part in the pacification of the country, and became governor of the eastern part, or province of Agramante, in 1503, and later became the principal cacique, Aguanahu (q. v.), accompanied him to all parts of the island, and Ponce collected many samples of vegetation about astonished at the fertility of the soil. In 1509 he returned to Hispaniola to report, and in quest of re-enforcements, but the new governor, Diego Columbus, gave the command of the expedition to Diego Ceron, and sent Ponce as his lieutenant. The latter, through his protector, Ovando, in the court of Spain, claimed the appointment of governor of Borinquen, and in 1510 he obtained it. He sent Ceron to Hispaniola, began the construction of the first city, calling it Caparra, and sent his lieutenant, Cristobal de Sotomayor, to find another city in the southwest near the Bay of Guanica. Soon he began to distribute the Indians among his officers, as had been done in Hispaniola, and Aguirre-bo's brother and successor, of the same name, began a war of extermination against the invaders.

He was defeated in successive encounters, and the natives called the Caribs of the lesser Antilles to their help, but Ponce conquered the whole island. In the beginning of 1526 Ponce was deprived of his government, and, broken in health by wounds, resolved to go in search of the fountain of eternal youth, which, according to the reports of the natives, existed in an island called Bimini. He gathered many of his former followers and other adventurers, sailed on 3 March, 1512, with three caravels from the port of San German, and visited several of the Bahamas islands, but was told that the land in question lay farther west. On 27 March he landed in latitude 30° N., a little to the north of the present city of St. Augustine, on a coast which, on account of the abundant vegetation, he called Florida island. He sailed along the coast to a cape, which he called Cerrientes, but, disappointed in his search for the fountain of youth, returned to Porto Rico on 23 April, 1512. He obtained for himself and his successors the title of adelantado of Bimini and Florida. In 1515 he returned with three caravels from Seville and touched at Porto Rico, where, finding that the Caribs had nearly overpowered the Spanish garrison, he remained to expel them, and founded in the south of the island the city of Ponce. In March, 1521, he made a second attempt to conquer Florida, and, sailing with two ships from San German, reached a point about fifty miles to the south of his former landing-place. He began to explore the interior, but found a warlike people, and, after many encounters with the natives, was obliged to re-embark, with the loss of nearly all his followers. Not desiring to return after his defeat to Porto Rico, he retired to the island of Cuba, where he died shortly afterward, in consequence of a wound from a poisoned arrow. His remains were subsequently transported to the city of San Juan de Porto Rico, and rest in the church of San Jose. A monument has been erected to his memory recently in that city. His autograph, which it is believed he never before appeared in America, was preserved in Spain through the care of Gen. Meredith Read.

POND, Enoch, clergyman, b. in Wrentham, Norfolk co., Mass., 29 July, 1791; d. in Bangor, Me., 21 Jan., 1882. He was graduated at Brown in 1813, studied theology with Dr. Nathaniel Emmons, was licensed to preach in June, 1814, and ordained pastor of the Congregational church in Ward (now Augusta), Mass., 1 March, 1815. While he remained in Bangor until 1828, when he was dismissed at his own request, to become the editor of "The Spirit of the Pilgrims," a monthly publication that had just been established at Boston in the interest of orthodox Congregationalism. After editing five volumes, he became, in September, 1832, professor of systematic theology in the seminary at Bangor, Me. In 1844 he delivered a series of lectures on ecclesiastical history, and lecturer on pastoral duties in the same institution. In 1870 he was made emeritus professor, retaining the presidency. In 1853 he received the degree of D. D. from Dartmouth college. Dr. Pond's first publication was a review of a sermon against "Conference Meetings," issued by the Rev. Daniel Dabney, of Roanoke, Va. (1813), which led to a reply and rejoinder. The same year he reviewed "Judson on Baptism." He published a volume of "Monthly Concert Lectures" (1824); a "Memoir of President Samuel Harrison Morse" (1829); a "Memoir of Nathaniel Anthony" (1830); "Murray's Grammar Improved" (Worcester, 1832); "Memoir of Count Zinzendorf" (1836); "Wickliffe and his Times" (Philadelphia, 1841); "Morning of the Reformation" (1842); "No Fellowship with Romanism" and "Review of Second Advent Publications" (1843); "The Mather Family," 1844; "Young Pastor's Guide" (Portland, 1845); "The World's Salves" (1847); "Pope and Pagan" (1849); "Probation"; "Swedenborgianism Reviewed" (1846; new ed., entitled "Swedenborgianism Examined," New York, 1861); "Plate, His Life, Works, Opinions, and Influence" (1846); "Life of Increase Mather and Sir William Phipps" (1847); "The Church" (1848); 2d ed., 1868; "Review of Bushnell's "God in Christ"" (1849); "The Ancient Church" (1851); "Memoir of John Knox" (1856); "The Wreck and the Rescue, a Memoir of Rev. Harrison Fairfield" (1858); "Prize Essay on Congregationalism" (1867); and "Sketches of the Theological History of New England" (1886). His college lectures have been printed under the titles "Pastoral Theology" (Andover, 1841); "Christian Theology" (Boston, 1868); and "History of the Churches" (New York, 1885). John Norton's "Life of John Cotton" (Boston, 1832).

POND, Frederick Eugene, author, b. in Poughkeepsie, Dutchess co., N. Y., 8 April, 1836. He received a common-school education, and early turned his attention to sporting matters. He was among the first to urge the organization of a National sportsmen's association, and in 1854 was the principal agent in forming the Western sportsmen's association for the protection of fish and game. From 1854 till 1886 he was field-editor of the New York "Turf, Field, and Farm," with the exception of six months in 1883, when he was associate editor of the "American Field," of Chicago, Ill., and became later editor of "Wildwood's Magazine" in the latter city. On 31 Jan., 1882, he nearly lost his life in the fire that destroyed the "World" building in New York city. Under the pen-name of "Will Wildwood" he has published "Handbook for Young Sportsmen" (Milwaukee 1876); "Memoirs of Eminent Sportsmen" (New York, 1878); and "The Gun Trial and Field Trial Records of America" (1885). He has edited Frank Forester's "Irresistible" and written several other books under the same author's "Sporting Scenes and Characters" (Philadelphia, 1880); and Isaac McDellan's "Poems of the Red and Gun" (New York, 1886). He has also written an introduction to Frank Forester's "Poems," edited by Morgan Herbert (1887).

POND, George Edward, journalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 11 March, 1837. He was graduated at Harvard in 1858, and served in the National army in 1862-3. From early in 1864 till 1868, and subsequently, he was associate editor of the New York "Army and Navy Journal." He was afterward an editorial writer on the New York "Times," and edited the Philadelphia "Record" from 1870 till 1875. Since the latter date he has been engaged in writing for the press. For nearly ten years he wrote the "Driftwood" essays, which were published in the "Galaxy" magazine under the signature of "Philip Quiltet." They were begun in May, 1868. He contributed the account of the engagement between the "Monitor" and the "Merrimac" to William Swinton's " Twelve Decisive Battles.;" and also wrote "The Shenandoah Valley" (New York, 1864); and "Swinton's" (1885) in the series of "Campaigns of the Civil War.

D. in Shakespe, Minn., 5 Dec., 1891. He in 1831 became a professing Christian, and in May, 1834, in advance of all other organized effort on the part of the churches, and having no connection with any society, he and his brother, Gideon Hollister (b. in June, 1810; d. in January, 1878), entered the Dakota country, now the state of Minnesota, and began to labor as missionaries to the Indians of that tribe and the garrison at Fort Snelling. Returning to Quebec, he obtained a minister of the Congregational church, 7 March, 1837, and the following October became connected with the American board. He was subsequently stationed at Minnesota at Lake Harriet, Fort Snelling, Oak Grove, and Prairieville, being released from the service of the board in September, 1864. He afterward held pastorates in various parts of the same state, where he continued to reside. The Pond brothers were the first to reduce the Dakota language to writing. They also collated the majority of the words contained in the Dakota dictionary by Rev. Stephen R. Riggs (g. c.). They had previously studied Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, and German. He has published, in connection with his brother, "The History of the Indians from Genesis" (Cincinnati, 1839); "Wowapi Inompa, the Second Dakota Reading Book" (Boston, 1842); and other translations into the same language. He is also the author of "Indian Warfare in Minnesota" in the "Collections" of the historical society of that state.

POND, William Adams, music-publisher, b. in Albany, N. Y., 6 Oct., 1824; d. in New York city, 12 Aug., 1883. He was educated in private schools in New York city, and at an early age entered his father's music business. He became well known as a publisher, and at the time of his death was president of the United States music publishers' association. Col. Pond performed some military service as an officer during the civil war, and was for many years colonel of the veteran corps of the 7th New York regiment.

PONS, François Raymond Joseph de, French traveller, b. in Souston, Santo Domingo, in 1751; d. in Paris about 1812. He studied in Paris, became a lawyer, and was elected member of the Academic society of sciences. He went to Canada, in South America, where he acted as agent of the French government till the revolution, and then returned to France. He published several works, among which his "voyage to the part orientale de la terre ferme, dans l'Amérique méridionale, fait pendant les années 1801, 1803, 1804" (1806); and "Perspective des rapports politiques et commerciaux de la France dans les deux Indes, sous sa dynastie régénante" (1807).

PONTBRIAND, Henry Mary Du Brelle de (b. in Lower Canada, b. in Virginia, France, in 1799; d. in Montreal, Canada, in 1796). He was consecrated bishop of Quebec in Paris in 1741, and arrived in Canada the same year, with several priests. After entering Quebec, he found himself engaged in a lawsuit with the mun of the general hospital, who claimed the episcopal palace as part of the legacy that Saint-Valier, second bishop of Quebec, had obtained a royal decree confirming the possession of the palace to the bishops of Quebec, which was followed by another prohibiting religious congregations from holding lands in mortmain, and in 1744 by a letter from the minister, Maupeu, enjoining him to suppress a portion of the holidays observed by the Canadian people; but he paid no attention to either. After the capture of Quebec by the English in 1759, he regulated the affairs of his church as far as possible, appearing as the first bishop of the English colony. He died in 1766, at the age of 68, and his diocese was annexed to the new order of things and observed the terms of the capitulation, and then retired to Montreal. He was not able to survive the grief which the capture of Quebec caused him, and died after a few days' illness.

PONTÉVÉS-GIEN, Henry Jean Baptiste (pont-vay). Viscount de, commonly known as (Gence de Giens), was born at the parish of Aix, Provence, in 1710; d. in Fort Royal, Martinique, 33 July, 1790. He entered the navy as a midshipman in 1755, and served in Canada during the war of 1756-63. He was attached afterward to the station of Martinique, and in 1776 employed to make soundings along the Newfoundland banks and the coast of St. Pierre and Miquelon islands, preparing charts of these regions for the use of the French war for American independence he was on duty at Brest, but, requesting to be employed in more active service, he was appointed to the command of a division, with which he destroyed the English establishments and forts on the coast of Guinea between the river Gambia and Sierra Leone. Upon his return he was promoted "chef d'escadre," and charged with escorting a convoy of eighty sail to the United States. Afterward he participated in the engagements with Lord Byron, assisted Boulainville at the capture of Tobago, was with De Grasse at Yorktown in October, 1781, and served under De Vaudemont till the conclusion of the campaign. He commanded the station of the Leeward islands in 1784-90, became in January, 1790, governor general of Martinique, and during his short administration not only promoted the best interests of the colony, but appealed all the troubles that had been provoked by the French revolution, leaving Martinique at his death in a state of perfect tranquility, while all the other French possessions in the West Indies were in insurrection. By public subscription his statue was erected in one of the squares of Fort Royal, Martinique.

PONTGRAVÉ, Daniel, French sailor, b. in St. Malo, France, in the latter half of the 16th century; d. there probably in the first half of the 17th. He was one of the most enterprising merchants in St. Malo, and a skilful navigator. He had made several voyages to Tadoussac, Canada, and believed that the development of the fur-trade would lead to great wealth, especially if it were under the control of a single person. With this object he proposed to Chauvin, a sea-captain, to obtain exclusive privileges from the court in connection with this branch of commerce, and, on the latter's success, Pontgrave equipped several vessels and sailed with him for Canada in 1599. He wished to form a settlement at Three Rivers, but, Chauvin objecting, he returned to France in 1600. In 1603 the king granted Pontgrave leave to continue his discoveries in Canada and establish colonies, and the merchants of Rouen fitted out an expedition under his direction. He sailed on 15 March, Samuel Champlain being on board one of his ships, and he accompanied Champlain in his voyage up St. Lawrence river. He sailed again to Canada the same year, commanding a ship and later, two others. He returned through the latter colony to Port Royal in Acadia. Pontgrave devoted himself to the welfare of the new settlement, and did much to render it successful, though he was placed in his office. He returned to France, but was sent out in 1698 to establish a trading-post at Tadoussac in conjunction with Champlain. He returned with the latter in September, 1699, and two vessels were fitted out, one of which was condensed to Pontgravé, who reached Canada in April. He was again in France early in 1703, and commanded the vessel in which Champlain sailed from France in Oct. After reaching France, he separated from the latter, and despaired to Quebec.

It is said by Charlevoix to have returned to France in the following year, but this is doubtful.

He had charge of the interests of the Sieur de Caen for some time in Quebec, but ill health obliged him to go to France in 1723. "This was a real loss to New France," says Charlevoix, "which owes much to him." He was in Quebec in 1728 in the interest of De Motts and his society, and counselled resistance to the English.

PONTIAC, chief of the Ottawas, b. on Ottawa river about 1720: d. inCahokia, Ill., in 1769. He was the son of an Ojibway woman, and, as the Ottawas were in alliance with the Ojibways and Pot-tawattamies, he became the principal chief of the Ottawas. In 1709 he attacked the French in the french attacked at an attack against some of the northern tribes, and in 1755 he is believed to have led the Ottawas at Braddock's death. After the surrender of Quebec, Maj. Robert Rogers, of New Hampshire, was sent to take possession of the western forts, under the treaty of Paris, but in November, 1760, while encamped at the place where the city of Chicago now stands, he was visited by Pontiac, who objected to his further invasion of the territory. Finding, however, that the French had been driven from Canada, he acquiesced in the surrender of Detroit, and persuaded 400 Detroit Indians, who were lying in ambush, to relinquish their design of cutting off the English. While this action was doubtless in good faith, still he hated the English and soon began to plan their extermination. In 1762 he sent messengers with a red-stained tomahawk and a wampum war-belt, who visited every tribe between the Ottowa and the lower Mississippi, all of whom joined in the conspiracy. The end of May was deter-m ined upon as the time when each tribe was to destroy the English. On the 11th of May, Fort Detroit was destroyed, and then all were to attack the settlements. A great council was held near Detroit on 27 April, 1763, when Pontiac delivered an oration, in which the wrongs and indignities that the Indians had suffered at the hands of the English were recounted, and their own extermination was prophesied. He also told them of a tradition, which he could hard-lly have invented, that a Delaware Indian had been admitted into the presence of the Great Spirit, who told him his race must return to the customs and weapons of their ancestors, throw away the implements they had acquired from the white man, abtain from whiskey, and take up the hatchet against the English, "these dogs dressed in red, who have come to rob you of your hunting-grounds and drive away the game." The taking of Detroit was to be his special task, and the 12th of May was appointed for the attack; but the plot was disclosed to the commander of the post by an Indian girl, and in consequence Pontiac found the garrison prepared. Foiled in his original intention, on 12 May he surrounded Detroit with his Indians; but his attack was repulsed, and the garrison received food from the Canadian settlers. The latter likewise supplied the Indians, in return for which they received promissory notes drawn on Pook, Samuel Moore, naval constructor, b. in Boston, Mass., 15 Aug., 1804; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 2 Dec., 1878. He was educated in the Boston public schools, and from 1841 to his retirement, 15 Aug., 1866, was naval constructor in the U. S. navy.

Among other vessels, he built the sloops-of-war
"Preble" and "Saratoga," the frigates "Congress" and "Franklin," and the steamers "Merrimack" and "Princeton." He was also active in fitting out the fleet of Admiral Dampier and others during the civil war. Mr. Pook was the inventor of numerous devices connected with his profession, and wrote "A Method of comparing the Lines, and Draughting Vessels propelled by Sail or Steam," with diagrams (New York, 1866).—His son, Samuel Hart, naval constructor, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 17 Jan., 1825, was graduated at Portsmouth academy, N. H., in 1842, became a naval architect, and on 17
May, 1848, was appointed first-lieutenant of a navy. He has built many merchant ships, including the well-known clipper "Red Jack." When the introduction of iron-clad vessels into the navy was proposed he was one of the party that called on Sec. Gideon Welles to advocate them, and he was made superintendent of the first that was built.

POOL, John, senator b. in Pasquotank county, N. C., 16 June, 1826; d. in Washington, D. C., 18 Aug., 1884. He was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1847, and admitted to the bar in the same year. He was chosen to the state senate in 1856 and 1858, and in 1858 he was the Whig candidate for governor of the state. After being returned to the state senate in 1864 as a peace candidate, and again in 1865, he was a member of the State constitutional convention of the latter year, and was chosen to the U. S. senate, but not admitted. In 1868 he was re-elected, and he then served till the expiration of his term in 1873.

POOLE, Fitch, journalist, b. in Danvers, Mass., 13 June, 1803; d. in Peabody, Mass., 19 Aug., 1873. He received a common-school education, was connected with the press for many years, and edited the Danvers "Wizard" from its establishment in 1839 till 1868. Mr. Poole was the founder of the Mechanics' institute library, which afterward became the Peabody institute, and he was its librarian from 1856 till his death. He was in the legislature in 1841-2, and held several public offices. He was the author of numerous satirical ballads that attained popularity, the best known of which was "Giles Corev's Dream."

POOLE, William Frederick, librarian, b. in Salem, Mass., 24 Dec., 1821; d. in Evanston, Ill., 1 March, 1894. He was descended in the eighth generation from John Poole, who came from Reading, England, to the towns of Cambridge, Mass., in 1632, and became the chief proprietor of Reading, Mass., in 1655. He was graduated at Yale in 1849, and while in college was librarian of the "Brothers in Unity" literary society, and prepared an index to periodical literature containing 164 pages, which was published in 1849. During his senior year he prepared a new edition of 521 pages, which was published in 1853, and followed in 1882 by a third edition of 1,469 pages, prepared with the co-operation of the American library association and the library association of the United Kingdom. He was assistant librarian of the Boston Athenæum in 1853, and in 1858 became librarian of the Boston mercantile library, where he remained four years, and printed a dictionary catalogue of the library on the "title-a-line" principle, which has since been followed widely. From 1856 till 1869 he was librarian of the Boston Athenæum. He organized the Bronson Library, Waterbury, Conn., in 1858, the Athenæum library at St. Johnsbury, Vt., and did similar work at New London and East Hampton, Mass., and in the library of the U. S. naval academy at Annapolis. He began, in October, 1869, as librarian, the organization of the public library of Cincinnati, and in January, 1874, the organization of the Chicago public library. He resigned this position in August, 1887, and in that year was elected librarian of the library in Chicago founded by Walter L. P. Scott. Mr. Poole devoted much attention to the study of American history, and was president of the American historical association, and a member of many other similar societies. He was president from 1885 till 1887 of the American library association, and vice-president of the international conference of librarians in London in 1877. He had published many papers on library and historical topics, including the construction of buildings and the organization and management of public libraries. These include "Chicago," "Gates and Salem Witchcraft," "the chapter on "Witches" in the "Mysteries of Boston," "The Popham Colony," "The Ordinance of 1587," and "Anti-Slavery Opinions before 1800." He edited "The Owl." A literary monthly, in 1843-4 in Chicago, and since 1880 had been a constant contributor to "The Dial."

POOLEY, James Henry, physician, b. in Cherters, Cambridgeshire, England, 17 Nov., 1830. He was brought to this country in early childhood, and graduated at the New York college of physicians and surgeons in 1856. After service as an assistant surgeon in the regular army in 1861-3 he practised in Yonkers, N. Y., till 1875, when he removed to Columbus, Ohio. He is a member of many professional societies, was a delegate to the International medical congress of 1876, and professor of surgery of the St. Louis medical college, Ohio, from 1875 till 1880. Since 1883 he has held the chair of surgery in Toledo medical college. He has edited the "Ohio Medical and Surgical Journal" since 1876, and has been a voluminous contributor to surgical literature. Several of his articles have been reprinted in pamphlet-form, including "Three Cases of Inoperative Anus" (1870); "Remarks on the Surgery of Chilblains" (1872); and "Gastrotomy and Gastrectomy" (1875).

POOR, Charles Henry, naval officer, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 11 June, 1808; d. in Washington, D. C., 5 Nov., 1882. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 1 March, 1825, and was promoted lieutenant, 23 Dec., 1855, commander, 14 Sept., 1863, captain, 16 July, 1862, and commodore, 2 Jan., 1863. After serving with different squadrons, and in the Washington and Norfolk navy-yards, he was given command of the "St. Louis," of the home squadron, in 1860-1, and in the latter year had charge of an expedition that was sent to reinforce Fort Pickens. During 1861-3 he was in command of the frigate "Roonke," of the North Atlantic blockading squadron. He was ordered to the south in the summer of 1863, under the flag of "Merrimac," but did not have an opportunity to test its strength. He subsequently passed the Confederate batteries under fire in the "Roonke," while proceeding from Hampton Roads toward Newport News, to assist the "Congress" and "Cumberland." From 1863 till 1865 he was in command of the sloop-of-war "Saracen," of the Pacific squadron, and in 1868 was placed on the reserve list. In 1874 he was sent to the Mediterranean, and in 1877 commanded the North Atlantic squadron in 1869-70, he was retired on 9 June, 1870. In 1871-2 he was a member of the retiring board. Admiral Poor saw twenty-three years and six months of sea-service, and was employed fourteen years and five months in shore duty.

POOR, Daniel, minister, b. in Danvers, Essex co., Mass., 3 July, 1789; d. in Marblehead, 3 Feb., 1857. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1811, and at Andover theological seminary in 1814.

He was ordained in the Presbyterian church at Newburyport, Mass., in June, 1815, and in the following October sailed with his wife and four other missionaries for Ceylon, where he arrived in March, 1816, and organized a mission-school. He went to Matura, southern India, in 1826, organized thirty-seven schools, which he visited in succession, and frequently addressed from horseback crowds of all ages and nations, supported by the British government, and returned to the United States in 1849, where he spent two years in addressing meetings on missionary work. Returning to Ceylon in 1851, he settled at Mankup, and labored incessantly until an epidemic of cholera terminated his labors. Dr. Poor took high rank as a scholar, and he was peculiarly qualified to labor among the religious sects of India and Ceylon. He was given the degree of D. D. by Dartmouth in 1835. He published numerous religious, temperance, and other tracts in the Tamil and English languages, and was a contributor to the "Bibliotheca Sacra."—His son, Daniel Warren, clergyman, b. in Tillipalgy, Ceylon, 21 Aug., 1819; d. in Newark, N. J., 1 Oct., 1887. He graduated at Andover and at Princeton, and was pastor of Presbyterian churches at Fairhaven, Mass., in 1845-8, Newark, N. J., in 1849-69, and Oakland, Cal., in 1869-72. In 1871 he was appointed professor of ecclesiastical history and church government in San Francisco theological seminary, and he held the chair until 1876, when he became corresponding secretary of Presbyterian board of education at Philadelphia. Dr. Poor organized the church of which he was pastor in Newark, and was also instrumental in building up three German churches within the bounds of his presbytery, and in organizing one in Philadelphia. He was also active in founding the German theological school at Bloomfield, N. J. He received the degree of D. D. from Princeton in 1857. Besides occasional sermons and pamphlets, he had published "Select Discourses from the French and German, with Rev. Henry C. Fish (New York, 1858), and, with Rev. Conway P. Wing, "The Epistles to the Corinthians," from the German of Lange (1868). POOR, Enoch, soldier, b. in Andover, Mass., 21 June, 1756; d. near Hackensack, N. J., 4 Sept., 1780. He was educated in his native place, and removing to Ester, N. H. engaged in business there until the battle of Lexington, when the New Hampshire assembly resolved to raise 2,000 men. Three regiments were formed, and the command of one of them was given to Poor. After the evacuation of Boston he was sent to New York, and was afterward ordered to join the disastrous Canadian expedition with his regiment. On the retreat from Saratoga he was captured by the British, and was placed in the New York prison. He made a successful escape to Canada, where the Americans concentrated at Crown Point, and Col. Poor was actively occupied in strengthening the defenses of that post until a council of general officers advised its evacuation, which was accordingly ordered by Gen. Philip Schuyler. Against this step twenty-one of the field-officers, headed by Poor, John Stark, and William Maxwell, sent in a written remonstrance.

Gen. Washington, on being appealed to, while refusing to overrule Gen. Schuyler's action, concurred distinctly in the views of the remonstrants as to the improbability of the measure. On 21 Feb., 1777, Poor was commissioned brigadier-general, and he held a command in the campaign against Burgoyne, was in the hard-fought but indescribable engagement at Stillwater. Gen. Poor's brigade sustained more than two thirds of the whole American loss in killed, wounded, and missing. At the battle of Saratoga, Poor led the attack. The vigor and gallantry of the charge, supported by an adroit and furious onslaught from Col. Daniel Morgan, could not be resisted, and the British line was broken. After the surrender of Burgoyne, Poor returned to Washington in Pennsylvania, and subsequently shared in the hardships and sufferings of the army at Valley Forge. During the dreary winter that was spent by the Revolutionary army in that encampment, no officer exerted himself with greater earnestness to obtain relief. He wrote urgently to the legislature of New Hampshire, "I said," referring to his men, "bearing their sufferings, and an every morning awakened by the lamentable tale of their distresses... If they desert, how can I punish them, when they plead in justification that the contract on your part is broken?" Gen. Poor was among the first to set out with his brigade in pursuit of the British across New Jersey. At the summer of 1778 he fought gallantly under Lafayette at the battle of Monmouth. In 1779 he commanded the second or New Hampshire brigade, in the expedition of Gen. John Sullivan against the Indians of the Six Nations. When, in August, 1780, a corps of light infantry was formed composed of two brigades, the command of one of them was given, at the request of Lafayette, to Gen. Poor; but he survived his appointment only a few weeks, being stricken down by fever. In announcing his death, Gen. Washington declared him to be "an officer of distinguished merit, who, as a citizen and a soldier, had every claim to the esteem of his country. In 1824, when Lafayette visited New Hampshire, at a banquet in his honor, he said, referring to Col. Poor: "Lifting his glass to his lips, and after a few explanatory words, he gave: "Light-infantry Poor and Yorktown Scammel." He had seen the latter mortally wounded at the battle of Yorktown. Both men were New Englanders. Gen. Poor was buried in Hackensack, where a fine monument marks his grave.

POORE, John Alfred, journalist, b. in Andover, Oxford co., Me., 8 Jan., 1808; d. in Portland, Me., 5 Sept., 1871. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised at Bangor, but afterward removed to Portland. In the latter city he was for several years editor of the "State of Maine," a daily paper, and he subsequently served in the legislature. He was the first active promoter of the present railroad and of the paving of the state, he originated the European and North American line, and was president of the proposed Portland, Rutland and Oways road. He was an active member of the Maine historical society, under whose auspices he published "A Vindication of the Claims of Sir Ferdinando Gorges as the Founder of English Colonization in America" (New York, 1862). He also delivered the address at the commemoration, on 15 Aug., 1853, of the founding of the Popham colony at the mouth of the Kennebec (1863).
ton, D. C., 30 May, 1882. He was descended from John Poore, an English yeoman, who came to this country and, in 1650, purchased "Indian Hill Farm," the homestead, which still remains in the family. When Perley was eleven years of age he was taken by his father to England, and there saw Sir Walter Scott, Lafayette, and other notable people. Leaving school after his return, he served an apprenticeship in the instrument business, with Mr. Lothrop, and had edited the Athens, Ga., "Southern Whig," which his father purchased for him, for two years before he was twenty. In 1841 he visited Europe again as attaché of the American legation at Brussels, remaining abroad until 1848. During this period he acted in 1844-8 as the historical agent of Massachusetts in France, in which capacity he filled ten folio volumes with copies of important documents, bearing date 1492-1789, illustrating them by engraved maps and water-color sketches. He was also the foreign correspondent of the Boston "Atlas" during his entire stay abroad. After editing the Boston "Bee" and "Sunday Sentinel," Mr. Poore finally entered in 1854 upon his life-work, that of Washington correspondent. His letters to the Boston Journal were signed "Perley," and to other papers, gained him a national reputation by their trustworthy character. For several years he also served as clerk of the committee of the U. S. senate on printing records. He was interested in military matters, had studied tactics, and during his editorial career in Boston held several staff appointments. About the same time he organized a battalion of riflemen in Newbury that formed the nucleus of a company in the 8th Massachusetts volunteers, of which organization Mr. Poore served as major for a short time during the civil war. He was also in 1854 commander of the Ancient and honorable artillery company of Boston, and had made a collection of materials for its projected history. Maj. Poore's vacations were spent at Indian Hill, where the farm-house contained sixty rooms filled with historical material, of which its owner was an industrious collector. During thirty years of Washington life he made the acquaintance of many eminent men, and his fund of reminiscences was large and entertaining. He told good stories, spoke well after dinner, and was much admired in society. Among his many friends was Gen. Zachary Taylor," of which 800,000 copies were circulated, and "Rise and Fall of Louis Philippe" (Boston, 1848); "Early Life of Napoleon Bonaparte" (1851); "Agricultural History of Essex County, Mass."; "The Conspiracy Trial for the Murder of Abraham Lincoln" (1865); "Federal and State Charters" (2 vols., 1871); "The Political Register and Congressional Directory" (1878); "Life of Burnside" (1882); and "Perley's Reminiscences of Sixty Years in the National Metropolis" (Philadelphia, 1886). As secretary of the U. S. agricultural society, he became the editor of its "Journal" in 1857. He began to edit the Congressional directory in 1867, supervised the indices to the "Congressional Record," and brought out the National and Congregational directories of the United States for many years. By order of congress he compiled "A Descriptive Catalogue of the Government Publications of the United States, 1774-1881" (Washington, 1885), and also made a compilation of the various treaties negotiated by the United States government with different native tribes.

POPE, Albert Augustus, manufacturer, b. in Boston, Mass., 20 May, 1843. He was educated at public schools, but even as a boy was compelled to earn his own living. In 1862 he was commissioned 2d lieutenant in the 25th Massachusetts regiment, with which he continued until the close of the war, when he was mustered out with the brevet rank of lieutenant-colonel. Soon after he became head of a shoe-finding business. In 1877, he began to take an interest in bicycles, and during that year ordered eight from Manchester, England. Subsequently he came largely himself in their manufacture, and it is chiefly due to his enterprise that most of the improvements of the bicycle in this country have been brought about. Col. Pope was instrumental in founding "Outing," a journal that for several years was published by him.—His twin sisters, Emily Frances and Caroline Augusta, physicians, b. in Boston, Mass., 18 Feb., 1846, were graduated at the Brookline high-school, and at the New England medical college in 1870. Subsequently they devoted some time to hospital study in London and Paris, and on their return became attached to the New England hospital for women and children. In 1873 they established themselves in general practice, in which they have been successful. Both are members of the New England hospital association of gynecology and the Massachusetts medical society, and, with Emily L. Call, they prepared "The Practice of Medicine in the United States" (Boston, 1881).

POPE, Charles Alexander, surgeon, b. in Huntsville, Ala., 15 March, 1818; d. in Paris, Monroco, Mo., 6 July, 1879. He was educated at the University of Alabama, and studied medicine at Cincinnati medical college and at the University of Pennsylvania, where he graduated in 1839. He spent the next two years in study in France and Germany, and on his return began to practise in St. Louis, Mo., where he soon took high rank. He became professor of anatomy, and afterward of surgery, in St. Louis university, aided in organizing St. Louis medical college, and was president of the American medical association in 1854. He also took an active part in promoting the cause of education generally. Soon after the close of the civil war he gave up practice and retired to Paris, Mo., where he resided until his death.

POPE, Franklin Leonard, electrical engineer, b. in Great Barrington, Mass., 2 Dec., 1840; d. there, 13 Oct., 1886. He was educated in his native town, became an electrician, and, as operator, was made assistant engineer of the American telegraph company, and filled a similar office in the Russo-American telegraph company. In association with George Blenkinsop, of Victoria, British Columbia, he made, while in that service in 1866, the first exploration of the extensive region between British Columbia and Alaska, about the sources of Skeena, Stikine, and Yukon rivers. Subsequently he settled in New York city, where he had his office, and was engaged as an electrical engineer and expert. With Thomas A. Edison he invented in 1876 the one-wire printing telegraph, known as the "ticker," which is employed in large cities for telegraphing exchange quotations. He also invented in 1872 the rail-circuit for automatically controlling a telegraph recording instrument, that has since been used on the principal railroads of the United States, and has patented other improvements relating to railway and telegraphic service. In 1885 he was elected president of the American institute of electrical engineers. Mr. Pope had since 1884 been the editor of "The Electrical Engineer," and, besides articles in the technical, historical, and popular periodicals on the art and science of the Electric Telegraph" (New York, 1871) and "Life and Work of Joseph Henry" (1879).
POPE, James Colledge, Canadian statesman, b. in Bed cope, Prince Edward island, 11 June, 1826; d. in Summerside, Prince Edward island, 18 May, 1885. He was educated in his native place and in England, engaged in business in early manhood, and became successful as a merchant, shipbuilder, and ship-owner. In 1857 Mr. Pope became a member of the Prince Edward Island assembly, and, except for a brief intermission in 1858, when he sat in the Dominion parliament, held his seat until August, 1876, when he was defeated. He became a member of the executive council of Prince Edward island in 1857, and was premier of that province in 1865–7, 1870–1, and from April till September, 1875. The construction of the Prince Edward Island railway was the result of his energy, and the latter was in the hands of the government, which he represented in the dominion parliament, his railway was achievements of his administration. He was elected to the Canadian parliament in November, 1876, re-elected in 1878, and became minister of marine and fisheries in October of the latter year. He held this portfolio till May, 1882, when he resigned in consequence of his unpopularity.

POPE, John, senator, b. in Prince William county, Va., in 1770; d. in Springfield, Washington co., Ky., 12 July, 1845. He was brought to Kentucky by his father, and, having lost his arm through an accident, was compelled to abandon farm work, and after studying law was admitted to the bar. He first served in Springfield, and was afterwards a member of the Kentucky legislature. He was for several years a member of the state house of representatives, and in 1801 was a presidential elector on the Jefferson ticket. He was elected to the U. S. senate as a Democrat, and served from 26 Oct., 1807, till 3 March, 1813, acting as president pro tempest in 1811. From 1820 till 1835 he was territorial governor of Arkansas. On his return to Kentucky he practised his profession at Springfield until he was elected to congress, and twice re-elected, serving from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1843. He was an independent candidate for a seat in the succeeding congress, but was defeated.

POPE, John, naval officer, b. in Sandwich, Mass., 17 Dec., 1798; d. in Dorchester, Mass., 14 Jan., 1881. He was commissioned a midshipman, 30 May, 1816, and was promoted lieutenant, 28 April, 1826, commander, 15 Feb., 1843, and captain, 14 Sept., 1855. As lieutenant he served in the frigate "Constitution," of the Mediterranean squadron, and subsequently in the West India and Brazil squadrons. He commanded the brig "Dolphin" on the coast of Africa in 1846–7, and the "Vandalia" in the East Indies in 1853–6. He had charge of the Boston navy yard in 1850, and of the Portsmouth navy yard in 1857–59. In 1861 he commanded the steam-sloop "Richmond," of the Gulf squadron. He was a prize-commissioner in Boston in 1864–5, and light-house inspector in 1866–9. On 21 Dec., 1866, he was placed on the retired list and was promoted commodore, 15 July, 1882. Com. Pope passed twenty-one years at sea, and was for seventeen years and eleven months engaged in shore duty.

POPE, John Henry, Canadian statesman, b. in the Eastern Townships, Quebec, in 1821; d. in Ottawa, Canada, 1 April, 1889. He was educated in Compton, and then engaged in farming. He was elected for Compton in the Canada assembly from 1857 till the union, and was elected in 1867, 1872, 1874, and 1878 for that constituency, by acclamation, to the Dominion parliament. He was re-elected in 1882 and in February, 1887. Mr. Pope became a member of the privy council of Canada, and was minister of agriculture from October, 1871, till November, 1873, when he retired with the government on the Pacific railway question. He was re-appointed minister of agriculture in 1878, and minister of railways and canals in September, 1885. During the summer of 1880 he visited England in company with Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper, and took an active part in the negotiations that resulted in the Pacific railway contract, which was afterward ratified by the Canadian parliament. Mr. Pope was president of the International railway of Maine and of the Compton colonization society.

POPE, John Hunter, physician, b. in Washington, Wilkes co., Ga., 12 Feb., 1845. He received a good medical education in the medical college of the state of Georgia, and entered the practice of medicine in West Virginia and Virginia, and was graduated at the latter institution in 1868. He began to practise at Milford, Eliso co., Tex., in 1869, but in 1870 removed to Marshall, in the same state, where he has since resided. Previous to studying medicine he was a private soldier in the Confederate army from 1861 till 1865. From 1874 till 1878 he was secretary of the Harrison county medical association, and in 1878–80 he was president of the Texas state medical association. In 1877 he was appointed a member of the State board of medical examiners for the 2d judicial district. He has published a "History of Epidemic of Yellow Fever at Marshall, Texas" (1874); "Report on Climatology and Sanitary Conditions of the Territories of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho," (1876); and subsequently he was chosen delegate to the 14th congress, taking his seat, 2 Dec., 1876. He was re-elected, and served until 4 Dec., 1882. He was a member of the house of representatives, and, in the same year, was appointed U. S. judge for the district of Illinois, which office he held until his death. He died on the 20th June, 1882, at the town of Ohio, in Clay county, where he was born, and thence for many years the southern boundary of Illinois was moved from the southern extremity of Lake Michigan to 42° 30', thus adding the territory now included in the thirteen northern counties, and giving the new state its greatest lake port and the site of its most populous city. Pope county was named after him,—his son, John, soldier, b. in Louisville, Ky., 16 March, 1822; d. in Sandusky, Ohio, 23 Sept., 1892. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, and entered the engineers. He served in Florida, and assisted in the survey of the northeast boundary-line between the United States and the British provinces. He was made 2d lieutenant, 9 May, 1846, and took part in the Mexican war, being brevetted 1st lieutenant for gallantry at Monterey, and captain for his services in the battle of Buena Vista. In 1849 he conducted the Minnesota exploring expedition, which demonstrated the practicability of the navigation of the Red river of the north by steamers, and in 1851–3 he was engaged in topographical engineering service in the Mexican war. While on this service he was six months in charge of the survey of the route for the Pacific railroad, near the 32d parallel, and in making experiments to procure water on the Llano Estacado, or "Staked Plain," stretching between Texas and New Mexico, by means of artesian wells. On 1 July, 1856, he was commissioned captain for four-been years' continuous service. In the political campaign of 1860, Capt. Pope sympathized with the Republicans, and in an address on the subject of "Fortifications," read before a literary society at Cincinnati, he criticized the policy of President Buchanan in unparliamentary terms. For this he was court-martialed, but, upon the recommendation of Postmaster-General Edgar D. mothers, further proceedings were dropped. He was still a captain of engineers when Sumter was fired upon, and he was one of the officers detailed by the war department to escort Abraham Lincoln to Washington. He was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 17 May, 1861, and placed in command first of the district of northern, and afterward of southwestern, Missouri. Gen. Pope's operations in that state in protecting railway communication and driving out guerrillas were highly successful. His most important engagement was that of the Blackwater, 18 Dec., 1861, where he captured 1,300 prisoners, 1,000 stand of arms, 1,000 horses, 65 wagons, two tons of gunpowder, and a large quantity of tents, baggage, and supplies. This victory forced Gen. Sterling Price to retreat below the Osage river, which he never again crossed. He was next intrusted by Gen. Henry W. Halleck with the command of the land forces that co-operated with Admiral Andrew H. Foote's flotilla in the expedition against New Madrid and Island No. 10. He succeeded in occupying the former place, 14 March, 1862, while the latter surrendered on the 8th of the following month, when 6,500 prisoners, 125 cannon, and 7,000 small arms, fell into his hands. He was rewarded for the capture of New Madrid by a commission as major-general of volunteers. As commander of the army of the Mississippi, he advanced from Pittsburg landing upon Corinth, the operations against that place occupying the period from 22 April till 30 May. From its occupation he pursued the enemy to Bolivar, Leesburg, Miss. At the end of June he was summoned to Washington, and assigned to the command of the Army of Virginia, comprised of Fremont's (afterward Sigel's), Banks's, and McDowell's corps. On 14 July he was commissioned brigadier-general in the regular army. On 9 Aug., a division of his army, under Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks, with a severe engagement with the Confederates, commanded by Gen. Thomas J. Jackson, at Cedar mountain. For the next fifteen days Gen. Pope, who had been reinforced by a portion of the Army of the Potomac, fought continuously a greatly superior force of the enemy under Gen. Robert E. Lee, on the line of the Rappahannock, at Bristow station, at Manassas, and at Gainesville, in the town, near Chantilly. Gen. Pope then withdrew his force behind Difficult creek, between Flint hill and the Warrenton turnpike, whence he fell back within the fortifications of Washington, and on 3 Sept. was, at his own request, relieved of the command of the Army of Virginia, and was assigned to that of the Department of the Northwest, where in a short time he completely checked the outrages of the Minnesota Indians. He retained this command until 30 Jan., 1865, when he was given charge of the military division of the Missouri, which, in June following, was made the Department of the Missouri, including all the northwestern states and territories. From this he was relieved 6 Jan., 1866. He afterward had command successively of the 5th military district, comprising Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, under the first Reconstruction act; and the Department of the Columbia, comprising Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and the Pi- oin, headquarters at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, 1867-69; and the Military Department of the Pacific from 1884 until he was retired, 18 March, 1886. In Washington, in December, 1882, he testified before a court-martial, called for the trial of Gen. Fitz-John Porter (q. v.), who had been accused by him of misconduct before the enemy at the second battle of Manassas or Bull Run. Gen. Pope was brevetted major-general, 13 March, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious services" in the capture of Island No. 10, and advanced to the full rank, 26 Oct., 1882. The fullest account of his northern Virginia campaign is to be found in the report of the congressional committee on the conduct of the war (Supplement, part xi., 1865). Gen. Pope is the author of "Experiences of a volunteer as a member of the River Rappahannock, in "Pacific Railroad Reports," vol. iii., and the "Campaign of Virginia, of July and August, 1862" (Washington, 1865).

POPE, Richard, Canadian author, b. in Toronto, 13 Oct., 1827. He was called to the bar of Lower Canada in 1853, and was assistant editor of the "Lower Canada Law Reports" in 1855-60. After serving as commissioner for the Champlain gold mining association from 1866 to 1871 he was clerk in the department of public works, and private secretary to the minister from 1872 till 1875, when he was appointed clerk of the crown in chancery. He was major in the Canadian militia, and organized the Quebec volunteer rifle association. Mr. Pope won the first prize medal of the Literary and historical society of Quebec for the best "Essay on Canada" (1854), and is also the author of "Canadian Minerals and Mining Interest" (1857); "Gold Fields of Canada" (1858); and "Notes on Emigration and Mining and Agricultural Labor in Canada" (1859).

POPHAM, George, colonist, b. in Somersetshire, England, about 1550; d. in Maine, 3 Feb., 1607. He and his two children Ferdinand Gorges (q. v.) as one of the proprietors of an extensive territory in what is now the state of Maine, and sailed from Plymouth, 31 May, 1607, with two ships and one hundred men. Popham was in command of one ship, and Raleigh Gilbert, a nephew of Sir Walter Raleigh, of the other. On 15 Aug., 1607, they landed at the mouth of the Sagadahoc or Kennebec river, and the patent laws, the company proceeded to build a storehouse, with a fort, which they called Fort George. This was the first English settlement in New England. The ships sailed on the home voyage on 5 Dec., leaving a colony of forty-five persons, Popham being president and Gilbert admiral. After Popham's death the colonists, having overcome disease, river, and from New Hampshire, and from his brother, Sir John, b. in Somersetshire in 1551; d. 10 June, 1607, became lord chief justice about 1592, and was active in colonization schemes.—Sir Francis, supposed to be a son of Sir John, and named as a patentee of New England, was a member of parliament in 1620.

descent, came to this country from Ireland, and his father, John, was a lieutenant-colonel in the Revolutionary army. He was graduated in 1792, with the first honors, at Harvard, where he was tutor in Greek in 1795–8, after teaching in Woburn and Cambridge. He had also studied theology, was licensed to preach in 1798, and on 16 July, 1799, was ordained pastor of the Federal street church in Boston, where he remained till 1802. He was pastor at Newbury in 1804–13, then professor of Greek at Harvard on the resignation of Professor Eliphalet North, and editor of Greek literature, to succeed Edward Everett, till 1823. From the latter date till his death he lived in retirement in Cambridge. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1815, and he was a member of the American academy of arts and sciences. Dr. Popkin left the Unitarian faith for the orthodox Congregational, and finally became an Episcopalian. He was a professor of Greek scholar. He edited the fourth American edition of Andrew Dalzel's "Collectanea Graeca Majora" (2 vols., Cambridge, 1824), and was the author of several-occasional sermons, a Greek grammar (1828), and "Three Lectures on Liberal Education" (1836). These last, with selections from other lectures, extracts from his sermons, and a translation of a treatise by Cornelius C. Felton, appeared after his death (1872).

PORCALLO DE FIGUEROA, Vasco (por-cal-vo), Spanish soldier, b. in Caracas, Spain, in 1491; d. in Puerto Principe, Cuba, in 1559. He went to Cuba when very young and served under Diego Velazquez, the conqueror and first governor of the island. He was the founder of the city of Santa Clara, and appointed colonel of the garrison of Puerto Principe and Puerto Velazquez. Governor Velazquez selected him to command the expedition that he intended to send against Cortez, but Porcallo declined. In 1539 he accompanied Fernando de Soto in his expedition to Florida, but he soon returned to Cuba, and afterward resided in Puerto Principe.

PORCHER, Francis Peyre, physician, b. in St. John's, Berkeley, S. C., 14 Dec., 1853; d. in Charleston, S. C., 19 Nov., 1895. He was graduated at the Medical college of the state of South Carolina in 1874, where he occupied the chair of materia medica and therapeutics. On graduating he settled in Charleston, where he had since continued in the active practice of his profession, also holding the appointments of surgeon and physician to the medical department of the University of South Carolina, and surgeon in chief of Confederate hospitals at Norfolk and Petersburg, Va. Dr. Porcher was president of the South Carolina medical association in 1872, and, besides holding memberships in other societies, was an associate fellow of the Philadelphia college of physicians. He was one of the editors of the "Charleston Medical Journal and Review," having charge of the publication of five volumes of the first series (1850–5), and more recently of four volumes of the second series (1873–6). Dr. Porcher was an enthusiastic botanist and had devoted considerable attention to that subject. Besides numerous fugitive contributions to the medical journals, and articles in medical works, he had published: A Medical-Botanical Catalogue of the Plants and Ferns of St. John's, Berkeley, South Carolina "(Charleston, 1847); "A Sketch of the Medical Botany of South Carolina" (Philadelphia, 1849); "The Medicinal, Poisonous, and Dietetic Properties of the Cryptogamic Plants of the United States" (New York, 1854); "Illusions of Disease with the Microscope, and Chemical Intemperance of the Microscope and by Chemical Reagents" (Charleston, 1861); and "Resources of the Southern Fields and Forests, Medical, Economical, and Agricultural," published by order of the surgeon-general of the Confederate states (Richmond, 1863) and revised (Charleston, 1869).

POIRET DE BLOSEVILLE, Jules Alphonse René (po-ray), Baron, French navigator, b. in Rouen, 29 July, 1802; d. in the Arctic ocean about February, 1834. He entered the navy as a volunteer in 1818, served in the West Indies and South America, and in 1833 was appointed commander of the brig La Lioissie and sent to the Arctic ocean. Sailing from Brest in May, 1833, he visited Iceland and Greenland, where he made astronomical observations, and prepared a valuable chart of the western coast of the latter country. He had reached latitude 83° N. when he was imprisoned by the ice-fields, and sent news to France by a whaler. This was the last that was heard of him, and several French and English expeditions failed to find traces of him. The expedition of "La Recherche et l'Aventure" ascended through Esquimaux that Portet advanced farther than latitude 83° N., and it is supposed that his death was similar to that of Sir John Franklin. His works include "Histoire des découvertes faites à diverses croques par les navigateurs" (Paris, 1826), and "Histoire des explorations des Grands Lacs du Nord" (Paris, 1834). See Bauche, Bénigne Ernest, b. in Rouen, 19 Jan., 1799; d. in 1882; was the author or translator of several American novels, including "John Tanner, on 30 années dans les déserts de l'Amérique du Nord" (Paris, 1839).

POIRRAS, Martin de, clergyman, b. in Lima in 1767; d. there in 1839. He was an illegitimate son, his father being an Indian and his mother a negress. His youth was neglected, but he gave evidence of so many virtues that his father determined to recognize him. He was then educated, and, as his tastes lay in the direction of surgery, was enabled to study that profession. He was noted for his care of the poor, whom he attended without fee; but the respect that this gained him in Lima alarmed his humility, and he determined to retire from the world. He joined the Dominicans in 1812, taking the lowest rank in the order—that of oblate brother. He was charged with the care of the sick after his reception, and when a plague broke out in Lima he was constant in his attendance on its victims. The ravages of this epidemic in one of the worst at any period of his superior's episcopate. Some of the cures he performed were considered miraculous, and he was summoned back to Lima. The rest of his life was spent in caring for the sick. It was believed in Peru that he had restored many to life by supernatural agencies. After his death, the chapter, university, and religious communities of Lima demanded that he should be honored on the altars of the church, and, after an examination that lasted during the reign of Clement X., he was beatified under Gregory XVI.

POIRRO, Francis, clergyman, d. about 1802. He was a member of the order of Francisians, and belonged to the convent of the Holy Apostles in Rome. Bishop Portier, when he was at Rome in 1829, saw a portrait of him, and said he had a handsome face. It was supposed that he was consecrated in 1802, and died on the eve of his departure for Louisiana. It is now believed that he was never consecrated, as it was known at Rome that the Spanish government was not likely to retain possession of Louisiana, in which case it was doubtful whether the diocese could exist. See Archbishop Spalding's "Life of Bishop Flaget."

PORTALES, Diego José Victor (por-ta-lez), Chilian soldier, b. in Santiago in June, 1788; d. in Valparaiso, June 18, 1857. He acquired his education in the College of San Carlos, and in 1817 obtained the place of assayer of the mint, but went to Peru in 1825 and entered commerce. He returned to Chile in 1824, and being convinced on account of heavy losses in a contract with the Chilian government, from whom he had obtained the monopoly of tobacco, joined the opposition, attacking the government in the paper "El Hambriento" in 1827. In April, 1830, he was appointed by the general junta minister of the interior, foreign affairs, war, and the navy; but, on account of political differences, resigned his charges in 1831, and retired to Valparaiso, where he engaged again in business. On 17 Aug., 1832, he was elected vice-president of the republic, and at the end of the same year he was appointed governor of Valparaiso, where he organized the civic militia. In September, 1835, President Prieto appointed him again minister of war. When in 1836 the Peruvian colonial federation was established, Portales strongly opposed it. Owing to his efforts, in October of that year a Chilian fleet left Valparaiso for Callao under Admiral Blanco Encalada (q. c.), to protest against the confederation, and, not receiving a satisfactory answer, the Chilian government declared war on 11 Nov., 1836. Meanwhile, Portales was organizing an expeditionary force in Quillota, giving the command of the best regiments to Criel, José Antonio Vidarrour, who was his special favorite. Soon afterward a mutiny, led by Vidarrour and other officers, was organized, while Portales was at Valparaiso, and when the latter returned to Quillota and was reviewing his troops, he was made a prisoner by Vidarrour. The mutineers marched on Valparaiso, but they encountered a determined resistance of the civic militia. Portales was left under custody of a lieutenant, who, seeing the defeat of his party, ordered him to be shot. In September, 1861, a statue of Portales was erected in front of the mint in Santiago.

PORTER, Albert Gallatin, statesman, b. in Lawrenceburg, Ind., 20 April, 1824; d. in Indianapolis, 5 May, 1897. He was graduated at Asbury University, was admitted to the bar in 1843, and began to practise in Indianapolis, where he was councilman and corporation attorney. In 1853 he was appointed reporter of the supreme court of Indiana. He was elected to congress as a Republican, holding his seat from 5 Dec., 1859, till 3 March, 1863, and serving on the judiciary committee and on that on manufactures. He was a nominee for presidential elector on the Hayes ticket in 1876. On 5 March, 1878, he was appointed first commissioner of the U. S. treasury, but he resigned to become governor of Indiana, which office he held from 1881 till 1884. He had published "Decisions of the Supreme Court of Indiana" (5 vols., Indianapolis, 1857-76). From 1889 to Sept., 1892, Judge Porter presided at American consular courts in Italy.

PORTER, Alexander, jurist, born in Armagh, County Tyrone, Ireland, in 1796; d. in Attakapas, La., 13 Jan., 1844. His father, an Irish Presbyterian clergyman and chemist, while lecturing in Ireland during the insurrection of 1798, fell under suspicion of being an insurgent spy, and was seized and executed. His son came to this country in 1801 with his uncle, and settled in New York, where, after serving as clerk, he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1807. By the advice of Gen. Andrew Jackson, he removed to St. Marinsville, La., and was elected to the State constitutional convention of 1811. In 1821-33 he was judge of the state supreme court, and rendered service by establishing with others a new system of jurisprudence. He was elected a U. S. senator as a Whig, in place of Joseph S. Johnston, deceased, serving from 6 Jan., 1834, till 5 Jan., 1837, and during his term voted to censure President Jackson for the removal of the deposits from the U. S. bank, and favored John C. Calhoun's motion to reject petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. In March, 1836, he made an elaborate reply to a speech of Thomas H. Benton upon the introduction of his "expunging resolutions." He also opposed Benton's bill for compelling payments for public lands to be made in specie, and advocated the division of surplus revenue among the states, and the recognition of the independence of Texas. He was again elected to the senate in 1843, and served till his death. For many years before his death he resided on his estate, "Oak Lawn," of 5,000 acres, on Bayou Teche, and the large mansion, where Henry Clay was a frequent visitor, is still (1898) standing in the centre of an extensive park.

PORTER, Andrew, soldier, b. in Worcester, Montgomery co., Pa., 24 Sept., 1743; d. in Harrisburg, Pa., 16 Nov., 1813. His father, Robert, emigrated to this country from Londonderry, Ireland, in 1729, settled in Londonderry, N. H., and afterward removed to the county in Montgomery county, Pa. In early years the son manifested a talent for mathematics, and under the direction of Dr. David Rittenhouse opened, in 1767, an English and mathematical school in Philadelphia, in which he taught until 19 June, 1776, when he was appointed by congress a captain of marines and ordered to the frigate "Ellingham." He was soon transferred to the artillery, in which he served with efficiency. He was captain until 13 March, 1782, and then became major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel of the 4th Pennsylvania artillery, which post he held at the disbanding of the army. He participated in the battles of Newton, Princeton, Brandywine, and Germantown, where nearly all his company were killed or taken prisoners, and where he received on the field personal commendation from Gen. Washington for his conduct in the action, and at his request he was sent to Philadelphia to prepare material for the siege of Yorktown. In April, 1783, he was detached with his company to join Gen. John Sullivan's expedition against the Indians, and suggested to Gen. James Clinton the idea of capturing the outlet of Otsego lake, by which means the water was raised sufficiently to convey the troops by boats to Ticonderoga. In 1784 he retired to the cultivation of his farm, and declined the chair of mathematics in the University of Pennsylvania, saying that "as long as he commanded men he would not return to flogging boys." In 1784-7 he was engaged as commissioner to run the boundary-lines of Pennsylvania, and he was also interested in the completion of the western termination of the Mason and Dixon line, although he was not a commisssioner. He was made brigadier-general of Pennsylvania militia in 1801, was subsequently major-general, and in 1809 appointed surveyor-general, and held this post until his death. Owing to the infirmities of age he declined the offices of brigadier-general in the U. S. army and secretary of war in President Monroe's cabinet, which were offered him in 1812-13. —His son, David Rittenhouse, governor of Pennsylvania, b. near Norristown, Montgomery co., Pa., 31 Oct., 1788; d. in Harrisburg, Pa., 6 Aug., 1867, was educated at Norristown academy, and, when his father was appointed governor of Pennsylvania, he followed him to Harrisburg. He studied law, but abandoned it, owing to impaired health, and removed to Huntingdon county, where he engaged in the manufacture of iron, was interested in agriculture, and introduced a fine stock of cattle and horses into the country. He served in the legislature in 1821, was made postmaster in 1823, state senator in 1836, and governor of Pennsylvania in 1838 under the new organization that went into effect in that year, and held this office until 1843. During his term the first great discussion upon the introduction of railroads took place in the state. He was active in suppressing riots in Philadelphia in 1844, and received a resolution of thanks from the city. He was elected Speaker of the Pennsylvania legislature, and erected in Harrisburg the first anthracite furnace in that part of the state. —Another son, George Bryan, governor of Michigan, b. in Norristown, Pa., 9 Feb., 1791; d. in Detroit, Mich., 18 July, 1854, was graduated at the Litchfield law-school, Conn., practised law in Lancaster, Pa., served in the legislature, and was appointed in 1812 governor of Michigan territory. He was killed by an accident while acting as a surveyor, and he held this office until his death. —Another son, James Madison, jurist, b. in Selma, Pa., 6 Jan., 1793; d. in Easton, Pa., 11 Nov., 1862, served as a volunteer in the war of 1812, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1833, and settled in Easton, where he practised with success. He was a member of the Constitutional convention of Pennsylvania in 1838, and took an active part in its proceedings. He was appointed secretary of war in 1843, but was rejected by the senate, and returned to the practice of law in Easton. Mr. Porter was a founder of Lafayette college, Easton, in 1826, president of its board of trustees for twenty-five years, and lectured there on jurisprudence and political economy. He served as president of the judicial council in his county, and as a member of the Pennsylvania constitution convention in 1874. He was a partner in the law firm of Brinton, Rittenhouse, and Williams. —William Augustus, jurist, b. in Huntington county, Pa., 24 May, 1821; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 28 June, 1886, was graduated at Lafayette college in 1849, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1842, and became district attorney of Philadelphia. He was sheriff of that city in 1843, and solicitor in 1856. In 1861 he organized the first volunteer regiment of Pennsylvania, and in 1874 he became a judge of the court of Alabama claims in Washington, D. C. Jefferson college gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1871. He was a contributor to the "American Law Magazine" and "Law Journal," and published an "Essay on the Law pertaining to the Sheriff's Office" in 1849, and the "Life of Chief-Justice John B. Gibson," in 1853. —David Rittenhouse, Horace, soldier b. in Huntington, Pa., 15 April, 1837, was educated in his native state, and afterward entered the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard, and while there was appointed to the U. S. military academy, and graduated in 1860. He was several months instructor of artillery at West Point, and was ordered to duty in the south at the beginning of the civil war. He was chief of artillery, and had charge of the batteries at the capture of Fort Pulaski, and participated in the assault on Seccessonville, where he received a slight wound in the first attempt to take Charleston. He was on the staff of Gen. McClellan in July, 1862, and served with the Army of the Potomac until after the engagement at Antietam. In the beginning of the next year he was chief of ordnance on Gen. Rosencrans's staff, and went through the Chickamauga campaign with the Army of the Cumberland. When Grant had taken command in the east, Porter became aide-de-camp on his staff, and in the rank of colonel, and later as colonel. He accompanied him through the Wilderness campaign and the siege of Richmond and Petersburg, and was present at the surrender at Appomattox. Afterward he made a series of tours of inspection, by Grant's direction, in the south and on the Pacific coast. He was brevetted captain, major, and lieutenant-colonel for gallant and meritorious services at the siege of Fort Pulaski, the Wilderness, and Newmarket Heights respectively, and colonel and brigadier-general, U. S. army, for gallant and meritorious services during the war. He was assistant secretary of war while Grant was secretary at interior, served as secretary to Grant during his first presidential term, and continued to be his intimate friend till the latter's death. He was mustered into the army in 1853, and has since been interested in railroad affairs, acting as manager of the Pullman palace-car company and as president and director of several corporations. He was largely interested in building the West Shore railroad, of which he was the first president. Gen. Porter was a founder and financier of the Atlantic and Great Western telegraph company, and of the ticket-cancelling boxes that are used on the elevated railways in New York city. He has been president of the Union League club and was appointed in 1897 American ambassador to France. Author of "West Point Life" (New York, 1866) and "Campaigning with Grant" (1898) —George Bryan's son, Andrew, soldier, b. in Lancaster, Pa., 10 July, 1820; d. in Paris, France, 3 Jan., 1872, entered the U. S. military academy in 1836, but left in the following year. He was appointed 1st lieutenant of mounted rifles on 27 May, 1846, and served in the Mexican war, becoming captain on 15 May, 1847, and receiving the brevet of major for gallant and meritorious conduct at Contreras and Churubusco, and was made of lieutenant-colonel, for Chickamauga, Sept., 1864. Afterward he served in Texas and in the southwest, and in 1860 was in command of Fort Craig, Va. At the opening of the civil war he was ordered to Washington, and promoted to command the 16th infantry. He had charge of a brigade at Bull Run, and, when Col. Daniel Hunton was killed, was wound and enabled to surrender his command of the 21st division. On 17 May, 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers. Subsequently he was provost-marshal-general for the Army of the Potomac, but after Gen. George B. McClellan's retreat from the Chickamauga to James river he was relieved from duty with this army. In the autumn of 1862 he was ordered to the post of the military governor of Arkansas, but in September he was made commander of the Rewards, and in November of that year he was assigned to command in Pennsylvania, and charged with the duties of provost-marshal-general of Washington, where he was active in restoring order in the city and surrounding district. He was mustered out on 4 April, 1864, and, owing to impaired health, resigned his commission on 20 April, after which he travelled in Europe.
PORTER, Benjamin Curtis, artist, b. in Melrose, Mass., 27 Aug., 1843. He has had no regular art instruction. For some years he gave much attention to figure-painting, accomplishing some notable work in that line, but subsequently he devoted himself entirely to portraiture. In 1867 he first exhibited at the Academy of Design, New York, and he was elected an associate in 1878 and academician in 1880. He has made several trips to Europe, visiting and studying in England, Holland, France, and Italy. Besides his studio in Boston, he has had another for several years in New York during the winter. His works include "Henry V. and the Princess Kate" (1889); "The Mandolin-Player" and "Cupid with Butterflies" (1874); "The Hour-Glass" (1876); "Portrait of Lady, with Dog" in the Corcoran gallery, Washington (1856); "Portrait of Boy with Dog" (1884); and numerous other portraits.

PORTER, Benjamin Faneuil, lawyer, b. in Charleston in 1808; d. in Greenville, Ala., June, 1886, was admitted to the bar of Charleston at an early age, but afterward studied medicine, and practised in Alabama, where he removed in 1830. He returned to the law, was chosen to the legislature in 1832, and became reporter of the state in 1835. In 1840 he was elected to the bench, but doubted the constitutionality of his election and declined the office. He was frequently an orator on public occasions, contributed to several periodicals, translated the "Elements of the Institutes" of Heineccius, and published "Reports of Supreme Court of Alabama" (9 vols., Tuscaloosa, 1835-40); "Office of Executors and Administrators" (1842); and a collection of poems (Charleston).

PORTER, David, clergyman, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 27 May, 1761; d. in Catskill, N. Y., 7 Jan., 1851. He served ten months in the Revolutionary army, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1784, and taught in Portsmouth, N. H., where he studied theology, and was licensed to preach. From 1787 till 1803 he was pastor of a Congregational church in Spencerport, N. Y., and from 1803 till 1831 he had charge of the 1st Presbyterian church in Catskill. N. Y. Williams gave him the degree of D. D. in 1811. Dr. Porter published nine sermons (1801-28), and "A Dissertation on Christian Baptism" (1800).

PORTER, David, naval officer, b. in Boston, Mass., 1 Feb., 1780; d. in Peru, near Constantinople, Turkey, 3 March, 1843. Five generations of this family have served in the navy. His grandfather, Alexander, commanded a Boston merchant-ship, giving his aid to the colonies, and his father, Capt. David, with his brother Samuel, commanded vessels commission-ed by Gen. Washington in the Continental navy for the capture of ships carrying stores to the British army, which was a perilous service, the patriots often fighting their way to escape from the foe. In 1778 Capt. David Porter commanded the schoop "Delight," of 6 guns, fitted out in Maryland, and was active against the enemy, and in 1780 commanded the "Aurora," of 10 guns, equipped in Massachusetts, but was captured by the British and confined in the "Jersey" prison-ship, where he suffered many hardships. Escaping, he fought throughout the British rebellion, in which he resided in Boston until he was appointed by Gen. Washington a sailing-master in the navy, having charge of the signal-station on Federal Hill, Baltimore, Md. Of his two sons, John, entered the naval service in 1806, and died in 1831, having attained the rank of commander. His other son, David, made voyages to the West Indies, and was twice impressed by British ships-of-war, but escaped and worked his passage home. On 16 April, 1799, he was appointed midshipman in the U. S. frigate " Constellation," and participated in her action with the French frigate "Insurgente," on 9 Feb., 1799, receiving a prize for his service. He became lieutenant on 8 Oct., 1799, and served on the West India station. In January, 1800, his schooner, the "Experiment," while bound off the coast of Santo Domingo, with several merchant-men under her protection, was attacked by ten pec-aron barges, but after a conflict of seven hours, in which Lieut. Porter was wounded, they withdrew. Subsequently this vessel had several success-ful affairs with privateers and captured the French schooner "Pum," of 14 guns and 60 men. On 17 May, 1800, Porter was ordered to proceed to Tripoli, in a small privateer of 12 guns, to which Porter was attached, fell in, off Malta, with a Tripolitan cruiser of 14 guns, which surrendered after an engagement of three hours. While attached to the frigate "New York," he commanded a boat expedition which destroyed several feluccas in the harbor of Tripoli, and was again wounded. In October, 1803, he was captured in the frigate "Philadelphia," and was imprisoned in Tripoli until peace was proclaimed. On 29 April, 1806, he became master-commandant, and he was made captain on 2 July, 1812. At the beginning of the war of 1812 he sailed from New York in command of the frigate "Essex," of 32 guns, carrying a flag with the words "Free-Trade and Sailors' Rights," and in a short cruise captured the British frigate "Roebuck," of 20 guns, and a transport that was bearing troops to Halifax. On 13 Aug., 1812, he was attacked by the British armed ship "Alert," which, after an action of eight minutes, surrendered in a sinking condition. This was the first British war-vessel that was captured in the conflict. On 1 Dec., he also took, near the equator, the British government packet "Nocton," with $300,000 in specie on board. He cruised in the South Atlantic and upon the coast of Brazil until January, 1813, when he determined to destroy the English whale-fishery in the Pacific, and sailed for Valparaiso, where he learned that Chili had become an independent state, and that the viceroy of Peru had sent out cruisers against those of the Americans. After refitting he went to sea, and on 25 March captured the Peruvian privateer "Nere- da," of 19 guns, which had taken two American whaleships and had their crews on board as prisoners. The latter were transferred to the "Essex," and the armament and ammunition of the "Neredy" were thrown overboard, when she was released. One of her prizes was recaptured shortly afterward and restored to her commander. After this Capt. Porter cruised about the Revillagigedo, capturing a large number of British whaling-ships. The British loss was about $2,500,000, with 400 prisoners, and for the time the British whale-fisheries in the Pacific were destroyed. The captured "Georgiana" was converted into a vessel of war.
called the "Essex Jr." and cruised with the "Essex" under the command of Lieut. John Downes. Having heard that the British government had sent out vessels under Capt. James Hillyar, with orders to take the "Essex," Capt. Porter sailed to the Marquesas islands, and on his way captured two English vessels. He anchored in the Bay of Nukahivah, where the "Essex" was the first to carry the American flag, and named it Massachusetts bay. He assisted in subduing the hostile natives, and on 19 Nov., 1813, took possession of the island in the name of the United States. On 3 Feb., 1814, the "Essex" and the "Essex Jr." arrived at Tripoli, and there Capt. Porter, with his personal friend, Capt. Porter, and his consort the "Cherub," also arrived and anchored near the "Essex," and, after obtaining supplies, cruised off Valparaiso for six weeks. Porter determined to escape and made sail for the open sea; but a heavy squall disabled the "Essex," which was forced to return to harbor. The enemy, disregarding the neutrality of the harbor, followed, took position under her stern, and opened fire on 28 March, 1814. The "Essex" was of 960 tons, mounting 52 guns, with a crew of 235, while the "Phrae" was of 960 tons, mounting 53 guns, and had a crew of 320, and her consort the "Cherub," which attacked the "Essex" on her starboard bow, carried 28 guns. 1814, twenty-two days after her departure, on the quarter-deck and forecastle, and a crew of 180. Both ships had picked crews and were sent to the Pacific to destroy the "Essex." Their flags bore the motto "God and country. British sailors best rights: traitors offend both." In reply Capt. Porter wrote at his mess, "God, our country, and liberty: tyrants offend; every American officer is our advocate, her armament being too light to be of service. The engagement, which was one of the most desperate and remarkable in naval history, lasted two hours and thirty minutes, and, except the few minutes they were repairing damages, the firing was incessant. The "Essex" ran out three long guns at the stern ports, which in half an hour were blown off her armament, and required repair. The "Phrae" was armed with guns of long range, while those of the "Essex" were mostly carronades. Capt. Hillyar therefore drew off at a distance where he was beyond the fire of the "Essex," and then kept his guns steadily at work till the "Essex" became a helpless wreck and surrendered, having suffered a heavy loss of men. Capt. Porter and Lieut. Stephen Decatur MacKnight were the only commissioned officers that remained unhurt. The latter, who was exchanged with others for a part of the "Sir Andrew Hammond's" crew, sailed in a Swedish brig, bound for England, and was lost at sea. Porter wrote to the secretary of the navy: "We have been unfortunate, but not disgraced. For the "Essex," which arrived a few days after Capt. Porter's capture, and of which it is said that our officers and men were cruelly treated while cruising in search of the "Essex," to possess which cost the British government nearly $3,000,000. The "Essex Jr." brought the survivors to the United States. At Sandy Hook they fell in with the British ship-of-war "The Saturn," under Capt. Nash, who at first treated the crew with civility, but afterward extended their parley and detained the "Essex Jr.," declaring Capt. Porter a prisoner and no longer under parole to Capt. Hillyar. Early on the following day Capt. Porter escaped, leaving a message that "most British officers were not only destitute of honor, but regardless of the honor of each other; that he was armed, and prepared to defend himself against his boats, if sent in pursuit of him; and that he must be met, if met at all, by an enemy." With much difficulty he reached Babylon, L. I., and on arriving in New York was received with distinction, and was given the thanks of congress and of several state legislatures. The "Essex Jr." was condemned and sold on her arrival in New York. From April, 1815, till December, 1823, Capt. Porter was a member of the board of many commissioners, which post he resigned to command the expedition called the Mosquito fleet that was fitted out against pirates in the West Indies. A depot was established at Thompson island, near Key West, and a system of cruising was arranged. In October, 1814, upon evidence that valuable goods had been stored by pirates at Foxarlo, Porto Rico, Capt. Porter despatched the "Bengal" to investigate the matter; but the commanding officer, on landing, was arrested and thrown into prison on the charge of being a pirate. Com. Porter then sailed for the island, landed a force of 200 men, and demanded an apology, which was promptly given. The government, deeming that he had exceeded his powers, brought him before a court-martial, and he was sentenced to suspension for six months. He resigned his commission on 18 Aug., 1826, and entered the service of Mexico as commander-in-chief of the naval forces of that country. He remained in this service until 1829, when he returned to the United States. He had been given honorary by the Mexican officials. He was afterward appointed consul-general to the Barbary states, from which post he was transferred to Constantinople as charge d'affaires, and was made minister resident there in 1831, which office he held until his death. He was buried in the grounds of the naval asylum in Philadelphia. It is a singular fact that the two vessels "Essex" and "Essex Jr." fought their first battles under his command his son, David D., and David G. Farragut (q. v.), the latter of whom he adopted in 1806. Com. Porter was the author of "Journal of a Cruise made to the Pacific Ocean in the U. S. Frigate "Essex" in 1812-'13-'14," illustrated with his own drawings (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1815; 2d ed., New York, 1829). Porter, John, American long resident (2 vols., 1835). See "Trial of Commodore David Porter before a Court-Martial" (Washington, 1825). His life was written by his son (Albany, 1856).—His son, William David, b. in New Orleans, La., 10 March, 1809; d. in New York city, 1 May, 1864, was educated in Philadelphia, and appointed to the U. S. Navy at Massachusetts as midshipman on 1 Jan., 1825. He became lieutenant on 31 Dec., 1828, served on the "Franklin," "Brendywinc," "Natchez," "Experiment," "United States," and "Mississippi," and in 1843 was assigned to the home squadron. He commanded the store-ship "Eric" in 1849, and, in 1851, the "Waterwitch." On 13 Sept., 1853, he was placed on the retired list, and was appointed as naval reserve duty as commander on 14 Sept., 1853. At the beginning of the civil war he was serving on the U. S. sloop "St. Mary's," in the Pacific. He was ordered to the Mississippi to assist in fitting out the gun-boat "Flotilla" with which he accompanied Com. Andrew H. Foote up Tennessee river, and commanded the "Essex," which he had named for his father's ship, in the attack on Fort Henry, 6 Feb., 1862, during which engagement he was wounded and temporarily blinded by steam from a boiler that had been pierced by shot. He also commanded the "Essex" in the battle of Fort Donelson, 14 Feb., 1862, and fought in the same vessel past the batteries on the Mississippi to join the fleet at Vicksburg. He attacked the Confederate man
from congress, which was the fourth that he received during the war, including the general one for the capture of New Orleans. He was promoted vice-admiral on 23 July, 1866, and served as supertendent of the U. S. naval academy till 1869, when he was detailed for duty in the navy department in Washington. On 15 Aug., 1850, he was appointed admiral, which rank he held for two decades. He was the author of a "Life of Commodore David Porter" (Albany, 1875), a romance entitled "Allan Barre and Robert le Diablo" (New York, 1885), which has been dramatized, and was produced in New York in 1887; "Incidents and Anecdotes of Robert F. Stockton" (1885); "Mary Mag-line" (1886); and "History of the Navy in the War of the Rebellion" (New York, 1887).—Another son, Theodore Henry, soldier, b. in Washington, D. C., 10 Aug., 1817; d. in Texas, 19 April, 1846, was apnointed a cadet at West Point, resigning after two years. He was appointed by President Jackson 3d lieutenant in the 4th infantry, served under Gen.
Zachary Taylor at the beginning of the war with Mexico, and was the first American officer killed in the conflict, having been sent with twelve men on a scouting expedition near Fort Brown on the Rio Grande, where he was surrounded by a large force of Mexican cavalry. The commanding officer called upon Lieut. Porter to surrender, which he refused, and was wounded by a piece of shot. Another son, Henry Winslow, naval officer, b. in Washington, D. C., in 1823; d. in Baltimore, Md., in 1872, was appointed midshipman in 1840, resigning in 1847. He served in one of Walker's expeditions to Central America, where he fought bravely, and was wounded several times. Afterward he was appointed lieutenant in the U. S. revenue marine, and was detailed for service in the commerce of the navy, 24 April, 1862, serving as executive officer on the "Hatteras" when that vessel was sunk by the Confederate steamer "Alabama." He died from the effect of his wounds.—Com. David's nephew, David H., naval officer, b. in New Castle, Del., in 1804; d. near Havana, Cuba, in March, 1828, entered the U. S. navy as midshipman on 4 Aug., 1814, became lieutenant of the ship "Texas," 26 June, 1826, and 1826. He joined his uncle while commander-in-chief of the Mexican navy, and in 1827 sailed in command of the brig "Guerrero," built by Henry Eckford, of New York, taking this vessel to Vera Cruz. He fell in with a fleet of 50 merchant vessels, fifteen miles below Havana, sailing under convoy of two Spanish war-vessels, carrying together 29 guns. Driving them into the port of Little Mabili, after a conflict of two hours he silenced the fire of the two brigs, cutting them severely, and sunk a number of the convoy. A twenty-fourpound shot from a battery on shore cut the cable of the "Guerrero," and the vessel drifted on shore, and went afterward to sea to repair damages. In the mean time they attached a boarding party of 64 men, and after a very severe engagement, last-two hours and a quarter, in which Capt.
Porter was killed, eighty of his officers and men being either killed or wounded, the masts and sails of the "Guerrero" all shot away and the hull riddled, the "Guerrero" was surrendered and taken into Havana.—David Dixon's cousin, Fitz-John soldier, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 13 June, 1829, is the son of Commander John Porter, of the U. S. navy. He studied at Phillips Exeter academy, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1845, and assigned to the 4th artillery, in which he became 2d lieutenant, 18 June, 1846. He served in the Mexican war, was commissioned 1st lieutenant on 29 May,
and received the brevet of captain on 8 Sept., 1847, succeeding eighteen years, as well as memorials from various legislatures, and on 28 Dec., 1882, a bill for his relief was presented in the senate, under the action of an advisory board appointed by President Hayes, consisting of Gen. John M. Schofield, Gen. Alfred H. Terry, and Gen. George W. Getty. On March 4, 1882, the president remitted so much of the sentence of the court-martial as forever disqualified him from office or trust or profit under the government; but the bill for his relief failed in its passage. A technical objection caused President Arthur to veto a similar bill that was passed by the 48th congress, but another was passed subsequently which was signed by President Cleveland, and he was restored to the U. S. army as colonel on 5 Aug., 1886. Gen. Grant, after his term of service as president had ended, though he had refused many petitions to open the case, studied it more thoroughly, and published his conclusions in December, 1882, in an article entitled "An Undeserved Stigma," in which he said that he was convinced of Gen. Porter's innocence. After leaving the army, Gen. Porter engaged in business in New York city, was subsequently supplanted in the New Jerusalem church by the insane, and in February, 1875, was made commissioner of public works. He was police commissioner in 1884-8, and then became commissioner of the fire department. In 1869 the khedive of Egypt offered him the post of commander of his army, with the rank of major-general, which he declined.

PORTER, Eliphalet, clergyman, b. in North Bridgewater, Mass., 11 June, 1782; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 7 Dec., 1863. His father, John (1715-1802), was graduated at Harvard in 1738, was pastor of the 1st Congregational church of North Bridgewater from 1740 till his death, and published several controversial pamphlets in defence of Calvinism. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1777, studied theology with his father, and was ordained over the Congregational society of Roxbury on 2 Oct., 1782, where he continued until his death. In 1839 Rev. George Putnam was associated with him in his pastorate. He was a member of the Academy of arts and sciences, an overseer of Harvard and a member of its corporation, an original trustee of the Massachusetts Bible society, and a founder of the State temperance society. Harvard gave him the degree of LL.D., in 1838, for three sermons, and a "Eulogy on Washington." (1800).

PORTER, George W., soldier, b. about 1796; d. in Memphis, Tenn., 7 Nov., 1856. He was a lieutenant in the 38th U. S. infantry from May, 1814, till June, 1815, and made many valuable inventions, including the Porter rifle.

PORTER, James, clergyman, b. in Middlebrough, Mass., 23 March, 1808; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 16 April, 1888. At the age of sixteen he entered a cotton-factory in his native town with the intention of learning the business of a manufacturer, but three years later he determined to study for the ministry. He attended the Kent’s Hill seminary at Bedfield, Me., and at the age of twenty-two was admitted a member of the New England conference of the Methodist Episcopal church. During the early period of his ministry Dr. Porter held many pastorates in and near Boston. For several years he was a presiding elder of the conference, and from 1844 till 1852 he was a delegate to the general conference. From 1852 till 1855 he was a member of the board of overseers of Harvard, being the first Methodist clergyman ever elected to that office. He was also a trustee of Wesleyan university, which conferred upon him the degree of A. M. In 1856 he was elected one of the book agents in New York city, having in charge the Methodist book concern, which office he held for twelve years. From 1868 till 1882 he was secretary of the National temperance society, and he was also one of the earlier members of the New England anti-slavery society. He was closely connected with the abolition movement, and was at one time in danger from the mob while delivering a speech on the subject. After the close of the war he was a professor of history and literature in the University at Nashville, Tenn., and a board of trustees elected him professor of history and political science in New Hope College in 1870, but in 1871 he was appointed professor of chemistry at the New Hope theological seminary. In 1873 he was appointed professor of agricultural chemistry and horticulture at the State Agricultural College, at Brunswick, Ga., and in 1874 he was elected president of the college, which office he held until his death, 1889.
rious papers to the "American Journal of Science." He also established the "Connecticut War Record," a monthly periodical, devoted to the publication of news from the Connecticut regiments at the front during the civil war. Prof. Porter published "Principles of Chemistry" (New York, 1856); "First Book of Chemistry and Allied Sciences" (1857); and "Selections from the Kalevala, the Great Finnish Epic" (1868). In 1871 the Scroll and Key society of Yale, of which he was a founder in 1842, established in his memory the John A. Porter university prize of $500, which is awarded annually for the best essay on a given subject, and is the only prize open to all the members of Yale university.

Peter Buel's grandson, Peter Augustus, soldier, b. in Black Rock, 14 July, 1827, killed in the battle of Cold Harbor, Va., 3 June, 1864, was graduated at Harvard in 1845, and subsequently studied in the universities of Heidelberg and Berlin. He was a member of the New York legislature in 1862, and in that year he raised a regiment, afterward consolidated with the 8th New York artillery, was placed in command, and served on garrison duty. When he was offered the nomination for secretary of state of New York on the Republican ticket in 1868, he declined to lead the army. He was ordered to the field in May, 1864, participated in the sack of Petersburg, and was wound at the battle of Cold Harbor.

Peter Buel's nephew, Augustus Seymour, senator, b. in Canandaigua, N. Y., 18 Jan., 1798; d. in Niagara Falls, N. Y., 18 Sept., 1872, was graduated at Union college in 1818, studied law in Canandaigua, and settled in Black Rock, N. Y., and afterward in Detroit, Mich., where he was appointed a Justice of the peace while storming a breastwork at Cold Harbor.

PORTER, Lydia Ann Emerson, author, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 14 Oct., 1816. She is a second cousin of Ralph W. Emerson, and was eloped at 17 years of age to Massachusetts, where she afterward taught in Royatow, Va., and in 1834 established a school in Springfield, Va. In 1836 she became principal of Putnam female seminary, in Zanesville, Ohio, and she subsequently took charge of the female department of Delaware academy, Newark, Ohio. In 1841 she married Charles E. Porter, of Springfield, Va., and she has subsequently conducted a school in that town. Mrs. Porter is the author of "Uncle Jerry's Letters to Young Mothers" (Boston, 1854) and "The Lost Will" (1860), and several Sunday-school books.

PORTER, Moses, soldier, b. in Danvers, Mass., in 1595; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 14 April, 1822. He entered the Revolutionary army as a lieutenant in Capt. Samuel T. Taege's regiment. He was graduated at Harvard, served at Boston, Charlestown, and through the war, and was one of the few old officers that were selected for the peace establishment in 1594. He became lieutenant of artillery, 29 Sept., 1789, and captain in November, 1791, and served under Gen. Anthony Wayne in the expedition against the northwestern Indians in 1794. He was appointed major of the artillery on 26 May, 1800, colonel of light artillery 12 March, 1812, accompanied Gen. James Wilkinson's army to Canada, commanded the artillery, and served with credit at the capture of Fort George, 27 May, 1813. He was brevetted brigadier-general on 10 Sept., 1813, and ordered to the defence of Norfolk, Va., in 1814. He became colonel of the 1st artillery in June, 1821.

PORTER, Noah, clergyman, b. in Farmington, Conn., in December, 1781; d. there, 24 Sept., 1866. His ancestors, Robert and Hannah Porter, settled in Farmington in 1630. He was graduated at Yale with the highest honor in 1803, and was ordained pastor of the Congregational church in his native town, which charge he held until his death. For many years he was a member of the corporation of Yale. Dartmouth gave him the degree of S. T. D., in 1828. He published occasional sermons in the "National Preacher," "The Century Delineator," in the fiftieth year of his ministry, and contributed to the "Christian Spectator." His "Memoir" was written by his son, Noah.—His son, Samuel, educator of the deaf and dumb, b. in Farmington, Conn., 12 Jan., 1810, was graduated at Yale in 1830. He was instructor of the deaf and dumb in the Hartford institution from 1832 till 1836, and again from 1846 till 1860, also holding the same office in the New York institution in 1843-46. From 1866 till 1884 he was professor of mental science and English philology in the National deaf-mute college in Washington, D. C., and is now (1898) professor emeritus. He has made a special study of phonetics, and is the editor of North's "American Annals of the Deaf and Dumb" from 1854 till 1886, and has published "The Vocal Elements in Speech, a Phono logical and Philosophical Essay" (New York, 1867), and numerous articles, including "Is Thought possible without Language," in the "Princeton Review" (1881).—Another son, Noah, educator, b. in Farmington, Conn., 13 Dec., 1811; d. in New Haven, Conn., 4 March, 1892, was graduated at Yale in 1831, became master of Hopkins grammar-school in New Haven, and was tutor at Yale in 1833-5, during which time he studied theology. He was pastor of Congregational churches in New Milford, Conn., from 1836 till 1843, and in Springfield, Mass., from 1843 till 1846. Mr. Porter was then appointed professor of moral philosophy and metaphysics at Yale, in which chair he continued. In 1851 he succeeded Theodore D. Woolsey as president of Yale, which post he held till his resignation in 1886. During President Porter's administration the progress of the college was marked. Some of its finest buildings were erected in this period, including the Peabody museum, the new theological halls, the Silliman physical laboratory, the Battell chapel, and one of the largest dormitories. The curriculum was also considerably enlarged, especially by the introduction of new elective studies, although Dr. Porter was an earnest champion of a required course, as opposed to the elective system as it has been recently elaborated at Harvard. He always maintained the claims of the classics to a chief place in a liberal course of education. As an instructor, and in his personal relations with the students, he was one of the most popular presidents of Yale. He was probably the last to hold the presidency and a professor's chair at the same time, as his successor, Timothy Dwight, expressly stipulated on accepting the office that the duties of a teacher should not attach to it. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of the city of New York in 1858, from Yale in 1859, and from the University of Edinburgh in 1866, and also from Western Reserve college, Ohio, in 1870, and from Trinity in 1871. He is the author of an "Historical Discourse at Farmington, Nov. 4, 1830," commemorating the 200th anniversary of its settlement (Hartford, 1841); "The Educational Systems of the Puritans and Jesuits Compared," a prize essay (New York, 1851); "The American Ian System," a treatise on metaphysics at Yale and elsewhere (1866; many new editions); "Books and Reading" (1875); "American Colleges and the American Public" (New Haven, 1851); "Sciences of Nature versus the Science of Man," a review of the philosophy of Herbert Spencer (1871); "Evangelism, the Place, the Story, and the Poem" (1889); "Science and Sentiment" (1889); "The Elements of Moral Science, Theoretical and Practical" (1885); "Life of Bishop Berkeley" (1885); and "Rant's Ethics, a Critical Exposition" (Chicago, 1886). Dr. Porter was one of the most scholarly metaphysicians in this country. He was the principal editor of the revised editions of Noah Webster's "Unabridged Dictionary" till 1880 (Springfield, Mass., 1880, and New York, 1891.)

PORTER, Rufus, inventor, b. in West Roxbury, Mass., Jan. 7, 1823; d. in New Haven, Conn., 13 Aug., 1884. He early showed mechanical genius. In 1807, his parents apprenticed him to a shoemaker, but he soon gave up this trade, and occupied himself by playing the life for military companies, and the violin for dancing parties. Three years later he was apprenticed to a house-painter. During the war of 1812 he was occupied in painting gun-boats, and his skill to the Portland light-boat. In 1813 he painted sleighs at Denmark, Me., beat the drum for the soldiers, taught others to do the same, and wrote a book on the art of drumming, and he then enlisted in the militia for several months. Subsequently he was a teacher, but was unable to remain in one place, and so led a wandering life. In 1829 he made a camera-ob- ject, with which he made a journey to New York, taking with its aid he could draw a satisfactory portrait in fifteen minutes. With this apparatus he traveled through the country until he invented a revolving almanac, when he at once stopped his painting in order to introduce his latest device. His next project was a twin boat to be propelled by horse-power, but it proved unsuccessful, and he next turned to a device for teaching a horse to begin landscape-painting, but relinquished it to build a horse flat-boat. He invented a successful cord-making machine in 1835, and thereafter produced a clock, a steam carriage, a portable horse-power, corn-sheller, churn, a washing-machine, signal telegraph, fire-alarm, and numerous other articles. In 1840 he became editor of the "New Haven Daily Courier," a position he maintained in the following year he moved it to Boston, where he called it the "American Mechanic." The new art of electrotying there attracted his attention, and he gave up editorial work in order to occupy himself with the new innovation. He devised at this period a revolving rifle, which he sold to Col. Samuel Colt for $100. In 1845 he returned to New York and engaged in electrotying; and about this time he founded the "Scientific American," the first issue of which bears the date 28 Aug., 1845. At the end of six months he was glad to dispose of his interest in the paper, and then occupied himself with his inventions. These included a flying-ship, trip-hammer, fog-whistle, engine-lathe, balanced valve, rotary plough, reaction wind-wheel, portable hose, thermo-engine, rotary engine, and scores of others.

PORTER, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Ireland, 1714; d. in Congrunity, Pa., 23 Sept., 1825. He learned the trade of a weaver, and came to this country in 1783, settling in Pennsylvania. He studied theology, was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Redstone in 1790, and held charge of the united congregations of Pole Run and Congrunity, Pa., from 1790 till 1798, and then of Congrunity alone until his death. He published several sermons and two dialogues between "Death and the Believer" and "Death and the Hypocrite," which were reprinted, with a biography of the author, by Rev. David Elliott, D. D., in 1833.

PORTER, Thomas, jurist, b. in Farmington, Conn., in May, 1731; d. in Granville, N. Y., in August, 1833. His ancestor, Thomas, emigrated from England in 1640, and was an original proprietor of the town of Dover, N. H., and a justice of the peace at Lake George in 1735, and was captain of a company of minute-men. About 1757 he removed to Cornwall, Conn., and in 1759 he went to Tim- mouth, Vt., in both of which towns he held local offices. For ten years he was judge of the supreme and county courts of Vermont, and he was a member of the convention that constituted the constitution of Vermont for thirty-five years. His son, Ebenezer, educator, b. in Cornwall, Conn., 5 Oct., 1775; d. in Andover, Mass., 8 April, 1834, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1792, studied theology in Bethle-hem, Conn., was pastor of a Congregational church in Washington, Conn., from 1796 until 1812, and. from that year until 1822 was professor of sacred rhetoric at Andover theological seminary, of which he was president from 1827 till his death. Yale gave him the degree of A. M. in 1795, and Dartmouth that of D. D. in 1814. He contributed to the "Quarterly Register," and published sixteen sermons, two first sermons (1831), and abridgments of Owen on "Spiritual Mindedness" and on the 150th Psalm (1835); and was the editor of "The Vermontian" (Burlington, Vt.); "Lecture on the Analysis of Vocal Infections" (Andover, 1824); "An Analysis of the Principles of Rhetorical Delivery" (1825); "Syllabes of Lectures" (1826); "Rhetorical Reader" (1831), enlarged by James N. MacElligott, New York, 1854; "Lectures on the Revivals of Religion" (Andover, 1829); "Lectures on the Cultivation of Spiritual Habits and Progress in Study" (1833); "Lectures on Homiletic, Preaching, and Public Prayer, with Sermons and Letters" (Andover and New York, 1834; 2d ed., with notes and appendix by the Rev. J. Jones, of Liverpool, London, 1855); and "Lectures on Eloquence and Style," revised by Rev. Lyman Matthews (Andover, 1830). See "Life," of Ebenezer Porter, D. D., by Rev. Lyman Matthews (Boston, 1837).

PORTER, Thomas Conrad, botanist, b. in Alexandria, Huntington co., Pa., 22 Jan., 1822. He was graduated at Lafayette college, Easton, Pa., in 1840, and at Princeton theological seminary in 1843, and was licensed to preach in 1844. In 1846 he was pastor of a Presbyterian church in Farmington, Conn., and in 1848 he took charge of the newly organized 2d German Reformed church in Reading, Pa., and was ordained by the classis of Lebanon. In 1849 he resigned to become professor of natural sciences in Marshall college. Meanwhile he prosecuted his studies when the institution was removed to Lancaster and consolidated with Franklin college in 1853, and was secretary of the board of trustees until 1866, when he resigned to become professor of botany and zoology in Lafayette, which office he now (1868) holds. In 1877 he became pastor of the Third street Reformed church of that town, which he had organized in 1831, and in 1884 he received the degree of D. D. in 1884, and Franklin and Marshall that of LL. D. in 1880. He is a member of various scientific societies, and was a founder and first president of the Linnaean society of Lancaster county, Pa. His extensive herbarium is in the possession of Lafayette college. His reports in connection with Dr. Ferdinand V. Hayden's collections in the Rocky mountains in 1867-4 were published by the government, and one of these, "A Synopsis of the Flora of Colorado," prepared with Prof. John M. Coulter, has been issued in a separate volume (Washington, 1874). He also furnished a summary of the flora of the state to "Gray's Topographical Atlas of Pennsylvania" (Philadelphia, 1852), and to "Gray's Topographical Atlas of the United States" (1854), and contributed to the "Mercersburg Review." He has published a prose version of Goethe's "Her mann und Dorothea" (New York, 1854); translated "The Life and Labors of St. Augustine," from the German of Dr. Philip Schaff (New York, 1854-5), and "The Life and Times of Ulric Zwingle," from the German of Schaff and Rhyns (New York, 1851); and contributed several hymns from the German and Latin to Dr. Philip Schaff's "Christ in Song" (New York, 1868). He was an active member of the committee that framed in 1867 the order of worship that is now (1888) used in the German Reformed church in the United States.

PORTER, William Trotter, journalist, b. in Newbury, Vt., 24 Dec., 1806; d. in New York city, 29 July, 1858. He was educated at Dartmouth, but was not graduated. In 1829 he became connected with the "Farmer's Herald" at St. Johnsburg, Vt., and the following year he became associate editor of "The Enquirer" at Norwich. His ambition for a wider field of action led him to New York city, where he first found employment as a reporter on the "Evening Post." He was afterward reporter and compositor Horace Greeley, who had recently arrived in the city, and a lifelong friendship ensued. Mr. Porter's cherished project was put into effect on 10 Dec., 1831, when he issued the initial number of the "Spirit of the Times," the first sporting journal in the United States. It was a novel undertaking, and was not at first successful. In a few months it was merged with "The Traveller," with Mr. Porter in charge of the sporting department. The following year he resigned and took charge of "The New Yorker" for a short time, and then of "The Constellation." As these journals gave only a subordinate place to sporting topics, he purchased "The Traveller, and Spirit of the Times" from C. B. Fisher, who had united the two, and on 3 Jan., 1835, the paper was issued again under its original name. At this period the sports of the turf and field were held in disrepute, especially in the New England states, and the task of correcting deep-rooted prejudices called into play all the perseverance, tact, and talent of the editor, who was thoroughly imbued with love for the work. The paper was soon supported by a host of wealthy patrons and versatile contributors. Among the latter were Albert Pike, Thomas B. Thorpe, "Frank Forester," George Wilkins Kendall, Charles G. Leland, and Thomas Pictou. The popularity of Mr. Porter was great. Nearly all his correspondents...the majority of his subscribers, were personal friends. His sobriquet of "York's Tall Son" was bestowed not less in recognition of his social qualities than of his lofty stature—six feet and four inches. A writer says of him: "His mind was comprehensive, his perception keen, his deductions clear and concise, whilst his judgments were sound and sincere. He was more reliable and more respected than any other man in this country. He was the father of a school of American sporting literature, which is no less a credit to his name than it is an honor to the land that gave him birth. Many of his decisions and sporting reports will be quoted as authority for generations to come. He possessed a fund of sporting statistics unequalled by any other man in America." In February, 1839, he purchased the "American Turf Register and Sporting Magazine" from John S. Skinner, of Baltimore, and the periodical was thereupon published in New York until it was finally suspended in 1844. After conducting the old "Spirit"—as it was familiarly termed—for nearly twenty-five years, he withdrew from the management, and together with George Wilkes established "Porter's Spirit of the Times" in September, 1856. Failing health prevented close application to the new field of labor. He edited three collections of tales that had appeared in his journal, entitled "The Big Bear of Arkansas, and Other Tales" (Philadelphia, 1839); "A Quarter Race in Kentucky, and Other Sketches" (1846); and "Major T. R. Porter's Scenes in Arkansas, and Other Sketches" (1859); and also issued an American edition, with additions, of Col. Peter Hawker's "Instructions to Young Sportsmen" (1846). At the time of his death he was engaged in preparing a biography of Henry William Herbert ("Frank Forester"). See "Life of William T. Porter," by Francis Rainier (New York, 1869).

PORTERFIELD, Charles, soldier, b. in Frederick county, Va., in 1750; d. on Santee river, S. C., in October, 1789. He became a member of the first company that was raised in Frederick county in 1775 for service in the Revolutionary war, of which Daniel Morgan was elected captain, marched to Cambridge, near Boston, and soon afterward joined in the expedition against Fort Ligonier. He was mustered in as a fifer and made prisoner in the attempt on that fortress. The assailing column, to which he belonged, was under the command of Col. Arnold. When that officer was wounded and carried from the field, Porterfield, with Morgan, rushing forward, passed the first and second barriers. After being exchanged he re-entered the service as captain in the rifle corps of Col. Morgan and participated in the battles and expeditions that were engaged during the campaigns of 1777–8. In 1779 he was appointed by Gov. Jefferson lieutenant-colonel of a Virginia regiment that had been equipped mainly at his own expense, with which, in the spring of 1780, he marched to the relief of Charleston, S. C. He remained in South Carolina and joined the army of Gen. Gates, at Saratoga, and became aide-de-camp to the general. His nominal part of the advanced guard of Gates's army, and unexpectedly met that of the enemy about one o'clock A.M. on 16 Aug., a moonlight night. While making a gallant resistance and holding the enemy in check, he received a mortal wound, his left leg being shattered just below the knee. He was carried from the field, remained ten days without surgical attention, and then was taken in a cart twelve miles to Camden where the required amputation was performed. While a prisoner in Camden he was treated with great kindness and attention by both Lord Cornwallis and Lord Rawdon, who supplied all his wants. He was paroled, but died from the effects of his wound.—His brother, Robert, soldier, b. in Frederick county, Va., 22 Feb., 1752; d. in Augusta county, Va., 15 Feb., 1816, was appointed a lieutenant by Capt. Peter Porter of Augusta county, Va., and served as aide-de-camp to Gen. Daniel Morgan, was paroled, and was mustered out of service in Winchester, Va., in 1776, served in Col. Daniel Morgan's regiment through the campaigns of 1777–9, the last year was aide to Gen. William Woodford, and was in the battles of the Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth. He accompanied Gen. Woodford to the south in December, 1779, and participated in the siege of Charleston, S. C., where he was surrendered a prisoner of war in May, 1780. He was appointed a brigadier-general of Virginia militia during the war of 1812, and commanded at Camp Holly, Va. Gen. Porterfield was a county magistrate for more than fifty years, and was twice high-sheriff.

PORTIER, Michel, R. C., bishop, b. in Montier-son, France, 7 Sept., 1795; d. in Mobile, Ala., 14 May, 1839. He entered the Seminary of Lyons, France, before completing his theological studies he met with Bishop Dubourg, of Louisiana, who had come to France in search of missionaries for his diocese. Young Portier consented to follow the prelate to the United States, and reached Annapolis, 4 Sept., 1815. A visit of several months to the home of Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, he finished his studies in St. Mary seminary, Baltimore, and was ordained priest in St. Louis by Bishop Dubourg in 1818. Shortly afterward there was an epidemic of yellow fever in the country, during which he was unceasing in his attendance on the sick and dying. He was finally attacked by the disease, and on his recovery was summoned to New Orleans, where he established a school on the Lancastrian system. He was shortly afterward appointed vicar-general of the diocese. The rapid increase in the number of Roman Catholics rendered a division of the see of Louisiana necessary, and in 1825 Alabama, Florida, and Arkansas were created a vicariate. Dr. Portier was nominated vicar-apostolic the same year. He was consecrated bishop of Olena in partibus by Bishop Rosati in St. Louis on 5 Nov., 1826. Thence he went to his vicariate to Pensacola and the other in St. Augustine—and the three priests, who were the sole missionaries in this extensive territory, belonged to other dioceses, to which they were recalled shortly after his consecration. His poverty was so great that he was unable to purchase the insignia appropriate to his rank. He remained in Mobile until the summer of 1837, when he began his diocesan visitation of Pensacola, Tallahassee, and St. Augustine. Owing to the heat that prevailed during his journey, he was attacked by a fever at the latter town and narrowly escaped death. When he had partially recovered he resumed his labors in St. Augustine and its neighborhood. The absence of priests for some years had resulted in a total neglect of religious obligations and religious instruction, and he found it necessary to instruct even the adults in the rudiments of Christian doctrine. He remained until the end of September, constantly preaching and instructing in Spanish and English, except when stricken by fever, and wrought an extraordinary change in the habits of the people. His English sermons were attended by the members of all denominations, and he received substantial aid also.
from those who differed with him in belief during his stay in St. Augustine. In 1829 he prevailed on Bishop England to station a priest of his diocese in East Florida. He then sailed for Europe, and, after spending several months in France, where he obtained money, besides the services of two priests, four sub-deacons, and two ecclesiastical students, he returned the same year. While he was in Europe the bishopric of Mobile had been formed out of his vicariate, and he was installed bishop of the new diocese on Maryland. He was then recalled to France to organize parishes, and built churches at Toulouse, Montoya, Florence, Huntsville, and Moulton. He next founded Spring Hill college, near Mobile, and also built the ecclesiastical seminary that was attached to it. The funds he had obtained from abroad enabled him to employ teachers. He introduced the name of the Visitation order into his diocese in 1882, and in the following year built a convent and academy for them in Summerville. He began the erection of the cathedral of the immaculate conception in 1885, a fine structure, which he completed in 1886. Nearly all the great charities of the diocese owed their origin to Bishop Portier. A large number of children having been rendered orphans by the cholera epidemic of 1883, he formed a family of Sisters of Charity and a body of Brothers of Christian Instruction from France, who took charge of the orphans that he founded. To these institutions he attached labor and free schools. He organized a girls' school in St. Augustine, introduced the Jesuits, and added largely to the number of churches and missions. He paid a second visit to Europe in 1884. After his return to the diocese he sent the Bishop of New Orleans to the United States, and the Bishop of Mobile to France, where he took charge of the seminary that he founded. His last great work was the erection of Providence infirmary in Mobile, to which he retired when he felt his end approaching. Bishop Portier may be said to have created the Roman Catholic church in his vicariate, which, before his death, was divided into three extensive dioceses. He left twenty-seven priests, a splendid cathedral, fourteen churches, an college and ecclesiastical seminary, fourteen schools, three academies for boys and three for girls, two orphan asylums, an infirmary, and many free schools. He was for some time before his death the senior bishop of the American hierarchy.

PORTILLO, Bernardo (por-to-car-ray'-ro), Cuban soldier, b. in Santiago de Cuba in 1840. He went to Spain when very young, was educated in Madrid, entered the army as a military engineer, and took part in the war against France and Spain. In 1802 he was appointed professor in the College of military engineers. In 1804 the government sent him to Denmark to report on the war between that country and Germany and Austria. In 1805 he returned to Cuba, where he superintended the construction of several important public works. He went back to Spain in 1814, in 1819 he was elected to represent the native city in the Spanish Cortes, and he has since been a representative of the Cuban Liberal honor-party in that body. He also assisted to bring about the abolition of slavery in the Spanish West Indies. He has published "Tratado de Arquitectura": "Estudios de Organizaciones militares extranjeras": "Descripción de varias plazas de guerra": and "Empleo del hierro en las fortificaciones."

PORY, John. Pioneer, b. in England about 1570; d. in London, Sept. 16, 1615. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1612 was a resident of Paris. During 1619-21 he was secretary of the Virginia colony, and he was elected speaker of the first representative assembly that was ever held in this country, which convened in Jamestown on 30 July, 1619. He was a Christian hero shortly after its settlement by the Pilgrims from Leyden, but in 1613 returned to Virginia as one of the commissioners to inquire into the condition of affairs. He assisted Hakluyt in his geographical work, and was considered a man of great learning. His account of excursions among the Indians is given in Smith's "General Historie," and he translated and published "A Geographical Historie of Africa" by John Loo, a more, borne in Granada and brought up in Barbary" (London, 1600).

POSADAS, Gervasio Antonio. Argentine statesman, b. in Buenos Ayres, 19 June, 1575; d. there, 2 July, 1632. He studied law, and for several years was employed in the Spanish administration, but when independence was proclaimed, 35 May, 1810, he took an active part in the patriotic movement. Soon he became the head of the Centralization party in opposition to the Federalists, and when in 1813 the constituent assembly abolished the executive junta, he was appointed, 26 Jan., 1814, supreme director of the Argentine Republic. He created the provinces of Entrerios, Tucuman, and Salta, and was active in forwarding re-enforcements to the army of the Banda Oriental, and, on 22 June Montevideo was captured by Gen. Alvear. His conservative ideas caused him to send, in December of that year, a secret mission to Europe, for the purpose of obtaining a protectorate or a monarchy from England or some other European nation, as he did not think his country ripe for a republic. His intentions became known, and there were several unsuccessful attempts to force his resignation, but it was not until 9 Jan., 1815, and after the accession of Rosas and the adoption of the Federal system he was often persecuted.

POSEY, Thomas. Soldier, b. in Wilkinson county, Miss., 5 Aug., 1818; d. in Charlotteville, Va., 13 Nov., 1863. He served in the Mexican war as a lieutenant of rifles under Jefferson Davis, and was wounded at San Jacinto. He was captain of the 16th Mississippi regiment on 4 June, 1861, and was appointed brigadier-general in the Confederate army, 1 Nov., 1862. His brigade was composed of four Mississippi regiments of infantry, and formed part of Anderson's division of Ambrose P. Hill's corps in the Army of Northern Virginia. Gen. Posey received wounds at Bracrice Station, Va., 14 Oct., 1863, from the effects of which he died.
Shawnees in Ohio. He established an independent mission in Ohio in 1761, where he was joined in 1762 by John Heckewelder; but the Pontiac war forced them to abandon the project. In January, 1764, he sailed for the Mosquito coast, where he labored two years, and he made a second visit there in 1765. He afterward united with the Protestant Episcopal church.

POST, Isaac, philanthropist, b. in Westbury, Queens co., N. Y., 26 Feb., 1705; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 9 May, 1782. Being the son of Quaker parents, he was educated at the Westbury Friends' school. He engaged in the drug business, and removed to Sepio, N. Y., in 1783, and to Rochester, N. Y., in 1786, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was a warm adherent of William Enston Garrison, and one of the earliest laborers in the anti-slavery cause. His door was ever open to those who had escaped from bondage, and his hospitality to the fugitive slaves was benevolent and uncompromising. He was a member of the Hicksite branch of the Quakers, but left that body because, in his opinion, it showed itself subservient to the slave days, in its refusal to have its public worship and public attention first attracted to the manifestations by the Fox sisters, and became one of the earliest converts to Spiritualism. He was the author of "Voices from the Spirit World, being Communications from Many Spirits, by the Hand of Isaac Post, Medium" (Rochester, 1852).—His brother, Joseph, b. in Westbury, L. I., 30 Nov., 1763; d. in Feb., 1828, remained in his profession of abolition principles. He was at one time proscribed and persecuted within his own sect, but lived long enough to witness a complete revolution of sentiment, and to be the recipient of many expressions of confidence and esteem from his co-religionists. When Isaac T. Hopper, Charles Marriot, and James S. Gibbons were disowned by the Hicksite Friends, on account of their outspoken opposition to slavery, they received encouragement and support from Joseph Post. Mr. Post passed his life in the same house in which he was born and died.

POST, Minturn, physician, b. in New York city, 28 June, 1768; d. there, 26 April, 1839. He was graduated at Columbia in 1787, and, after studying medicine under Dr. Valentine Mott, he received his degree in the department of the University of Virginia in 1782. Subsequently he studied in Paris; and, settling in New York city on his return, he acquired a large practice, and became recognized as an authority on diseases of the chest. In 1843 he was called to be medical examiner of the New York life insurance company. He translated and added notes to Embob's "Ascuturation and Percussion" (New York, 1829).

POST, Philip Sidney, soldier, b. in Florida, N. Y., 19 March, 1832; d. in Washington, D. C., 6 Jan., 1865. He was graduated at Union college, and was admitted to the bar. He then traveled through the northwestern states, his parents having meanwhile removed to Illinois, and took up his abode in Kincas, where he practiced his profession, and also established and edited a newspaper. At the opening of the civil war he was chosen 2d lieutenant in the 40th Illinois infantry, and in 1862 he became its colonel. He was severely wounded at the battle of Pea Ridge, and made his way with much suffering, and under many difficulties, to St. Louis. Before leaving Arkansas, he rejoined his regiment at front of Corinth, Miss., and was assigned to the command of a brigade. From May, 1862, till the close of the war he was constantly at the front. In the Army of the Cumberland, as first organized, he commanded the 1st brigade, 1st division, of the 20th army corps from its formation to its dissolution. He began the battle of Stone River, drove back the enemy several miles, and captured Lectown. During the Atlanta campaign he was transferred to Wood's division of the 4th army corps, and when that general was wounded at Lovejoy's station, Post took charge of the division, and with it opposed the progress of the Confederates toward the north. On 16 Nov., 1864, in a charge on Oconee Hill, a grape-shot crushed through his hip, making what was for some days thought to be a mortal wound. On 16 Dec., 1864, he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers. After the surrender at Appomattox he was appointed to the command of the western district of Texas, where there was a great excitement, and was the first to be called there. He remained there until 1866, when the withdrawal of the French from Mexico removed all danger of military complications. He was then earnestly recommended by Gen. George H. Thomas and others, under whom he had served, for the appointment of colonel in the regular army; but he did not wish to remain in the army. In 1886 he was appointed to the post of governor of Arkansas, and in 1878 he became consul-general. His official reports have been quoted as authority. In 1878 he tendered his resignation, which, however, was not accepted till the year following. He resided at Galesburg, Ill., and in 1886 and 1894 was elected to congress as a Republican.

POST, Truman Marcellus, clergyman, b. in Middlebury, Vt., 18 Jan., 1811; d. at Des Moines, Mo., 31 Dec., 1886. He was graduated at Middlebury college in 1829, and then was principal of an academy at Castleton, Vt., for a year. In 1830 he returned to Middlebury as tutor, and remained for two years, also studying law. He spent the winter of 1832-3 at Washington, D. C. Listening to debates in congress and at the supreme court. After spending a short time in St. Louis, Mo., he settled in Jacksonville, Ill., and was admitted to the bar. In 1833 he became professor of languages in Illinois college, and later he took the chair of history. He studied theology, and was ordained minister of the Congregational church in Jacksonville in 1840. He was called in 1847 to the 3d Presbyterian church in St. Louis, and in 1851 to the newly organized 1st Congregational church in Des Moines, which he organized and edited until his death. Dr. Post held the place of university professor of ancient and modern history at Washington University, and in 1853-5 was Southworth lecturer on Congregationalism at Andover theological seminary, and was professor of ecclesiastical history in Northwestern theological seminary in Chicago. In 1853 he received the degree of D. D. from Middlebury college. He contributed to the "Biological Repository" and other religious periodicals, and, besides various pamphlets, addresses, and sermons, was the author of "The Skeptical Era in Modern History" (New York, 1856).

POST, Wright, surgeon, b. in North Hempstead, N. Y., 19 Feb., 1766; d. in Throg's Neck, N. Y., 14 Dec., 1828. He studied medicine under Dr. Richard Bayley, and took for two years under Dr. John Sheldon in London. On his return in 1786 he began to practise in New York, and in 1787 delivered lectures on anatomy at the New York hospital. These efforts were interrupted by the "doctor's mob," which broke into the building and destroyed the valuable anatomical specimens that had been collected. In 1792 he was appointed professor of surgery in the medical department of Columbia college, and he then visited the great schools of Europe, collecting a splendid anatomical cabinet, and returning to New York in 1793, after which he held the chair of anatomy until 1813.
Dr. Post took rank as one of the ablest of operative surgeons, and his skill gained for him celebrity both at home and abroad. He was the first in the United States to perform an operation for a case of false aneurism of the femoral artery. Subsequently he operated in two cases for carotid aneurism, and in all three cases was successful. One of his greatest feats was the successful operation of tying the subclavian artery above the clavicle on the scapular side of the scalen muscles for brachial aneurism situated so high in the axilla that it made it inexpedient to tie this artery. The accomplishment of this operation was especially noteworthy from the fact that Dr. John Abernethy, Sir Astley Cooper, and other English surgeons had been unsuccessful in its performance. In 1813, on the union of the medical faculty of Columbia and that of the College of physicians and surgeons, Dr. Post was chosen professor of anatomy and physiology in the new faculty, of which he was president in 1821-6. In 1814 he received the honorary degree of M. D. from the regents of the University of the state of New York, and in 1816 he was chosen a trustee of Columbia college. Dr. Post was a member of various medical societies both at home and abroad. For more than thirty-five years he was one of the surgeons and consulting surgeons of the New York hospital. His publications include papers in medical journals and lectures. — His nephew, Alfred Charles, surgeon, b. in New York city, 13 Jan., 1806; d. there, 7 Feb., 1866, was the son of Joel Post, a merchant of New York, whose place of business was on Hanover square, and who owned as his country-seat the property known as Clearmont, which is now included in Riverside park and embraces the site of Gen. Grant's tomb. Young Post was graduated at Columbia in 1822, and after studying medicine under his uncle, Wright Post, received his degree at the College of physicians and surgeons in 1827. After passing two years at the medical schools of Europe, he established himself in 1829 in New York city, and devoted his attention chiefly to surgery. During 1831-5 he was demonstrator of anatomy at the College of physicians and surgeons, and in the latter year he moved to Brooklyn, but two years later he returned to New York, where he remained until his death. He was chosen professor of ophthalmic surgery at Castleton medical college, Vt., in 1846, and a year later was appointed to the chair of surgery. From 1851 till 1855 he was professor of surgery in the medical department of the University of the city of New York, serving also as president of the medical faculty from 1853 until his death. Dr. Post held consulting relations to various institutions, notably to the New York hospital from 1836 to St. Luke's hospital from its beginning, and to the Presbyterian hospital. His great fame was achieved in surgery, and his operations were marked with precision and dexterity. He was the first in the United States to operate for stammering and in 1840 devised a new method of performing bilateral ligation. He also showed mechanical ingenuity in devising instruments and appliances, and in the latter part of his life labored much in plastic surgery, making important reports of operations in that line. He was a member of medical societies both at home and abroad, and was president of the New York medical society in 1852. In 1872 he received the degree of L. L. D. from the University of the city of New York. Dr. Post was also active in various religious and charitable organizations, and at the time of his death was president of the New York medical mission, and one of the directors of Union theological seminary. His literary contributions consisted of technical papers in professional journals, with the single exception of his "Strabismus and Stammering" (New York, 1849).

POSTELL, Benjamin, soldier, b. in 1766; d. in Charleston, S. C., in January, 1801. He was a resident of St. Bartholomew's parish, S. C. In 1775 he became a lieutenant in the 1st regiment of his state, and on the capture of Charleston in 1780 he was sent as a prisoner to Yorktown, but remained months, suffering many hardships. Subsequently he was a member of the legislature, and colonel of the Colleton county regiment. He did good service in the Revolution under Gen. Francis Marion. His brothers, Maj. John and Col. James, also won reputation in the partisan warfare under Marion. The former captured forty British regulars near Moncks Corner on 29 Jan., 1781.

POTANOU, Indian chief, b. in Florida about 1525; d. there about 1570. He was the king of the most potent of the three great Indian confederacies that existed in lower Florida at the time of the landing of Jean Ribaut (q. v.) in 1562, and his domain extended seventy miles westward and northward of St. John's river. The Florida Indians were more advanced in civilization than the more northern tribes, and were chiefly an agricultural people. Potanou was a legislator, and endeavored to promote civilization among his subjects. The villages under his rule had wooden buildings that were constructed according to his plans, and astonished both the early French and Spanish adventurers. But he failed in his attempts to unite the Indians of lower Florida in a single great confederacy, of which it was his ambition to be the chief, and at the time of Ribaut's landing in 1562 there was a war among the three kings, Satouriona, Ouita (q. v.), and Potanou, in which the last seemed to have the advantage. He was also the first to open intercourse with Ribaut, and received from him a present of a robe of blue cloth, worked with the regal fleur-de-lys. The difficulties that the French under René de Laudemouère (q. v.) met in their attempts to colonize Florida were due chiefly to the rivalry among the three kings, who asked Laudemouère's aid against their neighbors, and, being refused, became his enemies. They afforded assistance to the Spaniards under Menendez de Aviles (q. v.), especially Potanou, who complained of a raid that had been made in his villages by Ouita, aided by a party of French under Arlae, a lieutenant of Laudemouère. But the haughtiness and cruelty of the Spaniards soon occasioned hostilities with the Indians, and a war began against the intruders. Menendez de Aviles endeavored in vain to conciliate Potanou, but the prudent king could not be deceived, and ordered that all missionaries and Spaniards trespassing on his domains should be put to death. This enmity, which lasted till Potanou's death, proved a severe check to the Spanish colonization of Florida.
POTTER. Alonzo, P. E., Bishop, b. in Reckman (now La Grange, Kentucky), N. Y., 6 July, 1800; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 4 July, 1865. His father was Joseph Potter, a farmer, of the Society of Friends, an emigrant from Cranston, R. I., in which state other branches of the family are still living. Alonzo first attended the district-school of his native place, which was then taught by a Mr. Thompson, to whose influence in arousing and directing the activities of his mind he never forgot that he was greatly indebted. At twelve years of age he was sent to an academy in Poultney, Vt., and was graduated at Union college in 1838 with the highest honors. Soon after his graduation he went to Philadelphia, where he was attracted to the Episcopal church, and entered its communion. His thoughts were soon turned to the ministry, and he was directed in his theological studies by the Rev. Dr. Samuel H. Turner. He was previously recalled to Union college as a tutor, and at twenty-one he was made professor of mathematics and natural philosophy. Meanwhile he pursued his studies, and was admitted deacon by Bishop Robert, and in 1824 advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Brownell. In the same year he married the only daughter of President Nott, of Union college. In 1826 Prof. Potter was called to the rectorship of St. Paul’s church, Boston. After five years of earnest and successful labor he felt constrained, despite the protestations of his people, to resign his rectorship. In 1832 he was recalled to Union college to fill the chair of moral and intellectual philosophy and political economy. His official position and his personal relationship naturally made him the friend and counsellor of the president in the administration of the college. In 1838 he was formally elected its vice-president, and continued to be practically its controlling head until he resigned to become bishop of Pennsylvania, 23 Sept., 1845. From his boyhood, owing perhaps in part to his Quaker origin, he cherished a deep sympathy for the oppressed, and through life, in every office, he befriended the negro race. He took great interest in the organization of young men’s institutes throughout the state of New York, and immediately on his settlement in Philadelphia, invoking the help of energetic laymen, established four such fraternities in that city, and gave his personal services as a lecturer before them. When he was called to the episcopate he was already under engagement to deliver in five consecutive years before the Lowell institute in Boston courses of lectures on “Natural Theology and Christian Evidences,” beginning in 1845 and ending in 1849. They were given on an open platform, without even a brief before him, and the largest public hall in Boston was filled throughout the entire series. This was the intellectual triumph of his life; as a bishop he was most distinguished for his executive ability. He had a genius for administration. He devised large plans of beneficence, which it was costly to consummate, but they were so well considered before he communicated them to others that men of business and wealth were found ready to co-operate and to contribute for their realization. In his time the Episcopal hospital was founded, built, and endowed with nearly half a million dollars; the Episcopal academy, which for half a century had had no sign of its existence but its charter, was revived, its commodious building was reared and filled with pupils, its institution for thorough instruction was made equal to that of any preparatory school in the city; the Philadelphia divinity-school was established, a valuable property for its occupancy was bought and fitted, and an endowment of several hundred thousand dollars was secured for its support. These institutions, still developing for the benefit of the present and future generations, over the invention to Bishop Potter. In the twenty years of his episcopate thirty-five new churches were built in the city of Philadelphia. The growth of the diocese was such that in the year of his death it became necessary to divide it. His vigorous constitution succumbed under the pressure of care and labor that he took upon himself. In 1850 he was partially relieved by an assistant, but it was too late. He died in the harbor of San Francisco, where he had just arrived after a voyage around Cape Horn in search of health. He had received the degree of D. D. from Harvard in 1846, and that of LL. D. from Union in the same year. Bishop Potter was the author of treatises on logarithms and descriptive geometry, which were printed in the “American Journal of Education” (1822–6); “Political Economy, its Objects, Uses, and Principles” (New York, 1849); “The Principles of Science applied to the Domestic and Mechanic Arts, and to Manufactures and Agriculture” (Boston, 1841; revised ed., New York, 1850); “The School and the Schoolmaster,” with George B. Emerson (1842); “Hand-Book for Readers and Students for the “Discourses on Pastoral Charges, Addresses, Pastoral Letters, etc.” (1858); and “Religious Philosophy” (1870). He edited seven volumes of “Harper’s Family Library,” with introductory essays: Rev. Samuel Wilks’s “Christian Essays” (Boston, 1829); Maria James’s “Poems” (New York, 1830); and “Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity delivered in the Mechanics’ Institute of the Presbyterian Episcopal Church, 1832–4” (Philadelphia, 1855). See “Memoirs of the Life and Services of Rt. Rev. A. Potter, D. D., LL. D.” by Bishop M. A. De Wolfe Howe (Philadephia, 1870). — His son, Clarkson Nott, legislator, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 25 April, 1825; d. in New York city, 23 Jan., 1882, was graduated at Union college in 1842, studied civil engineering at Rensselaer polytechnic institute, and in 1843 went to Milwaukee, Wis. After being employed as an engineer, he studied law, and in 1848 returned to New York, where he began to practise. In 1868 he was elected to Congress, from the 12th district of that state, as a Democrat, and he was twice re-elected, sitting in that body from 4 March, 1860, till 3 March, 1885. He declined a nomination to the 44th Congress, but was again chosen for the two succeeding terms, and served from 15 Oct., 1877, till 3 March, 1881. During his congressional career Mr. Potter was a member of important committees, and took an active part in the discussion of the disputed electoral votes of Louisiana and Florida in the presidential election of 1856. In 1870 he received the Democratic nomination for lieutenant-governor of New York, but was defeated. Mr. Potter served as president of the American bar association, and received the degree of LL. D. — Another son, Robert Brown, soldier, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 16 July, 1829; d. in Newport, R. I., 19 Feb., 1887, spent some time at Union college, but was not graduated. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, and at the beginning of the civil war was in successful practice in New York city. He was commissioned major of the 51st New York volunteers, led the assault at Rappahannock, at Sedgwick, and took part in the siege of Knoxville, Tenn. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers in August, 1864.

In the Wilderness campaign, his division was constantly under fire, and in the final assault on Petersburg, 2 April, 1865, he was severely injured.

After the war he was assigned to the command of the Connecticut and Rhode Island district of the Department of the East, and on his wedding-day his wife was presented by Gen. Stanton with his commission as full major-general of volunteers, dated 29 Sept., 1865.

He was mustered out of the army in January, 1866, and acted for three years as receiver of the Atlantic and Great Western railroad. After spending some time in England for his health, he returned to Newport, R. I., where he resided until his death. He had been a prominent and successful term in terms of his "Memos," and Gen. Winfield S. Hancock said of him that he was one of the twelve best officers, including both the regular and volunteer services, in the army.—Another son, Henry Codman, P. E., bishop, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 25 May, 1835, after being educated chiefly at the Theological seminary at Virginia, in 1857. He was received deacon's orders the same year, and was ordained 15 Oct., 1858. From July, 1857, till May, 1859, he was rector of Christ church, Greensburgh, Pa., and for the next seven years he had charge of St. John's, Troy, N. Y. He then became assistant minister of Trinity church, Boston, where he remained two years. From May, 1861, till 1884, he was rector of St. John's church, New York city. In 1863 he was chosen president of Kenyon college, Ohio, and in 1875 he was elected bishop of Iowa, but he declined both offices. In 1883 Bishop Horatio Potter, of New York, having asked for an assistant, the convention of that year unanimously elected his nephew, Dr. Henry C. Potter, assistant bishop. He was consecrated on 20 Oct., in the presence of forty-three bishops and 300 of the clergy, the General convention being then in session in Philadelphia. By formal instruments, that were executed soon afterward, the aged bishop resigned the entire charge and responsibility of the work of the diocese into the hands of his assistant. These duties the latter continued to discharge until the death of Bishop Horatio Potter, on 2 Jan., 1887, made him his successor. Dr. Peter was secretary of the House of bishops from 1866 till 1883, and for many years he was a manager of the Board of missions. He received from Union the degrees of A. M., D. D., and LL. D. in 1863, 1865, and 1877, respectively, and that of D. D. from Trinity in 1884. Bishop Potter has published "Sisterhoods and Daconesses at Home and Abroad: A History of their Rise and Growth in the Protestant Episcopal Church, together with Rules for their Organization and Government" (New York, 1872); "The Gates of the East: A Winter in Egypt and Syria" (1876); and "Sermons of the City" (1877).—Another son, Edward Teckerman, architect, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 25 Sept., 1831, was graduated at Union in 1853, studied architecture under Richard M. Upjohn, and has practiced in New York, giving attention principally to collegiate and ecclesiastical architecture. His work (as illustrated in the Church of the Heavenly Rest, New York; the Church of the Good Shepherd [Colt Memorial], Hartford; and Memorial Hall, Schenectady) is distinguished by marked freshness and originality of conception, felicity of ornamentation, and delicacy of feeling. He has resided largely abroad, and is known as a musical composer of much merit.—Another son, Ephraim S. Potter, d. in Schenectady, N. Y., 29 Sept., 1833, was graduated at Union in 1841, and at Berkeley divinity-school in 1862. He took orders as an Episcopalian clergyman, and was rector of the Church of the Nativity in South Bethlehem, Pa., from 1862 till 1869. From 1866 till 1871 he was secretary and professor of ethics at Lehigh university, and from 1869 till 1871 he was associate rector of St. Paul's, Troy, N. Y. At Bethlehem Dr. Potter was instrumental in building three churches, and in Troy two chapels. In 1871 he was elected president of Union college, and he was chosen to the same office when the college became a university in 1873. In 1872 he was elected trustee. Resigning from the presidency in 1884, he was chosen bishop of Nebraska, but declined, accepting instead a prior call to become president of Holcomb college. He received the degree of D. D. from Union in 1882.—Alonzo's brother, Horatio, P. E., bishop, b. in Beckman, Dutchess co., N. Y., 9 Feb., 1802; d. in New York city, 2 Jan., 1887. He was graduated at Union college in 1826, ordained deacon in July, 1827, and became priest the following year. His first charge was at St. Mark, Middletown, 1828; he was elected professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Washington (now Trinity) college, and took an active part in plans for the enlargement of the college. In 1833 he became rector of St. Peter's church, Albany, N. Y., and held that post till 1854, when he was elected provisional bishop of the diocese of New York, and consecrated in Trinity church on 22 Nov., 1854. On the death of Bishop Ormsby in 1861, he became bishop of the diocese. The 25th anniversary of his consecration was celebrated on Saturday, 22 Nov., 1879, by services in Trinity church, and on the following Tuesday by a reception in the Academy of music, at which deputations from the other dioceses in the state of New York were present, and addresses were made by William M. Evarts and John Jay. The bishop's last public service was held, 3 May, 1883, at the end of a long and fatiguing visitation, after which he was prostrated by an attack of pneumonia from which he never rallied. He died at his residence, after being confined to his room three years and eight months. When Bishop Potter came to his diocese it was in a state of great depression and disquiet, owing to the controversies that resulted. from the trial and suspension of his predecessor. (See Underwood, Benjamin T.) His administration resulted in the restoration of order, quietness, and peace, and in great development and prosperity. Among the notable events in his episcopate was the subdivision in 1868, when the dioceses of Long Island and Albany were set off. He was among the chief members of the house of bishops, and took an active part in the Lambeth conferences in September, 1867, and July, 1878. He entered zealously into the measures that had for their object the reunion of the dioceses that had been separated temporarily from each other during the civil war, and was among the prominent figures in the general convention at Philadelphia in 1865, at which the southern bishops, appearing in the persons of two representatives, were received with general and enthusiastic rejoicings, and without conditions or questions, or allusion to the past. Bishop Potter was a man of remarkable good sense and tact, calm, wise, and patient, an able administrator, one whose judgment was rarely if ever at fault, always temperate and conciliatory; and to these qualities were due the good order, peace, and prosperity of his diocese. He was a man of unusual literary culture. Among his personal friends and correspondents outside of his own country were such men as Bishops Wilberforce, Selwyn, Jackson, of London, Hamill and Macfie, of Salisbury, and Medley, of Fredericksburg, St. Asaph, Aberystwyth, and the Rt. Hon. Sir J. T. Oderbrecht. The growth of the diocese of New York under his administration may be inferred from the statistics taken from the convention journals, though they are imperfect. In 1854 the diocese reported 2490 baptisms, 5,500 confirmations, 4,892 communicants, 16,530 communicants, and 730 representatives. In 1860, were reported 446 baptisms, 3,930 confirmations, 6,314 baptisms, 33,000 communicants, and $1,005,138.21 in contributions. Bishop Potter took a lively interest in city mission work among the laboring classes and the poor, and devoted to that subject a great part of his annual addresses to the convention. His publications are limited to pastoral letters, and a report to the diocesan convention, and occasional sermons. In person Bishop Potter was tall and of a dignified and noble presence; he belonged to the old high-church school, of which Keble, Pusey, and Isaac Williams were among the best illustrations, yet his sympathies went freely toward all Christian people. He was buried in the cemetery at Poughkeepsie, where an appropriate monumental stone marks the place of his rest.

-Horton's son, William Bleecker, mining engineer, b. Schenectady, N. Y., 23 March, 1846, was graduated at Columbia in 1866, and then, entering the school of mines of that college, received the degree of E.M. in 1869. He continued for two years as assistant in geology at the college, and also served as observer on the meteorograph (p. c) on the geological survey of Ohio. In 1871 he was elected to the chair of mining and metallurgy at Washington university, St. Louis, Mo., which place he has since held. During these years he has built up an extensive professional practice in the line of examining mineral deposits and mining properties, with reports on the same. Prof. Potter is a member of scientific societies, and in 1888 he was elected president of the American institute of mining engineers. His scientific papers have been confined to proceedings of societies to which he belongs.

POTTER, Chander Eastman, author, b. in Concord, N. H., 7 March, 1801; d. in Flint, Mich., 3 Aug., 1868. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1821, and was principal of Portsmouth high-school in 1832-8, except during 1834-5, when he was a member of the legislature. Mr. Potter then studied law in Concord, and began to practise in East Concord, but in 1844 moved to Manchester, and for four years edited and published the Manchester "Democratic". He edited the "Manchester's Monthly Visitor" in 1852-4, "The Granite Farmer and Monthly Visitor" in 1854-5, and was codirector of the "Weekly Mirror" and the "Mirror and Farmer" in 1864-5. He was colonel of the Anosogekt veterans of Manchester until his decease, and had command of the regiment at the time of its visit to Baltimore and Washington during the administration of Franklin Pierce. He was active in the New Hampshire historical society, and its president in 1857-7. Col. Potter was well known as an agricultural, historical, and general newspaper writer, and also devoted much of his time to the study of Indian languages, in which he was more competent than any other scholar in New Hampshire. He edited and compiled all that part of the adjutant-general's report of New Hampshire that included the military history of the state from the beginning of the Revolution down to the civil war (1866-5). His other publications include a "History of Manchester, N. H." (Manchester, 1856), and articles on the Penobscot and other eastern Indians in Henry R. Schoolcraft's "History of the Indians," and he partially prepared for the press a new edition of "The history of New Hampshire, with Notes and a Continuation to 1890." the civil war he was appointed captain and commissioner of subsistence from New York, which commission he held from February to October, 1862.
Subsequently he recruited a regiment of North Carolina troops, of which he was made colonel, and was engaged chiefly in the operations in North and South Carolina and east Tennessee, receiving the promotion of brigadier-general of volunteers on 29 Nov., 1862. He resigned in 24 July, 1863, but was the major-general of volunteers on 13 March, 1865. After the war Gen. Potter resided in Madison, N. J., and New York city.

POTTER, Elisha Reynolds, lawyer, b. in South Kingston, R. I., 5 Nov., 1764; d. there, 29 Sept., 1835. He began life as a blacksmith's apprentice, and was also a soldier, but subsequently began to study law, and practised with considerable success. From 1793 till his death he was a member of the Rhode Island assembly, except during the years of his congressional service, and he was for five years its speaker. In 1795 he was elected as a Federalist to congress and served from Dec. 1796, until his resignation in 1797. He was again sent to congress and served from 22 May, 1799, till 2 March, 1813, acting as important member.
From 1804 to 1812 he was lieutenant-governor. It is said of him that "few political men in Rhode Island ever acquired or maintained a more commanding influence."—His son, Elisha Reynolds, lawyer, b. in South Kingston, R. I., 20 June, 1811; d. there, 10 April, 1882, was graduated at Harvard in 1830, and, after studying law, became a member of the Rhode Island legislature. In 1835-7 he was adjuttant-general of the state. He was elected to congress as a Whig, serving from 4 Dec., 1843, till 3 March, 1845, and was state commissioner of public schools from May, 1849, to October, 1854. Subsequently he devoted himself to the practice of his profession, was chosen a judge of the supreme court of the state. Judge Potter was an active member of the Rhode Island historical society, and published in its collections "A Brief Account of the Emissions of Paper Money made by the Colony of Rhode Island" (1837), also various addresses.
In addition to his "Report on the Condition and Improvement of the Public Schools of Rhode Island" (1822), "The Bible and Prayer in Public Schools" (1854), and other "Reports and Documents upon Public Schools, Goals, and Education in the State of Rhode Island," his "History of Narragansett, with an Appendix of Original Documents" (Providence, 1855).

POTTER, Hazard Arnold, surgeon, b. in Pot-towship, Ontario (now Yates) co., N. Y., 21 Dec., 1819; d. in Geneva, N. Y., 2 Dec., 1889.
He was graduated at the medical department of Bow-doin College, 1842, and entered into the practice of his profession in Rhode Island, where he was kept too long in the same station. In 1855 he settled in Geneva, where he performed successfully many critical surgical operations, and in 1857 he called attention to the presence of arterial blood in the veins of parts that had been paralyzed in consequence of injury to the spinal cord. He trephined the spine for depressed fractures of the vertebrae of the fifth and sixth revertebrae in 1844, and subsequently he performed the same operation four times, twice successfully. Later he performed ligation of the carotid artery five times, four times successfully, and removed the upper jaw six times and the lower five times. Dr.
Potter was early convinced of the safety of operations within the abdominal cavity, and in 1845 per-fomed operations for the relief of inflammation of the bowels with perfect success. He removed fibrous tumors of the uterus from within the abdominal cavity five times, in three cases successfully. He experimented by ovariotomy twenty-two ovarian tumors, fourteen of them successfully, and in one of the successful cases both ovaries were removed at the same time. In another case, also successful, the operation was repeated upon the same patient twice with an interval of seventeen months. Dr. Potter served as regimental surgeon of the 50th New York engineers in 1862.

POTTER, Henry, lawyer, jurist, and former Governor of Granville county, N. C., in 1765; d. in Fayetteville, N. Y., 20 Dec., 1857.
He was educated as a lawyer, and was appointed in 1841 U. S. judge of the fifth circuit. In 1802 he became U. S. judge of the district of North Carolina, and he was on the bench for more than half a century. He was a trustee of the University of North Carolina from 1795 till his death. Judge Potter published "Duties of a Justice of the Peace" (Raleigh, 1810), and was associated with John L.
Taylor and Bartlett Yancey in the compilation of a revision of the "Law of the State of North Caro-lna" (2 vols., 1821).

POTTER, Israel Ralph, patriot, b. in Cran-ton, R. I., 1 Aug., 1744; d. there about 1826. He early left home to become a farmer in New Hampshire, after which he engaged in business with a family of surveyors as assistant chain-bearer. He next became a sailor on a ship that was burned at sea, but he was rescued by a Dutch vessel and continued his roaming career for nearly two years. In 1773 he returned home, and after working on a farm for several months enlisted in a regiment that was raised by Col. John Patterson. The battle of Lexington found him delirious, and after deliberately finishing the work, he joined his regiment at Charlestown. He fought with bravery at the battle of Bunker Hill, and, when his ammunition was ex-husted, seized a sword from a wounded officer and continued the contest until the close, when, having received two musket-bail wounds, he found his way to the hospital, on his recovery he volunteered as a seaman on the "Washington," one of the blockading fleet in front of Boston. Soon afterward his vessel was captured, and he was sent to England. On the voyage he formed a scheme to take the frigate, but was betrayed and put in irons.
When he arrived in England he was conveyed to Spitalfield and put on board of a hulk, but he escaped, and, in the garb of a beggar, found his way to London, where, after several attempts to get back to the United States, he was employed in New gardens, where the king held a conversation with him. After various experiences he was sent on a mission by friends of the colonies to Paris, where he met Benjamin Franklin, by whom he was sent back with replies.
On reaching England he sought employment in London, was married and gained a bare livelihood until 1824, when, by the influence of the American consul, he was able to return to Boston. He visited his former home, but the memory of his name had long since faded away. His application for a pension was refused, owing to his absence from the country when the pension law was passed; and so, after dictating an account of his experiences, he passed away. His memoirs published in Providence, in 1824, were sold by peddlers, and finally were entirely lost until a tattered copy fell into the hands of Herman Melville and was made the basis of his "Israel Potter: His Fifty Years of Exile" (New York, 1855).

POTTER, James, Revolutionary soldier, b. in Tyrone, Ireland, in 1729; d. in Centre county, Pa., in October, 1799. He came to this country with his father, John Potter, in 1741, and the family settled in Cumberland county, Pa., of which the father became high sheriff in 1750. At the age of twenty-five the son was a lieutenant in the border militia, and in 1755 he was a captain under Gen. Armstrong in the victorious Kittanning campaign, after which Armstrong and Potter were attached friends. In 1763-4 he served in the militia as major and lieutenant-colonel. He sympathized ardently with the colonies in their contest with the mother country, in 1775 was made a colonel, and in the following year was a member of the Provincial convention, of which Benjamin Franklin was president. In April, 1777, he was made a brigadier-general of Pennsylvania troops, and he remained in almost continuous service until the close of the war. In 1777, with the troops under his command in the counties of Philadelphia, Chester, and Delaware, he obtained important information for Washington, and prevented supplies reaching the enemy.

11 Dec., while the army under Washington was on its way to Valley Forge, after part of it had crossed the Schuylkill at Matson's ford, it was found that the enemy under Cornwallis were in force on the other side. "They were met," writes Washington, "by Gen. Potter, with part of the Pennsylvania militia, who, after several skirmishes, succeeded in every possible opposition until he was obliged to retreat from their superior numbers." In the spring of 1778 Washington wrote from Valley Forge: "If the state of Gen. Potter's affairs will admit of his returning to the army, I shall be exceedingly glad to see him, as his activity and vigilance have been much wanted during the winter. He was chosen a member of the supreme executive council of Pennsylvania in 1780, in 1781 became its vice-president, and in 1782 was a candidate for the presidency against John Dickinson, receiving thirty-two votes to Dickinson's forty-one. He became a member of the council of censors in 1784, and in 1785 one of the commissioners of rivers and streams. He was a farmer, and he left at his death large and valuable landed estates.

POTTER, John Fox, lawyer, b. in Augusta, Me., 11 May, 1817; d. in East Troy, Wis., 18 May, 1899. He was educated at Phillips Exeter academy, and was admitted to the bar. Settling in East Troy, Wis., he began the practice of his profession, and during the 1842-5 he was judge of Walworth county and in 1846 was sworn into the legislature of Wisconsin, and he was then elected as a Republican to congress, serving from 7 Dec., 1855, till 4 March, 1863. In 1860, after Owen Lovejoy's speech in congress, concerning the assassination of his brother, Elijah P. Lovejoy (q. v.), Mr. Potter, at the close of an angry discussion with Roger A. Pryor, was challenged to a duel by the latter. Mr. Potter chose Bowie-knives as the weapons, which were promptly objected to by the other side, and in consequence the matter was dropped. Considerable newspaper discussion followed. It is said that at the roll-call of congress at the time of the proposed meeting, when Potter's name was reached, the response came: He is keeping a Pryor engagement. The Pryor's name was called, the answer was: He has gone to be made into Potter's clay. In 1861 Mr. Potter was a delegate to the Peace congress, and on his defeat for reelection to congress he was tendered the governorship of Dakota. This offer he declined, and he received in 1863 the appointment of consul-general to British North America at Montreal, which he held until 1865.

POTTER, John S., actor, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1869; d. in Morris, Ill., 21 Feb., 1869. He was early apprenticed as a printer in the office of the Philadelphia "Gazette," but began to frequent the theatres, and soon joined the Bohemian dramatic club. He made his first appearance at the Washington circus in 1827, and then went to Pittsburg, where he played under the name of John Sharp. For several years he acted in various parts throughout the United States, but ultimately he became a manager, in which vocation he continued until his death.

Mr. Potter built the first theatre in Natchez, Miss., and was one of those in Fort Gibson in 1836, sold his half in 1836; in Natchez in 1837; in Jackson, Miss., in 1837; in Dubuque, Iowa, in 1839; in Chicago, Ill., in 1841; in Rochester, N. Y., in 1846; and in Cleveland, O., in 1848. He sailed for California in 1855, and remained on the Pacific coast until 1865, building theatres in California, Oregon, and Vancouver's island.}

POTTER, Joseph Haywood, soldier, b. in Concord, N. H., 12 Oct., 1822; d. in Columbus, Ohio, 1 Dec., 1892. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1843 in Grant's class. In 1843-5 he was engaged in garrison duty, and he then participated in the military occupation of Texas and the war with Mexico. He was engaged in the defense of Fort Brown, and was wounded in the battle of Resaca de la Palma, and Rosecrans in recruiting service, was promoted 1st lieutenant in the 7th infantry on 30 Oct., 1847, and served on garrison duty until 1856, becoming captain on 9 Jan. of that year. He accompanied the Utah expedition in 1858-59, and at the beginning of the civil war was on duty in Texas, where he was captured by the Confederates at Augustus Springs on 27 July, 1861, but he was exchanged on 16 Oct., 1862. The command of the 12th New Hampshire volunteers was given him, and he took part in the Maryland and Rappahannock campaigns with the Army of the Potomac, receiving his promotion of major in the regular army on 4 July, 1863. He took part in the battle of Fredericksburg, and at Chancellorsville was wounded and captured. His services in these two battles gained for him the brevets of lieutenant-colonel and colonel respectively. He was exchanged in October, 1863, and was assistant provost-marshal-general of Ohio until September, 1864, when he was assigned a brigade in the 18th corps of the Army of the James, with command of the Bermuda Hundred front during the attack on Petersburg. After the war he was assigned to command of brigade in the 24th corps and continued at the front as chief of staff of the 24th corps from January, 1865, until the surrender of Gen. Lee, receiving the brevet of brigadier-general in the U. S. army on 13 March, 1865, and promotion to brigadier-general of volunteers on 1 May, 1865. He was mustered out of the volunteer service on 15 Jan., 1866, and appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 39th infantry, 28 July same year. After holding various posts in the west he received his promotion as colonel on 11 Dec., 1873, and then continued with his regiment, with the exception of four years, from 1 July, 1877, to 1 July, 1881, when he was governor of the soldiers' home, Washington, D. C., until 1 April, 1894, when he was made brigadier-general in the regular army. He then had command of the Department of Missouri until his retirement on 12 Oct., 1896.

POTTER, Nathaniel, physician, b. in Carolina county, Md., in 1770; d. in Baltimore, Md., 2 Jan., 1843. He was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1796, and settled in Baltimore where he practised until his death. In 1807 he was associated with Dr. John B. Davidge and others in founding the College of medicine of Maryland, which in 1812 became the medical department of the University of Maryland, and he was its professor of the theory and practice of medicine until his death, and its dean in 1814. Dr. Potter was physician to the Baltimore general dispensary in 1805, and secretary of the medical and chirurgical faculty in 1802-9. He was a collaborator of the "American Journal of the Medical Sciences," in 1811 edited the "Baltimore Medical and Philosophical Lyceum," a quarterly periodical, and in 1839-43 was editor of the "Maryland Medical and Surgical Journal." Besides numerous medical papers, he issued "Medical Properties," and "Letters to the Arsenic Correspondents" (Baltimore, 1805); "A Memoir on Contagion, more especially as it respects the Yellow Fever" (1818); and "On the Locusta Septentrionalis" (1839); and he edited, with notes, critical and explanatory, John Armstrong's "Practical Illustrations of The Typhus Fever" (Baltimore, 1821), also, with Samuel Calhoun, two editions of George Gregory's "Elements of Theory and Practice of Medicine" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1826-9).

POTTER, Platt, jurist, b. in Galway, N. Y., 6 April, 1800; d. in Schenectady, 11 Aug., 1891. He was graduated at Schenectady academy, and, after studying law, was admitted in 1824 to the bar. Settling in Miniverly, he followed his profession there until 1833, when he removed to Schenectady and entered upon private practice. Meanwhile he had been elected to the assembly in 1830, and attracted attention by his speech in favor of the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt. From 1839 till 1847 he was district attorney for Schenectady county, and at the same time master and examiner in chancery, having been appointed to those offices in 1838, and continuing to exercise the functions of his position until discharge by the courts in chancery about 1847. He was elected justice of the supreme court in 1837, and re-elected in 1865 without opposition, also serving as judge of the court of appeals. His judicial services during the civil war were of the utmost value to the government, and his written opinions and judgments bear testimony to his abundant legal knowledge. He was a member of the assembly for refusing to answer a subpoena, and for this action Judge Potter was brought before that body on an accusation of "high breach of privilege"; but he completely vindicated his course, and was discharged. His argument was issued by the bar in pamphlet-form (Albany, 1870), and he received numerous voluntary letters of commendation from eminent jurists throughout the United States. During the same year he was chosen president of the State judicial convention in Rochester. Later in life he was president of the Mohawk national bank of Schenectady. In 1865 he was elected a trustee of Union college, which office he filled for twenty years, and in 1867 the degree of LL. D., was conferred upon him by that body. He alsoดำนักวิชาการและนักวิจัยในภาคพื้นที่รัฐนอร์ฟอลก้า, แคนาดา, 12 June, 1848. He was educated in the public schools of Canada and Michigan, and graduated at Maynooth and commercial college in 1853. In 1856 he entered upon the study of law, and was a pastor in the Methodist Episcopal church in 1863-77. He was associate editor of the "Michigan Christian Advocate" in 1877-84, and has been editor-in-chief since the latter year. Mr. Potts received the degree of M. A. from Northwestern university in 1882, and that of D. D. from Albion college in 1885. He is the author of "The Methodist, the Field, or Pastor and People" (New York, 1889); "Golden Dawn, or Light on the Great Future" (Philadelphia, 1880); "Spiritual Life, its Nature and Excellence" (New York, 1884); "Our Thorns and Crowns" (Philadelphia, 1884); "Perrine's Principles of Church Government," with additions (New York, 1884); and "Faith made Easy, or what to Believe and Why" (Cincinnati, 1888).
POTTS, John, Canadian clergyman, b. in Maguire's Bridge, County Fermanghat, Ireland, in 1838. He emigrated to Canada at an early age, and engaged in mercantile pursuits in Kingston and Hamilton, but after a course in Victoria college he was ordained as a Methodist minister in 1861. After being stationed at London and Yorkville he was chosen, in 1866, as the first pastor of a church that had been erected in Hamilton to commemorate the centenary of American Methodism. He afterward was pastor of churches at Montreal and Toronto. He is an eloquent preacher, and one of the best-known clergymen of his denomination in Canada. He is a member of the board and senate of Victoria university and the Montreal theological college. In 1878 the Wesleyan university of Ohio gave him the degree of D. D.

POTTS, Jonathan, surgeon, b. in Popedom, Berks co., Pa., 1 April, 1745; d. in Reading, Pa., in October, 1781. He was a son of John Potts, the founder of Pottstown, Pa. After receiving a classical education, he went with Dr. Benjamin Rush to Edinburgh, Scotland, for medical study, and after his return he was graduated, in 1748, a bachelor of medicine at the College of Philadelphia, at the first granting of medical degrees in the country, and in 1771 received the degree of M. D. His Latin thesis on the latter occasion, "De Faberibus Intermittentibus Potentissimis Tertianis," was published (Philadelphia, 1771). From 1748 till his death he was a member of the American philosophical society. He began the practice of medicine at Reading. Upon Potts partly identified himself with the struggle for independence, and was secretary of the Berks county committee of safety, and a member of the Provincial convention at Philadelphia, 23 Jan., 1775. In 1775 he was appointed surgeon for Canada and Lake George, and returned with Gen. Gates to Pennsylvania. In general orders, dated 28 Dec., 1776, Gen. Putnam directed that all officers that were in charge of any sick soldiers should "make return to Dr. Jonathan Potts, at Mr. John Biddle's, in Market street." Soon after this order was issued Dr. Potts was in service at the battle of Princeton. Dr. Potts was appointed in April, 1777, medical director-general of the northern department, and in 1778 he was commissioned colonel of one of the Pennsylvania battalions. Another brother, John, studied law at the Temple, London, became a judge in the city of Philadelphia, and, sympathizing with the mother country, went to Halifax, Nova Scotia, but returned after the war. Another brother, Isaac, is said to have been the person that discovered Washington at prayer in the woods at Valley Forge, in 1777. Another brother, Nathan, was Washington's headquarters at the latter place. See "Potts Memorial," by Mrs. Thomas Potts James.

POTTS, Richard, member of the Continental congress, b. in Upper Marlborough, Prince George co., Md., in July, 1733; d. in Frederick county, Md., 26 Nov., 1804. He studied law at Annapolis, and afterward removed to Frederick county, where he practised till his death. He was clerk of the county committee of observation in 1756, clerk of the county court in 1777, and member of the house of delegates in 1779-80 and 1787-8. He was a delegate to the Continental congress in 1781, became state attorney for Frederick, Montgomery, and Washington counties, Md., in 1784, was a member of the Maryland convention of 1788 that ratified the constitution of the United States, and in 1789 was commissioned by Gen. Washington U. S. attorney for Maryland. He became chief justice of the county court of the 3d judicial district in 1791, and was a U. S. senator in 1797-98. From 1801 till 1804 he was associate justice of the Maryland court of appeals. Princevive gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1805.

POTTS, Stacy Gardner, jurist, born in Harrisburg, Pa., 9 Nov., 1799; d. in Trenton, N. J., 9 April, 1865. He became editor of the "Emporium," a weekly newspaper, in Trenton, N. J., in 1831, was admitted to the bar in 1837, and was in the legislature in 1838-39. He became clerk of the New Jersey chancery court in 1831, held office ten years, and then retired on account of delicate health. He was a commissioner to revise the laws of New Jersey in 1845, became judge of the court of appeals in 1852, and retired in 1859. Princeton awarded him the degree of D. D. in 1851. He was active in the affairs of the Presbyterian church, and in 1851, was chairman of the finance committee of that body. After leaving the bench he devoted himself to literary pursuits. His publications include "Village Tales" (Philadelphia, 1827) and "Precedents and Notes of Practice in the New Jersey Chancery Court" (1841), and he left in manuscript a work entitled "The Temperance Movement in the United States."

—His brother, William Stephens, clergyman, b. in Northumberland county, Pa., 13 Oct., 1802; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 25 March, 1852, learned the printer's trade, subsequently studied under Rev. Ezra S. Ely in Philadelphia, and was a student at Princeton theological seminary in 1825-7. He was pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church of St. Louis, Mo., in 1828-33, president of Marion college for the subsequent four years, founded the 2d Presbyterian church of St. Louis in 1838, and was its pastor till his death. Marion gave him the degree of D. D. in 1838. He published several sermons.

POUCHOT, M. (poosh-o), soldier, b. in Grenoble, France, in 1712; d. in Corsica, 8 May, 1799. He entered the engineer corps of the French army in 1739, served with the French, Swiss, and Dutch in Flanders, and Germany. He accompanied the Marquis de Montcalm to Canada, and assisted in the defense of Forts Niagara and Levis. He is the author of "Memoirs of the War of 1755-90 in North America" (Paris, 3 vols., 1784), which has been translated into English, and edited by Franklin B. Hough (2 vols., New York, 1890). In this work he speaks of observing oil-springs in northwestern Pennsylvania, probably the first mention of that petroleum field on record.

POULSON, Zachariah, publisher, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 Sept., 1761; d. there, 31 July, 1844. His father, of the same name, was brought from Denmark to Philadelphia in infancy, and became a printer. In 1793 he was in partnership with Samuel Sower, in whose printing establishment at Germantown, Pa., was printed, in German, the first edition of the Bible published in the United States. For many years he was printer to the senate of Pennsylvania. On 1 Oct., 1800, he began the publication of the "American Daily Advertiser," the first daily newspaper in the United States, which he had purchased from David C. Claypoole, and he continued as its editor and proprietor till its discontinuance, 28 Dec., 1836. He issued "Poulson's Town and Country Almanac" (1789-1801), and was the publisher of Robert Proctor's "History of Pennsylvania" (1792-98), the mystical works of William Gerard de Bruyn, and other valuable books. He was a founder and president of the Philadelphia society for alleviating the miseries of public prisons, and a member and benefactor of various other benevolent associations. He was also for twenty-one years librarian of the Library company of Philadelphia, six years its treasurer, and thirty-two years its first clerk of the city, by Thomas Sally, hangs in its hall in that city.

POUNDMAKER, Indian chief, b. near Battleford, Northwest territory, British America, in 1826; d. at Gleichen, near Calgary, 4 July, 1886. As chief of the Cree nation, he first came into public notice in connection with the war of the Marquis of Lorne, governor-general of Canada, and his party through the northwest in 1881, when he acted as their guide from Battleford to Calgary. Believing that the Canadian government was false to its promise of relief to the Indians, he was induced by Louis Riel (q. v.) to take the field with the warriors of his nation. At the battle of Cut Knife Creek, thirty-five miles from Battleford, with 359 Indian warriors, he displayed great valor and was conspicuous in the victory. Col. Otter at bay for more than four hours. Though the fight was indecisive and the losses about equal, Col. Otter thought it expedient to retire to Battleford. On another occasion Poundmaker surprised and captured a supply train which was carrying provisions to the troops. After the battle of Batache and the capture of Riel, Poundmaker, after giving up the prisoners that he had surrendered himself to Gen. Middleton. He was subsequently sent to Regina, tried for the part he took in the rebellion, and sentenced on 18 Aug., 1885, to three years' imprisonment in the Stony Mountain penitentiary. In reply to a question by the judge, Poundmaker said: "I am a man, do as you like, I am in your power; I gave myself up; you could not catch me." After sentence was pronounced, he asked to be hanged at once, as he preferred death to imprisonment. He was released after a year's confinement, and died while on a visit to Crowfoot, chief of the Blackfoot Indians, his relative by marriage. He was of genial disposition, possessed considerable intellectual force and keenness of perception, and was devotedly attached to his people.

POURTALES, Louis François de (poor-tallay), naturalist, b. in Neuchâtel, Switzerland, 4 March, 1824; d. in Beverly Farms, Mass., 19 July, 1890. He was educated as an engineer, but an early predilection for natural science led to his becoming a favorite pupil of Louis Agassiz, whom he accompanied in 1840 on his glacial explorations among the Alps. In 1847 he came with Agassiz to the United States and made his home in East Boston, and then in Cambridge, Mass. Pourtales entered the U. S. coast survey in 1848, and continued attached to that service until 1873. In 1851 he served in the triangulation of the Florida reef, and at that time collected numerous gobyfishes and holothurians, which led to his special study of the bed of the ocean. He has been director of the dredging in this country, and he lived to see that he had paved the way for similar researches both here and abroad. On the Hassler expedition from Massachusetts bay through the Straits of Magellan to California he had entire charge of the dredging operations. In 1854 he was placed in special charge of the southern part of the Grande division of the coast survey, where he remained until his resignation. His most valuable work was in connection with marine zoology, and the large collections that he made were deposited in the Museum of comparative zoology in Cambridge. Their examination has resulted in special reports upon echinoderms, corals, crinoids, tunicata, sponges, annelids, hydroids, bryozoa, mollusks, and crustaceans, by the most eminent investigators of America and Europe, which were published principally in the Proceedings of the Boston Society of natural history.

POUSIN, Guillaume Tell Vallayé (poos-sang), French soldier, b. in France about 1735; d. after 1830. He accompanied Gen. Simon Bernard to the United States after the fall of Napoleon, and on 6 March, 1817, became assistant topographical engineer in the United States army, with rank of captain, and aide to Gen. Bernard. He was promoted topographical engineer, with rank of major, 15 Jan., 1829, but resigned, 31 July, 1832. He had become a naturalized citizen of this country, but returned to France, where he took an active part in the establishment of the republic of 1848, and in 1848-9 he was its minister to the United States. Among other works he published "Travaux d'approfondissement inépuisables des premiers explorateurs sur le gouvernement général des États-Unis d'Amérique de 1782 à 1831" (Paris, 1834); "Considérations sur le principe démocratique qui régit l'Union Américaine, et de la possibilité de son application à d'autres États" (1841); and "De la puissance Américaine : origine, institutions, esprit, politique, ressources des États-Unis" (2 vols., 1843; English translation by E. L. Du Barry, M. D., Philadelphia, 1851).

POTRCOURT, Jean de Biencourt (poon-troo), Sieur de, French soldier, b. in France in 1557; d. in Mery-sur-Seine in 1615. He followed De Monts to Canada in 1603, and was subsequently made lieutenant by the latter. He obtained a grant of Port Royal in 1604, but gave his principal attention to trading with the Indians, and neglected the colony that he had established there. He returned to France in the following year, and, in pursuance of an agreement with De Monts, equipped a vessel with supplies for the settlers, and sailed from La Rochelle on 13 May, 1605. After fortifying Port Royal, he accompanied Champlain on an exploring expedition as far as Port Fortune (Chatham), which was not productive of many useful results. He returned to France in 1606, and was confirmed by the king in 1607, and he was desired at the same time to work for the conversion of the Indians, and to receive the Jesuits as missionaries. He felt a strong dislike for that order, and, on the ground that Port Royal was in no condition to receive the missionaries, begged them to postpone their departure, and then sailed for Acadia in 1608. He afterward wrote letters to the pope and the French court describing wholesale conversions that had been made by himself and deprecating the necessity of sending out Jesuits. In 1610 Madame de Guercheville formed a partnership with him, according to the terms of which Jesuit missionaries that she should send out were to be supported from the proceeds of the fishery and fur-trade. They were badly received on their arrival, and the suspicions that Poutrincourt entertained of them did not subside, and he hanged them. He returned to France in 1612, had a serious quarrel with Madame de Guercheville on this subject, and appears to have been imprisoned for some time about this period. Poutrincourt sailed for Acadia after the English abandoned it in 1614, but made no effort to rebuild Port Royal, returned home, and entered the French service. His son, Biscour, afterward called Poutrincourt, remained in Acadia, and died there in 1623 or 1624.

POVEDA, Francisco (poy-vay-dahl), Cuban poet, b. in Havana in October, 1766; d. in Sagua in 1881. When very young he went to Sagua la Grande, a small inland town, where he spent his life, becoming educated by himself. He acted as a teacher. He has published several collections of poems, including “Guarimba Hubamera,” “Ramillete Poetico,” and “El tiple campesino,” which are known throughout the island by the country people; “Las Rosas de Amor” (1831); “LEYENDAS CUBANAS” (1840); a complete collection of his songs and poems (1850; 2d ed., 1879); and “European” (1879). Poedva, as performed in 1879. Poveda was known under the name of the “Trovador Cubano,” or the Cuban troubadour, on account of his popularity and the nature of his poems.

POWEL, Samuel, mayor of Philadelphia, b. in Philadelphia in 1739; d. there, 29 Sept., 1785. He was graduated in 1759 at the College of Phila- delphia, University of Pennsylvania, served several years in the city council, was a justice of the common pleas and quarter sessions courts, and in 1775 was chosen mayor, being the last under the charter of 1701. He continued in office until the military authorities took municipal matters into their own hands, and after the Revolution, under the new charter, he was, in 1789, again chosen mayor. In 1780 he subscribed $5,000 for the provisioning of the army. He was the speaker of the Pennsylvania senate in 1792, one of the early members of the American philosophical society, from 1773 till his death a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania, one of the founders, and, in 1783, first president of the Philadelphia society for promoting agriculture, and manager of the Pennsylvania hospital. His wife, Elizabeth Willing, was a sister of Thomas Willing, the partner of Robert Morris.

—Her nephew, John Hare, agriculturist, b. in Philadelphia, 22 April, 1780; d. in Newport, R. I., 14 June, 1836, was originally named John Powell Hare, and he was own brother to Dr. Robert Hare (q. v.), but he was adopted by his aunt, Mrs. Powell, and at his majority assumed her name by act of legislature. He was educated at the College of Philadelphia, became a successful merchant, and, going abroad for pleasure, became secretary of the U. S. legation in London, under William Pinckney. While there, according to Charles Graville in his memoirs, he was “the handsomest man ever seen.” He returned in December, 1811, served as brigade-major of volunteers under Gen. Thomas Caldwell, and from December, 1814, till June, 1815, was inspector-general with the rank of colonel in the regular army. He subsequently, at the de- sire of his family, refused a brigadier-general’s commission in the Colombian service, and passed the remainder of his life in efforts to develop agriculture and improve the breed of domestic animals in the United States. He was one of the founders of the Pennsylvania agricultural society in 1823, and its secretary till 1824, corresponded actively with English agriculturists, and imported many valuable animals, and good stock of breeding, and a patron of the fine arts. He was a member of the Pennsylvania senate in 1827–30, and a delegate to the Free-trade convention of 1832. He published many papers in the “Memoirs of the Pennsylvania Agricultural Society”; “Hints for American Husbandman” (Philadelphia, 1827); pamphlets entitled “Reply to Pickering’s Attack upon a Pennsylvania Farmer” (1825), and “Remarks on the Proper Termination of the Columbia Railroad” (1836); and many essays in agricultural periodicals.

POWELL, Aaron Macy, reformer, b. in Clinton, Dutchess co., N. Y., 26 March, 1832. He was educated in public schools and in the state normal school, but left before graduation to take part in the anti-slavery movement. He was agent for the American anti-slavery society from 1852 till 1856, editor of the “National Anti-Slavery Standard” from that time till 1870, and then of the “National Standard” till 1872, and since that year has been secretary of the National temperance society and editor of the “National Temperance Advocate.” In 1858 he also took charge of the Philanthropic Bureau. Mr. Powell was a delegate to the International prison congress in London in 1872, and to those for the abolition of state regulation of vice, in Geneva in 1877, the Hague in 1883, and London in 1886. He is the author of “State Regulation of Vice” (New York, 1878).

POWELL, Henry Watson, British soldier, b. in England, 1753; d. at Balbec, near Geneva, 24 July, 1814. He became a captain in the 64th foot in 1776, served in the West Indies in 1778, and was stationed in this country in 1780. He became lieutenant-colonel in 1771, participated in Gen. John Burgoyne’s expedition in 1777, with the rank of brigadier-general, and in July of the latter year, after the evacuation of Fort Ticonderoga, was placed in command of that post, and successfully defended it against New Hampshire and Connecticut militia. In 1801 he became a general.

POWELL, John Wesley, geologist, b. in Mount Morris, N. Y., 24 March, 1834. He is the son of a Methodist clergyman, and passed his early life in various places in Ohio, Wisconsin, and Illinois. For a time he studied in Illinois college, and he subsequently entered Wheaton college, but in 1854 he followed a special course at Oberlin, also teaching at intervals in public schools. His first inclinations were toward the natural sciences, particularly natural history and geology, and he spent much of his time in making collections, which he placed in various institutions of learning in Illinois. The Illinois natural history society elected him its secretary and extended to him facilities for prosecuting his researches. At the beginning of the civil war he enlisted as a private in the 29th Illinois volunteers, and he rose to be lieutenant-colonel of the 24 Illinois artillery. He lost his right arm at the battle of Shiloh, but soon afterward he returned to his regiment and continued in active service until the close of the war. In 1865 he became professor of geology and curator of the museum in Illinois Wesleyan university, Bloomington, but he resigned to accept a similar post in Illinois normal university. During the summer of 1866 he conducted the mountains of Colorado with his class for the purpose of studying geology, and so began a practice that has been continued by eminent teachers elsewhere. On this expedition he formed the idea of exploring the canons of the Colorado, and a year later he organized a party for that purpose. The journey lasted more than three months and they passed through numerous perilous experiences, living for part of the time on half rations. Maj. Powell's success in this undertaking resulted in the establishment by congress in 1870 of a topographical and geological survey of the Colorado river of the West and its tributaries, which was placed under his direction. During the following years a systematic survey was conducted, until the physical features of the Colorado valley, embracing an area of nearly 100,000 square miles, had been thoroughly explored. This expedition, at first conducted under the auspices of the Smithsonian institution, was transferred to the department of the interior, and given the title of the geographical and geological survey of the Rocky mountain region. In 1874 four separate surveys were in the field, and in 1879, after much agitation, the National academy of sciences recommended the establishment under the department of the interior of an independent organization to be known as the U. S. geological survey. Action to this effect was at once taken by congress, and Clarence King (q. v.) was appointed director. From the beginning of 1875 Maj. Powell was the leading advocate of consolidation. Meanwhile he had devoted more attention to American ethnology in the prosecution of his work than the other surveys had done. He had collected material on this subject which he had deposited with the Smithsonian institution, and had already issued three volumes as "Contributions to North American Ethnology." In order to prevent the discontinuance of this work, a bureau of ethnology, which has become the recognized centre of ethnographic operations in the United States, was established under the direction of the Smithsonian institution. Maj. Powell was given charge of the work, and has since continued at its head, issuing annual reports and bulletins. In 1881 Mr. King resigned the directorship of the U. S. geological survey, and Maj. Powell was appointed his successor. Since that time he has ably administered the work of this great enterprise, which includes, besides special investigations in geology, the general study of economic geology, paleontology, and geography. In connection with the survey there is also a chemical laboratory, where the necessary analytical work is conducted. Maj. Powell received the degree of Ph. D. from the University of Heidelberg in 1886, and also during the same year that of L. L. D. from Harvard, and he is a member of many scientific societies. In 1889 he was elected to the National academy of sciences, and he was president of the Anthropological society of Washington from its organization in 1879 till 1888. He became a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science in 1855, president of the society in 1881, delivering an address on "Mythologic Philosophy," and in 1887 was elected to the presidency. His publications include many scientific papers and addresses, and numerous government volumes that bear his name, including the reports of the various surveys, the bureau of ethnology, and the U. S. geological survey. The special volumes that bear his own name are "Exploration of the Colorado River of the West and its Tributaries explored in 1869-72" (Washington, 1875); "Report on the Geology of the Eastern Portion of the Uinta Mountains and a Region of Country Adjacent Thereto" (1876); "Report on the Lands of the Arid Region of the United States" (1879); and "Introduction to the Study of Indian Languages, with Words, Phrases, and Sentences for use among the Mormons."" many years, aiding Leigh Hunt, William Wordsworth, and Richard H. Horne in their "Modernization of Chaucer," and Horne in his new "Spirit of the Age" (London, 1844). He came to this country in 1849, and from that date till his death was connected with Frank Leslie's publications. He was the first editor of "Frank Leslie's Weekly," which he established in 1853, and of "Frank Leslie's Ladies' Magazine" in 1857. He was subsequently connected also with various short-lived journals in New York city, and wrote several plays that were successfully produced in New York and London. His publications in this country include "The Living Authors in Great Britain" (New York, 1849); "The Living Authors in America" (1855); "The Pilgrims of the Living Authors of Great Britain" (1851).

POWELL, Walken, Canadian legislator, b. in Norfolk county, Ont., 20 May, 1825. His paternal grandfather, a loyalist, was born in the province of New York in 1763 and died in Norfolk in 1849, and his father (1801-32) was a warden of Norfolk county, a lieutenant-colonel of militia, and represented Norfolk county in the legislative assembly of Canada from 1849 till 1847. Walker Powell was educated at Victoria college, and afterward engaged in commercial enterprises. In 1856 he was warden of Norfolk county, and its representative in the Cananda assembly from 1857 till 1861. After a long previous connection with the Canadian militia, Mr. Powell was appointed adjutant-general of Upper Canada, 19 Aug., 1862; deputy adjutant-general for the Dominion at headquarters, 1 Oct., 1863; acting adjutant-general, 22 Aug., 1873; and adjutant-general, 21 April, 1875, which appointment he recently resigned.

POWELL, William Byrld, physician, b. in Bourbon county, Ky., 8 Jan., 1799; d. in Henderson, Ky., 3 July, 1861. He was appointed, at Transylvania university in 1829, and at the medical department there in 1833, devoted himself to the study of the physiology of the brain, and prosecuted his investigations among the Indian tribes, professing to read the temperament from an examination of the cranium alone. He became professor of chemistry in the Medical college of Louisiana, in 1848, and of materia medica in the Medical college of the University of the State of New York, in 1853. In 1880, he was elected professor of materia medica in the University of Wisconsin, with charge of the newly established department of pharmacy. Dr. Power is a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, and a member of the chemical society of Berlin, and other scientific associations. Besides writing chemical papers in professional journals, he was associated in the authorship of "Manual of Chemical Analysis" (Philadelphia, 1863); translated and edited Flückiger's "Chemisch Barks" (1884), and an American edition of Flückiger's and Tschich's "Principles of Pharmacognosy" (New York, 1857); and undertook the preparation of an American edition of Flückiger's "Pharmaceutical Chemistry."

POWER, Lawrence Geoffrey, Canadian senator, b. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, in August, 1841. His father, Patrick Power, represented Halifax county in the Dominion parliament in 1867-72 and in 1874-8. The son was educated at St. Mary's college, Halifax, Carlow college, and the Catholic university, Ireland, and at Harvard law-school, where he was graduated in 1865. He was for ten years a member of the board of school commissioners of Halifax, and is a member of the senate of the University of Halifax, and an examiner in law in that institution. He is a Reformer in politics, and was called to the Dominion senate, 2 Feb., 1857. Mr. Power was actively engaged in preparing "The and sacrificed all his means in his unsuccessful enter-prise. Eventually he returned home to resume his connection with the theatre, and for several years filled subordinate parts at different London play-houses. At this time he proffered his services to several American managers as a leading performer in juvenile tragedy. Some years afterward, while playing with the Covent garden company, he was given the Irish character of O'Shaughnessy, in the face of "The 4000 Foot," and in the perfection of which he made such perfection that it marked out his true line of characters. During his last engagement at the Haymarket theatre, Power's salary was advanced to £150 per week. He visited the United States on two occasions, from 1833 until 1835, and from 1839 until 1841, and met with extraordinary success.

He made his American début at the Park theatre in New York city on 28 Aug., 1833, in the plays of "The Irish Ambassador" and "Tally the Tiler." His last appearance was at the same house on 9 March, 1841. Among the dramas in which he performed were "The Nervous Man and Man of Nerve," "Paddy Carey," "St. Patrick's Eve," "The Irish Tutor," "The White Horse of the Peppers," "Rory O'More," and "Of Flanigan and the Fairies." Some of these were written for him; others were dramatized by himself. He left New York for Liverpool on the steamer "President" on 11 March, 1841. Three days later the vessel was met on the ocean, but it was never heard of afterward. Power was an easy actor, endowed with wit and humor, set off by vocal ability and a rich Irish brogue. He was the intimate friend of Fritz Greene Halleck and other well-known literary men. His publications include "Impressions of America" (2 vols. London, 1835); "The King's Secret" (1831); and "The Lost Hair" (1839).
of the Tribe," also known as "The Indian Girl"; (1872). Of his ideal busts the best known are "Ginevra" (1840); "Prosperine" (1845); "Psyche" (1849); "Diana" (1852); "Christ" (1856); "Faith" (1861); "Clytie" (1859); and "Hope" (1859), and "Charity" (1857). The greater part of his work consists of busts of distinguished men, including John Quincy Adams, Andrew Jackson, Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, John Marshall, and Martin Van Buren (1853); Edward Everett and John Preston (1845); and Henry W. Longfellow and Philip H. Sheridan (1855). He executed also statues for Washington for Louisiana, of Daniel Webster for Massachusetts, of John C. Calhoun for South Carolina, of Benjamin Franklin (1862) and Thomas Jefferson (1863). Powers had much mechanical skill, and was the author of several useful inventions, among which is a process of modelling in plaster which greatly expedites the labor of the sculptor by doing away with the necessity of making a clay model.—His son, Preston, b. in Florence, Italy, 9 April, 1843, studied modelling under his father in 1855-7. His most important work was the statue of Jacob Colman (1855), which was originally ordered of his father. It was placed in the old hall of representatives in Washington. He executed also, in 1881, a statue of Reuben Springer for Music Hall, Cincinnati. Like his father, he works principally in portraiture, and has made numerous busts, including those of LaGuadagni in the collection at Catanzaro; John O. Whittier, in the Public Library, Haverhill, and a replica in the Boston public library; Emanuel Swedenberg, four times repeated; Charles Sumner, owned by Bowdoin college; Ulysses S. Grant, in the war department, Washington; and Langdon Cheves. Of his ideal works the figures "Maud Muldrow" and "Maud Mecubin," in the Boston Public Library; "Miss D. Amis" and "Miss Wahnsonook." The name Powhatan is derived from his early home at the falls of James river, near the site of Richmond. By his prowess and ability he rose from an ordinary chief to the command of thrity tribes, that numbered 8,000 persons, and occupied the lands between James and York rivers. The site of his principal village is now occupied by the town of Shelby, on the north side of York river, about fifteen miles from Jamestown, in the county of Gloucester. He had a guard of forty warriors, and was always attended by a sentinel at night. In 1599, when Capt. Newport and Capt. John Smith, with thrity of the colonists, visited him, to treat for a supply of food, he received them with hospitable welcome. He was then a stalwart, gray-haired, and seemingly about sixty years old, with several wives, and a family of twenty sons and ten daughters. In the intercourse between the whites and Indians, both parties endeavored to overreach each other. One of Smith's trades was the exchange of two pounds of blue glass beads for 200 bushels of Indian corn. When Capt. Newport returned to Virginia from England, he brought with him a gilded crown for the great sachem, and at the ceremony of coronation Powhatan was declared "Emporer of the Indies." As an acknowledgment of the honor conferred, Newport was decked with a worn mantle, and received a pair of cast-off meccasorns. About a year later Capt. Smith made an attempt to capture the war emperor, in order to obtain a fresh supply of Indian corn. In retaliation, Powhatan prepared to destroy the English settlement; but his purpose was frustrated by the timely warning that was given the colonists by his daughter Pocahontas. He never trusted the white settlers, never visited Jamestown, and on the occasion of the marriage of a colony daughter to a Puritan representative, his daughter, Pocahontas, Indian princess, b. about 1595; d. in Gravesend, England, 21 March, 1617, was partial to the white people, and, it is believed, in 1617, when she was only twelve years of age, saved the life of Capt. John Smith. He had been taken prisoner by some of the tribe under Oceahanough, who sent him to his brother, Powhatan. On the trial of Smith, Powhatan was seated in an armchair of boughs, with a daughter of each sex at his feet. There were present about 200 warriors and many women. When he was about to be executed, Pocahontas threw herself over Smith's prostrate body, to shield him from destruction, and her subsequent intercession with Powhatan saved his life. This event is said to have taken place at Shelby, in Gloucester county. Smith's account, given in his "General History of Virginia," is discredited by Charles Deane, LL. D., in his edition of Smith's "True Relation," and by the Rev. Edward D. Neill, in his "History of the Virginia Company of London," on the ground that the incident is not mentioned in Smith's earlier

The Indian had been for some weeks friendly, and the child Pocahontas was often seen dancing and capering, much to the amusement of the colonists, among whom she was a general favorite. In 1612 Pocahontas dwelt away from her father, with one of his tributary bands, when Capt. Samuel Argall bribed their leader, for a copper kettle, to betray her into his hands; that he might treat advantageously with Powhatan, for her release. But nothing came of this nefarious transaction. During Pocahontas's captivity in Jamestown an attachment arose between her and a young widower, John Rolfe. She was baptized in the small village chapel, on 5 April, 1613, and not long afterward, in 1614, they were married by the Rev. Alexander Whittaker. The ceremony was witnessed by the colonists, her brothers, and other Indians, and Powhatan sent his consent. Pocahontas wore a tunic of white muslin, covered with a red cloth and a turban made by herself, her forehead was decked with a glittering band, her hair with feathers, and she wore the white bridal veil. This event produced a peace of many years' duration. Pocahontas's Indian name was Mataoka; at her baptism she was christened Rebecca. In 1616, at the end of April, Mr. and Mrs. John Rolfe bade farewell to the colony, and, under the protection of Sir Thomas Dale, in company with several Indian men and women, sailed for England. On their arrival, on 12 June, the "Lady Rebecca," as she was called, was entertained by the bishop of London, visited by Sir Walter Raleigh, and presented by Lady De la Warr, as an Indian princess, at the court of King James. She was graciously received and royally entertained; but she was displeased with her husband, Rolfe, for venturing to marry "the daughter of an emperor," before obtaining the royal consent. The "Lady Rebecca" appeared at the London theatres and other public places, and was an object of much interest with the people. "La Belle Sauvage" became a favorite name for taverns. On the eve of her return to this country she was suddenly attacked by small-pox, and died. Her remains were buried in Gravesend. The church register describes her erroneously as the "wife of Thomas Rolfe." She had never learned to write. Among the many memorials of Pocahontas is a stained-glass window placed by her descendants in St. Luke's Episcopal church, Smithfield, Va., representing her in the accompanying illustration. It is the oldest Protestant print edifice on this continent, having been built of imported brick in 1632. Since the destruction of the cathedral at St. Augustine, Fla., it is, with the exception of the adobe cathedral at Santa Fe, the most ancient Christian monument in this country. John Rolfe, her husband, had been advanced to the office of secretary, recorder-general of Virginia, and as such returned to the colony. Pocahontas had one son, Thomas, born in England, who was educated by his uncle, Henry, a London merchant. On attaining manhood, he followed his father to Virginia, as a tobacco-planter, and became opulent and distinguished. He left an only daughter, from whom sprang the Virginia families of Rolfe, Fleming, Murray, Guy, Robertson, Whittle, and Elbridge, and the branch of Randolphs from which John Randolph, of Roanoke, was descended. John Randolph was proud of his direct descent from the Indian princess, and some of his traits are ascribed to this origin. Among Rolfe's descendants is the present bishop of Virginia, Dr. Francis M. Whittle, who lately confirmed a class of Indian youth at Hampton (formerly Kecoughtan), where Pochino, brother of Pocahontas, was commander.

POWALL. Thomas, statesman, b. in Lincoln, England, in 1724; d. in Bath, 25 Feb., 1805. His father had been connected with the English civil service in India, and his brother John was long the secretary to the lords of trade and plantations. Thomas first came to this country in October, 1753, as private secretary to Sir Danyers Osborne, royal governor of New York. In 1754 he attended the Albany congress, in what capacity is not understood, but it is presumed to have been private agent of the colonial authorities in London. While in Albany he first perceived, as it by inspiration, the drift of American political tendencies. He next advocated the delimitation of the French and English possessions in America, and a neutral Indian territory between them. In 1755 he was appointed commissioner for Massachusetts, in negotiations with the colonial authorities in New York, concerning military operations against the French, and in the same year he was made lieutenant-governor of New Jersey. He was present at the meeting of the colonial governor with Gen. Edward Braddock at Alexandria. In 1757 Pownall was made governor of Massachusetts, to succeed Shirley. The accompanying engraving represents his residence in the old Province house, his residence in Boston. While conducting the government of that province, he built the fort that was named after him, on Penobscot river, and was active in the military campaign against the French. In 1759 he was appointed governor of South Carolina, but he never assumed the government of that colony, as he returned to England and was almost immediately elected to parliament. He was next made "director-general of control," and joined the English force in Germany.

After the peace of Paris he was again returned to parliament, where he sat almost continuously till 1781. He was the firm and consistent friend of the American idea. In 1767 he opposed parliamentary taxation of the colonies. In 1774 he voted for the peace, he was the first to announce that England's "sovereignty over America was gone forever," and he then advocated a commercial treaty in order to frustrate French influence. He was the first member of parliament to bring in a bill for peace with the colonies. Soon after the Albany congress Pownall formulated a plan for a

English-speaking empire whose seat of authority was ultimately to be in this country. He believed that the Americans had constitutional rights with the English in England, and his wonderful sagacity, penetrating the future so clearly as to make him something of a soothsayer, led him to a visionary to contemporary "practical politicians," made him anticipate the political preponderance of the English race in America. Because he was wedded neither to the American plan for independence of England nor to the English plan for colonial submission to the political empire in London, he failed to exert on his contemporaries all the influence that his singular ability warranted. Yet he always was considered in parliament the chief authority on all exact questions of American affairs, whether relating to South or North America. He was the first Englishman of note that made politics in America a profound study. When the United States became independent he proclaimed that he regarded the future political supremacy of England as doubtful, and admitted that the aim of his life—a consolidated English-speaking empire—was frustrated.

As a scientist, Pownall was much esteemed by Benjamin Franklin, whose close friend he was, even during the trying ordeal of the Revolutionary war. As an antiquary, scientist, and man of letters, Pownall stood high in England. He wrote extensively on Roman antiquities and published many papers in the "Gentleman's Magazine" on widely different subjects. But his great literary effort was one on the "Colonial Constitutions." (London, 1764). Though somewhat deformed by classical quotations, it works out in detail the first comprehensive argument for the equal political status of English freemen in America. In one aspect this book and its views entitle Pownall to be regarded as almost the first American statesman. Certainly he merits renown for being the first Englishman of education and influence that devoted his entire life to the amelioration of American political conditions. Pownall was the first publicist, orator, diplomatist, biographer, political writer, antiquary, and a fellow of the Royal society. By some he was thought to be "Junius," Pownall's political history is yet to be written. When it is written, if just to him, it will magnify the place that is commonly accorded to him by those historians that have treated the entire epoch in which he lived. He was the author of several works, including "Principles of Polity" (1752); "The Administration of the Colonies" (1764); "Description of the Middle Colonies of America" (1776); "A Memorial to the Sovereigns of Europe on the State of Affairs between the Old and the New World," (1789); "Memorial to the Sovereigns of America" (1789); "Notices and Descriptions of the Antiquities of the Province of Rhode Island," in "Intellectual Physics" (1795); "Letters advocating Free-Trade" (1795); "An Antiquarian Romance" (1796); and a treatise on "Old Age."

POYAS, Catharine Gendron, author, b. in Charleston, S. C., 27 April, 1813; d. there, 7 Feb., 1882. Her mother, Elizabeth Anne, published the following tribute—"The Ancient Lady," a series of small books and pamphlets relating to the history and genealogies of families in Carolina. Her daughter was educated in Charleston, wrote verses at an early age, and is the author of "Huguenot Daughters, and other Poems" (Charleston, 1849) and "Year of Grief" (1870).

POYDRAS, Julien, philanthropist, b. in Nantes, France, 31 Jan., Point Coupee, La., 25 June, 1724. He was the first delegate to congress from the territory of Orleans, from 31 May, 1809, till 3 March, 1811. He gave $100,000 for the founding of the Poydras orphan asylum at New Orleans, and left $200,000 for a college at Point Coupee.

PRAO, Juan de, Spanish soldier, b. in Leon, Spain, in 1710; d. about 1757. He entered the army early, took part in several wars in Spain and Africa, and was appointed governor-general of Cuba in 1760, but did not take possession of his office until February, 1761. On 6 July, 1762, an English force under Lord Albemarle began the siege of Havana, which was finally taken on 13 Aug. On Prado's return to Spain, the Madrid government caused him to be tried by a court-martial. He was convicted of incompetence and lack of energy in the defence of Havana, and was sentenced to death, but the sentence was commuted to ten years' imprisonment. He died in prison.

PRAO, Mariano Ignacio (pah-ah-doe, president of Peru, b. in Huancaco in 1826. He entered the army early and served in the provinces of the south, but was in Lima on leave of absence when Gen. Castilla's revolution against Echenique's government began in 1854, in which he participated. He was taken prisoner and banished to Chili, but soon returned, joined Castilla in the mountains, and marched with him against the capital as chief of the "Columna Sagrada." He was political governor of Tacna, where he founded the "Magazine Society" on the Chibchas islands, 14 April, 1864, issued a proclamation for the defence of the country, and became prefect of Arequipa. But when the Vizcaya-Pareja treaty was signed, Prado, on 28 Feb., 1865, marched against Lima, and entered the capital on 6 Nov., at the head of a victorious army, and on the 26th declared himself dictator. He signed at once a treaty of alliance with Chile, and when, after the bombardment of Valparaiso, the Spanish fleet appeared before Callao, Prado directed the defence of 2 May, 1866. At the beginning of 1867 he assembled congress, which elected him constitutional president, but his rule was not approved by the country. Castilla rose in arms shortly afterward in Tarapaca, but it died on the march to Lima, and on 27 Sept., 1867, the vice-president, Cansoso, put himself at the head of a rebel army and, with Col. Jose Rata (q. c.) pressed against Prado at Chiclayo. Prado attempted to take Arequipa by assault on 7 Jan., 1868, but was repelled, and retired to Chili. Under Parde's government he returned, and was elected president, 2 Aug., 1876. He made several ineffectual attempts to come to an arrangement with foreign bond-holders, and when the quarrel between Bolivia and Chili began, according to the secret defensive treaty with the former republic, he espoused its cause, and war was declared by Chili, 5 April, 1879. Prado took active measures to prepare for defence, and on 16 May left Callao to take command of the army then assembling at Tacna. He proceeded at once to inspect the allied army at Tarapaca, where he joined Colonel Huen, president, Hochman (q. c.). After the battle of Jerménes, San Francisco, and Tarapaca, Prado seemed to despair of success, and on 26 Nov., left for Lima, ostensibly to prepare and hurry forward new re-enforcements, but on 18 Dec. left the vice-president, La Puerta, in charge of the executive, and embarked secretly on a British mail-steamer, according to a manifesto that was published the day after his departure, to obtain help in money and material from Europe or the United States. He returned in 1888.

PRAT, Agustín Arturo, Chilian naval officer, b. near Quinol, Rata, 3 April, 1848; d. at sea, 21 May, 1870. He received his education in the College of Santiago, and in August, 1858, entered the naval academy of Valparaiso. In January, 1860, he shipped as apprentice on board the "Esmeralda," passing his examination as midshipman, 15 June, 1862, and he served on the same vessel as sub-lieutenant during the capture of the Spanish gun-boat "Covadonga," 26 Nov., 1863, and the engagement of Abtao in February, 1866. After serving in Valdivia, the Chilean sound, and the Strait of Magellan, he studied law, and in 1875 was appointed a lawyer in the navy department. Soon afterward he was sent by the government on a mission to Uruguay and the Argentine Republic, but, on hearing of the war against Peru and Bolivia, returned to his country, and during April, 1879, in command of the "Covadonga," assisted in the blockade of Iquique. When Admiral Juan Williams Rebolledo (q. q.) left with the fleet for Callao, Prat was placed in command of the "Esmeralda," and with the "Covadonga," also under his orders, left to sustain the blockade of Iquique. On this cruise he was attacked early on 21 May by the Peruvian iron-clads "Huascar" and "Independencia" under Admiral Miguel Grau (q. q.). During the engagement one of the masts of "Huascar" burst, and he fell an easy prey to the Peruvians, who occupied the "Covadonga," having struck on a reef. The turret-ship, to bring matters to an issue, rammed the "Esmeralda," and as the latter was struck behind the mizzen-mast, Capt. Prat, with sword and revolver in hand, jumped on board the "Huascar," calling on his men to follow him, but the two vessels immediately separated, leaving all but one man behind. As Prat refused to obey Gran's summons to surrender, and killed the signal officer on deck, he was shot down from the turret. Gran, who had highly esteemed Prat for his courage, collected his personal effects and sent them to the widow with a letter of regret. Prat's country has honored his memory by erecting a granite pyramid with his bust at Atacama in October, 1879, and bronze statues at his native town of Quiriquina in 1889, and in Valparaiso, 21 May, 1886.

PRAT, Benjamin, jurist, b. in Cohasset, Mass., 13 March, 1761; d. 2 April, 1830. The life of a limb in early life led him to study. He was graduated at Harvard in 1777, studied law, and soon became known for his learning and eloquence. He was a representative of Boston in 1775-50, and was a zealous lover of freedom. The friendship of Gov. Thomas Powuanl procured him the appointment of chief justice of New York. He was a man of great research and learning, wrote some fugitive verses, and had made extensive collections with the intention of writing a history of New England, but his death prevented the execution of his design. His wife was the daughter of Judge Robert Auchmuty.

PRATT, Calvin Edward, soldier, b. in Princeton, Worcester co., Mass., 29 Jan., 1828; d. in Rochester, Mass., 3 Aug., 1866. He studied law, and practised for several years in Winter- ton. He was a member of the Cincinnati convention which nominated James Buchanan for president. In 1859 he removed to New York city and practised till 1861, when he raised the 31st regiment of New York volunteers, and commanded it at the first battle of Bull Run. With his regiment he afterward took part in the battles on the mountains, the second battle of Bull Run, and the battle of Antietam. On 10 Sept., 1862, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, and he resigned, 25 April, 1863. After the war he held the post of collector of internal revenue in the Brooklyn district, which he resigned to resume his law-practice. In the autumn of 1869 he was elected a judge of the supreme court of the state of New York, and he was re-elected in 1877 for fourteen years.

PRATT, Charles, philanthropist, b. in Water- town, Mass., 2 Oct., 1830; d. in New York, 4 May, 1891. He was educated at the Willibrand academy, and in 1850 came to New York city, where he engaged in the oil and paint business. In 1867 he established the firm of Charles Pratt and Co., which was one of the largest concerns of their kind, of which he was an officer. Mr. Pratt displayed great interest in educational matters, and founded in Brooklyn the Pratt industrial institute. This receives its support from the Astral flats, which were built by him, and conveyed to the institute.

PRATT, Daniel, vagrant, b. in Prattville, Chelsea, Mass., about 1803; d. in Kansas City, 21 June, 1888. He was a carpenter, but did little work, and, his mind becoming affected, he spent his time in wandering about the country, living on charity. He was widely known as the "great American traveller," which was the name by which he called himself. For many years he made the tour of the New England colleges annually, until his visits embarassed almost as a regular feature of college life. His addresses, which were sometimes delivered to hundreds of students, and received with great applause, were remarkable for their long words, bombastic phrases, and curious figures of speech; and the same was true of his "proclamations" and other contributions that occasionally found their way into print. One of his delusions was that he had been elected president of the United States but defrauded of the office.
PRATT, Daniel Darwin, senator, b. in Palmer, Me., 26 Oct., 1813; d. in Logansport, Ind., 17 June, 1877. When he was a child his parents removed to New York. He was graduated at Hamilton college in 1831, and in 1832 engaged in teaching in Indiana. In 1834 he went to Indianapolis and was employed in the office of the secretary of state, studied law, and in 1836 settled in Logansport, where he began the practice of his profession. In 1851 and 1853 he was elected to the legislature, and he was a delegate to the Chicago National Republican convention of 1860, also acting as its principal secretary. He was elected to congress from Indiana in 1868, but before taking his seat was chosen U. S. senator from that state to succeed Thomas A. Hendricks, and served from 4 March, 1869, till 3 March, 1873. In 1875 he was appointed commissioner of internal revenue, which office he resigned in July, 1876.

PRATT, Daniel Johnson, educator, b. in Westmoreland, Oneida co., N. Y., 8 March, 1827; d. in Albany, N. Y., 12 Sept., 1881. He was graduated at Hamilton college in 1841, and was for ten years principal of Fredonia academy. He afterward became president of the regents of the University of the state of New York. He was one of the originators of the annual convocation of the professors in the colleges and academies of New York. In addition to many reports upon educational subjects, he published "Biographical Notice of Peter Worzall" (Albany, 1870), and "Annals of Public Education in the state of New York, 1826-1846" (Albany, 1882), and was the author of the greater part of "The History of the Boundaries of the State of New York." (2 vols.), presented to the legislature as a report by the regents of the university.

PRATT, Enoch, clergyman, b. in Middletown, Mass., in 1781; d. in New York, 25 Oct., 1817. For sixteen years he was one of the physicians of the New York Hospital. He was a member of the New York Convention of 1777, when he embarked for Jamaica on some mercantile enterprise. The following year he returned home, and began to pursue regularly the profession of a portrait-painter. About 1746 he went to England and became the pupil of Benjamin West. Four years were spent there in study and the practice of his profession, after which he returned to Philadelphia. He made another trip abroad in 1759, visiting Ireland and England, and after that did not leave his native city again. His portraits, in the execution of which he proved himself an artist of undoubted talent, include those of Rev. Archibald Mann, of Dublin, the Duke of Portland, the Duchess of Manchester, Gov. Andrew Hamilton, and Gov. Cadwalader Colden, of New York (1729). He painted also the "London School of Artists," which Thomas Sully pronounced well executed. Pratt, probably finding portrait-painting not sufficiently remunerative, occupied himself at intervals with the painting of signs. Many of his contemporaries have attested the fine execution of these signs.

PRATT, Parley Parker, Mormon apostle, b. in Burlington, Vt., 12 April, 1807; d. near Van Buren, Ark., 13 May, 1857. He joined the Mormon church in 1830, and was a member, in 1835, of the first quorum of the twelve apostles. Mr. Pratt was one of the earliest Mormon missionaries that travelled from the Atlantic seaboard to the western frontiers of Missouri, and among his converts was John Taylor. In 1849 he was sent on a mission to England, and again in 1846. He was one of the pioneers to the valley of the Great Salt Lake, and in 1847 explored Utah lake and valley; also Cedar and Tooele valleys, and Parley's Canyon and Parley's Peak, east of Salt Lake valley, were named after him, as he explored them in 1849 and worked a road up the canyon. He visited the Pacific coast in 1831 and 1854 on missions, and set out on a similar expedition to the eastern states in September, 1856, but was assassinated while passing through Arkansas. Some of Mr. Pratt's writings were pronounced by Joseph Smith to be standard works of the church. He established the "Mormon Student" in Manchester, England, and was its editor during 1849. It is still published. Mr. Pratt was the author of numerous pamphlets, among which are "An Appeal to the State of New York," "Immortality of the Body," "Fountain of Knowledge," "Intelligence and Affection." "The Angelo of the Priories, and was the author of "Voice of Warning and Instruction to all People, or an Introduction to the Faith and Doctrine of the Latter-Day Saints" (New York, 1837); "History of the Persecutions in Missouri" (Detroit, 1839); and "Key to the Science of Theology" (Liverpool, 1834). His marked Hebraic character and tone led to his being called the Isaiah of his people. His brother, Orson, Mormon apostle, b. in Deseret; d. 3 Oct., 1891. He was educated in common schools in Columbia county, and acquired an extensive knowledge of Hebrew and the higher mathematics. In September, 1839, he joined the Mormon church, which he followed in its travels to Missouri, and became an elder in 1831, a high-priest in 1832, and one of the twelve apostles in 1835. Soon after his connection with the church he was sent on numerous preaching missions, extending from the New England and other eastern states and Canada to western Missouri. He and Erastus Snow were the first Mormons to enter the valley of the Great Salt Lake, and he was the first to stand upon the site where Salt Lake City was afterward built. Mr. Pratt went on successful missions to Great Britain in 1840, 1842, 1850, 1853, 1856, 1861, 1867, and 1876, and was twice president of the British and European missions; and in 1865 he went on a mission to Austria. In 1853 he went on a mission to Washington, D. C., where he edited and published "The Seer," eighteen monthly numbers, at the same time presiding over the churches on the Atlantic slope and in Canada. He was a member of the legislative assembly of Utah during the first session, and also of every other session when he was in the territory, and was seven times its speaker. For some time he held the professorship of mathematics in Deseret university and in 1874 was appointed church historian and general church recorder. Mr. Pratt entered into theological controversies in England, and in 1870 discussed polygamy with Dr. John P. Newman before near 15,000 people in the great tabernacle in Salt Lake City. These discussions were published in pamphlet-form and in many papers in the United States. His mathematical knowledge was applied in his discovery of the "Law of Planetary Rotation," showing that the cubic roots of the densities of the planets are as the square roots of their periods of rotation, which he announced at Annapolis in 1835. He also published "The Prophetic Almanac," which he calculated for the latitude and meridian of Nauvoo and the principal cities of the United States. His publications include "Divine Authenticity of the Book of Mormon" (6 parts); "Series of Pamphlets on Mormonism, with Two Discussions" (Liverpool, 1841); "Patristical Order, or Plurality of Wives" (1853); "Cubic and Biquadratic Equations" (London, 1866); "Key to the Universe" (Liverpool, 1879); "The Great First Cause!"; "The Absurdities of Immortalism!" and several volumes of sermons, Mr. Pratt left in manuscript "Lectures on Astronomy" and a treatise on "Differential Calculus."

PRATT, Peter, lawyer, d. in New London, Conn., 25 Apr., 1761. He was eminent as a lawyer and published "The Prey taken from the Strong, or an Historical Account of the Recovery of One from the Dangerous Errors of Quakerism" (New London, 1725).

PRATT, Phinehas, pioneer, b. in England in 1590; d. in Charlestown, Mass., 19 April, 1899. He came to Massachusetts with Captain Thomas Winslow's colony in June, 1622, and settled at Wessagusset, afterward called Weymouth. On the failure of the colony, he fled from the place in February, 1623, and made his way alone through the forest, pursued by Indians, to Plymouth, thirty miles distant. He subsequently resided many years in Plymouth colony, and then removed to Charlestown, Mass. He wrote a "Declaration of the Affairs of the English People that First inhabited New England," published in the "Massachusetts Historical Collections" (Boston, 1838).

PRATT, Richard M., artist, b. in Binghamton, N. Y., in 1811 d. in New York city, 31 Aug., 1880. He studied under Samuel F. B. Morse and Charles C. Ingham, and became well known as a figure and flower-painter. Among his numerous portraits are those of Aaron D. Shattuck (1859) and George H. Smithie (1865), both in the possess-built what he intended to be the largest tannery in the world, around which grew the present town of Prattsville, N. Y. He was also interested in eleven similar establishments. In 1837 he received from the New York Institute the first silver medal that was ever awarded for homback sole-leather. He was elected to congress as a Democrat in 1836 and in 1832, serving one term each time. During his congressional career he was active in his efforts for the reduction of postage, established the National bureau of statistics, and as chairman of the committee on public buildings advocated the use of granite or marble in their construction, instead of sandstone. The post-office buildings in Washington were built to his specifications. He was also one of the earliest trustees of a Pacific railroad, and in 1845 offered a resolution for the distribution of engravings of patent devices through the country for the benefit of mechanics and the stimulation of invention. In 1836 and 1837 he was a presidential elector. He founded a bank in Prattsville, and contributed largely toward the growth of that town. He was a colonel of militia in 1825, and was generally known by his title—His son, George Watson, soldier, b. in Prattsville, N. Y., 18 April, 1836; d. near Manassas, Va., 21 July, 1861, was educated in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and in Europe, receiving the degree of Ph. D. at the University of Erlangen, Bavaria. He engaged in business, took an active interest in politics, and served in the state senate. At the outbreak of the civil war he became colonel of the 20th New York regiment, and at the time of his death, at the battle of Bull Run, he was acting brigade-regener. Col. Pratt was the author of an elaborate review of Gen. George B. McClellan's report on the Crimean war.

PRAY, Isaac Clark, journalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 15 May, 1812; d. in New York city, 28 Nov., 1865. He was educated at Harvard and Amherst, where he was graduated in 1833. He edited the Boston "Pearl," in 1834, and the Boston "Daily Herald," in 1837-7. and was also connected with the "Journal of Commerce" in New York. In 1839 he became manager of the National theatre in the latter city, where he produced his original tragedy of "Giulietta Gordon," (1839) and also produced at the Park theatre a farce entitled "The Old Clock, or Here She Goes, and There She Goes," dramatized from his story written for the "Sunday Morning News," of which he was the editor. He was also editor of the "Dramatic Guardian," and the "Ladies' Companion." He was in England in 1846-7, and acted the parts of Hamlet, Othello, Sir Giles Overreach, and other characters at the Queen's theatre, London, and at the Royal theatres in Liverpool and Cork. In 1850 he was engaged on the editorial staff of the New York "Herald," as musical and dramatic critic, and subsequently he became a theatrical manager, and translated and wrote several plays, including "Postus Cosimna" (1847) and "Arlbert of Media" (1850). He was the author of "Prose and Verse" (Boston, 1835); "Poems" (1855); "Book of the Drama" (New York, 1854); "Memoirs of James Gordon Bennett" (1855); and numerous contributions to magazines and reviews.

PRAY, Lewis Glover, philanthropist, b. in Quincy, Mass., 13 Aug., 1785; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 7 Oct., 1862. He received a common-school education and went to Boston in 1807, where he became a shoe-dealer in 1815. He was a member of the primary-school committee in 1823, its secretary in 1834-5, and organized a model school, but resigned in 1842. He was a member of the common council in 1827-8, and served in the legislature in 1833 and 1840. Mr. Pray retired from business in 1838, and devoted his time to a study of the principles of education. He became a member of the executive committee of the Sabbath-School and Religious Education Society from the earliest times (1845); "The Sylphid School and Other Pieces in Verse" (1862); and "Historical Sketch of the Twelfth Congregational Society in Boston" (1863).

PRAY, Publicius Rutilius Rufus, jurist, b. in Maine in 1739; d. in Portland, Me., 11 Jan., 1830. He removed to the south, practised law in Hancock, Mass., served in the legislature in 1828, and was president of the convention that adopted the revised constitution of 1822. In 1830 he was appointed by the legislature to revise the laws of the state, which work he completed after great labor. From November, 1830, till his death he was judge of the high court of errors and appeals. He published "Revised Statutes of the State of Massachusetts," 1828.

PREBLE, Jedediah, soldier, b. in Wells, Me., in 1707; d. in Portland, Me., 11 March, 1784. He began life as a sailor, and in 1746 became captain in a provincial regiment, settling in Portland about 1748. He was a lieutenant-colonel under Gen. John Winslow in Acadia in 1755, became colonel, 13 March, 1758, and brigadier-general, 12 March, 1759. He was for twelve years a representative in the general court, and became a councillor in 1773. On 27 Oct., 1774, he was commissioned brigadier-general by the Provincial congress of Massachusetts, and was afterward made major-general, but refused on account of age. Gen. Preble was judge of the court of common pleas in 1778, and a member of the state senate in 1789—His son, Edward, a naval officer, b. in Portland, Me., 15 Aug., 1761; d. there, 25 Aug., 1807. When he was seventeen years old he ran away and shipped in a privateer, and on his return was appointed midshipman in the Massachusetts state marine, participating in the "Protection" in a gallant attack on the British privateer "Admiral Bull," which took fire and blew up. In 1779 he was captured in the "Protection" and sent to the "Jersey" prison-ship in New York. After his release he served in the state cruiser "Winthrop," and took a British armed brig. After the peace of 1783 he cruised around the world in the merchant marine. Upon the organization of the navy he was one of the first five that were commissioned as lieutenants, 9 Feb., 1798, served as acting captain of the brig "Pickering," and was commissioned captain, 15 May, 1799, commanding the "Essex" on a cruise to China, whence he convoyed a fleet of fourteen merchantmen, valued at many millions. He married Mary Deering in 1801. In May, 1803, he commanded the "Constitution," and the squadron to operate against the Barbary states, with the "Philadelphia," Capt. Bainbridge; the "Argus" under Lieut. Hull; the "Siren," Lieut. Stewart; the "Enterprise," Lieut. Decatur; the "Xantius," Lieut. Samers; and the "Vixen," Lieut. Smith. On 6 Oct., 1803, the fleet arrived off Tangiers, where, by display of force and firm demands, he compelled the sultan of Morocco to renew the trade with the United States and to send to blockade Tripoli, and, while chasing Tripolitan gunboats, ran amuck and was captured, after the guns had been thrown overboard in vain efforts to float the ship. Subsequently the Tripolitans removed her to the inner harbor. Preble arrived off Tripoli, 17 Dec., 1803, reconnoitered the harbor, received letters from Bainbridge in prison, and matured a plan for the destruction of the "Philadelphia" that had been suggested by Bainbridge. He sailed to Syracuse, where he detailed Decatur with volunteers in the captured Tripolitan ketch renamed "Intrepid," to destroy the "Philadelphia." Decatur (q. v.) accomplished the feat and rejoined Preble at Syracuse, 19 Feb., 1804. Preble cruised along the Barbary coast, blockaded Tripoli, and collected a force for the destruction of the "Philadelphia" that had been captured by Bainbridge. He sailed to his home, and on 4 July, 1805, he arrived off Tripoli with a frigate, three brigs, three schooners, two bomb-vessels, and six gunboats. The town was defended by forts with 45,000 Arabs, besides two schooners, a brig, and nineteen gunboats. Preble conducted six spirited attacks, in which three Tripolitan vessels were captured and three were sunk. The pacta sued for peace, offering to waive all claims for future tribute, and reduce the ransom of merchant prisoners from $1,000 to $500 each. Preble insisted on equal exchange, and continued operations. The relief squadron arrived on 10 Sept., 1804, under Com. Barron, Preble's senior, and the latter, being relieved, sailed home after settling negotiations with Italian authorities for the vessels and supplies that had been furnished. Preble's strict discipline, prudent and energetic measures, and perseverance are demonstrated by the details of this series of the most galling attacks that are recorded in naval history. No gun was fired against Tripoli after he left. His operations resulted in the peace signed 3 June, 1805, by which the tribute that European nations had paid for centuries, and the slavery of Christian captives, were abolished. His officers were pleased with his frank and honest manner; and he was given an enthusiastic welcome on his return, and congress gave him a vote of thanks and an emblematical gold medal. He was the first officer to receive a vote of thanks after the adoption of the constitution. In 1806 Jefferson offered him a seat in the cabinet as the head of the navy department, but he declined on account of his unfitness for the place. He returned to Portland, where he died in consumption.—Edward's nephew, George Henry, naval officer, b. in Portland, Me., 25 Feb., 1816; d. in Boston, Mass., 1 March, 1885, entered the navy as midshipman, 10 Oct., 1835, cruised in the Mediterranean in the frigate "United States" in 1836-8, became passed midshipman 22 June, 1841, served in the Florida war 1817-21, and became navigator in the world in the "St. Louis" in 1842-3, when he took ashore the first American force that landed in China. In the Mexican war, in 1846-7, he participated in the capture of Alvarado, Vera Cruz, and Tuxpan. He became a master, 15 July, 1847, and lieutenant, 5 Feb., 1848, served in the frigate "St. Lawrence" in 1853-6, took goods to the London market 1856-7, and participated in a volcanic expedition to China, and fought Chinese pirates, for which the English authorities gave him their thanks. He surveyed the harbors of Keeling, Formosa, Jethoa, and Hakodadi, Japan, and prepared sailing directions for Singapore, which were published extensively. In 1856-7 he was light-house inspector, in 1857-9 he served at the navy-yard at Charlestown, Mass., and in 1859-61 he was executive of the steamer "Narragansett" in the Pacific. In January, 1862, he took command of the steamer "Narragansett," in which he participated in the capture of New Orleans, and subsequent operations in the Mississippi and Grand Gulf. He was commissioned commander, 16 July, 1862. For failure to capture the Confederate cruiser "Florida," in the capture of the "Florida," he was severely censured. Preble joined at Lisbon, cruising after Confederate vessels. The "Florida" again escaped him at Madeira while he was on duty. He next commanded the fleet at 21 Nov., 1864, till April, 1865, and cooperated with Gen. William T. Sherman. With the steamer "State of Georgia," in 1865, he rescued six hundred prisoners from the wrecked steamer "Golden Rule," near Augusta, and recaptured the steamer "Olive Branch," taken on 16 March, 1867, was at the Boston navy-yard in 1865-8, and served as chief of staff and in command of the flag-ship "Pensacola" in 1868-70 in the Pacific. After being commissioned commodore, 2 Nov., 1871, he was commodore of the navy-yards at Philadelphia in 1873-5, was promoted to rear-admiral, 39 Sept., 1876, and on 25 Feb., 1878, was retired by the sixty-two years old. Admiral Preble constantly contributed to the professional periodical press, and was a member of various historical societies. A collection of navy registers, naval tracts, and other works from his library constitute the rarest sets of U. S. naval publications in existence. They are now in the navy department, serving in many cases to supply information for the biographies of naval officers that is not otherwise obtainable. His writings, many of which were printed privately and in small editions, include "Chase of the Rebel Steamer of War "Oreto"" (Cambridge, 1862); "The Preble Family in America" (Boston, 1869); "First Cruise of the U. S. Frigate "Essex" (Salem, 1870); "History of the American Flag" (Albany, 1872); and "History of the United States Naval Academy" (New York, 1873). Jedidiah's granddaughter, Harriet, translator, b. in Lewes, England, in 1795; d. in West Manchester, near Pittsburgh, Pa., 4 Feb., 1854, was the daughter of Henry Preble, who became a merchant in Paris, France. She was educated at the school of Madame Campan in St. Germain-en-Laye, came to the United States with her mother in 1829, and in 1832 established a school in Pittsburg, which feeble health compelled her to abandon in 1836. She published translations into French prose of Bulwer's poem "The Rebel," with an historical introduction (Paris, 1827), and of James Fenimore Cooper's "Notions of the Americans" (4 vols., 1828), and left several works in manuscript. See "Memoir of Harriet Preble, containing extracts of her Correspondence," and "The Rebel," with an introduction by Prof. Richard H. Lee (New York, 1856).
was one of its most influential members. On the inauguration of the new state government of 1820 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court.
In 1829 he was made U. S. minister to the Netherlands, and he subsequently held other public offices.
He was the first president of the Atlantic and St.
Lawrence railroad company in 1847, and published pamphlets relating to this corporation (1845-51).
Bosohin gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1829.

PREFONTAINE, Aemyry. Chevalier de (prayfontaine), French soldier, b. in Countances in 1729;
d. in Cayenne in 1767. He entered the army very early, and served all his life in the French possessiions of South America, holding the post of police lieutenant of Cayenne from 1750 till his death. He contributed much to the improvement of French society, promoted emigration, and presented several papers to the king's councils in advocacy of the scheme of "France équinoxiale." He published several works, including "Maison rustique à l' usage des habitants de la partie de la France équinoxiale comme sous le nom de Cayenne" (Paris, 1755), to which is prefixed a dictionary of the Galibi dialect and a grammar of the language, which was afterward reprinted by Lessueur, and is yet considered as one of the best treatises on the language of the Guiana Indians.

PRECE, or PRINCE, Thomas, governor of Plymouth colony, b. in England in 1601; d. in Plymouth, Mass., 29 March, 1675. He was a son of Thomas Prince of Letcherfield, Northamptonshire, and sailed for this country on the "Fortune" in 1621. His first wife was a daughter of William Brewster. He was one of the firstsettlers of Nantsett, or Eastham, was chosen governor of Plymouth colony in 1634, serving until 1638, and again from 1647 till 1673, and was an assistant in 1637-47, and 1647-57. He was an impartial magistrate, was distinguished for his religious zeal, and opposed those that he believed to be heretics, particularly the Quakers. In opposition to the demands of the ignorant he procured revenue for the support of grammar-schools in the colony.
Gov. Prence gave to Wamsutta and Pometacom, the sons of Massasoit, the names of Alexander and Prince as a commendation to their character.

PRESTON, George Denison, journalist, b. in Preston, Conn., 18 Dec., 1802; d. in Louisville, Ky., 22 Jan., 1870. Before the age of fifteen he was principal of a public school. He was graduated at Brown in 1823, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1829, but never practised his proession. In 1835
he was the editor of the "Connecticut Mirror," and in 1828 he took charge of the "New England Weekly Review," which he conducted for two years, and then removed to Louisville, Ky. In 1831
he became editor of the "Louisville Journal," a daily paper which he continued to conduct for forty-nine years, and at death was the principal advocate of the Whig party in that region, and won a reputation for political ability, wit, and satire. In 1849 he sustained the Union party, but although maintaining its cause during the civil war he was not a zealous support of President Lincoln's administration.
He resigned his office, but contributed to this journal until its consolidation with the "Courier" under the name of the "Courier Journal." He also furnished a column of wit and humor to the "New York Ledger" for several years. He wrote numerous poems, which have been collected in bookform and published, with a biography, by John James Platt (Cincinnati, 1875). Mr. Prondice was the author of a "Life of Henry Clay" (Hartford, 1851).

A selection of his writings was published under the title of "Prenticeana; or, Wit and Humor" (New York, 1869; 2d ed., with biographical sketch by Gilberoy W. Griffin, Philadelphia, 1870).

PRESTIS, Benjamin Mayherry, soldier, b. in Belleville, Wood co., Va., 23 Nov., 1819. He removed with his parents to Missouri in 1855, and in 1841 settled in Quincy, Ill., where he learned rope-making, and subsequently engaged in the commission business. In 1844-5 he was 1st bautenant of a company that was sent against the Mormons in Hancock, III. He served in the Mexican war as captain of volunteers, and on his return was an unsuccessful Republican candidate for congress in 1860. At the beginning of the civil war he reorganized his old company, was appointed colonel of the 7th Illinois regiment, and became brigadier-general of volunteers, 17 May, 1861. He was placed in command of Cincinnati; afterward served in southern Missouri, routed a large body of Confederates at Mount Zion on 28 Dec., 1861, and joined Gen. Grant three days before the battle of Shiloh, on the first day of which he was taken prisoner with most of his command. He was released in October, 1862, and appointed major-general of volunteers or a number of parts, of which he was placed in command of the frontier. He was commander of Philadelphia, and served as governor of Missouri from 1863 to 1869.

PRETISSES, Charles, editor, b. in Reading, 1870. His father, Caleb, was pastor of a church in Reading. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1835, and in that year became editor of the "Rural Repository," a short-lived weekly journal, at Leominster, Mass. Subsequently he edited the "Political Poems," which was afterward called the "Washington Federalist," in Georgetown, D. C., the "Anti-Democrat," and a literary paper called "The Child of Dallas" in Baltimore. In 1804 he visited England, in 1809 he published "The Thistle," a theatrical paper of brief duration, and after 1810 he reported the congressional procedings in Washington, where he edited "The Independent American." He was the author of a Collection of Fugitive Essays in Prose and Verse, which was afterward called "Life of Robert Treat Paine" (Boston, 1812); "Life of Gen. William Eaton," printed anonymously (Brookfield, 1813); "Poems" (1813); a "History of the United States"; and the "Tribal of Calvin and Hopkins" (1819).

PRETISSES, George Aldrich, naval officer, b. in Keene, N. H., in 1801; d. near Charleston, S. C., 8 April, 1861. He entered the Navy, in 1829, and served in the New Hampshire legislature, established the "New Hampshire Sentinel," which he conducted for forty-nine years, and at death was the oldest editor in New England. The son entered the U. S. navy as midshipman on 1 March, 1825, was on duty at the Portsmouth navy-yard, served in the sloopof war "Lexington" in 1827, and, after a three-years' cruise, returned to this country. He was on the ship-of-war "Boston" in the Mediterranean, was promoted lieutenant on 9 Feb., 1827, and was attached to the receiving-ship "Ohio" at Boston, Mass., in 1834. On 14 Sept., 1845, he became commander, and on 16 July, 1860, he was made commodore on the retired list.

PRENTISS, Samuel, physician, b. in Stonington, Conn., in 1759; d. in Northfield, Mass., in 1818. He was the son of Col. Samuel Prentiss, who served in the Revolutionary war. After receiving a good education, he studied medicine, and entered the Revolutionary army as assistant surgeon. After the war he went to Worcester, Mass., and afterward to Northfield, where he gained a large practice, and was made medical officer in the vicinity. He was a fellow of the Massachusetts medical society in 1810. -His son, Samuel, jurist, b. in Stonington, Conn., 31 March, 1782; d. in Montpelier, Vt., 15 Jan., 1857, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1802, and began to practise in Montpelier in 1803, soon acquiring a reputation for eloquence and integrity. He served in the legislature in 1824-5, and in 1828 was elected chief justice of the superior court of Vermont. He was then chosen to the U. S. senate as a Whig, serving from 5 Dec., 1831, till 11 April, 1842, when he resigned. During his term he effected the passage of a bill against duelling in the District of Columbia. In 1842 he was appointed judge of the U. S. district court of Vermont, which office he held until his death. -Another son, John Holmes, journalist, b. in Worcester, Mass., 17 April, 1784; d. in Cooperstown, N. Y., 26 June, 1861, learned the printer's trade, and, settling in Cooperstown, N. Y., established there, in 1808, "The Freeman's Journal," which he conducted until 1849. He was elected a representative to congress as a Democrat, serving from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1841. -The second Samuel's son, Theodore, lawyer, b. in Montpelier, Vt., 19 Sept., 1818, entered the University of Vermont in 1838, but, owing to impaired health, left in the same year, and travelled in the south. He studied law under his father, was admitted to the bar in 1844, and in 1845 removed to Watertown, Wis. He was a member of the convention of 1846, acting as chairman of the committee on the acts of congress for removing the state from the state of slavery, and published an article upon that subject, which, after a single amendment that he suggested, was adopted. He was also a member of the State constitutional convention of 1847-8. Mr. Prentiss served in the Wisconsin legislature, and was three times elected mayor of Watertown.

PRENTISS, Sergeant Smith, orator, b. in Portland, Me., 16 Oct., 1808; d. at Longwood, near Natchez, Miss., 1 July, 1850. In his boyhood he was remarkable for his mental sprightliness, and for the keen appetite with which he devoured all the books on which he could lay his hand. He was a cripple all his life, and could walk until his ninth year only with crutches; but afterward he required but a cane. At the age of fifteen he entered, Maine College, Bowdoin, where he graduated in 1826. In 1827, he went to Natchez, Miss., in the vicinity of which he taught in a private family, and read law. In 1829 he was admitted to the bar, and removed to Vicksburg, where he rose to the front rank in reputation and the extent of his practice. In 1835 Mr. Prentiss was elected as a representative to the legislature of Mississippi, in which he made several speeches that were remarkable for wit, sarcasm, and argumentative power. In 1837 he was elected to the lower house of congress, and, finding his seat procured by Col. Claiborne, the Democratic candidate at the election, he vindicated his claim in a speech nearly three days long, which established his reputation as one of the ablest parliamentary orators in the country. His speech, having been rejected by the casting vote of the speaker, James K. Polk, he went back to Mississippi, and after a vigorous canvass of the state was again elected by a large majority. His principal speech at this session was made against the sub-treasury bill. In 1838 he visited his native city, and while the acceptance of his invitation to attend the public dinner to be given in July to Daniel Webster in Faneuil hall. His speech on this occasion was declared many years afterward by Edward Everett to have been "the most wonderful specimen of a sententious fluency which I have ever witnessed." Mr. Webster, when asked by Mr. Everett if he had ever heard anything like it, replied, "Never, except from Mr. Prentiss himself." In 1839, on his way home from Washington, he stayed a week in Kentucky, and defended his friend, Judge Wilkinson, who had been charged with murder, in a speech that was a masterpiece of forensic eloquence. In 1840 he canvassed the state of Mississippi as candidate for presidential elector, making a series of speeches that severely taxed his physical strength. During the next four years he delivered many speeches marked by extraordinary energy and elevation of tone, against the reputation by that state of its bonded debt. In 1845, regarding the state as "disgraced and degraded" by that act, he began the study of the civil law, and removed to New Orleans, La., where, in 1850, a fatal disease closed his brilliant and brief career. As an orator Mr. Prentiss had a gift akin to that of the Italian improvisatori, for, when addressing a large assembly of men, he experienced an electrical excitement, at times "almost maddening," and he seemed to himself to be rather spoken from than speaking. New thoughts came rushing into his mind unbidden, which surprised himself as much as his hearers, and which, he said, "he could no more reproduce when the excitement was over than he could make a world." The printed reports of his speeches are barely more than skeletons, giving little idea of his eloquence. His manner of speaking was at once natural and dramatic, and he combined in a remarkable degree logical power with intense passion, keen wit, pathos, and a vivid imagination. At the bar his chief characteristics were his mastery of his subject, his readiness, adroitness, facility of repartee, and absolute command of all his mental stores. In a jury trial, to give him the concluding address was nearly equivalent to giving him the verdict. With all his readiness he was indefatigable in his legal studies, and spared no labor on his cases. A legal acquaintance who knew him well said that his force was best seen in the analysis of a point of law, or the discussion of a constitutional question. "His style then became terse, simple, severe, exhibiting a mental discipline and a faculty of concentration in striking contrast with the natural exuberance of his fancy." Mr. Prentiss had fine social qualities, and his conversation sparkled with the shrewd sense, wit, and brilliant fancy that characterized his speeches. See a memoir by his brother, Rev. George L. Prentiss (2 vols., New York, 1856, new ed., 1870).—His brother George Lewis Prentiss (New York, 1836-7), was assistant in Gorkham academy in 1836-7, and studied theology at Halle and Berlin universities from 1839 till 1841. He became pastor of the South Trinitarian church, New Bedford, Mass., in April, 1845, and in 1851 was made pastor of the Mary A. Porter church in New York city, but resigning to improve his health, he travelled in Europe. On his return he established the "Church of the Covenant," New York city, of which he was pastor from 1862 till 1873, when he resigned to become professor of pastoral theology, church policy, and missionary work in Union theological seminary. Bowdoin gave him the degree of D. D. in 1854. In addition to sermons, advices, and contributions to periodicals, he has published, besides the memoir of his brother mentioned above, "Discourse in Memory of Thomas Harvey Skinner, D. D., L.L. D." (1871), and "Life and Letters of Elizabeth Prentiss" (1882; new ed., 1887).—George Lewis's wife, Elizabeth Payson, author, b. in Portland, Me., 26 Oct., 1818; d. in Dorset, Vt., 13 Aug. 1895. She was a daughter of Mr. Rev. Edward Payson (q. e.). She was educated in Portland and Ipswich, and taught in Portland and Richmond in 1840-3. In 1845 she married Mr. Prentiss, and after the loss of her two children devoted herself to writing. She was the author of numerous books, which include the "Little Susa Series" (New York, 1855-6); "The Flower of the Forsyle," "A Stranger Only," "A Dream," and "Other Stories" (1854); "Fred, Maria, and Me" (1885); "The Perseys" (1876); "The Home at Greylock" (1876); "Pemquid: A Story of Old Times in New England" (1877); and "Avis Benson, with Other Sketches" (1879). Her chief work, "Stepping Heavenward," which was first published in the "Chicago Advance" (1894), has been translated into many languages; it is estimated that 100,000 copies have been sold. PRESCOTT, Albert Benjamin, chemist, b. in Hastings, N. Y., 12 Dec., 1832. He was graduated at the medical department of the University of Michigan in 1864, and at once entered the U. S. volunteer service as assistant surgeon, with charge successively of hospitals in Louisville, Ky., and in Jeffersonville, Ind., also serving as a member of the medical examining board in Louisville, Ky. In 1865 he returned to the University of Michigan as assistant professor of chemistry, and lecturer on organic chemistry, and in 1870 was made professor of organic and applied chemistry and of pharmacy. He was a member of the committee of revision of the "U. S. Pharmacopoeia" in 1880. Since 1856 he has served as dean of the school of pharmacy, and since 1884 as director of the chemical laboratory in the same university. Prof. Prescott is a member of many scientific societies, and was elected in 1876 a fellow of the London chemical society, in 1886 president of the American chemical society, and in the same year vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science. Speaking, in 1877, a retiring address on "The Chemistry of Nitrogen as disclosed in the Constitution of the Alkali- loids." He has been a contributor to the periodical literature of chemistry from 1869, his work including reports of scientific work under his direction in the chemical laboratory of the University of Michigan, and his various chemical investigations, chiefly in analytical organic chemistry. Prof. Prescott has published "Qualitative Chemical Analysis," with Silas H. Douglas (Ann Arbor, 1874; 4th ed., with Otes C. Johnson, New York, 1888); "Outlines of Proximate Organic Analysis" (New York, 1875); "Chemical Determination of Alcohollic Liquors" (1875); "First Book in Qualitative Chemistry" (1879); and "Organic Analysis; a Manual of the Descriptive and Analytical Chemistry of Certain Carbon Compounds in Common Use" (1885). PRESCOTT, Benjamin, clergyman, b. in Concord, Mass., 16 Sept., 1837; d. in Danvers, Mass., 28 May, 1875. He was the son of Capt. Jonathan Prescott (d. 1810), of Danvers, Mass., and Mary Prentiss (d. 1819), and ordained minister of Danvers, 23 Sept., 1873. He resigned his charge, 16 Nov., 1876. Mr. Prescott was the author of "Examination of Certain Remarks" (Boston, 1855); "Letter to Joshua Gee" (1783); "Letter to Rev. George Whitefield" (1749); and "A Pine and a Calm Consideration of the Unhappy Misdemeanors and Debates between Great Britain and the American Colonies" (Salen, 1768). PRESCOTT, George Bartlett, electrician, b. in Kingston, N. H., 16 Sept., 1830; d. in New York city, 18 Jan., 1894. After receiving an English education, he was manager of telegraph offices. He became in 1858 superintendent of the American and International Western Union telegraphic lines, and in 1880 electrician of the Western union telegraph company. Mr. Prescott was also electrician of the International ocean telegraph company from 1873 till 1889. In 1873 he visited Europe in the interest of the Western union telegraph company for the purpose of investigating the various systems of telegraphy in operation there, with a view of organizing a general telegraphic Western Union system that might discover into the system in the United States. He found many important objects of recommendation, and among others that were adopted was the system of transmitting messages in cities by pneumatic tubes, which he introduced in New York in 1876. Mr. Prescott also introduced the duplex and quadruplex telegraphs in 1870 and 1871. He was vice-president of the executive and finance committee of the Gold and Stock telegraph company in 1873-81, and president of the American speaking telephone company in 1879-82, also director and member of the executive committee of the Metropolitan telephone and telegraph company, and of the Bell telephone company of Philadelphia. His inventions include an improvement in telegraph bell auditors (1872), and an improvement in quadruplex telegraphs (1876), which he patented in the United States and Great Britain. Mr. Prescott had contributed many articles to periodicals, and had published "History, Theory, and Practice of the Electric Telegraph" (Boston, 1869); The Propounded Union of the Telegraph and Postal Systems" (New York, 1868); "The Government and the Telegraph" (1872); "Electricity and the Electric Telegraph" (1875); "The Speaking Telephone, Talking Phonograph, and other Novelties" (1878); "The Speaking Telephone, Electric Light, and other Recent Electrical Inventions" (1879); "Dynamo-Electricity: its Generation, Application, Transmission, Storage, and Measurement" (1884); and "Bell's Electric Speaking Telephone; its Invention, Construction, Application, Modification, and History" (1884). PRESCOTT, Mary Newmarch, author, b. in Culais, Me., 2 Aug., 1840; d. near Newburyport, Mass., 14 June, 1888. She afterward removed with her parents to Newburyport, Mass., where she was educated, partly under the direction of her sister, Harriet Prescott, afterward Mrs. Spofford. She began to write the nursery verse soon after leaving school. Her first story, printed in "Harper's Monthly," was written for a school exercise. She wrote much for children, and many of her mature stories and poems have been widely copied. Her first book for children was "Matt's Follies" (Boston, 1853). She never made a collection of her miscellaneous writings. She spent 1881 and part of 1882 in Europe to recover her health.

PRESCOTT, Richard, British officer, b. in England in 1725; d. there in October, 1788. He was appointed a major of the 33d foot, 20 Dec., 1756, and in May, 1762, became lieutenant-colonel of the 30th foot, with which regiment he served in Germany during the seven years' war. He was afterward brevetted colonel of the 7th foot, with which he came to Canada in 1778. On the reduction of Montreal by the Americans in 1759, Col. Prescott, who had the local rank of brigadier-general, attempted to descend to Quebec with the British troops and the military stores, but was obliged to surrender to the Americans on 17 Nov. In September, 1759, he was exchanged for Gen. John Sullivan, in November he became colonel of his regiment. He was in command of the expedition against Rhode Island, where he remained in command of the British forces until he was made prisoner, 10 July, 1775, by Lient.-Col. William Barton (q. c.). He was finally exchanged for Gen. Charles Lee, and resumed his command at Rhode Island, but was almost immediately superseded by Sir Robert Pigot. He became major-general, 29 Aug., 1777, and lieutenant-general, 1780. As a member of American prisoners was harsh and cruel. See "The Capture of Prescott by Lient.-Col. William Barton," an address at the centennial celebration of the exploit, by Jeremiah Lewis Dinman (Providence, 1875).

PRESCOTT, Robert, British soldier, b. in Lancaster, England, in 1725; d. near Battle, Sussex, 21 Dec., 1793. He became captain of the 5th foot, 22 Apr., 1755, and served in the expeditions against Rochefort in 1755, and Louisburg in 1758. He acted as aide-de-camp to Gen. Amherst in 1759, and afterward joined the army under Gen. James Wolfe. On 22 March, 1761, he was appointed major of the 93th foot, which formed part of the force that was sent under Gen. Robert Monckton to reduce Martinique. He became lieutenant-colonel of the 28th regiment, 8 Sept., 1755, and was present at the battle of Long Island, the several engagements in Westchester county, and the storming of Fort Washington in November, 1775. He was attached to the expedition against Philadelphia in 1775, appointed colonel by brevet on 29 Aug., and engaged in the battle of the Brandywine. In 1778 he was appointed first brigadier-general of division, and an expedition under Gen. Cornwallis against the French West Indies. He became colonel, 13 Oct., 1780; major-general, 19 Oct., 1781; was appointed colonel of the 28th regiment, 6 July, 1789; and lieutenant-general, 12 Oct., 1793. In October, 1793, he was ordered to Barbadoes to take command there, and in February, 1794, he sailed with the troops to Martinique under Gen. Major, in whom he landed with Gen. Cornwallis. He effected the complete reduction of the island and forts, which capitulated on 22 March, and was afterward appointed civil governor of the island. His wise and judicious management of affairs prevented an uprising of the natives. From Martinique he was sent to Guadaloupe, where he pursued the same firm and conciliatory policy, and at this time he refused the proffered governorship of St. Lucia. Finding it impossible to effect much at Guadaloupe, he withdrew the British troops there, and sent some to Antigua and Dominica, and the rest to Martinique, where he returned. His health failing, he applied for leave to return to England, where he arrived, 10 Feb., 1795. On 12 July, 1796, he succeeded Lord Dorchester as governor of Canada, and on his arrival in Quebec he began strengthening the fortifications of that city. In 1797 he was also appointed lieutenant-general, and was sent to England to make a peace with the United States. In 1799, when he was recalled and succeeded by Sir Robert Shore Milnes. The principal event of his administration, during which he was made full general, was the attempt of David McLean to excite the people to insurrection, and to capture the city of Quebec, in which attempt McLean lost his life. Gen. Prescott returned to England, and settled at Rose Green, near Battle, where he died.

PRESCOTT, William, soldier, b. in Groton, Mass., 20 Feb. 1736; d. in Pepperell, Mass., 13 Oct. 1795. His father, Judge Benjamin Prescott, was the grandson of John, of Lincolnshire, England, an early settler of Lancaster, Mass. The son inherited a large estate and resided at Pepperell. In 1750 he served as a captain in the provincial army under Gen. John Winslow during the expedition against Nova Scotia. His conduct in that campaign attracted the attention of the British general, who offered him a commission in the regular army, which he declined, and after the war he retired to his estate at Pepperell. In 1774 he was appointed to command a regiment of minute-men, with which he marched, on 19 April, 1775, to Lexington, to oppose the expedition that was sent out by Gen. Thomas Gage. Before Prescott arrived the British had retreated, and he then proceeded to Cambridge, where he entered the provincial army, the majority of his officers and men volunteering to serve with the force during his first campaign. On 16 June, 1775, he was ordered to Charlestown with 1,000 men, and directed to throw up works on Bunker Hill. On arriving at the ground, it was perceived that the neighboring elevation, called Breed's Hill, was a more suitable station, and on it the defenses, consisting of a redoubt and breastwork, were erected during the night. The following day a large British force commanded by Gen. William Howe attacked the Americans, and, after the latter had repulsed two assaults, and had exhausted their ammunition, succeeded in dislodging them. In this battle, which owes its importance to the fact that it demonstrated the ability of the provincials successfully to oppose British regulars, Bancroft says that "no one appeared to have any command but Col.
Precott," and that "his bravery could never be enough acknowledged and applauded. He was one of the last to leave the intrenchments when he found it necessary to order a retreat, and immediately offered to take the position if the commander-in-chief would give him three regiments. Before the attack began, reconnoitring the works, saw Prescott walking on the parapet, and asked Counsellor Willard who he was; and if he would fight? The latter replied, That is Col. Prescott, a good soldier and was no longer as a drop of blood remains in his veins." Early in 1777 he resigned and returned home, but in autumn of that year he joined the northern army under Gen. Horatio Gates as a volunteer, and was present at Saratoga. After this battle he returned home and sat in the legislature of Massachusetts for several years. He wrote "A Letter from a Veteran to the Officers of the Army encamped at Boston" (Boston, 1778). See Samuel Swett's "History of Bunker Hill Battles" (Boston, 1827; new ed., with notes, 1835). The illustration on page 199 represents the statue by Story erected on Bunker Hill in 1881, on which occasion an oration was delivered by Robert C. Winthrop.—His brother, Oliver, soldier, b. in Groton, Mass., 27 April, 1750, was graduated at Harvard in 1769, and practiced medicine in his native town. Before the Revolution he was successively major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel in the militia, early in 1776 he was appointed a brigadier-general of militia for the county of Middlesex, and became a member of the board of war. In 1777 he was elected a member of the supreme executive council of the state; in 1778 he was appointed third major-general of militia in the commonwealth, and in 1781 he became second major-general, but soon afterward he resigned. In this year he was commissioned by the government to cause the arrest and commitment of any person whose liberty he considered dangerous to the commonwealth. From 1779 till his death he was judge of probate for Middlesex county. He was very influential in suppressing Shays's rebellion. In 1780 he became a fellow of the Academy of arts and sciences, and he was a trustee, patron, and benefactor of Groton academy.—Oliver's son, Oliver, physician, b. in Groton, Mass., 4 April, 1762; d. in Newburyport, 26 Sept., 1837, was graduated at Harvard in 1783, studied medicine, and was a suffering member of the forces that suppressed the Shays insurrection in 1787. Leaving a large practice in Groton, he removed to Newburyport in 1811, practising successfully there till his death. He was often a representative in the legislature, and was a founder, trustee, and treasurer of Groton academy. He contributed valuable articles to the New England "Journal of Medicine and Surgery," but is best known by the annual discourse before the Massachusetts medical society in 1813, entitled "A Dissertation on the Natural History and Medicinal Effects of Secale Cornutum, or Ergot," which was republished in London, and translated into French and German.—William's son, William, jurist, b. in Peppercorn, Mass., 19 Aug., 1762, d. in Boston, 8 Dec., 1828, was graduated at Harvard in 1783, and taught first at Brooklyn, Conn., and afterward at Beverly, Mass., where he studied law with Nathan Dane, and practised successfully from 1787 till 1789. In the latter year he removed to Salem, and after representing that town for several years in the legislature, he was elected a state senator by the Federal party for Essex county, first in 1796, and again in 1813. He twice declined a seat on the bench of the supreme court of Massachusetts, in 1808 he removed to Boston, and was for several years a member of the governor's council. He was a delegate to the Hartford convention in 1814, in 1818 was appointed a judge of the court of common pleas for Suffolk, which post he soon resigned, and in 1820 was a delegate to the State constitutional convention. He was a member of the American academy of arts and sciences.—The second William's son, William Hickling, historian, b. in Salem, Mass., 4 May, 1799; d. in Boston, Mass., 25 Jan., 1869, was graduated at Harvard in 1814, and would have devoted himself to the law but for the results of an act of folly on the part of an undergraduate, who threw at random a large, hard piece of bread, which struck one of Prescott's eyes and practically destroyed it. His other eye was soon sympathetically affected, and the youthful student was now obliged to turn his back upon the sun, and to spend his later period "for many months to remain in a darkened room. "In all that trying season," said his mother, "I never saw my son without crossing the apartment to take my place by his side that he did not grieve me with some hearty expression of good cheer, as if we were the patients and it was his place to comfort us." His literary aspirations were not subdued by the sad results of this misfortune. "I had early conceived," he wrote to the Rev. George E. Ellis, "a strong passion for historical writing, to which perhaps the reading of Gibbon's autobiography contributed not a little. I proposed to make myself a historian in the best sense of the term, and hoped to produce something which posterity would not willingly let die. In a memorandum-book, as far back as the year 1819, I find the desire intimated; and I proposed to devote ten years of my life to "substitute," and study, in history and modern literatures, chiefly the latter, and to give ten years more to some historical work. I have had the good fortune to accomplish this design pretty nearly within the limits assigned. In the Christmas of 1837 my first work, the 'History of Ferdinand and Isabella,' was given to the world. I obtained the services of a reader who knew no language but his own. I taught him to pronounce the Castilian in a manner suited, I suspect, much more to my ear than to that of a Spaniard, and we began our wearisome journey through Mariana's noble history. I cannot even now call to mind without a smile the tedious hours in which, seated under some old trees in my country residence, we pursued our slow and melancholy way over passages where afforded no glimmering of light to lead us from which the light came dimly struggling to me through a half-intelligible vocabulary. But in a few weeks the light became stronger, and I was cheered by the consciousness of my own improvement, and when we had toiled our way through seven quartos, I found I could understand the book when read about two thirds as fast as ordinary English. My reader's office required the more patience; he had not even this result to cheer him in his labor. I now felt that the great..."
difficulty could be overcome, and I obtained the services of a reader whose acquaintance with modern and ancient tongues was so large as to enable him to supply, by dictation, the deficiency of eyesight on my part. But, though in this way I could examine various authorities, it was not easy to arrange in my mind the results of my reading, drawn from different and often contradictory accounts. To do this, I dictated copious notes as I went along, and when I had read enough for a chapter (from thirty to forty, and sometimes even sixty pages in a day), I arranged them in my own language, which would easily bring before me at one view the fruit of my researches. These notes were carefully read to me, and while my recent studies were fresh in my recollection I ran over the whole of my intended chapter in my mind. This process I repeated at least half a dozen times, so that when I finally put my pen to paper it ran off pretty gladly, for it was an effort of memory rather than composition. This method had the advantage of saving me from the perplexity of frequently referring to the scattered pages in the originals, and it enabled me to make the corrections in my own mind which are usually made in the manuscript, and which with my mode of writing, as I shall explain, would have much embarrassed the printer. It was, in a word, a method of composition, when the chapter was very long, was somewhat too heavy a burden on the memory to be altogether recommended. Writing presented me a difficulty even greater than reading. Thierry, the famous blind historian of the Norman conquest, advised me to cultivate dictation; but I have usually preferred a substitute that I found in a writing-case made for the blind, which I procured in London forty years since. It is a simple apparatus, often described by me for the benefit of persons whose vision is imperfect. It consists of a frame of the size of a sheet of paper, traversed by brass wires as many as lines are wanted on the page, and with a sheet of carbonated paper, such as is used for getting duplicates, pasted on the reverse side. With an ivory or agate stylus, the writer traces his characters between the wires on the carbonated sheet, making indelible marks, which he cannot see, on the white page below. This treadmill operation has its defects; and I have repeatedly supposed I had accomplished a good page, and was proceeding in all the glow of composition to go ahead, when I found I had forgotten to insert the character of my writing-paper below that my labor had all been thrown away, and that the leaf looked as blank as myself. Notwithstanding these and other whimsical distresses of the kind, I have found my writing-case my best friend in my lonely hours, and with it have written nearly all that I have sent into the world the last forty years.

The success of the history of the "Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic" (3 vols., Boston, 1838) was great and immediate. It was published in France, Germany, and Spain in the languages of those countries, appeared in an Italian version at Florence (3 vols., 1847-48), and early in 1858 a translation was announced in Russia. Thus encouraged, Mr. Prescott again resumed his labors, and made a "History of the Conquest of Mexico," and in 1847 a "History of the Conquest of Peru." These works, the fruits of the most painstaking investigation into manuscript authorities, procured from Spain, proved that the critics had not been too hasty in assigning a high place to Mr. Prescott from the day of the publication of the "History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella." At least one of the Mexican editions of the "Conquest of Mexico" was garbled by the translator to suit the political and religious atmosphere of the country. The Madrid edition is complete. To the French translation, by M. Amédée Pichot, a reference by Mr. Prescott will be found in the preface to the "Conquest of Peru." Mr. Prescott wrote memoirs of John Pickering and Abbott Lawrence, and in 1845 published, under the title of "Biographical and Critical Miscellanies," a series of such interesting papers. He contributed to the "North American Review" between 1821 and 1843, and a "Memoir of Charles Brocken Brown," originally published in Spark's "American Biography" in 1854. In the edition of the "Miscellanies," issued since 1851 will be found a valuable paper entitled "Spanish Literature," a criticism published in the "North American Review," for January, 1858, of George Ticknor's admirable "History of Spanish Literature." In the summer of 1850 Mr. Prescott visited England, and in the autumn spent a short time in Scotland and on the continent. In 1855 he published the first two volumes, and in December, 1858, the third, of what would have proved, had it been completed, his greatest work, "The History of the Reign of Philip II. King of Spain." A translation of the first two volumes appeared in Russia in 1858. In 1857 Mr. Prescott added to a new edition of Robinson's "History of the Reign of Charles V." (3 vols., Boston) a supplement (vol. iii.) entitled "The Life of Charles V. after his Abdication." Early in 1858 he experienced a slight stroke of paralysis, from the effects of which he never entirely recovered, although he was soon able to resume his usual walks, and to devote some hours daily to his books and papers. On 28 Jan., 1859, he received a second stroke, which terminated his life about two o'clock in the afternoon. Mr. Prescott left a widow, two sons, and a daughter.

It is not to be denied that the portion of history selected by Prescott for illustration in his "Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella" had been neglected by the scholars of Germany, France, and England, and only superficially touched by Italian writers; it is equally certain that at an earlier date no faithful narration of the events of this reign could have been given to the world. Prescott had the advantage of the tragic annals of Lorraine, the political dispositions of Martina, Sempere, and Capmany, the literary version of the period, the critical and historical notices in the learned and curious manuscripts purchased by his friend George Ticknor, in Spain, for his own library, and, unpublished documents of priceless value, collected from all available quarters, under the directions of the historian by the zealous agency of Alexander de Pueyrredon, Mr. Martin Fernandez de Navarreta, other original authorities, and such printed works on the subjects discussed as had previously been given to the world.

In the preparation of his "Reign of Charles V." Prescott used a portion of the manuscript collections that were used for the "Conquest of Mexico," a part of the unpublished documents formerly in the possession of Lord Kingsborough, and other original materials collected at great expense in England and on the continent. In the preparation of the "History of the Reign of Philip II." he is said to have employed six years. A letter written by him from Brussels in the summer of 1890 shows the enthusiasm with which he entered into the spirit of the age of Charles V., and will probably remind the reader of the "musing" of the historian of the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire amongst the Ruins of the Capitol, where the Barefooted Frines were singing Vespers in the Temple of Jupiter." Volumes I. and II. bring down the story to the execution of Counts Egmont and Hoorn in 1658, and to the imprisonment and death of Don Carlos. In the collection of materials for this history Mr. Prescott spared neither time, cost, personal labor, nor the services of willing friends. Public and private collections were freely opened to his use, and the long-closed doors of the ancient archives of Simancas and of other secret depositories flew open at the name of the magician whose genius had rekindled the glories of the Old World and depicted with a vivid pencil the sorrows and desolation of the New. The reign of Charles V. is the intermediate link between the reigns of Ferdinand and Isabella and Philip II., and completes an unbroken period of 150 years of the Spanish annals. To the life of the emperor subsequent to his abdication six or seven pages only are devoted by Dr. Robertson, and these contain many errors. Robertson was unable to obtain the information then locked up in the archives of Simancas. Of this information and of the labors of his predecessors, Stirling, Pichot, Gachard, and Mignet, Mr. Prescott freely availed himself.

Prosper Merimee says of Prescott: "Of a just and upright spirit, he had a horror of paradox. He never allowed his bias to be drawn away by doubts often condemned himself to long investigation to refute even the most audacious assertions. His criticism, full at once of good sense and acuteness, was never deceived in the choice of documents, and his discernment is as remarkable as his good faith. If he may be reproached with often hesitation, even after a long investigation, to pronounce a definitive judgment, we must at least acknowledge that he omitted nothing to prepare the way for it, and that the author, too timid perhaps to decide, always leaves his reader sufficiently instructed to need no other guide." Prof. Cornelius C. Felton wrote: "It is a saying that the style is the man; and of no great author in the literature of the world is that saying more true than of him whose loss we mourn. For in the transparent simplicity and undimmed beauty and color of his style were read the endearing qualities of his soul, so that his personal friends are found wherever literature is known, and the love for him is co-extensive with the world of letters, not limited to those who speak our Anglo-Saxon mother tongue, to the literature of which he has contributed so much of work, but co-extensive with the civilized languages of the human race." The illustration on this page represents Prescott's birthplace.

PRESCOTT. William, physician, b. in Gilmantown, X. B., 29 Dec., 1788; d. there, 18 Oct., 1875. He was indentured to a farmer at sixteen years of age, received few educational advantages, taught, studied medicine, and in 1815 was graduated at Dartmouth medical college. He practised in Gilmantown and Lynn, and served in both branches of the legislature. Dr. Prescott was an enthusiastic lover of painting, singing, and science, and was a member of many literary and scientific societies. He wrote the "Prescott Memorial" (Boston, 1876).

PRESTMAN. Stephen Wilson, clergyman, b. in Charleston, S. C., 1 Oct., 1794; d. in Newcastle, Del., in 1845. He obtained a good education in Baltimore, Md. When the war of 1812 was declared he enlisted for and received a commission in the U. S. Army, becoming ensign in the 5th infantry on 14 April, 1812, and 2d lieutenant in July. He was in active service on the Canada frontier, gained credit on several occasions in battle, especially at Loyal's Creek, and was wounded in the attack on La Cole mill, 30 March, 1814.

He engaged in business for several years, but, having a desire to enter the ministry of the Episcopal church, he studied for orders under a clergyman in Baltimore. He was ordained deacon, 11 July, 1822, by Bishop Richard C. Moore, and priest, 15 June, 1823, by the same bishop. While a deacon he served the church in Dumfries, Va., and in 1833 he was called to the rectorship of Immanuel church, Newark, Del. This post he held during the remainder of his life. Mr. PreSTMAN, though publishing no contributions to theological or general literature, was very active and useful in various departments of church work. He was for many years president of the standing committee of the diocese of Delaware, and was uniformly elected a clerical deputy to the triennial general convention of the Protestant Episcopal church.

PRESTON. Ann, physician, b. in West Grove, Pa., 1 Dec., 1813; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 18 April, 1852. She was the daughter of Ames Preston, a Quaker, and, owing to the delicate condition of her mother's health, the family was early placed under her care. Meanwhile she received her education in the local school, and evinced more than a usual fondness for her books. In 1830 the Woman's Medical College of Philadelphia was opened, and she studied there until her graduation in 1832.

Settling in Philadelphia, she began the practice of her profession, in which she achieved deserved success. In 1854 she was elected professor of physiology and hygiene in the college where she was graduated, and in 1866 to the office of dean, which place she held until her death. Her lectures and addresses were filled with striking thoughts and practical knowledge. Dr. Preston was active in the establishment of the Woman's hospital of Philadelphia, and was from its beginning one of the managers, its corresponding secretary, and its consulting physician. The Philadelphia county medical society in 1867 made public objections to the practice of medicine by women, and Dr. Preston at once defended the claims of her sex so ably that much of the adverse criticism was disarmed; indeed her influence in removing prejudices against female physicians was very extended. She published various essays on the medical education of women, and was the author of a book of poems entitled "Cons in Ann's Stories for Children" (Philadelphia, 1854).

Preston, David, banker, b. in Harmony, N. Y., 20 Sept., 1826; d. in Detroit, Mich., 21 April, 1887. He was educated at common schools, and at the academy in Westfield, N. Y., while teaching during the winters. In 1848 he moved to Detroit where he commenced a banking-house. Four years later he established himself as a banker in Detroit and Chicago. Mr. Preston gave about $200,000 to charities, and pledged himself to raise from the people of Michigan $60,000, giving himself nearly one half this sum, for Allen college, of which he was a trustee from 1862 till his death. During the civil war he was active in the Christian commission, and he was president of the Young men's Christian association of Detroit in 1860-70. He was the candidate of the Prohibition party for governor in 1884. Besides being a delegate to the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1876, and delegate to the Centenary conference of Methodism in Baltimore in 1884, he was active in other matters pertaining to his denomination, and was regarded at the time of his death as the foremost member of the Methodist church in the state of Michigan.

Preston, Harriet Waters, author, b. in Danvers, Mass., about 1843. She was educated chiefly at home, and began her literary labors about 1865 as a translator from the French, her first work being "The Life of Mme. Sercéhin." Then she translated "The Man in White," "Flowers," "Shylock's Wife," "Cloak and Dagger," "The Second Sense," "The Fiery Furnace," "A Walk Through the Forest," "The Year of the Storm," "The Case of the Missing His-Rib," and "A Life of the World." Her last work was a translation of "The Life of Alfred de Musset," by his brother, Paul de Musset. She has also published "Aspendale" (Boston, 1872); a translation of Mistral's "Mire de Valence," Philadelphia, "United Century" (Boston, 1874); "Troublous and Trouvers" (Boston, 1876); "Is That All?" in the "No Name" series (Boston, 1876); a translation of the "Georgies of Virgilo" (Boston, 1881); and "A Year in Eden" (1886). She has contributed frequent critical papers to the "Atlantic Monthly." Miss Preston has resided abroad for some years, chiefly in France and Great Britain.

Preston, Jonas, physician, b. in Chester county, Pa., 23 Jan., 1764; d. in Philadelphia, 4 Jan., 1836. His father, of the same name, was a physician. His grandfather, William Preston, a Quaker, in 1718 emigrated from Huddersfield, England, and settled in Pennsylvania. Jonas entered on the study of medicine under Dr. Thomas Bond, of Philadelphia, and concluded his studies in the medical schools of Edinburgh and Paris, being graduated from the former about 1785. On his return he settled in Wilmington, Del., afterward removed for a time to Georgia, but returning to Chester, Pa., succeeded in establishing an extensive practice, particularly in obstetrics, in which he was celebrated. At the period of the whiskey insurrection he volunteered his medical aid, and served with the troops. He was for many years a member of the legislature, serving in both the assembly and the senate. About 1812 he removed to Philadelphia, where he took an active interest in several benevolent and other institutions, such as the Pennsylvania hospital, Friend's asylum, Penn bank, and Schuykill navigation company. His extensive observation in the practice of his profession led him to form the opinion, expressed in his will, "that there ought to be a lying-in hospital in the city of Philadelphia for married women of good character," and he bequeathed about $100,000 for the founding of such an institution. Within a few months after his death the legislature of Pennsylvania passed an act incorporating "The Preston Retreat." The cornerstone of the hospital building was laid, 17 July, 1837, and the institution is one of the noted charities in Philadelphia.

Preston, Margaret Junkin, poet, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., about 1825; d. in Baltimore, Md., 28 March, 1897. She was the wife of Prof. John T. L. Preston, of the Virginia military institute. Her first contributions to the press appeared in "Surtain's Magazine" in 1849-50, and she subsequently published a novel entitled "Silverwood" (New York, 1856), but she has since devoted herself to poetical composition. She was an ardent sympathizer with the south, and her most sustained volume of verse, "Beechenbrook," a poem of the civil war, enjoyed a wide popularity, and contains the familiar lines on "Stonewall Jackson's Grave" and the lyric "Slain in Battle" (New York, 1866). Her other works include many fugitive poems, "Old Song and New," the dedication of which has been much admired (1870), "Cartoons" (1875), and "For Love's Sake" (1887). Her writings are vigorous, suggestive, and full of religious feeling. Her translation of the "Dies Irae," which appeared in 1855, has been highly praised.

Preston, Samuel, b. in Patuxent, Md., in 1665; d. in Philadelphia, 10 Sept., 1743. He was brought up as a Quaker. From the age of 18 he laid aside his Quakerism and went to the Delaware, and was sent to the legislature from the latter place in 1693, and again in 1701, and was chosen sheriff in 1695. About 1703 he took up his residence in Philadelphia, where he became a merchant, and stood among the most influential of the Quakers of his day. In 1708 he was unanimously elected alderman. During the same year he made a trip to Canada. About 1714 excavation of silver was discovered near Yarmouth, Maine, and it was desired by the commissioners of property, which office he held many years. He was also one of the trustees of the alterations of William Penn's will.
PRESTON, Thomas Scott, clergyman, b. in Hartford, Conn., 23 July, 1824; d. in New York city, 4 Nov., 1891. He was graduated at Trinity in 1843, and at the general theological seminary in 1846, after which he was assistant rector of the Church of the Annunciation, and subsequently of St. Luke's, in New York city, until 1849. Accepting the Roman Catholic faith, he then went to St. Joseph's theological seminary in Fordham, and was ordained to the priesthood in 1850. After serving as an assistant in the cathedral in New York city, and as pastor of St. Mary's church in Brooklyn, N. Y., he was in 1854 appointed chancellor of the archdiocese of New York, and in 1855 became vicar-general in connection with the archdiocese of Baltimore. In 1856 he had been pastor of St. Ann's church, and in 1851 he was appointed a domestic prelate of the pope's household, with the title of monsignor. The degree of S. T. D. was conferred on him by Seton Hall college, N. J., in 1880. He has published "Ark of the Covenant, or Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary" (New York, 1860); "Life of St. Mary Magdalene" (1860); "Sermons for the Principal Seasons of the Sacred Year" (1864); "Life of St. Vincent de Paul and its Lessons" (1896); "Lectures on Christian Unity, Advent, 1866" (1857); "The Purgatorial Manual, or a Selection of Prayers and Devotions" (1857); "Lectures on Reason and Revelation" (1868); "The Vicar of Christ" (1879); "Dedications upon the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus" (1878); "Divine Praise of Jesus" (1880); "Protestantism and the Bible" (1880); "Protestantism and the Church" (1882); "God and Reason" (1894); and "Watch on Calvary" (1885).

PRESTON, William, soldier, b. in County Down, Ireland, 35 Dec., 1729; d. in Montgomery county, Va., 3 May, 1810. His father, John, emigrated to this country in 1755, and settled in Augusta county. William received a classical education, and in early life acquired a taste for literature. He became deputy-sheriff of Augusta county in 1759, was elected to the house of burgesses a short time afterward, and accompanied Gen. Washington on several exploring expeditions in the western counties, and on a friendly visit to the Shawnee tribe of Indians, in 1757, and, by negotiations with Cornstalk, secured peace among the western frontiers for several years. The privations that the party suffered on their return journey compelled them to eat the "tongue of the ox", or strips of rawhide with which their packs were fastened, and Preston, in memory of the event, called that branch of the Big Sandy river "Tong Fork," which name it still retains. He became surveyor of the new county of Montgomery in 1771, was early engaged in the organization of troops for the Revolutionary war, became colonel in 1777, and led his regiment at Guilford Court-House, S. C., where he received injuries that caused his death in the following July.

His son, Francis, congressman, b. at his residence in Greenfield, near Amsterdam, Bolton co., Va., 2 Aug., 1765; d. in Columbus, S. C., 3 May, 1855, was graduated at William and Mary in 1783, studied law under George Wythe, practised with success in Montgomery, Washington, and other counties, and in 1792 was elected to congress, serving two terms. He then declined re-election and removed to Abingdon, Va., where he subsequently resided. At the beginning of the second war with Great Britain he enlisted with the appointment of colonel of volunteers, and marched with his regiment to Norfolk, and subsequently he was appointed brigadier-general and major-general of militia. He was frequently a member of the Virginia house of delegates and of the state senate, where his ability in debate and graceful eloquence gave him high rank. He was the personal friend of Madison, Jefferson, Monroe, and Chief-Justice Marshall. He married in 1792 Sarah, the daughter of William Campbell, the hero of King's Mountain.-Their son, William Campbell, senator, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 27 Dec., 1794; d. in Columbia, S. C., 22 May, 1866, began his education at Washington college, Va., but was sent to the south on account of his large estate in the state, and was graduated at the College of South Carolina in 1812. On his return to Virginia he studied law under William Wirt, and was admitted to the bar, but failing health again compelled him to seek a change of climate, and, after an extensive tour of the west on horseback, he went abroad, where on his arrival he formed the beginning of a life-long intimacy with Washington Irving. Through Mr. Irving he was placed on terms of intimacy at Abbotsford, and in the intervals of his law studies at the University of Edinburgh, where Hugh S. Logan was his fellow-student, he made several pedestrian tours with Irving through Scotland, northern England, and Wales. Together they witnessed many of the scenes of the "Sketches". He returned to Virginia in 1820, and settled in North Carolina in 1822, where he at once won a brilliant reputation as an advocate and orator. He was in the legislature in 1828-32, was an ardent advocate of free-trade and state rights, became a leader of the nullification party in 1832, and in 1833 was elected to the U. S. senate as a Calhoun Democrat. Among the most carefully prepared and eloquent of his speeches in the Senate was that on the French spoliation claims, which was praised by Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and statesmen of all parties. Differing with his colleague, John C. Calhoun, and also with his constituents, in regard to the support of President Van Buren's policy, he resigned his seat and resumed his law-practice in 1842. He was president of the College of South Carolina from 1815 till his retirement in 1851. When he accepted the office the institution had lost many members, but under his guidance it rose to a prosperity that it had never before enjoyed, and became the most popular educational institution in the south. He also established the Columbian lecture, and gave it a large and valuable library. Harvard gave him the degree of L. L. D., in 1846. As a popular orator Mr. Preston was the peer of his maternal uncle, Patrick Henry, in many instances arousing his countrymen to enthusiasm and the next moment moving them to tears. His style has been described as florid, but his vocabulary was large, and the illustrations and classical allusions that ornamented his speeches were as naturally employed in his familiar conversation. He was a profound classical scholar, and it was universally admitted that he was the most finished orator the south has ever produced. His discourse on the sec-sion of the southern Democratic party in 1850 hastured his end. When he was dying, his friend, James L. Pettigrew, said to him: "I envy you, Prest; you are leaving it, and I shall have to stay and see it all." Preston signified, with a sigh of relief, that the words were true. He left no children.—Another son of Francis, John Smith, olic, b. at the Salt Works, near Abingdon, Va., 20 Nov., 1809, d. in Columbia, S. C., 4 May, 1881, was graduated at Hampden Sydney college in 1824, attended lectures at the University of Virginia in 1825-36, and read law at Hayward. He married Caroline, daughter of Gen. Wade Hampton, in 1830, and settled first in Abingdon, Va., and subsequently in Columbia, S. C. He engaged for several years in sugar-planting in Louisiana, but also devoted much time to literary pursuits and to the Collection of paintings and sculptures. He aided struggling artists liberally, notably Hiram Powers, whose genius had been recognized by his brother William. Mr. Powers, as a token of his appreciation, gave him the first replica of the "Greek Slave." He also became widely known as an orator, delivering, among other addresses, the speech of the Palmetto regiment on its return from the Mexican war in 1848, which gained him a national reputation. This was increased by his oration before the "Seventy-sixth association of Charleston" and the literary societies of South Carolina college, and those at the 50th anniversary of the battle of King's Mountain and at the laying of the cornerstone of the University of the south at Sewannee. He was an ardent secessionist, and in May, 1860, was chairman of the South Carolina delegation to the Democratic congression that met at Charleston, S. C. After the election of President Lincoln he was chosen a commissioner to Virginia, and in February, 1861, made an elaborate plea in favor of the withdrawal of that state from the Union, which was regarded as his greatest effort. He was the staff of Gen.
Beauregard in 1861-2, participated in the first battle of Bull Run, and was subsequently transferred to the conscript department with the rank of brigadier-general. He went to England shortly after the close of the war, and remained abroad several years. After his return he delivered an address at a commencement of the University of Virginia, which was a formal reproof to the president of secession, incurred the criticism of the conservative press throughout the country. His last pubic appearance was at the unveiling of the Confederate monument at Columbia, S. C., when he was the orator of the occasion. Gen. Preston was more than six feet in height, and of a powerful and symmetrical frame.—Another son of Francis, Thomas, vented, b. at Bowling Green, Ky., 1771; d. in Smithfield, Va., 4 May, 1843, was graduated at William and Mary in 1790, and settled as a planter in Montgomery county, Va. He became lieutenant-colonel of the 12th U. S. infantry in 1812, colonel, 5 Aug., 1813, and received at Chrysler's field a wound that crippled him for life. He was governor of Virginia in 1816-19, and subsequently served frequently in the state senate.
He married Ann, daughter of Gen. Robert Taylor, of Norfolk, Va.—Their son, William Ballard, secretary of war, b. in Smithfield, Montgomery county, Va., 25 Nov., 1815; d. there, 18 Nov., 1882, was educated at the University of Virginia, adopted law as a profession, and achieved signal success in its practice. He served several times in the Virginia house of delegates and senate, and was never throughout his career defeated in any popular election. He was chosen to congress as a Whig in 1846, and during the accession of Gen. Zachary Taylor to the presidency he held the portfolio of the navy until Gen. Taylor's death, when he retired to private life, but was several times presidential elector on the Whig ticket. He was sent by the government on a mission to France in 1858-9, the object of which was to esablish a line of steamers between that country and Virginia, and a more extended commercial relation between the two countries. The scheme failed on account of the approaching civil war.
He was a member of the Virginia secession convention in 1861, and resisted all efforts toward the dissolution of the Union till he was satisfied that war was inevitable. In 1861-2 he was a member of the Confederate senate, in which he served until his death.—Francis's nephew, Will-tiam, lawyer, b. near Louisville, Ky., 16 Oct., 1806;
d. in Lexington, Ky., 21 Sept., 1887. His education was under the direction of the Jesuits at Bardstown, Ky. He afterward studied at Yale, and then attended the law school at Harvard, where he was graduated in 1828. He then began the practice of law, also taking an active part in politics.
He served in the Mexican war as lieutenant-colonel of the 4th Kentucky volunteers. In 1851 he was elected to the Kentucky house of representatives as a Whig, and in the following year he was chosen to congress to fill the vacancy caused by Gen. Humphrey Marshall's resignation, serving from 6 Dec., 1852, to 3 March, 1855. He was again a candidate in 1854, but was defeated by his predecessor, Gen.
Marshall, the Know-Nothing candidate, after a violent campaign. He then became a Democrat, and was a delegate to the Cincinnati convention of 1856, which nominated Buchanan and Breckinridge. He was appointed U. S. minister to Spain after the Buchanan administration, at the close of which he returned to Kentucky and warmly es-pressed the cause of the south. He joined Gen.
Simon B. Buckner at Bowling Green in 1861, and was made colonel on the staff of his brother-in-law, Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, when that officer assumed command. He served through the Kentucky campaign, was at the fall of Fort Donelson, the battle of Shiloh, where Gen. Johnston died in his arms, and the siege of Corinth. He was also in many hard-fought battles, especially at Murfreeboro. At the close of the war he returned to his home in Lexington, Ky., in 1867; he was elected to the legislature, and in 1880 he was a delegate to the convention that nominated Gen. Hancock for the presidency.—William Ballard's cousin.

ISAAC TRIMBLE, jurist, b. in Rockbridge county, Va., in 1797; d. on Lake Pontchartrain, La., 5 July 1887. He graduated at Valentine's school in 1812, and studied at Litchfield law-school, but resigned his profession in 1813 to serve as captain of a volunteer company in the war with Great Britain. He resumed his legal studies under William Wirt in 1816, was admitted to the bar, and removed to New Orleans, where he practised with success. At the time of his death he was a judge of the supreme court of Louisiana. His death was the result of a steamboat disaster.

PREVALAYE, Pierre Dinam (pray-vah-lay), Marquis de, French naval officer, b. in the castle of Prevalaye, near Brest, in 1745; d. there, 28 July, 1816. He was descended from a family that was distinguished in the annals of the French navy. His father, Theophile-Prevelaye, was colonel of artillery in 1742 and 1755, became "chef d'escadre," commanded the station of the Antilles, and as governor of Brest in 1778 was charged to superintend the armament of the fleet that was sent to the succor of the American patriots. The son became a midshipman in 1769, and took part as lieutenant, and afterward as commander, in the war for American independence. He served under DeTouaing at Newport in 1778, participated in the operations against St. Lucia and Grenada, directed the batteries at the siege of Savannah, in October, 1779, was attached to the fleet of De Guichen in 1780, and served under De Grasse at Yorktown, in October, 1781, and under De Verplanck, De Board, and Vaudreuil in the West Indies. In 1783 he was sent to carry to Congress the treaty of peace that acknowledged the independence of the United States, and was promotor commodore. He was afterward appointed a member of the board of admiralty, emigrated in 1790, served in the army of Conde, and, returning to France in 1801, lived quietly in his ancestral castle, which the neighboring peasants, being much attached to his family, held in abeyance. Resisting the offices of Napoleon of a commission in the navy, he devoted his last years to science, founded an astronomical observatory in Brest, and became a member of the Academy of marine of that city. Louis XVIII. made him a rear-admiral in 1815. He published "Memoire sur la campagne de Boston en 1775" (Brest, 1784); "Memoire sur les operations navales de l'armee du Conde etant pendant la guerre d'Amérique" (Paris, 1778); "Memoire sur une machine propre à faire comporte à tout moment le tirant de l'eau des naviers" (Brest, 1803); and several treatises on naval architecture.

PREVOST, Augustin, British soldier, b. in Geneva, Switzerland, about 1725; d. in Bernett, England, 5 March 1784. He served as an officer in the English army. The son also entered the army, became a lieutenant colonel in March, 1761, colonel, 29 Aug., 1777, and major-general, 27 Feb., 1779. He served as captain of the 69th regiment or Royal Americans under Wolfe at Quebec, captured the fort at Sunbury, Ga., in December, 1778, and directed Gov. John Ashe at River creek in March, 1779, but was feigned in an attempt to capture Charleston in May, 1779. In October, 1779, he successfully defended Savannah against the Americans. Gen. Prevost's widow married Aaron Burr.—His son, Sir George, Bart, British soldier, b. in New York, 19 May, 1767; d. in London, England, 5 Jan., 1816, entered the army in his youth, served with credit at St. Vincent, where he was severely wounded, and was also at Dominica and St. Lucia. He was created a baronet, 6 Dec., 1805, and appointed major-general in January of the same year, and lieutenant-general in June, 1811. He arrived in America after the battle of Plattsburg, 11 Sept., 1814, which forced him to retreat into Canada. He was afterward returned to England, and demanded an investigation of charges that had been made against him for the disaster at Plattsburg. He died before this was completed, but the result vindicated his character.

PREVOST, Charles Mallet, soldier, b. in Baltimore, Md., 19 Sept., 1807; d. in Philadelphia, 5 Nov., 1887. His father, Gen. Andrew M. Prevost, who commanded the first regiment of Pennsylvania artillery in the war of 1812, was born in Geneva, Switzerland, of Huguenot ancestry, and his grandfather, Paul Henry Mallet Prevost, a Geneva banker, came to the United States in 1744 and purchased an estate at Alexandria (since called Frederic-town), Hunterdon Co., N. J. Charles M. Prevost studied law and was admitted to the bar, and shortly afterward was appointed U. S. marshal for the territory of Wisconsin, and he was subsequently deputy collector of the port of Philadelphia. He was an active member of the militia, and at the beginning of the civil war had command of the military depots in Pennsylvania. He was appointed assistant adjutant-general on the staff of Gen. Frank Patterson. He was engaged in the Peninsula campaign, later was appointed colonel of the 18th (Corn exchange) regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers, and commanded it at Antietam. The severity of the attack compelled his regiment to fall back, and Col. Prevost seized the colors and ran to the front to rally his men. While encouraging them, he was struck in the shoulder by a Minie ball, and also by a fragment of shell, and so severely wounded that he never recovered. The brevet of brigadier-general of volunteer was conferred on him on 13 March, 1863, for his bravery in this action. After his partial recovery he returned to the command of his regiment, and took part in the battle of the Wilderness. When his arm was amputated, he was appointed major-general of the 1st division of the Pennsylvania national guard.

PREVOST- PARADOL, Lucien Anatole, French author, b. in Paris, 8 July, 1829; d. in Washington, D. C., 11 Aug., 1870. He was the only son of the actress Lucinde Prevost-Paradol, and early showed literary talent. He received his education in Paris, became in 1854 editor of "La Revue d'histoire universelle," was graduated in the following year as M. L. I., and appointed professor of literature in the University of Aix in Provence. In 1856 he published "Essais de Debats," and from that time till his death he was one of the most brilliant journalists of his time. He was a formidable adversary to Napoleon III., and his witty criticisms were particularly obnoxious to that monarch, who tried in vain to conciliate him. In 1860, after a short service as editor of "La Presse," he returned to "Les Debats," where he opposed the French intervention in Mexico in a series of articles which, by arousing public indignation, caused the emperor first to reduce the proposed invading army, and ultimately to recall his troops in 1865. Three times, at Paris in 1863 and 1865, and at Nantes in 1869, Prevost-Paradol was a candidate for the corps legislatif, but failed, owing to the opposition of the administration. As such an attempt to do with the opposition to the constitution in 1889, and the accession of the Emile Ollivier cabinet, he became reconciled to the empire, and accepted the appointment of minister to the United States, 12 June, 1870. He arrived in Washington toward the middle of July, but was coldly received in society, owing to the France-German war, which public opinion disapproved. He complained bitterly of this, especially of the attitude of President Grant. In the night of 11 Aug., 1870, he rose, and, after putting his papers in order, took position before a mirror and deliberately shot himself through the breast. Prevost-Paradol was a remarkable writer, and his editorials are yet considered models for journalists. His works include "Essais de politique et de litterature" (Paris, 1859); "Du gouvernement parlementaire" (1869); and "Nouveaux essais de politique et de litterature" (1865).

PRICE, Bruce, architect, b. in Cumberland, Md., 12 Dec., 1845. He studied his profession with James Crawford and with John Randolph Nicolls in Baltimore, after which he spent a year abroad. In 1869 he settled in Baltimore and began his professional career. Soon afterward he moved to Wilkesbarre, Pa., where he remained five years, and in 1877 he established himself in New York. His work has included designs for the cathedral in Savannah, Ga., the Methodist church in Wilkesbarre, Pa., and the Lee Memorial church in Lexington, Va., which are considered excellent examples of modern American ecclesiastical architecture. He designed the cottages and club-house at Tuxedo Park, N. J., the West End hotel at Bar Harbor, Me., and the Long Beach hotel, N. Y. The hotel at Long Beach was built by him in sixty days. Mr. Price invented, patented, and built the parlor bay-window cars for the Pennsylvania, and Boston and Albany railroads. He is the author of "A Large Country House" (New York, 1885). Price, David Edward, Canadian senator, b. in Quebec in 1816; d. there, 22 Aug., 1883. He was the son of William Price, a native of England, and a merchant of the city of Quebec. He received a classical education, and became senior member of a firm of lumber merchants in Quebec. He was a candidate for Chieutini and Tadoussac in 1854, but withdrew little Paris. He was commissioner of crown land, and represented those constituencies in the Canadian assembly from 1855 till 1857. From the latter date he represented Chieutini and Saguenay until he was elected to the legislative council in 1864 for the Laurentides division, and held his seat till he was called to the senate in May, 1867. He is colonel of the 2d battalion of Chieutini militia, and vice-consul at Saguenay for Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and the Argentine, Chili, and Peruvian republiees, and several other countries. He is a retired member of the United States Navy.

PRICE, Eli Kirk, lawyer, b. in Bradford, Chester co., Pa., 20 July, 1757; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 11 Nov., 1884. His ancestor, Philip, a Welsh Quaker, came to this country with William Penn, and settled on a tract of 1,000 acres in Montgomery county, Pa. Eli was educated in his native county, and entered the shipping-house of Thomas C. Coke in 1815, and abandoned merchandise for law, and became a student in the office of John Sergeant. He was admitted to the bar in 1823, and soon established a reputation as a chancery and real-estate lawyer. It is said that no other member of the Philadelphia bar was ever intrusted with so large a number of valuable estates. He was in active practice for sixty years, and had litigated a great many important cases, except as a member of the state senate in 1854-57. During this service he was the author of several acts for the better security of real-estate titles and the rights of married women, and originated and secured the passage of the "Consolidation Act," by which the towns that are included in the present city of Philadelphia were united in one municipal government. The year before his election to the senate he framed and succeeded in making a law that is known as the "Price Act," relating to the sale and conveyance of real estate. He was an originator of Fairmount park, and a commissioner from its foundation in 1865, and as chairman of its committee on the purchase of real estate examined all the titles of lands that were included within its borders and acquired by the city of Philadelphia. He was an active member of the American philosophical society and a constant contributor to its "Transactions," a member of several foreign scientific and literary societies, president of the University hospital, of the Preston retreat, of the Pennsylvania colonization society, and of the Numismatic and antiquarian society; a vice-president of the American philological association, and of the University of Pennsylvania. He published "Law of Limitations and Liens against Real Estate" (Philadelphia, 1851); several treatises that were contributed to the American philosophical society; and the memorial volumes "Philip and Rachel Price" (printed privately, 1859); "Rebecca, 1852;" and the "Centennial Meeting of the Descendants of Philip and Rachel Price" (1864). See a "Memor" by James T. Rothrock (Philadelphia, 1886), and "Address on the late Eli K. Price," delivered by Benjamin H. Brewster before the Bar association of Philadelphia (1886).

PRICE, Hiram, congressman, b. in Washington county, Pa., 10 Jan., 1814. He received a common-school education, was for a few years a farmer, and then a merchant. He removed to Davenport, Iowa, in 1844, was school-fund commissioner of Scott county for eight years, and as such had the school lands appraised. He was collector, treasurer, and recorder of the county during seven years of the time when he was school-fund commissioner, and was president of the State bank of Iowa during its existence, except for the last year. When the civil war began, the state of Iowa had no available funds, and he furnished from his individual means quarters and subsistence for several months for about 5,000 men, infantry and cavalry. With Ezekiel Clark he advanced about $25,000 to pay the 1st, 2d, and 3d Iowa regiments their "state pay," and carried the same to them, at much personal risk from the "bushwhackers" in northern Missouri. Mr. Price was elected to congress as a Republican, serving in 1863-9. He declined to be a candidate again, and spent some time abroad. He was again elected in 1876 and 1878, and then again declined re-election. He was appointed commissioner of Indian affairs in 1881, and served in that office until shortly after the inauguration of President Cleveland.

PRICE, John, soldier, b. in England; d. in Maryland in 1861. He emigrated to Maryland, and represented St. Michael's hundred in the general assembly of 1639. He served with credit as a soldier, received the public thanks of Lord Baltimore, and was appointed muster-master-general in 1648. He was made a privy councillor the same year, and was an ardent supporter of the toleration act of 1649. He took an active part in the rebellions of 1645, and commanded St. Ingis's fort at a critical moment, and it was in a great measure owing to his exertions that Gov.
Leonard Calvert recovered his authority.

PRICE, Richard, clergyman, b. in Tynton, Glamorganshire, Wales, 23 Feb., 1723; d. in London, England, 19 March, 1791. He was the son of a dissenting Calvinistic minister, was educated at an dissenting academy, and held several appointments in and about London. Of his "Observations on Civil Liberty and the Justice and Policy of the War with America" (London and Boston, 1756) 60,000 copies were soon distributed. For this work he received the thanks of the corporation of London and the freedom of the city, besides being invited, in 1778, by the colleges of London and other institutions, to become a citizen of this country. This request he declined, but referred to the infant republic as the "hope and the future refuge of mankind." His other works refer to religion, ethics, politics, and finance. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Aberdeen in 1769, and that of L. L. D. from Yale in 1781. His biography was written by his nephew, William Price. He died in London, 1815.

PRICE, Rodman McTainley, governor, b. in Sussex county, N. J., 5 May, 1816; d. in Oakland, N. J., 7 June, 1894. He became a student at Princeton, but before completing the course was obliged to leave on account of his health. He afterward pursued for some time the study of the law, and finally, in 1849, was appointed purser in the U. S. navy. For ten years he was connected with this branch of the service, and in 1848 he was made navy agent for the Pacific coast. When the American flag was raised in this region, he was one of the first to exercise judicial functions under it as allocutus. On returning to his home in 1859, he was elected a member of the legislature, and served from 1851 till 1853. On 8 Nov. of the latter year he was elected governor of New Jersey, which office he filled for three years. Through his instrumentality mainly the normal school of that state was established, and the militia system greatly improved. In 1861 he was a delegate to the Peace congress.

PRICE, Roger, clergyman, b. in England about 1686; d. in Leigh, Essex, Dec., 1792. He was educated at Oxford, and admitted to orders in the Church of England in 1729. From 1725 onward he held several livings in England. On the death of the Rev. Samuel Myles, in 1728, Mr. Price was sent, the year following, by the bishop of London, to succeed Mr. Myles in the rectorship of King's chapel, Boston, Mass. The next year he was appointed the bishop's commissary. In April, 1734, he said the first service at the church. On Aug. 30, 1735, he delivered the first sermon in it. Although an able preacher, he appears to have had various difficulties and disputes with his parishioners, and became quite dissatisfied with the state of affairs in general. About 1744 he purchased a tract of land in Hopkinton, Mass., did missionary duty for two or three years, built a church at his own expense, and devised it, with a glebe of 180 acres of land, to the Society for propagating the gospel, in trust for supporting a minister of the Church of England. In 1755 he went to England, where he spent the rest of his life as "incumbent of the parish of Leigh, in the deanery of Broughing, and archdeaconry of St. Albans." Mr. Price published two small sermons, a speech, a poem on the death of George I. on the death of John Jekyll, Esq., collector of customs (1753), the other, on the death of the queen, wife of George II. (1759).

PRICE, Samuel, senator, b. in Peninsular county, Va., 18 Aug., 1805; d. in Leesburg, V. A., 23 Feb., 1884. He removed to Preston county, Va. (now W. Va.), at twelve years of age, received a common school education, and practiced the practice of law in Nicholas county. After serving two terms in the legislature he removed to Wheeling, and subsequently to Leesburg, and represented Greenbrier county for many years in the legislature. He was a leader in all schemes for internal improvement west of the Blue Ridge, and an originator of the proposition to establish a railroad from Wheeling to Richland, Va., to the Ohio river. He was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1831, and of the Secession convention in 1861, and earnestly opposed secession in the latter body, but, on the passage of the ordinance of secession, supported the measures that followed. He was elected lieutenant-governor in 1863, and served as president of the state senate, fill the latter year as a Democrat. He was appointed a circuit judge in 1865, but decided to take the test oath and did not serve. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the U. S. senate in 1876, was president of the West Virginia constitution convention in 1872, and in 1876 was appointed by the governor to fill out the unexpired term of Allen T. Caperton, deceased, in the U. S. senate, serving in that capacity.

PRICE, Sterling, soldier, b. in Prince Edward county, Va., 11 Sept., 1809; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 29 Sept., 1867. He was a student at Hampden Sidney college, read law, moved to Chariton county, Mo., in 1831, and was speaker of the Missouri house of representatives in 1840-4. He was elected to the congress in the latter year, but resigned in 1846, and raised the 2d Missouri cavalry regiment for the Mexican war, becoming its colonel. He moved his regiment with that of Col. Doniphan, both under command of Gen. Stephen W. Kearny, from Fort Leavenworth to Santa Fé, more than 1,000 miles, the march occupying more than fifty days, and the army subsisting mainly on the country. Col. Price, with about 2,000 men, was left in charge of New Mexico. Gen. Kearny moving with the remainder of the command to California. An insurrection occurred in Santa Fe, to which Gov. Bent and several of his officers fell victims during their absence from the town. Col. Price now attacked the Mexicans, completed the conquest of the province in several brilliant actions, and after promotion to brigadier-general of volunteers, 20 July, 1847, marched to Chihuahua, of which he was made military governor. He defeated the Mexicans at Santa Cruz de Rosales, 16 March, 1848. Gen. Price was governor of Missouri from 1853 till 1857, bank commissioner of the state from 1857 till 1861, and president of the Missouri Military Medical Service on 4 March, 1861. He was appointed major-general of the Missouri state guard on 18 May, and after he had been joined by Gen. Ben McCulloch and Gen. Price with Confederate troops and Arkansas militia, they defeated Gen. Nathaniel Lyon at Wilson's creek, in southwestern Missouri, 10 Aug., 1861. Price then advanced northward and invested Lexington, on Missouri river, 12 Sept., 1861. He captured the place, with 3,500 men, on 21 Sept., but fell back southwest before Gen. John C. Frémont, and went into winter-quarters near Springfield, whence he was driven by Gen. Samuel R. Curtis, 12 Feb., 1862, and retreated toward Fort Smith, Ark. Gen. Earl Van Dorn assumed command of Price's and McCulloch's armies, attacked Curtis at Pea Ridge, 7 March, 1862, and was defeated. Van Dorn was now ordered to Tennessee. Price participated in the engagements around Corinth, retreated under Beauregard to Tupelo, was assigned to the command of the Army of the West in March, 1862, and then to the district of Tennessee. He moved toward Nashville, and met and fought with Gen. William S. Rosecrans, in command of Grant's right, at Juka, 19 Sept., 1862, but was ordered to report to Van Dorn, and by his direction abandoned Juka and joined him near Baldwyn. He participated in Van Dorn's disastrous attack upon Corinth, 4 October, 1862, and in the operations under Gen. John C. Pemberton in northern Mississippi during the winter of 1862-3. He was then ordered to the Trans-Mississippi department, took part in the unsuccessful attack upon Helena, 21 July, 1863, and was assigned to the command of the district of Arkansas. He was driven from Little Rock by Gen. Frederick Steele, but successfully resisted Steele's advance toward Red River in March, 1864, and forced him to retreat. He made a raid into Missouri in September, 1864, had many engagements with the National forces, and reached Missouri river, but was driven out of the state and into southwestern Arkansas. After the surrender of the Confederate armies he went to Mexico, but he returned to Missouri in 1865.

PRIDEAUX, John, British soldier, b. in Devonshire, England, in 1718; d. near Fort Niagara, 19 July, 1759. He was the second son of Sir John Prideaux, bart., and early entered the army, serving in the service of Dettingen in 1743. He became captain in the 34 foot-guards, 23 Feb., 1745, colonel of the 55th foot, 20 Oct., 1758, and brigadier-general, 5 May, 1759. In 1759 he was intrusted by William Pitt with the command of one of the four divisions of the army that was to conquer Canada, the others being given to Wolfe, Amherst, and Stanwix. He opened his campaign by a movement on Fort Niagara, which was then one of the most formidable French posts. A landing was effected on 7 July, notwithstanding a harassing fire, and after a summons to surrender had been refused by Ponchet, the French commander, who had sent secretly for reinforcements, Prideaux opened fire with his artillery. He repelled a sortie on 11 July, and on the 19th prevented a French schooner from landing reinforcements that had been sent by Frontone. On the evening of the same day, while he was busy in the trenches, he was killed by the bursting of a coehorn, owing to the carelessness of a private soldier. He was succeeded in command by Sir William Johnson. As the elder brother he had been killed at Carthagena in 1741, Prideaux was his father's heir, and his son, John Wilmot, succeeded to the baronetcy in 1766.

PRIEST, Josiah, author, b. about 1730; d. in western New York about 1756. He was uneducated, and was a harness-maker by trade, but published several books, including "Wonders of Nature" (Albany, 1826); "View of the Millennium" (1826); "Stories of the Revolution" (1856); "American Antiquities" (1856); and "Slavery and the Light of History and Scripture" (1856).

PRIESTLEY, Joseph, scientist, b. in Fieldhead, near Leeds, Yorkshire, England, 13 March, 1733; d. in Northumberland, 7 Sept., 1804. He was the eldest son of a cloth-dresser, and his mother dying when the boy was six years old, he was adopted by his aunt, Mrs. Kegghley. The youth was sent to a free grammar-school, and at the age of sixteen had made considerable progress in the ancient languages. He had determined to become a clergyman, and in 1748-50 he was at the dissenters' academy at Daventry, Northamptonshire, where he wrote some of his earliest tracts. On attempting to enter the ministry he was rejected on account of his views on original sin, the atonement, and eternal damnation, which he maintained openly. In 1755 he became an assistant in an obscure meeting-house at Needham market in Suffolk, but he failed to become popular. Three years later he went to Nantwich, in Cheshire, where he taught twelve hours a day. At this time he wrote his first book, "Elements of English Grammar" (London, 1761), and his "Course of Lectures on the Theory of Language and Universal Grammar" (Warrington, 1762). In 1761 he removed to Warrington, in Lancashire, where the dissenters had established an academy, and for six years he was tutor there in the languages and belles-lettres. He preached continually during his residence in that place, and was ordained there. During one of his visits to London he met Benjamin Franklin, and through his assistance undertook the preparation of his "History and Present State of Electricity, with Original Experiments" (London, 1767). He received the degree of L.L.D. from the University of Edinburgh, and was elected to the Royal society in 1766. In 1767 he removed to Leeds, where he was given charge of the Mill Hill chapel. He devoted himself closely to the study of theology, and began his investigations on gases, also publishing a fragmentary work on the History and Present State of Discoveries relating to Vision, Light, and Color" (2 vols. London, 1772). In 1759 he came into conflict with Sir William Blackstone, author of the "Commentaries," pointing out inaccurate statements of historical facts in his work. Blackstone promised to cancel the offensive paragraphs in the future editions of his work, and the controversy came to an amicable conclusion. From 1754 till 1776, he was a Universalist, and he was presented to the Earl of Shelburne, with whom he travelled on the continent, and spent some time in Paris; on his return he had much leisure for scientific research, and was active in presenting his experiments. During these years he made his great discoveries in chemistry, and renewed his investigations on gases. Priestley was unacquainted with chemistry; he had no apparatus, and knew nothing of chemical experiments, but these adverse conditions may have been serviceable as he entered upon a new field where apparatus had to be invented, and the arrangements that he devised for the manipulation of gases are unsurpassed in simplicity and have been used ever since. The first of these discoveries was his elucidation of the principles of combustible gases. His experiments were made in the evening of 1 July, 1772. He was aware that gas was contained in the air, and he ascertained and applied to the analysis of air. In 1774, by heating the red oxide of mercury, he made his discovery of oxygen, to which he gave the name of dephlogisticated air. He also showed its power of supporting combustion better, and animal life longer, than the same volume of common air. By means of mercury which he used to check the leakage of the apparatus, he ascertained that gases are soluble in water, he further made known hydrochloric acid and ammonia in 1774, and sulphur dioxide and silicon tetrafluoride in 1775, and introduced easy methods for their preparation, describing with exactness the most remarkable properties of each. He likewise pointed out the existence of carbonated hydrogen gas. Priestley discovered also the nitrogen oxide of air, applicable to the United States, carbon monoxide in 1779. To him we owe the knowledge of the fact that an acid is formed when electric sparks are made to pass for some time through a given bulk of common air, which afterward led to Cavendish's discovery of the composition of nitric acid. These facts are described in his "Experiments and Observation Relating to Natural Philosophy, with a Continuation of the Observations on Air." (3 vols., London, 1779-86). Meanwhile he wrote numerous theological works, and it has been said of Priestley that "he was fond of controversy, yet he never sought it, and if he participated in it, it was generally because it was thrust upon him, and he became the defendant rather than the assaulter." In 1780 he took up his residence in Birmingham, where he had charge of an independent congregation. His collection of apparatus had increased, and his income was now so good that he could prosecute his researches with freedom. In 1790 he enraged the people by his "Familiar Letters to the Inhabitants of Birmingham" (Birmingham, 1790), and these were soon followed by "Letters to Rt. Hon. E. Burke, occasioned by his Reflections on the Revolution in France" (1791). He now became the recognized champion of liberal thought, which made him the subject of severe condemnation at home. This feeling culminated on 14 July, 1791, the anniversary of the French revolution, in a riot in Birmingham, during which his meeting-house and his dwelling-house were burned, and his library and apparatus were destroyed. In 1824, after the persecution had ceased, he received a subscription from a gentleman of the city of Oxford, the sum of £200, by which he purchased a collection of manuscripts, the fruits of years of industry, preserved in the flames. Priestley escaped to London. When the popular excitement had somewhat ceased in Birmingham he sought compensation in the courts for the destruction of his property, and presented a claim for £3,628, but, during a trial of nine years, it was cut down to £2,592. He sailed from London on 4 June, landed in New York, where he was received by delegations from scientific societies and invited to give a course of lectures on experimental philosophy, for which a hundred subscriptions at $10 each were soon obtained. But he refused, and proceeded at once to Philadelphia, where he received a complimentary address from the American Philosophical Society. He was offered the professorship of chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania with a good salary, but declined the appointment, preferring to choose his own occupation in retirement. His sons had previously settled in Northumberland, Pa., whither he followed, making his home in the midst of a garden overlooking one of the finest views of the Susquehanna. A school was established by him, which flourished in 1797, and he was able to arrange his books and renew his experiments with every possible facility. Thomas Jefferson consulted him in regard to the founding of the University of Virginia, and he offered the presidency of the University of North Carolina. In the spring of 1796 he delivered a series of "Discourses relating to the Evidences of Revealed Religion" (Philadelphia, 1796), which were attended by crowded audiences, including many members of congress and the executive officers of the government, and in 1797 he delivered a second series, which were less favorably received. The first of these, when published, was dedicated to John Adams, who was then his hearer and admirer, but later, when Adams (q.v.) became president, Priestley opposed the administration, and it was intimated that the "alien law" was directed against him. His time was chiefly spent in literary work, and he wrote the continuation of his "General History of the Christian Church to the Fall of the Western Empire" (4 vols., Northumberland, 1802-3), which he dedicated to Thomas Jefferson; also "Answer to Mr. Paine's Age of Reason" (1795); "A Vindication of the Rights of the Colonies, and of those of the Hindoos and other Nations" (1799); "Notes on the All Books of Scripture" (1803); and "The Doctrines of Heathen Philosophy compared with those of Revelation" (1804). There are many memoirs of his life, of which the most important are John Corny's "Life of J. Priestley" (Birmingham, 1895) and Memoirs of Dr. Joseph Priestley to the Year 1805 (London, 1805). There was a continuation to the Time of his Death, by his Son, Joseph Priestley" (2 vols., London, 1806-7). His "Theological and Miscellaneous Works" (excluding the scientific) were collected by John T. Rutt and published in twenty-six volumes (Hacker, 1817-32). His old congregation in Birmingham erected a monument to his memory in their place of worship, and a statue was placed in 1860 in the corridor of the museum at Oxford. The centennial of the discovery of oxygen was celebrated on 1 Aug., 1874, by the unveiling of a statue to his memory in Birmingham, an address in Paris, and in this country by a gathering of chemists at his grave in Northumberland, Pa., where appropriate exercises were held, including addresses by T. Berry Hunt, Benjamin Silliman, and other scientists. Dr. H. Currington Bolton, who delivered an address on Priestley before the New York Genealogical and Biographical Society in April, 1888, has in preparation "The Scientific Correspondence of the Rev. Joseph Priestley."

PRIETO, Joaquín (preaño-to), Chilian soldier, b. in Concepción, 20 Aug., 1767; d. in Valparaiso, 20 Nov., 1854. In August, 1805, he enlisted in the militia of Concepcion, and in April, 1806, he accompanied the expedition of General Bulnes. In 1811, as captain of dragoons, he formed part of an auxiliary army that went to aid the patriotic movement of Buenos Ayres. On his return he served in the southern campaign of Chile, and in 1814 was governor of Talca. After the defeat of Rancagua he went to the Argentine Republic and established himself in Buenos Ayres. He joined the Chilian-Argentine army, in 1815, was present at the battle of Chacabuco, and afterward was appointed commander of Santiago and director of the arsenal. He equipped the army and took part in the battle of Maypar as commander of the reserve. In 1821 he was sent to the south, which had revolted under Bernadotte, and defeated the latter in the battle of Lagos de Sobrados. He was elected deputy to congress and senator in 1823, took an active part in the civil war of 1829-30, and after the battle of Lircay he was appointed provisional president of the republic. Six months afterward, 18 Sept., 1831, he was elected constitutional president. On 25 May, 1833, the new constitution of the country was promulgated. He was re-elected in 1836, and, after retiring in 1841, became councillor of state, senator, and commander of Valparaiso.

PRIEHE, Ebenezer, clergyman, b. in Milford, Conn., 21 July, 1790; d. in Huntington, N. Y., 15 Sept., 1799. He was the grandson of James, who, with his brother, Mark Prime, came from England to escape religious persecution about 1638. Ebenezer was graduated at Yale in 1718, studied divinity, and the following year was called to Huntington, L. I., where he became an assistant to Rev. Eliphalet Jones. On 5 June, 1723, he was ordained pastor of the same church, which office he continued to hold until his death. A register of the sermons that he preached, with texts, dates, and places of delivery, shows that he prepared more than 3,000, many of which are still preserved. Although he was educated in the Congregational church and the church in the county of Suffolk formed themselves into a presbytery and adopted the Presbyterian form of government, Mr. Prime being chosen the first moderator. In the war of the Revolution Mr. Prime's church was turned into a military depot by the British, and the pulpit and pew were burnt for fuel. The parsonage house was occupied by the troops, and the Rector's valuable library was used for lighting fires, and otherwise mutilated. Driven from home in his seventy-seventh year, an object of special hostility on account of his decided patriotic opinions, he retired to a quiet part of the parish and preached in private houses, or wherever he could gather his people together. Toward the close of the war Col. Benjamin Thompson, afterwards Count Rumford, visited the village. He tore down the church, and used the materials in building barracks and block-houses in the graveyard. Ascending where the venerable pastor lay buried, he directed that his own tomb should be pitched at the head of the grave, that, as he expressed it, he might have the satisfaction of treading on the "old rebel" every time he entered and left it. Mr. Prime is described by a contemporary as "a man of sterling character, of powerful intellect, who possessed the reputation of an able and faithful divine." His published discourses include "The Pastor at Large Vindicated" and "The Divine Institution of Preaching the Gospel Considered" (New York, 1758), and "The Importance of the Divine Presence with the Armies of God's People in their Martial Enterprises" (1759). He also published a sermon, delivered in 1754, on "Obligation to the Gospel Ministry" regarding which he held peculiar views. — His son, Benjamin Young, physician, b. in Huntington, L. I., 20 Dec. 1753; d. there, 31 Oct., 1790, was graduated at Princeton in 1751, studied medicine under Dr. Jacob Ogden, and began to practice at Easthampton, L. I. In 1756-7 he was tutor at Princeton. His acquirements as a linguist were unusual. Among his papers were found, after his death, Latin versifications of one of the Psalms written in all the different metres of the odcs of Horace. He was also master of several modern languages, which he spoke fluently. In June, 1752, he sailed for England to visit medical schools abroad, and he was graduated at the University of Leyden in July, 1754, after which he returned to New York city and resumed practice there. On the passage of the stamp act he wrote "A Song for the Sons of Liberty in New York." At the opening of the Revolutionary war, Dr. Prime, who had meantime given up practice in New York and retired to Huntington, was compelled to flee to Connecticut, but at the end of the war he returned to Huntington, and remained there until his death. Revivalism, sermons, and ballads, which circulated widely during the war, Dr. Prime published "The Patriot Muse, or Poems on some of the Principal Events of the Late War, etc., by an American Genteel, referring to the French War" (London, 1756), and "Columbia's Glory, or British Pride Humbled; a Poem on the American Revolution" (New York, 1791). In addition to these, there was published in New York city, in 1849, "Musieipula: Siege Cambrayomachia. The Mouse-Trap; or, the Battle of the Welsh and the Mice; in Latin and English. With Other Poems in different Languages.
By an American." The principal Latin poem in this volume is probably not by Dr. Prime, but the translation of the "Musieipula" is undoubtedly his work. In 1841 he received from the New York City Association the degree of D. D., and in 1855 was graduated at Princeton in 1854, licensed to preach by the presbytery of Long Island, 10 Oct., 1855, and ordained in 1860. After preaching at Sag Harbor, Fresh Pond, and Smithtown, L. I., he was called, in 1843, to the Presbyterian church at Cambridge, Washington co., N. Y., where he remained for seventeen years. For several years after 1851 he was also principal of the county academy. In 1831 he established a seminary for young women in Sing Sing, under the charge of his daughter, and on its being destroyed by fire in 1833, he removed it to Newburg, N. Y., where he remained eight years. On retiring at the end of that period, he did not again accept a pastoral charge. Dr. Prime was an earnest advocate of all moral reforms, and is believed to have preached in 1841 one of the first temperance sermons that was ever delivered. He was an enthusiastic electrician, and was instrumental in introducing Prof.
Joseph Henry to public notice. He received the degree of D. D. from Yale in 1848. Among his publications are "A Collection of Hymns" (Sag Harbor, 1809), "A Familiar Illustration of Christian Baptism" (Salem, 1818), and "A History of Long Island" (New York, 1849). Dr. Prime published sermons entitled "The Petroleumic Effects of Intemperance" (Brooklyn, 1812); "Divine Truth the Established Means of Sanmification" (Salem, 1817); and "The Year of Jubilee, but not to Africans" (1824). — Another son, Samuel Treadwell, editor, b. in Ballston, N. Y., 4 Nov., 1812; d. in Manchester, N. H., 18 July, 1885, was graduated at Williams in 1829, taught three years at Cambridge and Sing Sing, N. Y., and entered Princeton theological seminary, but before completing his first year he was attacked by a severe illness, and was never able to resume his studies. He was licensed to preach in 1836, and held pastorates at Ballston Spa in 1836-5, and at Matteawan, N.
Y., in 1837-40. In the spring of the latter year he was compelled to abandon the pulpit, owing to a bronchial affection, from which he never entirely recovered. Thereafter, till his death, he was editor of the New York Observer, except during 1849, when he acted as secretary of the American Bible society, and a few months in 1850, when he edited "The Presbyterian." In 1853 he visited Europe, Palestine, and Egypt, for his health, writing a seriies of letters to the "Observer" under the signature of "Irenaeus." He went abroad again in 1866-7 and in 1876-7. Dr. Prime was closely identified with the Evangelical alliance of Americans, founded in 1866, attending the 5th general conference at Amsterdam in 1867, and inviting the European alliances to hold the 6th conference in New York city, which invitation was accepted.
On his return from Europe he was elected a corresponding secretary of the American alliance, and he held the office until 28 Jan., 1884. In his hands the "Observer" acquired a wide reputation. The "Prime's " articles appeared in it weekly until the end of his life. He received the degree of D. D. from Hampden Sidney college, Va., in 1854. During his career as an editor he found time to write more than forty volumes, besides pamphlets, addresses, and articles for various periodicals. In 1854, while his first book of travels was passing through the press, he was asked by his publishers, Harper Brothers, to contribute to their magazine. From this source he received for the next twelve years more than $1,000 annually, and he was thus enabled to purchase an interest in the "Observer" in 1858. Dr. Prime was vice-president and director of the American tract society and of the American and foreign Christian union, president of the New York association for the advancement of science and art, president and trustee of Wells college for women, a trustee of Williams college, and member of a large number of other religious, benevolent, and literary societies. Among his publications are "The Old White Meetinghouse" and "Life in New York" (New York, 1847); "Aims of the English Bible" (1849);"Thoughts on the Death of Little Children" (1852); "Travels in Europe and the East" (1855);"The Power of Prayer" (1858); "The Bible in the Levant," and "American Wit and Humor" (1859); "Letters from Switzerland" (1860); "Memoirs of Rev. Nicholas Murray, D. D., "Kiriwan" (1862); "Memoirs of Mrs. Joanna Bethune" (1863); Fifteen Years of Prayer; and "Walking with God" (1872); "The Allmamh and the Kremlin" (1875); "Songs of the Soul" (1874); "Life of S. F. B. Morse, LL. D." (1855); "Iremens Letters" (1st series, 1880; 2d series, 1885); and "Prayer and its Answer" (1882). Of the "Power of Prayer" more than 150,000 were sold—100,000 in this country and Great Britain, while two editions appeared in France and two in Russia.

Another son, Edward Dorr Griffin, clergyman, b. in Cambridge, N. Y., 2 Nov., 1814; d. in New York, 7 April, 1891, was graduated at Union in 1832, and at Princeton theological seminary, and was pastor of a Presbyterian church in New York city. In April, 1853, to allow his brother, Ireneus, to go abroad for his health, he took his place as editor of the "Observer," with which he had corresponded for several years under the signature of "Ezraus." He continued his connection with that journal until his brother's death in 1885, acting as associate editor, but spent the winter of 1854-5 in Rome as chaplain of the American embassy. On the death of his brother, he became editor of the "Observer," but he was compelled by illness to resign the position. He received the degree of D. D. from Jefferson college, Pa., in 1857. Besides contributing anonymously to several volumes, he published "Around the World; Travel Through Many Lands and Over Many Seas" (New York, 1872); "Forty Years in the Turkish Empire; or Memoirs of Rev. William Goodell, D. D." (1870); and "Notes, Genealogical, Biographical, and Biblical, Historical of the Griffin Family," privately printed, New York, 1888.---Another son, William Cowper, journalist, b. in Cambridge, N. Y., 31 Oct., 1825, was graduated at Princeton in 1843, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1846. He continued to practise in the city of New York until 1861, when he became an owner and manager of the New York "Journal of Commerce," with which he still connected. He acted as its editor-in-chief from 1851 till 1899. Mr. Prime visited Egypt and the Holy Land in 1855-6, and again in 1869-70. In his leisure hours he has devoted himself to the study of the art of book illustration, and has made a valuable collection of the woodcuts of artists of the 15th and 16th centuries. From its establishment he has taken an active interest in the New York metropolitan museum of art, and since 1874 he has been its first vice-president. He also induced the trustees of Princeton to establish a systematic course of instruction in art history, and in 1884 he was chosen as the occupant of that chair. The college had previously, in 1875, conferred upon him the degree of L. I. D. Besides a series of letters in the "Journal" began in 1846 and continued to 1855, many papers and articles have appeared in various journals. Mr. Prime has published "The Owl-Creek Letters" (New York, 1848); "The Old House by the River" (1853); "Later Years" (1854); "Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia" and "Tent Life in the Holy Land" (1857); "Coins, Medals, and Seals, Ancient and Modern" (1861); the hymn "O Mother, Dear, Jeremiah," with notes on "Artists Fishing" (1875); "Old Prime" (1875); and "Pottery and Porcelain of All Times and Nations" (1878). As literary executor of Gen. George B. McClellan, he edited "McClellan's Own Story" (1886), and wrote a biographical sketch for that volume.

PRIME, Frederick, geologist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 March, 1846. He was graduated at Columbia in 1865, and after a year at the School of mines, studied for three years at the Royal mining-school in Freiberg, Saxony. On his return in 1869 he became assistant in surveying at Columbia school of mines, and also assistant on the geological survey of Ohio. In 1870 he was elected professor of mining and metallurgy at Lafayette, and in 1874 he became assistant geologist on the geological survey of Pennsylvania, both of which places he filled until 1879. Meanwhile he has been professionally consulted very frequently by various iron and coal companies. Of late years he has devoted himself more to professional practice, and became in 1883 president of the Allentown iron company. At the World's fair of 1876 he was judge of the group on mining and metallurgy, filling the office of secretary to the board. In 1880 Lafayette conferred on him the degree of Ph. D. Prof. Prime has been active in the management of the American institute of mining engineers, and has contributed to its transactions. He has also translated from the German and edited von Cotta's "Treatise on Ore Deposits" (New York, 1850).

PRIME, Rufus, merchant, b. in New York city in 1805; d. in Huntington, L. I., 15 Oct., 1885. He was a son of Nathaniel Prime, a descendant of Mark Prime, who emigrated from England in 1640, and joined the colony that founded the town of Rowley, Mass. While he was president of the bank of the firm of Prime, Ward, and King, in its day the chief banking-house in New York city, Rufus received a classical education, and on its completion engaged in business. On his father's death in 1843 he devolved himself entirely to the care of his large estate. Mr. Prime was familiar with several languages, and was fond of literary pursuits.--His son, Frederick Edward, soldier, b. in Florence, Italy, 21 Sept., 1829, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1850, and employed on fortifications in New York, California, and the south. In 1861 he was taken prisoner at Pensacola, Fla., while he was on his way to Fort Pickens. Having been commissioned captain of engineers, he served during the Mannusco campaign, and the following six months he was successively chief engineer of the department of Kentucky, the Cumberland, and the Ohio. After being wounded and taken prisoner while on a reconnaissance, he occupied the same post during Gen. Grant's Mississippi campaign in 1862-3. He was breveted major for gallantry at the battle of Corinth, and took part in the siege of Vicksburg. He was also promoted colonel, in the same month, for meritorious services before Vicksburg, and colonel and brigadier-general, 13 March, 1865, for gallant conduct throughout the war. The commission of brevet brigadier-general was declined. On 5 Sept., 1871, Maj. Prime was retired through disability from wounds that he received in line of duty.
PRINCE, and received the brevet of lieutenant-colonel for services at Cedar Mountain, 9 Aug., 1862, where he was detached. After his release in December, he participated in the North Carolina operations from 11 Jan. till 24 June, 1863; commanded the district of Pamlico from 1 May till 24 June, 1863; pursued the Confederate army in its retreat from Maryland, served in the Rapidan campaign from October till December, 1863; pursued Gen. Nathaniel B. Forrest's raiders in Tennessee and Alabama in 1863, and was made major of volunteer service on 30 April, 1866. He then served as paymaster in Boston till 1869, as chief paymaster of the Department of the East till 1871, and as paymaster in New York city until 1875. He was assigned to the Division of the Pacific on 28 June, 1875, became lieutenant-colonel on 3 March, 1877, and retired on 31 Dec., 1879.

PRINCE, Jean Charles, Canadian R. C. Bishop, b. in St. Gregory, Three Rivers, Quebec, 13 Feb., 1844; d. in St. Hyacinthe, Quebec, 5 May, 1871. He was educated at Nicolet college, in the village of that name, under the French system of education, taught in Nicolet college and afterward in the seminary at St. Hyacinthe. After his ordination as priest in 1866 he was director of the Grand seminary of St. Jacques, at Montreal, until 1880, and of the College of St. Hyacinthe until 1849. The death of Monsignor Lattinge, first bishop of the see, having made a change in the bishopric necessary, he was called by Ignace Bourget, the second bishop, to assist in the administration of that diocese. Early in 1841 the chapter of St. Jacques was established, and Abbe Prince was installed titular canon of the cathedral of Montreal on 24 Jan. The same year he issued the first number of "Mélanges religieux," a periodical which at first only published the sermons of Monsignor de Forbin Janson, but subsequently comprised general religious intelligence, its first number was published in 1852, when its offices and material were destroyed by fire. At this period the city of Kingston was without any religious institution connected with the Roman Catholic church. Bishop Gaulin, having no assistants save a few priests and a few nuns, decided with work asked the bishop of Montreal to send him several Sisters of Charity and a priest competent to take charge of them. M. Prince accordingly went to Kingston, established the Convent of the Sisters of the Congregation for the education of young girls, and prepared the way for the organization of the "Séurs de l'Hôtel-Dieu" for the care of the sick poor. On returning to Montreal he assisted in founding Providence House, and became its first director. He was also connected with the Convent of the Good Pastor and other institutions. He was appointed by Gregory XIV, coadjutor to the bishop of Montreal and bishop of Martyropolis, 5 July, 1844. The see of Montreal was at that time very large. Many new enterprises were calling for assistance, and bishop and coadjutor found all their energies taxed to the utmost. In 1851 Bishop Prince visited Rome on an ecclesiastical mission, and while he was there, at the request of the delegates to the first council of Quebec, transferred himself to the see of St. Hyacinthe, 8 June, 1852. He was the first bishop of that diocese. The old college that he had formerly attended and transferred to the cathedral and episcopal palace was burned, 15 May, 1854, but he undertook the immediate construction of a cathedral chapel, besides laying the foundations of a more elaborate ecclesiastical edifice, which has since been completed. During his residence at St. Hyacinthe, Bishop Prince organized twenty parishes, established several missions, and ordained thirty-one priests.

PRINCE, John, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 11 July, 1751; d. in Salem, Mass., 7 June, 1830. He was the son of a mechanic, and was apprenticed to a timber, but prepared himself for the ministry. He entered Harvard in 1766, after which he studied theology, and from 1799 till 1830 was pastor of the First Unitarian church in Salem, Mass. He was a friend of Count Rumford, joined in many of the latter's inventions and experiments, and constructed an improved air-pump, which gave him a wide reputation. Brown gave him the degree of D. D., in 1793. He published several sermons. A "Memoir" by Rev. Charles W. Upham, who became his associate in 1824, is printed in the Massachusetts historical collections.

PRINCE, Oliver Hillhouse, senator, b. in Connecticut about 1787; d. at sea, 9 Oct., 1857. He removed to Georgia in early years, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1806, and began to practise in Macon, of which he was a solicitor and one of the commissioners that laid out the town. He was elected a U. S. senator in place of Thomas W. Cobb, serving from 1 Dec., 1828, till 3 March, 1829. Mr. Prince was the author of many humorous sketches, one of which, giving an account of a Georgia militia muster, was translated into several languages. He also published "Bi- est of the Laws of Georgia to December, 1830" (Milledgeville, 1822; 2d ed., Athens, 1837). He perished in the wreck of the steamer "Home" on the coast of North Carolina.

PRINCE, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Sandwich, Mass., 15 May, 1837; d. in Boston, Mass., 22 Oct., 1758. He was the grandson of John Prince, of Hull, England, who emigrated to this country in 1633. After graduation at Harvard in 1757, he visited the West Indies and the island of Madeira, went to England in 1759, and preached in Cork, Limerick, and elsewhere. He returned to Boston, and on 1 Oct., 1718, was ordained colleague of his classmate, Dr. Joseph Sewall, pastor of the Old South church in Boston, where he continued until his death, and became eminent as a preacher, linguist, and scholar. He began, in 1766, and continued through his life, to collect manuscript documents relating to the history of New England, which he left to the care of the Old South church. They were deposited in the tower, which also contained a valuable library of the writings of the early New England divines that had been gathered by Mr. Prince. These were partly destroyed by the British in 1775-6, and much important matter relating to the history of New England was thus lost. The remainder of the manuscripts, with his books, which are of value, form part of the Boston University library, and of these a catalogue was published by William H. Whitmore (Boston, 1868), and a later one with his portrait

“Earthquakes of New England,” with an appendix on Franklin’s discoveries in electricity (1755); and “The New England Psathy-Book, Revised and Improved” (1758). Several of his sermons are contained in the publications of the Massachusetts historical society, and six of his manuscript discourses were published after his death by Dr. John Erskine (Edinburgh, 1785). He also left a diary and other manuscripts.

Mr. Prince began a work entitled “The Chronological History of England,” in the form of annals, the first volume of which was published in 1736, and two numbers of the second in 1753. It is published in the collective historical society, and was edited by Nathan Hale, who published it in book-form (Boston, 1896).

Dr. Charles Chauncy said that Mr. Prince was “the most learned scholar, with the exception of Cotton Mather, in New England.” The Prince society, a printing association, was established in Boston in 1856.—His brother Nathan, scholar, b. in Sudwicht, Mass., 30 Nov., 1632; d. in the island of Boston, 27 July, 1745, was graduated at Harvard in 1718, where he was tutor from 1723 till 1742, and of which he became a fellow in 1727. Subsequently he took orders in the Church of England, and was sent as a missionary to the Mosquito Indians in Central America. He published an “Essay to solve the Difficulties attending the Several Accounts given of the Resurrection” (Boston, 1734), and an “Account of the Constitution and Government of Harvard College from 1636 to 1742” (1742).—Thomas’s son, Thomas, editor, b. in Boston, Mass., 27 Feb., 1722; d. there 30 Sept., 1748, was graduated at Harvard in 1740. He edited the earliest American periodical, which was entitled “Christian History,” and contained accounts of the revival and propagation of the gospel in the British colonies for 1743 (2 vols., 1744–6).

PRINGLE, William, horticulturist, b. in Flushing, L. I., 10 Nov., 1756; d. there, 9 April, 1842. In 1793 he bought eighty acres of land and extended the nurseries of his father in Flushing. He brought many varieties of fruits into the United States, sent many trees and plants from this country to Europe, and systematized the nomenclature of the best-known fruits, such as the Bartlett pear and the Isabella grape. The London horticultural society named for him the “William Prince” apple. He was a member of the horticultural societies of London and Paris, of the Imperial society of Georgiopolis of Florence, and of the principal American societies, and the meeting of horticulturists in 1823, at which De Witt Clinton delivered an address, was held at his residence. He published “A Treatise on Horticulture,” the first comprehensive book that was written in the United States upon this subject (New York, 1828).—His son, William Robert, horticulturist, b. in Flushing, L. I., 6 Nov., 1793; d. there, 28 March, 1849, was a pupil of his father, and practiced horticulture in Boucherville, Canada. He imported the first maple from this country into 1816, continued the “Linnacan nurseries” of his father, and was the first to introduce silk-culture and the morus multidens for silk-worms in 1834, but lost a large fortune by this enterprise, owing to the change in the tariff, which destroyed this industry for several years. In 1839 he went to California, was a founder of Sacramento, and in 1834 travelled through Mexico. He introduced the culture of cacti and agaves in California in 1834. With his father, he wrote a “History of the Vine” (New York, 1830); and, in addition to numerous pamphlets in the nursery, the strawberry disorer, medical botany, etc., he published a “Pharmacological Manual” (2 vols., 1832); “Manual of Roses” (1846); and about two hundred descriptive catalogues of trees, shrubs, vines, plants, etc.,—William Roberts’s son, Le Baron Bradford, b. in Flushing, L. I., 3 July, 1800, is descended through his maternal ancestors from William Bradford, of the “Mayflower.” He was educated in Flushing, and was graduated at Columbia law-school in 1866. In 1871–5 he was a member of the assembly for Queens county, and in 1872 was chairman of the judiciary committee which investigated the Chinese immigration. He was a member of the National Republican conventions of 1868 and 1876. In 1876–7 he was a member of the state senate. From 1879 to 1882 he was chief justice of New Mexico, and in 1880–2 he was president of the bureau of immigration of that territory. He was a member of the Protestant Episcopal general conventions between 1877 and 1886, and since 1877 has been a trustee of the Long Island cathedral. Since 1889 he has been chancellor of the jurisdiction of New Mexico and Arizona. He is the author of “Agricultural History of Queens County” (New York, 1861); “E. Phihruins Cunam or American Nationality” (1869); “A Nation, or a League” (Chicago, 1880); “General Laws of New Mexico” (Albany, 1881); “History of New Mexico” (New York, 1883); and “The American Church and its Name” (New York, 1887).

PRINGLE, Daniel, British naval officer, b. in England in 1780; d. in Port Royal, Jamaica, 29 Nov., 1847. He entered the navy at an early age, and was midshipman on the Jamaica station. He became lieutenant in 1807, at the beginning of the war of 1812 was in command of the Baltimore station, and in 1816 was attached to the squadron of Commodore George Prevost to the charge of the provincial navy on the lakes. He was promoted commander in 1813, and while in charge of the “Linet,” a brig of sixteen guns and 100 men, in the squadron of Commodore George Downie on Lake Champlain, participated in the battle of Plattsburg Bay. During a greater part of the night the “Linet” engaged the “Eagle,” an American brig of twenty guns and 150 men, and forced her out of the line, but was subsequently compelled to strike her own colors. He was promoted post-captain in 1815 for bravery in that affair, and the next year was in command on Lake Erie. He became commodore in January, 1846.

PRINGLE, Benjamin, jurist, b. in Richfield, N. Y., 9 Nov., 1807. He received a good education and studied law, but gave up practice to become president of a bank at Batavia, N. Y. He was judge of Genesee county courts for one year, served two terms in congress in 1854–5, having been elected as a Whig, and in 1860 was in the legislature. Subsequently he was appointed by President Lincoln a judge of the court of arbitration at Cape Town, South Africa, and served as such until 1862 with great Britain for the suppression of the slave-trade.

PRINGLE, John Julius, lawyer, b. in Charleston, S. C., 22 July, 1753; d. there, 17 March, 1843. His father, Robert (1702-76), came from Scotland to South Carolina about 1729, became a merchant in Charleston, and in 1760-9 was a justice of the court of common pleas. The son was graduated at the College of Philadelphia in 1771, and read law with John Rutledge and in England, where his published articles in defence of colonial rights attracted attention. At the beginning of the American Revolution he was made a justice of the Supreme Court of the State in 1778 when he became secretary to Ralph Izard, U. S. commissioner in Tuscany. Returning home by way of Holland and the West Indies, he was admitted to the bar in 1781, and attained high rank in his profession. In 1787-9 he was speaker of the state assembly, and in the latter year he served for a time in the District and they by special request of Gen. Washington. In 1800 Thomas Jefferson, then secretary of state, appointed him to report on any infractions of the treaty with Great Britain that might occur in his state, and from 1792 till 1808 he served as attorney-general of South Carolina. In 1805 President Jefferson tendered him the attorney-generalship of the United States, but he declined. He now married a Miss Laura Cornelia Bowne, a descendant of the early Dutch settlers in New York. The lieutenant-colonel of artillery in the Swedish army in Germany, and was deprived of his rank for surrendering the Saxon town of Chemnitz, but was afterward restored to favor. He was governor from 1841 to 1844. During these thirteen years he maintained with little assistance from home, the supremacy of the Swedish crown on the Delaware against the Dutch, against the New Haven emigrants under Lambert, and against the followers of Sir Edmund Powden, the so-called lord of New Albion. He established forts at New Castle, at Wilmington, at Ticonderoga (a short distance above the present town of Chester, where he resided), at the mouth of the Schuylkill, and on the eastern shore of Delaware Bay. His efforts were of no avail in his dealings with the Indians that inhabited both sides of the bay and river as far north as Trenton. During his tenure of office seven expeditions, containing more than 300 emigrants, sailed from Sweden. They were excellent farmers, devoted to the Lutheran church, and extremely just in their dealings with the Indians, whom they prepared by the kind treatment, to receive William Penn and his followers in a friendly manner. In 1654 Printz, disconsolately with the condition and prospects of the colony, returned. In the next year the Dutch captured Fort Christina, and the Swedish domination was soon at an end. Little is known of Printz after his return to Sweden, but it is recorded that he was made a general and became governor of Tranent in 1658. His daughter, Armagel, accompanied her father to this country, and in 1644 married Lieut. John Pappegoya, who was in temporary charge of the province after Printz's departure till the arrival of the new governor. Pappegoya returned to Sweden in 1654, but his wife remained in the province, where she lived included in the mansion built by her father on Tintamund island. The royal government made large grants of land to father and daughter, but none of their descendants became inhabitants of the colony. See "Songs of New Sweden," by Arthur Peterson (Philadelphia, 1887).

PRIOLEAU, Samuel, jurist, b. in Charleston, S. C., 3 Sept., 1764; d. in Pendleton, S. C., 10 Aug., 1840. His ancestors, who were French Huguenots, emigrated to this country immediately after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Samuel was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, but was not graduated, was admitted to the bar of Charleston in 1798, and established a reputation as a lawyer. He was a member of the legislative council for many years, chairman of the judiciary committee for several terms, and was active in 1829 in the preparation of the acts to "revise and amend the judiciary system of the state." The next year he made a report in favor of the constitutionality of the internal improvements by the United States. He became intendant of Charleston in 1824, and recorder in 1825, and held office until 1836. He aided in establishing the Medical college of South Carolina, was one of its trustees, and was an organizer of the Charleston literary club.

PRIVAT D'ANGLEMON, Alexandre, West Indian author, b. in St. Rose, Guadeloupe, in 1737; d. in Paris, France, 18 July, 1789. He was a munificently endowed man, and a member of the order of the Excellent Order of the Royal St. Basse Terre, went to Paris to study medicine but abandoned it for literature. In 1786 he published a volume on the Prado palace, which showed wit, elegance, and simplicity. Soon afterward he made a voyage to Guadeloupe, and, in a sojourn of three days, settled all his interests there, and, carrying his small fortune in a bag, returned to Paris, where he became a contributor to magazines. It was his custom to wander at night through the streets, studying the habits of the poorest classes, and he discovered some extraordinary trades, such as those of killer of cats and dealer in the tongues of rats and mice, which he revealed to the world in a volume that caused a great sensation, "Paris Anecdote" (Paris, 1854). After his death from consumption, Alfred Delvain collected his articles and published them under the title "Paris inconnu" (1851).

PROCTOR, Edna Dean, poet, b. in Henrietta, N. Y., 10 Oct., 1838. She received her early education in Concord, N. H. and subsequently removed to Brooklyn, N. Y., where she has since resided. The late Robert Singel has been a friend to her abroad, and contributed largely to magazine literature. She has edited "Extracts from Henry Ward Beecher's Sermons" (New York, 1858), and has published "Poems" (Boston, 1866) and "A Russian Journey" (1872), and is now (1898) compiling a genealogy of the Sterling family. Her best-known poems are "Heroes" and "By the Shamleth.

PROCTOR, Henry A., British soldier, b. in Wales in 1787; d. in Liverpool, England, in 1839. At the beginning of the war between Great Britain and the United States he came to Canada as colonel of the 43d regiment. He was despatched by Gen. Sir Isaac Brock to Amherstburg to prevent the landing of Gen. William Hull, whom he drove back, and subsequently gained the victory of Queenston, which exploits contributed much to the fall of Detroit and the capitulation of Hull. He opened the campaign of 1813 by defeating Gen. James Winchester near Frenchtown, on River Raisin, for which service he was promoted a brigadier-general. He was expelled from Fort Meigs by Gen. William Henry Harrison (q. c.) in May, 1813, from Fort Stephenson (Lowo Squaws) by Maj. Croghan on 2 Aug., and was defeated by Har- rison at the battle of the Thames, 5 Oct., 1813. He was tried and sentenced to be suspended from rank and pay for six months. He was reinstated, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-general.
PROCTOR, Lucien Brock, author, b. in Hannover, N. H., 6 March, 1826. He was graduated at Hamilton college in 1844, admitted to the bar in 1847, and, after practicing for two years at Port Byron, N. Y., removed to Dansville. Annul his professional duties he continued his classical studies, and contributed articles to magazines. In 1859 he became a regular contributor to the Albany "Law Journal." About 1863 he abandoned his profession and devoted his time entirely to legal literature. In 1884 he removed to Albany, N. Y. His works include: "The Bench and Bar of the State of New York" (2 vols., New York, 1870); "Lives of the New York State Judges" (1875); The Law of Takings by Thaddeus A. Emery (1879); "Lawyer and Client, or the Trials and Triumphs of the Bar" (1879); "The Bench and Bar of Kings County, including the Legal History of Brooklyn" (1883); "The Legal History of Albany and Schenectady Counties" (1884); "Early History of the Board of Regents and University of the State of New York" (1886); a revised and annotated edition of Daniel Pound's "Political History of the State of New York," continued from 1814 to the close of the legislative session of 1887; and addresses, including "Aaron Burr's Political Career Defended" (1885), and "Review of John C. Spencer's Legal and Political Career" (1886).

PROCTOR, Redfield, cabinet officer, b. in Proctor, Vt., 1 June, 1861. The town was founded by his great-grandfather, and he was graduated at Dartmouth in 1881, and at Albany law-school in 1889. For two years he practised law in Boston. In June, 1861, he entered the army as lieutenant in the 3d Vermont volunteers; in October he was made major of the 5th Vermont regiment, and in 1862 became colonel of the 15th. After leaving the army in 1865, he again practised law in Rutland, Vt.; in 1867 and 1868 he was appointed manager of the Sutherland Falls marble company. In 1890 this company was united with another, under the title of the Vermont marble company, and Mr. Proctor became its president. In the interval he had been state senator, and in 1876 became lieutenant-governor; and in 1878 he was elected governor. In 1878 he was a member of the national convention, and in 1888 he was chairman of the Vermont delegation to the Chicago convention, and cast the votes of his state for Tilden. Harrison for president, who appointed him secretary of war. In November, 1892, he was elected to fill both the unexpired term of U. S. Senator George F. Edmunds, resigned, and also the succeeding term.

PROCTOR, Richard Anthony, astronomer, b. in Chelsea, England, 23 March, 1817; d. in New York city, 12 Sept., 1888. He entered King's college, London, in 1855, and a year later went to Cambridge, where in 1860 he received his bachelor's degree. A fondness for mathematics led to his studying astronomy, on which subject he became the most fertile popular writer of his time. His original work included numerous researches on the stellar system, the law of distribution of stars, their motions, the relations between the stars and the nebulae, and the general constitution of the heavens. In 1849 he advanced, on theoretical grounds, a theory of the solar corpus that has since been generally accepted, and also that of the inner complex solar atmosphere that was afterwards advocated by Prof. Charles A. Young. He was active in the transit-of-Venus expeditions of 1874 and 1882, and became involved in a dispute with the astronomer royal of England as to the best methods of observation. In 1853-4 and in 1857-8 he lectured in the principal cities of the United States, and in 1879 he left England for Australia, and lectured in all of the larger towns of Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand. He visited the United States again in 1884, and, after lecturing in the leading cities, settled for a short time in New York, and then in Chicago. In 1885 he joined the American Astronomical Society, and in 1876 he was appointed an honorary fellow of King's college, London. He was honorary secretary of the Royal Astronomical Society and editor of its proceedings in 1872-3. Mr. Proctor established "knowledge" as a weekly journal in 1881, but changed it to a monthly in 1883. His literary work began in 1843, when he published an article in "The Saturday Magazine" on "Double Stars." Among his numerous books are "Saturn and its System" (London, 1865); "Gnomonic Star Atlas" (1866); "Half-Hours with the Telescope" (1868); "Half-Hours with Stars" (1869); "Other Worlds than Ours" (1870); "Light Science for Leisure Hours" (3 series, 1871, 1873, and 1880); "Elementary Astronomy" (1874); "Border Land of Science" (1875); "Transits of Venus—Past, Present, and Future" and "The Exploits of Heaven" (1875); and "Myths and Marvels of Astronomy" (1877). He edited "The Knowledge Library," consisting of a series of works made up of papers that appeared in his journal, among which were several of his own, notably "How to Play Whist" and "Home Whist" (1885). After becoming a American citizen he published "Science and Luck" (New York, 1887); "Principles of Geometry" (1887); "Easy Lessons in Differential Calculus" (1887); and "Old and New Astronomy," which at the time of his death was being issued.

PROCTOR, Thomas, soldier, b. in Ireland in 1739; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 16 March, 1806. He emigrated to Philadelphia with his father, Francis Proctor, and worked as a carpenter. On 27 Oct., 1775, he applied to the committee of safety to be commissioned captain of an artillery company to be raised for garrisoning Fort island, and was immediately commissioned with authority to raise his company. In August, 1776, his command was raised to a battalion, and he was appointed major. The regiment was under Wayne at Brandywine, and Proctor, as major, was engaged in the artillery duel with Knyphausen at Chadds Ford. Proctor was wounded in the duel, and his arm was afterwards crippled. In 1778, he was made captain of the 1st New Jersey regiment and fought at Saratoga. After the war, he was honored with a medal and a sword by the state of New Jersey. He died a poor man, and was buried at his own expense in the burying-ground of the New Jersey regiment.
PROVOST, Robert, historian, b. in Yorkshire, England, 10 May, 1728; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 July, 1813. He emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1759, and taught Latin and Greek in a Friends' academy in Philadelphia until the Revolution. Charles Brockden Brown was one of his pupils. He was firm in his attachment to the crown, and believed that the Revolution would cease the decline of virtue and prosperity in this country. "Dominie" Provost was a familiar figure for many years in his adopted city. He was tall, with a Roman nose, and "most imposing brow;" and in his curtained wig and cocked hat is described as the "perfect model of a Pennsylvania-Pennsylvania Quaker." His History of Pennsylvania contains a work which is full of valuable information, although deficient in well-sustained narrative, was his pecuniary ruin (Philadelphia, 1793-5).

PROUDFIT, Alexander Moncrief, clergyman, b. in Pequea, Pa., 10 Nov. 1778; d. in New Brunswick, N. J., 23 Nov. 1843. He was graduated at Columbia in 1792, studied theology under Dr. John H. Livingston, and was pastor of the Associate Reformed church in Salem, N. Y., from 1794 till 1835. He became secretary of the New York colonization society in the latter year, and held office till his resignation in 1841. Williams gave him the degree of D. D. in 1832. For a short time during his pastorate he was professor of philosophy and mathematics in the New York University, and in Newburgh, N. Y. He published numerous sermons and addresses, including "The One Thing Needful" (New York, 1804); "Rain and Recovery of Man" (1806); "Theological Works" (4 vols., 1815); and a work on the "Parables" (1820). See a memoir of him by Rev. John Forsyth (New York, 1844). His son, John Williams, clergyman, b. in Salem, N. J., 9 March, 1809, was graduated at Union in 1832 and at Princeton theological seminary in 1834, and was pastor of the Reformed church in Newburyport in 1835-39. At the latter date he became professor of Latin in the University of New York, and in 1839-64 he occupied the chair of Greek in Rutgers. Union college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1841. Dr. Provancher has written two ecclesiastical literature, and edited the New Brunswick Review. He published several sermons, and "Man's Twofold Life" (1802), and edited "A Comedy of Plautius, with English Notes" (1836).

PROUDFIT, David Law, author, b. in Newburg, N. Y., 27 Oct., 1812; d. in New York City, 23 Feb., 1892. At fifteen years of age he went to New York city to engage in business. In 1828 he enlisted as a private in the 1st New York mounted rifles. In the following year he was appointed a 2d lieutenant in the 29th U. S. colored troops. His regiment accompanied Gen. Butler in his advance up James river, and took part in various engagements, and at the close of the war he had won the rank of major. Later he engaged in business, and afterward took a special interest in pneumatic tubes, and he also became president of the Meteor despatch company of New York. His poems have been extensively used in public recitations. He had published in book-form, "Love among the Gomas," poems (New York, 1877), and "Make and Donkey" (1888). He was a descendant from Provost, the first settler and father of the future bishop, was a wealthy New York merchant, and for many years was one of the governors of King's college. His wife, Eve, was a daughter of Hermann Bleeker, Samuel, their eldest son, was one of the seven graduates of King's new Columbia college at its first commencement in 1758, winning the honors, although the youngest but one of his class. In the summer of 1766 he sailed for England, and in the same year entered St. Peter's college, Cambridge... enjoying while there the advantage of a tutor in the person of Dr. John Jebb, a man of profound learning and a zealous advocate of civil and religious liberty, with whom he corresponded till the doctor's death in 1786. In March, 1766, Mr. Provoost, having previously been admitted to the order of deacon by the bishop of London, was ordained at King's chapel, Whitehall, by the bishop of Chester. In the same year he married Maria, daughter of Thomas Bonsfield, a rich Irish banker, residing on his estate near Cork, and sister of his favorite classmate, afterward a member of parliament. The young clergyman, with his accomplished wife, sailed in September for New York, and in December he became an assistant minister of Trinity parish, which then embraced St. George's and St. Paul's, the Rev. Samuel Anlorn rector, the Rev. John Ogilvie and the Rev. Charles Inglis assistant ministers. During the summer of 1769 Mr. and Mrs. Provoost visited Mrs. Bonsfield and her son in Ireland, and spent several months in England and on the continent.

Early in 1774 Provoost severed his connection with Trinity, the reason assigned being that his attention was then approaching commerce with the mother-country were not in accord with those of a majority of the parish, and removed to a small estate in Dutchess (now Columbia) county, where he occupied himself with literary pursuits and in the cultivation of his farm and garden. He was an ardent disciple of the Swedish Linnaeus, and he possessed, for that period, a large and valuable library. (See book-plate on page 190.) Provoost was perhaps the earliest of American bibliophiles. While far away from the danger of resounding arms," he occasionally filled the pulpits of churches then existing at Albany, Catskill, Hudson, and Poughkeepsie. He was proposed as a delegate to the Provincial congress, but declined, as also in invitation to become chaplain of the convention which met in 1777 and framed the present constitution of the state of New York. After the British burned Esopus, on the Hudson, he joined his friends the Livingstons, and other neighbors, in their pursuit. Mr. Provoost was proffered the rectorship of St. Michael's church, Charleston, S. C. in 1777, and five years later that of King's chapel, Boston, where his patriotic principles and personal integrity gained him the confidence of both call. When the colonies had gained their independence and New York was evacuated by the British, he was unanimously elected rector of Trinity church, 13 Jan. 1784, immediately removed with his family to the city, and entered upon the duties of his office. Before the close of the year he was made a member of the Board of regents of the university, removed from Trenton, N. J., to New York, he was, in November, 1785, chosen as their chaplain. In the summer of 1786 he was elected first bishop of New York, and three weeks later received from the University of Pennsylvania the degree of D. D. In November of the same year he sailed for England in company with Dr. William White, where they were consecrated in Lambeth palace, 4 Feb. 1787, by the archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the bishops of Petersborough and Bath and Wells. The centennial anniversary of this event was appropriately celebrated in Lambeth palace, London, in Christ church, Philadelphia, and in the Chicago cathedral.

On his return Mr. Provoost resumed his duties as rector of Trinity, the two positions being then filled by the same person. He was one of the trustees of Columbia college, and under the present constitution was elected chaplain of the U. S. Senate. After his inauguration as president, Washington, with many other distinguished men, proceeded on foot to St. Paul's church (see illustration), where Bishop Provoost read prayers suited to the occasion. The first consecration in which he took part was that of the Rev. John Thomas Claggett, for the Diocese of Md., being the earliest of that order of the ministry consecrated in the United States. It occurred at Trinity church, 17 Sept., 1792, during a session of the general convention. As the presiding bishop Dr. Provoost was the consecrator, Bishop White, of Pennsylvania, Bishop Seabury, of Connecticut, and Madison, of Virginia, joining in the historic ceremony and uniting the succession of the Anglican and Scottish episcopate. Mrs. Provoost died, 18 Aug., 1796, which, with other domestic bereavements and declining health, induced the bishop to resign the rectorship of Trinity, 28 Sept., of the following year, and his bishopric, 3 Sept., 1801. His resignation was not accepted by the house of bishops, by whom, however, consent was given to the consecration as assistant bishop of Dr. Benjamin Moore. Provoost was subject to apoplectic attacks, and from one of these he died suddenly at his residence in Greenwich street. His funeral at Trinity was attended by the leading citizens of New York, and his remains were placed in the family vault in Trinity church-yard. In person Bishop Provoost was above medium height. His countenance was round and full and highly intellectual, as may be seen in the accompanying vignette, copied from the original by Benjamin Ragone. He translated Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," but it was never given to the world, nor any of his occasional poems in English, French, and German. His sermons were characterized by force and felicity of diction. He was learned and benevolent and inflexibly conscientious, fond of society and social life. Under his administration as rector of Trinity for seventeen years, the church was rebuilt on the same site. During his episcopate of four years the church did not advance as rapidly as during the same period under some of his successors. It must not, however, be forgotten that those were days of difficulties and depression in the church, and that the people of Pennsylvania threatened to throw their bishop into the Delaware river when he returned from England in 1795. The Episcopal church was only tolerated, and many Protestants fiercely opposed prejudice, having but recently "escaped from kings and bishops." While it cannot be claimed that
PROUD'HOMME

Provedome is among those "upon the adamant of whose fame the river of Time beats without injury," or that he should rank with those eminent founders of the American church, Scalabrini and White, or with the epoch-makers Hobart and Whittingham, it may be asserted that for elegant scholarship he had no peer among his American contemporaries. He was so indifferent to literary reputation that not even a sermon of his appears to have been printed, although his accomplishments were many and admirable, as may be inferred from Dr. Hobart's remarks at the first meeting of the diocesan convention after the bishop's death: "The character of Bishop Provedome is one which the enlightened Christian will estimate at no ordinary standard. The generous sympathies of his nature created in him a cordial concern in whatever affected the interests of his fellow-creatures. Hence his beneficence was called into almost daily exercise, and his private charities were often beyond what was justified by his actual means. As a scholar he was excellently qualified. As a scholar he was deeply versed in classical lore, and in the records of ecclesiastical history and church polity. To a very accurate knowledge of the Hebrew he added a profound acquaintance with the Greek, Latin, French, German, Italian, and other languages. He made considerable progress also in the natural and physical sciences, of which botany was his favorite branch." See "The Centennial History of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of New York" (New York, 1866), and an address on "Samuel Provedome, First Bishop of New York," by Gen. Jas. Grant Wilson (1857).

PRUYN. John Van Schaick Lansing, lawyer, b. in Albany, N. Y., 27 June, 1811; d. in Clifton Springs, N. Y., 21 Nov., 1877. He was graduated at Albany academy in 1826, became a student in the office of James King, and was admitted to the bar in 1832. At once he took high rank in his profession as one of the attorneys in the once-celebrated James will case. In 1835 he became a director of the Mohawk and Hudson railroad and its counsel, and in 1853, when the railroads between Albany and Buffalo were united, forming the present New York Central, he conducted the proceedings and drew up the consolidation agreement, in some respects the most important business instrument that was ever executed in the state of New York. He was a director in the Hudson river bridge case, finally arguing it alone, was sole trustee of the estate of Harmannus Bleeker, and was the financial officer of the Sault Ste. Marie canal, which he carried through many difficulties. In 1861 he was elected state senator as a Democrat, having accepted the nomination on condition that no money should be used in the election. At the close of his term, in 1865, he was offered the presidency of the University of Albany, a position of the highest dignity, which he accepted. He was the first man in any respect to be offered the presidency of the University of Albany, and a few years later he was one of the founders of the University of Buffalo, which he was asked to found, and which he conducted with great success. He was a member of congress in 1863-5 and 1875-7, serving upon several important committees, and as a regent of the Smithsonian institution. At the first election of General Grant to the presidency he was one of the tellers of the house of representatives and suggested such legislation as would have remedied the existing difficulties in counting the presidential vote. He was president of the University of the state of New York for thirty-three years, during the last fifteen of which he was chancellor. The establishment of the university convention and the regents' examinations were largely if not almost wholly due to his efforts. The regents are trustees of the State museum of natural history and the State library, and the present value of these collections is largely owing to Mr. Pruyn's personal interest and supervision. Mr. Pruyn was also president of the board of trustees of St. Stephen's college, Annandale, of the State board of charities, of the State survey, and of the Albany institute. He was also a member of various historical and other societies, and of the Association for the codification of the law of nations. Mr. Pruyn received the degree of M.A. from Rutgers in 1835, and from Union college in 1845, and that of L.L.D. in 1852, from the University of Rochester. His cousin, Robert Hewson, diplomatist, b. in Albany, N. Y., 14 Feb., 1815; d. in Albany, N. Y., 26 Feb., 1882, was graduated at Rutgers in 1833, studied law with Abraham Van Vechten, and in 1836 was admitted to the bar. He was corporation counsel of Albany, a member of the city government, and in 1855 became adjutant-general of the state. He was a Whig in politics, and served in the assembly in 1848-50, and again in 1854, when he was elected speaker. It is said that no appeal was made from any of his rulings in the chair. In 1861 he was appointed by President Lincoln U. S. minister to Japan as successor to Townsend Harris. As there were then no telegraphic facilities, months often elapsed before the minister could receive his instructions, and when they did arrive they were frequently inapplicable, circumstances having changed. Our vessels of war then in Japanese waters were piloted by the United States merchant steamer "Peace," and the American consul assiduously informed the Japanese government of the provisions prescribed by the U. S. government. In 1863 Mr. Pryor took the ground that he should regard the treaty to be the real rular of Japan, as otherwise foreign intercourse could never be guaranteed unless treaties were ratified by the mikado. Two naval expeditions were undertaken against the transgressing daimio of Chosu, whose vessels had fired on the American merchant steamer "Peace." In the first the U. S. man-of-war "Woming," Com. McDougall, sank the brig "Laurel" and blew up the steamer "Lancefield," at the same time running the gauntlet of shore batteries of eighty guns in the Straits of Simonsaki. In the second expedition the forces of Great Britain, France, and Holland (the daimio having previ- ously directed the attack at which he had contested) the United States being represented by the chartered steamer "Taking," having on board a part of the crew and guns of the "Jamestown," which had been left at Yokohama for the defence of that place. The allies demolished the fortifications of Chosu and captured the guns. Although it was questioned, this proceeding postponed the dethronement of the daimio for several years, and caused him to observe his treaty stipulations which he had not been able to do, owing to the hostility of the daimio of Chosu. An indemnity was paid by Japan and intercourse was guaranteed. Mr. Pryor played an important part in securing American rights in the East. Mr. Pryor's last public post was that of presiding officer of the State constitutional convention of 1872. For the last years of his life he was not greatly identified with public affairs, but was deeply interested in various enter- prises, and at the time of his death was president of the National commercial bank of Albany. He was a trustee of Rutgers college, to which he gave $10,000, and was president of the board of directors of the Dudley observatory. He received the degree of M. A. from Rutgers in 1836, and in 1865 that of LL. B. from Williams.

PRYOR, Roger Atkinson, lawyer, b. near Petersburg, Va., 19 July, 1828. He was graduated at Hampden Sidney college in 1845, and at the University of Virginia, three years later, studied law, and was admitted to the bar, but entered journalism. He joined the staff of the Washington "Union," and was afterward editor of the Richmond "Enquirer." He was sent at twenty-seven on a special mission to Greece by President Pierce. In 1856 he opposed William L. Yancey's proposition to reopen the slave-trade. He was an ardent advocate of state-rights, and established a daily paper, the "South," at Richmond, in which he represented the extreme views of the Virginia Democratic party. He was a speaker of the Convention of 1861, and his intense utterance of his convictions led to several duels. He was elected to congress in 1859 to fill a vacancy, and was re-elected in 1860, but did not take his seat. While in that body he made various fiery speeches, and in the excited condition of the public mind preceding the civil war was often involved in passion- nate discussions with his northern opponents. One day in the Senate, Mr. Potter named bowie-knives as the weapons, and the Virginian's second refused to allow their principal to fight with arms which they pronounced barbarous. This challenge created an uproar throughout the country, and was accompanied with severe and characteristic comments on the principals from the northern and southern press. Mr. Pryor was eager for war, and visited Charleston to witness the firing on Sumter. When its provision Confederate congress at Richmond, and elected to the first regular congress. Soon afterward he entered the Confederate army as a colonel, and was made a brigadier-general after the battle of Williamsburg. He resigned, 25 Aug., 1863, was taken prisoner in 1864, and confined for some time in Fort Lafayette. After the surrender of the Confederate armies was urged on the south the adoption of its policy of acquiescence and loyalty to the government. He went to New York in 1865, settled there as a lawyer, and is now a city judge. He has taken no part in politics since the war, confining himself exclusively to his profession. He is the author of many speeches and literary addresses, and has been given the degree of LL. D. by Harvard University.

PUENTE, Juan Eligio (poo-aire'-ta), Spanish author, b. in Asturias about 1720; d. in Mexico about 1780. Very little is known of his life, except that he was employed as chief clerk in the office of the secretary of the vice Royalty of Mexico, Melchor de Peramus, and probably was sent by him on several missions to Florida. His manuscripts were found in the library of the secretary, at the evan- gORIZATION of Mexico by the Spaniards, and include "Noticias de la Provincia de la Florida y el Cuyo de los Martires, con un Mapa y Mapa" (dated 1760), the accompanying map of which is remarkably correct for that time; "Informe de los Pescadores que se sirvieron en las Costas de la Florida y Campeche, y de los beneficios que pueden resaltar de tales Pesquerias" (1770); and "Noticia exacta de las Familias, que por la entrega de la Florida a la Corona Britanica, se retiraron a la Habana, y modo con que fueron recibidas" (1770).

PUERNA, Cristobal Martinez (poo-air'-ta), Spanish missionary, b. in Andalusia in 1580; d. in Honduras, Central America, in September, 1623. He was a soldier in his youth, came in 1609 to America with Juan Monasterios, and landed in Guatamala. He was appointed by the vicerey to Costa Rica, and while there resolved to abandon the army and undertake the conversion of the Indians of the province of Teguazguila. In 1602 he retired to Guatemala, entered the Franciscan order, 17 Oct., and in the newly founded seminary studied theology and the principal Indian dialects. Afterward he was professor of Latin grammar in Chiapa, and master of novices in the convent of Guatemala, but he continued in his desire to convert the natives, and after many difficulties obtained from his superiors permission to undertake the task. With another friar and four Guatamala Indians as interpreters he landed at Cape Gracias a Dios, penetrated into the interior, and was fairly successful with the Paye and Guazacapa tribes, where he founded the mission of Concepcion near Juruca river. He afterward received a vessel with auxiliaries and another priest, and undertook the conversion of the Guana and Jicque tribes, where he founded seven other missions. While camping on Guanampo river, he was invited by the ferocious Albatunio tribe to preach to them, and, notwithstanding the opposition of his Jicque companions, he entered the camp and was never heard of after September 1623. His body was recovered later by Juan de Miranda, the governor of PUEYRREDON, Juan Martin de (poo-air-ray-don) was born in Buenos Ayres about 1775; d. there about 1840. He received his education in Spain, but returned in the first years of the 19th century. When the English general, Sir William Beresford, occupied Buenos Ayres, 27 June, 1806, Pueyrredon refused to recognize the English authorities, and, leaving the city, began to organize resistance. On 31 July, with a force of armed peasants, he attacked the English outworks, and was driven back, but his troops surrounded the city, which capitulated on 11 Aug. In the second invasion of the English he took a principal part in the heroic defence of the city, which ended by the capitulation of Gen. Whiteholck, 7 July, 1807. He was active in the movement for independence in the provinces. He was designated by the Congress of Rivadavia, of which he was a member, supreme director of the Argentine Republic, 3 May, 1816. Together with San Martin and Belgrano he favored in that congress the election of a monarch, fearing that a republican form of government would continue the anarchy that existed at that time. During his administration he aided his friend San Martin, governor of Chaco, in the preparation of his expedition for the liberation of Chili, and, after the latter's departure, 17 Jan., 1817, forwarded re-enforcements and resources to him. In the same year he obtained the transfer of the congress to Buenos Ayres, in order to have it more under his influence. On 13 May that body began its sessions there, and in 1818 decreed the new constitution, which caused general discontent and several revolts. Pueyrredon sent forces from Buenos Ayres against the rebellions provinces, and ordered the army of the north against them, but the insurgents were victorious, and Pueyrredon was forced to resign, 10 June, 1819, taking refuge in Montevideo. After a few years he returned to Buenos Ayres, but not at this time in public life, ending his days in retirement on his estate, Bosque Hermoso, near Buenos Ayres.

PUFFER, Reuben, clergyman, b. in Sudbury, Mass., 7 Jan., 1759; d. in Berlin, Mass., 9 April, 1829. He was graduated at Harvard in 1778, taught in East Sudbury (now Wayland), Mass., studied theology, and became in 1781 pastor of the Congregational church at Sudbury (now Berlin), which charge he held till his death. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1810. He published an election sermon (1803); "Dudleian Lecture at Harvard" (1808); an address (4 July, 1810); "Convention Sermon" (1811); and "Two Sermons" (1826).

PUFFIER, Eliza Lofton (pew), author, b. in Bayou Lafourche, La., in 1841. Her father, Col. George Phillips, of the legislature, and her mother was a daughter of Judge John Rice. After graduation at a seminary in New Orleans in 1858, she married William W. Pugh, a planter of Assumption parish, La. She has written under the pen-name of "Arrin," and is the author of two novels, "Not a Hero" (New York, 1867), and "In a Peculiar Place" (Philadelphia, 1871).

PUFFIG, Ellis, Quaker preacher, b. in the parish of Dolgelieu, Meirionethshire, North Wales, in August, 1656; d. in Gwynedd, Pa., 3 Dec., 1718. His father died before his birth, and his mother soon afterward. In his eighteenth year he was converted, under the preaching of John ap John, a Quaker, and in 1680 he was approved as a minister. In 1687 he and his family, with many of his acquaintance, settled near the township of Gwynedd, in Philadelphia (now Montgomery) county, Pa., where he found hundreds of his countrymen, whose worship was performed in Welsh. He was able to support his family as a farmer, but his heart was engaged in the ministry and he was afterwards welcomed in the various meetings of his society in Philadelphia, Chester, and Bucks counties. In 1706 a religious "concern" led him back to Wales, where he remained until 1708, when he returned to his family and resumed his ministerial labors. He wrote, for the most part in his last sickness, a book entitled "Ance" (An Appeal to the English Nation," to call them from the many things to the one thing needful, for the saving of their souls." This book was afterward printed by Andrew Bradford (Philadelphia, 1721), and is the first Welsh book that is known to have been printed in this country. So popular and well received was this dying testimony that in 1727 an English translation of it was published, a translation having been made by Rowland Ellis (1727).

PUGH, Evan, chemist, b. in East Nottingham, Pa., 29 Feb., 1828; d. in Bellefonte, Pa., 29 April, 1864. He was early apprenticed to the blacksmith's trade, but at the age of nineteen bought out the residuum of his time and studied at the Whitestown, N. Y., seminary, meanwhile supporting himself by manual labor. Failing heir to a small property in his native town, including a school, he taught there successfully for several years. In 1853 he disposed of these interests and went abroad, where for four years he studied natural science and mathematics in the universities of Leipsic, Gottingen, Heidelberg, and Paris, receiving in 1856 the degree of Ph. D. at the University of Gottingen. After this he devoted attention to agricultural chemistry, and made in England a series of valuable determinations of nitrogen, showing that plants do not assimilate free nitrogen. In 1859 he returned to the United States and accepted the presidency of Pennsylvania agricultural college. He at once organized a new scheme of instruction and carried on the improvements of the college buildings, secured endowments, and, besides taking the general guidance of the institution, had special charge of the practical investigations of the students in chemistry, scientific agriculture, mineralogy, and geology. This office he held until his death. Dr. Pugh was a fellow of the London chemical society, a member of scientific societies in the United States, and contributed to scientific literature.

PUGH, George Ellis, senator, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 28 Nov., 1822; d. there, 19 July, 1876. After his graduation at Miami university in 1840 he practised law until the beginning of the Mexican war, in which he took part as captain in the 4th Ohio regiment, and also as aide to Gen. Joseph Lane. In 1848-9 he served in the legislature, and he was city solicitor of Cincinnati in 1850, and attorney-general of Ohio in 1851. He was elected to the U. S. senate as a Democrat, serving from 3 Dec., 1855, till 3 March, 1861, and was a member of the committees on public lands, and the judiciary. He was a delegate to the National Democratic convention at Charleston, S. C., in 1860, and made a speech in reply to William L. Yancey. One of his ablest efforts was his appeal in behalf of Clement L. Vallandigham (q. v.) in 1863, in the habeas corpus proceeding involving the question as to the power and duty of the judge to relieve Mr. Vallan-dighet from military confinement. He was defeated as the Democratic candidate for lieutenant-governor in 1863, and for congress in 1864. In 1873, he was elected to the State constitutional convention, but declined to serve.

PUGLIII, James Lawrence, senator, b. in Burke county, Ga., 12 Dec., 1820. In early years he removed with his family to Alabama, where he received a collegiate education, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He began to practice in Enfauila, Ala., as a presidential elector in 1848 and 1856, and was then elected to congress as a Demo-} crat, serving from 5 Dec., 1859, to 21 Jan., 1861, when he retired, on the excursion of his state. He was a delegate from Alabama to the house of representatives in the 1st and 2d Confederate congresses, serving from 2 Feb., 1862, till the surrender in 1865. He also served as a private in the Confederate army, and after the war again practiced law. Mr. Pugh was president of the Democratic state convention of 1874, a member of the Constitutional convention of 1875, and a presidential elector again in 1876. He was elected a U. S. senator from Alabama for the term ending in 1885, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of George S. Houston, and was re-elected for the term ending 3 March, 1891, also for the term following.

PULASKI, Kazimierz (or Casimir) Polish soldier, b. in Podolia, 4 March, 1745; d. near Savannah, Ga., 11 Oct., 1779. He was the eldest son of Joseph Pulaski, founder of the confederation of Barr. He received a thorough education and served in the guard of Duke Charles of Courland. In 1775 he returned to Poland and joined his father as one of the eight original associates of the confederation of Barr, 29 Feb., 1776. He continued to carry on a partisan war, following the arrest and death of his father. He raised a revolt in Lithuania in 1769, and, although he was driven into the fortified monastery of Czenstochowa, he finally compelled the besieging Russian army to withdraw. He helped to drive the Russians across the Vistula, but opposed the plans of the French commissioner, François Dumouriez, and refused to join the main army, thus causing the loss of the battle of Landskron in 1779. He was then elected commander-in-chief, but was defeated, and returned to Czenstochowa, and had been accused of planning the murder of King Stanislas Poniatowski from Warsaw, but modern historians have cleared him of all participation in it. The plot had for its result the intervention of Prussia and Austria, and led ultimately to the partition of Poland in 1773. Pulaski's estates were confiscated, he was outlawed, and a price was set on his head. He escaped to Turkey; but, failing to obtain succor from the sultan, went to Paris toward the close of 1775. He had there several interviews with Benjamin Franklin, and, becoming interested in the American struggle for independ-} ence, came to this country in March, 1777. He proceeded immediately to Philadelphia, and was attached to the staff of Washington. The first action in which he took part was at the Brandywine. When the Continental troops began to yield, he made a reconnoissance with the general's body-guard, and reported that the enemy were endeavoring to cut off the line of retreat. He was authorized to collect as many of the scattered troops as came in his way, and employ them according to his discretion, which he did in a manner so prompt as to effect important aid in the retreat of the army. Four days later, on recommendation of Washington, he was commissioned brigadier-general, and placed in charge of the cavalry. He saved the army from a surprise at Warren tavern, near Philadelphia, took part in the battle of Germantown, and in the winter of 1777-'8 engaged in the operations of Gen. Anthony Wayne, contributing to the defeat of a British division at Haddonfield, N. J. The cavalry officers could not be reconciled to the orders of a foreigner who could scarcely speak English and whose ideas of discipline and tactics differed widely from those to which they had been accustomed, and these circumstances induced Pulaski to resign his command in March, 1778, and return to Valley Forge, where he was assigned to special duty. At his suggestion, which was adopted by Washington, congress authorized the formation of a corps of lancers and light infantry, in which even deserters and prisoners of war might enlist. This corps, which became famous under the name of Pulaski's legion, was recruited mainly in Baltimore. In September it numbered about 350 men, divided into three companies of cavalry and three of infantry. The poet Longfellow has commemorated in verse this episode of Pulaski's life. In the autumn he was ordered to Little Egg Harbor with his legion, a company of artillery, and a party of militia. A German deserter named Gustav Juhet, who held a subordinate command in the legion and who entertained a grudge against Col. de Bosen, the leader of the infantry, betrayed their whereabouts to the British, who made a night attack upon De Bosen's camp. Pulaski heard the tumult and, assembling his cavalry, repelled the enemy, but the legion suffered a loss of forty men. During the following winter he was stationed at Minisink, N. J. He was dissatisfied with his petty command, and in-}

to join Gen. John McIntosh at Augusta, and to move with him toward Savannah in advance of the army of Gen. Benjamin Lincoln. Before the enemy was aware of his presence he captured an outpost, and, after several skirmishes, established permanent communications with the French fleet at Beaufort. He rendered great services during the siege of Savannah, and in the assault of 9 Oct. commanded the whole cavalry, both French and American. Toward the close of the action he received a shot in the upper part of his right thigh, and was taken to the U. S. brig "Wasp." He died as the vessel was leaving the river. His body was buried at sea, but his funeral ceremony took place afterward in Charleston. Congress voted a monument to his memory, which has never been erected, but was raised by the citizens of Savannah, of which Lafayette laid the cornerstone during his visit to the United States in 1824. It was completed on 6 Jan., 1853, and is represented in the accompanying illustration.

PULITZER, Joseph (pul'-it-ser) journalist, b. in Buda-Pesth, Hungary, 10 April, 1847. He was educated in his native city and came to this country in early youth. Soon after arriving in New York he went to St. Louis, where he quickly acquired a knowledge of English, became interested in journalism, and was elected to the Missouri legislature in 1869, and to the State constitutional convention in 1874. He entered journalism at twenty as a reporter on the St. Louis "Westliche Post," a German Republican newspaper, then under the editorial control of Carl Schurz. He subsequently became its managing editor, and obtained a proprietary interest. In 1878 he founded the Post-Dispatch in that city, by buying the "Dispatch," and uniting it with the "Evening Post," and he still retains control of the journal. In 1872 he was a delegate to the Cincinnati convention which nominated Horace Greeley for the presidency, and in 1880 he was a delegate to the Democratic National convention, and a member of its platform committee from Missouri. In 1880 he purchased the New York American, then in the hands of Schurz, but his twenty-three years of existence under various managers, had achieved no permanent success, and he has greatly increased its circulation. He is at present its editor and sole proprietor. He was elected to Congress in 1884, but resigned a few months after taking his seat, on account of the pressure of journalistic duties.

PULITZER, George M(etcen), b. in Chautauqua county, N. Y., 3 March, 1834; d. in Chicago, 10 Oct., 1897. He was clerk for a country merchant, and at seventeen joined an elder brother in the cabinet-making business in Albion, N. Y. At twenty-two he successfully undertook a contract for moving warehouses and other buildings, along the line of the Erie canal, then being widened by the government. He received for this work the nickname of "Mr. Job." He engaged extensively in the then novel task of raising entire blocks of brick and stone buildings. In 1858 his attention was first directed to the discomfort of long-distance railway travelling, and he determined, if possible, to offer the public something better. In 1859 he remodelled two old day-coaches of the Chicago and Alton road into sleeping-cars, which at once found favor and established a demand for improved travelling accommodation. In 1863 he began the construction of Chicago a sleeping-car upon the now well-known model, which was destined to associate his name inseparably with progress in railway equipment. It was named the "Pioneer," and cost about $18,000. From this small beginning he continued to develop his ideas for comfort and safety in railway travel, till Pullman cars are now known all over the world. The Pullman palace-car company, of which he was president, was organized in 1867, and it now operates over 1,400 cars on more than 100,000 miles of railway. In 1887 he designed and established the system of "vestibuled trains," which virtually makes of an entire train a single car. They were first put in service upon the Pennsylvania trunk lines, and are now to be found on many other railroads. In 1880, in obedience to the imperative demand of the Pullman company for increased shop facilities, and to give effect to an idea he had long cherished of improving the social surroundings of the workmen of the world, he founded near Chicago the industrial town of Pullman, which now contains over 11,000 inhabitants, 5,000 of whom are employed in the company's shops. Architecturally the town is picturesque, with broad streets, handsome public buildings, and attractive houses supplied with every modern convenience. According to mortality statistics, it is one of the most healthful places in the world. Mr. Pullman had been identified with various public enterprises, among them the Metropolitan elevated railway system of New York, which was constructed and opened to the public by a corporation of which he was president.—His brother, James Minton, clergyman, b. in Port Royal, South Carolina, N. Y., 21 Aug., 1858, was graduated at St. Lawrence divinity-school, Canton, N. Y., in 1860. He was pastor of the 1st Universalist church, Troy, N. Y., from 1861 till 1868, when he was called to the 6th Universalist church, New York city, where he remained until 1885. He organized and was first president of the Young Men's Universalist association of New York city in 1869, was secretary of the Universalist general convention in 1869-77, and chairman of the publication board of the New York state convention in 1869-74. From 1870 till 1886 he was a trustee of St. Lawrence university, which gave him the degree of D. D. in 1873. Since 1885 he has been pastor of the 1st Universalist church in Lynn, Mass.

PULSIFER, David, antiquary, b. in Ipswich, Mass., 22 Sept., 1809; d. in Augusta, Me., 9 Aug., 1864. He was educated in the district schools, and then went to Salem to learn bookbinding, where, in handling old records, his taste for antiquarian research was first developed. Subsequently he served as clerk in county courts, and transcribed several ancient books of records. In 1853 the governor of Massachusetts called the attention of the executive council to the perishing condition of the early records and recommended that the two oldest volumes of the general court records should be printed at the expense of the state. Ephraim M. Wright and Nathaniel B. Shurtleff were appointed to the task of the printing, and David Pulsifer, who was acknowledged to be especially skillful in deciphering the chirography of the 17th century, was charged with the copying. He had previously copied the first volume for the American antiquarian society. Of his work, Samuel F. Hauen, in his introduction to the printed results, said in the American Antiquarian Society: "The qualifications of an expert in chirography with a genuine antiquarian taste and much familiarity with ancient records." Mr. Pulsifer had edited the "Records of the Colony of New Plymouth in New England" (vols. ix. to xii., Boston, 1830-61); "The Simple Cobbler of Agawam in America" (1843); "A Poetical Epistle to George Washington, Esq., Command-er-in-Chief of the United States of America, by Rev. Charles H. Wharton, D. D."

which was first published anonymously in An-napolis in 1789 (1881); and "The Christian's A. B. C.," an original manuscript, written in the 18th century by an unknown author (1885). He is the author of "Inscriptions from the Burying-Grounds in Salem, Mass." (Boston, 1847); and has edited a "Quarterly Review For Home and Abroad" and a "Guide of the Battle of Banker Hill, with General John Bur-gevan's Account" (1872).

PULTE, Joseph Hippolyt, physician, b. in Meschede, Westphalia, Germany, 6 Oct., 1811; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 24 Feb., 1884. He was educated in the gymnasium of Sost and received his medical degree at the University of Hamburg. He followed his brother, Dr. Hermann Pulte, to the country in 1834, and practised in Cherrystown, Pa., but became a convert to homoeopathy, and took an active interest in forming the homeopathic academy in Allentown, Pa., which was closed in 1840. He then removed to Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1844 he founded, with others, the American institute of homoeopathy in New York city, and in 1872 he established in Cincinnati the medical college that bears his name, where he was professor of the science of clinical medicine. In 1852 he was made professor of the same branch at the Homeopathic college of Cleveland, and he served as professor of obstetrics in 1853-5. He contributed to various homeopathic journals, was an editor of the "American Magazine of Homoeopathy and Hydro-pathy," v., 1852-4, and of the "Quarterly Medical Magazine", in Massachusetts, in 1854; edited Teste's "Diseases of Children," translated by Emma H. Cote (2d ed., Cincinnati, 1857); and was the author of "Organon der Weltgeschichte" (Cincinnati, 1846; English ed., 1859); "The Homoeopathic Do-mestic Physician" (1850); "A Reply to Dr. Met-calf" (1851); "The Science of Medicine" (Clev-eland, 1859); "The Woman's Medical Guide" (Cincinnati, 1853); and "Civilization and its Heroes: an Orion" (1855).

PUMACAHUA, Matéo (poo-mah-wah), Peruvian insurgent, b. in Chinchero about 1780; d. in Sienani, 17 March, 1835. He was cacique of his native tribe, but served with the royals and aided in suppressing the revolution of 1780, headed by Jose Gabriel Condorelim. In 1820, he was appointed colonel of militia, and soon afterward he obtained the same rank in the army. At the beginning of the struggle for independence he served the royals, and was appointed by the viceroy Abascal to maintain order in the province of Cuzco. With 3,500 men and the forces of another cacique, Manuel Choquechua, he pacified the whole territory, and Abascal recommended him to the king, who appointed him brigadier in 1811. In 1812, during an absence of Gen. Goyeneche, the viceroy appointed Pumacahua temporary governor of upper Peru and president of the royal audiencia. A sudden change now took place in his opinions, and when the revolution in Cuzco under Jose and Vicente Angulo began, 3 Aug., 1814, Pumacahua took part in it, and was appointed a member of the governing junta. On 9 Nov., in command of a large and division of the royal forces that defended the province of Arequipa, and took possession of the city. But on the 30th of the same month he left that place and went to Cuzco, and meanwhile Gen. Ramirez occupied the city. After two months' sojourn, occupied in organizing his forces and casting cannon, Pumacahua, at the approach of Ramirez, took up a strongly fortified position near Yanachiri, which was stormed on 11 March, 1815. Pumacahua was totally defeated, and soon afterward hanged by order of Ramirez.

PUMPEDLY, Mary Rollenback Wells (pum-pel-ly), poet, b. in Athens, Pa., 6 May, 1803; d. in Paris, France, 4 Dec., 1879. She wrote religious historical poems, including Belshaz-zar's Feast, "The Pilate's Wife's Dream," "Hevel's Ark," "The Last of the Picts," and "The Story of America," which were collected and published in a volume (New York, 1852).—Her son, Raphael, geologist, b. in Osgo, N. Y., 8 Sept., 1837, was educated at the polytechnic school in Hanover, and at the Royal mining school in Freiberg, Saxony, after which he travelled extensively through the mining districts of Europe for the purpose of studying geology and metallurgy by direct observation. In 1859 he was engaged in mining operations in Arizona, and during 1861-3 he was employed by the government of Japan to explore the island of Yesso, after which he was engaged by the Chinese authorities to examine the coal-fields of northern China and returned to the United States in 1866, after crossing Mongolia, central Asia, and Siberia, thus completing a geological journey around the world in the north temperate zone. During 1866-75 he was professor of mining at the School of mining and practical geology at Harvard, and in 1876-71 he conducted the geological survey of the copper region of Michigan, for which he prepared "Copper-Bearing Rocks," being part ii. of volume I. of the "Geological Survey of Michigan" (New York, 1878).—She was a member of the "American Association of the Geological Survey of Missouri," and for three years devoted his energies to that task, preparing "A Preliminary Report on the Iron Ores and Coal Fields," with an atlas for the report of the "Geological Survey of Missouri" (New York, 1853). When the U. S. geological survey was established in 1879, Prof. Pumpelly organized the division of mining and geological, and as a special agent of the 10th census he planned and directed the investigations on the mining industries, exclusive of the precious metals, and prepared volume xv. of the "Census Reports," on "The Mining Industries of the United States" (Washington, 1886). During 1879-80 he conducted at Newport, R. I., an elaborate investigation for the National board of health as to the influence of various substances, and the effects of distilled waters from liquids and from air. In 1881 he organized the Northern transcontinental survey, with reference to collecting information concerning the topographical and economic features of Dakota, Montana, and Washington territories, and had charge of the work until its cessation in 1884, also editing the reports of the survey. He has prepared a new manual on the geological and palaeontological division of the archaean division of geology, and remained there but a few years. Prof. Pumpelly is a member of PUNCHARD, William J., jurist, b. in Centre county, Pa., 11 April, 1840. He received a liberal education, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1869, served in the legislature, and was active in public affairs. He published an "Abridgment of the Laws of Pennsylvania from 1700 to 1851" (Philadelphia, 1851). Frederick C. Brightly edited the 8th and 10th editions (1858 and 1892), with annual supplements (to 1899).

PURCHAS, Samuel, English clergyman, b. in Thaxted, Essex, England, in 1577; d. in London in 1629. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and in 1604 became vicar of Eastwood, Essex. Removing to London, he compiled from more than 1,300 authorities a work entitled "Purchas, his Pilgrimage; or, Relations of the World and the Religious observed in all Ages and Places discovered from the Creation unto this Present" (4 parts, folio, London, 1613-1616), and Hakluyt's Posthumous; or, Purchas, his Pilgrimages," which is a collection of the original accounts, and which preserves the original narratives of the early English navigators and explorers of the western world (5 vols., folio, 1625-33). He also published "The King's Tower and Triumphal Arch of London" (1623) and "Microcosmus, or the Historie of Man," which is sometimes called "Purchas's Funeral Sermon" (1627).

PURDON, John, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1784; d. there, 3 Oct., 1835. He was graduated at Princeton in 1802, and was admitted to the bar in 1806, served in the legislature, and was active in public affairs. He published an "Abridgment of the Laws of Pennsylvania from 1700 to 1851" (Philadelphia, 1851). Frederick C. Brightly edited the 8th and 10th editions (1858 and 1892), with annual supplements (to 1899).

PURMAX, [or PURCHAS], George, editor, b. in Salem, Mass., 7 June, 1806; d. in Boston, Mass., 2 April, 1880. His father, John (1763-1857), served in the Revolutionary army and was probably the last survivor of the regiments that were stationed at West Point at the time of Arnold's treason. The son was graduated at Dartmouth in 1836, and at Andover theological seminary in 1839. From 1839 till 1844 he was pastor of a Congregational church in Plymouth, N. H. Mr. Punchard was associate editor and proprietor of the "Boston Traveler," of which he was also a founder, from 1845 till 1857, and again from 1867 till 1871. He was secretary of the New England branch of the American tract society, and the author of "The Vicar of Wakefield" and "A History of Congregationalism from A. D. 250 to 1819" (1841; 3rd ed., 3 vols., New York, 1853-7).

PURCELL, John Baptist, R. C. archbishop, b. in Mallow, County Cork, Ireland, 26 Feb., 1806; d. in Brown county, Ohio, 4 July, 1888. He emigrated to the United States in 1818, and entered a law college, Baltimore, where he was taught. In 1829 he was made a missionary to Mount St. Mary's, Emmetsburg, and, after receiving minor orders, finished his theological course in the Sulphurite college, Paris. He was ordained a priest in the cathedral of Notre Dame in 1826, and in 1827 was appointed professor of philosophy in St. Mary's college, becoming president in 1828. The progress that this institution made during his presidency attracted the notice of the American hierarchy, and he was nominated bishop of Cincinnati. He was consecrated on 13 Oct., 1833. At the time of his appointment there was only one small frame Roman Catholic church in the city, and not more than 16 in the diocese, while the church property was valued at about $12,000. He founded academies, and churches, established congregations, and built a convent for the Ursulines. The number of Roman Catholics had increased from 6,000 to 70,000 in 1846, with 70 churches and 53 priests. In 1847 the diocese of Cleveland was formed out of that of Cincinnati, and placed under the jurisdiction of another prelate at his request. He was made an archbishop in 1850, with four suffragan bishops attached to his see, and being in Rome in 1851, he received the pallium from the pope's own hands. He at once set about founding what was to be one of the chief theological seminaries of the country, Mount St. Mary's of the West. He presided over his first provincial council in 1853, and held a second in 1858. It was impossible to meet the wants of the new congregations with the resources at hand, and this led to the financial embarrassments that shadowed the closing years of the archbishop's life. In 1868 the creation of new sees had limited his diocese to that part of Ohio south of latitude 40° 41', but this still contained nearly 140,000 Roman Catholics. In 1869 he attended the Vatican council, where the question of Church and State was opposed. The declaration of the infallibility of the pope, he at once subscribed to the doctrine on its definition. His golden jubilee was celebrated in Repubulcan state executive committee, and was elected to congress as a Republican, serving from 1 Dec., 1873, till his resignation on 16 Feb., 1874. He was again elected, serving from 6 Dec., 1873, till 3 March, 1874, and re-elected, but his seat was successfully contested by the supreme court. He was once a candidate for U. S. senator, and in 1899 was a delegate to the Democratic national convention in Charleston, S. C. He published "Statutes of Illinois relating to Real Estate" (Quiney, 1849) and "A Compilation of the Statutes of Illinois of a General Nature in Force, Jan., 1856" (2 vols., Chicago, 1856). These works were adopted by the general assembly.

PUSEY, Samuel Smith, physician, b. in Lebanon, Madison co., N. Y., 21 June, 1822. He received a common-school education and was graduated at the medical department of the University of the city of New York in 1844. In 1846-8 he was physician to the New York city dispensary, and he was ward physician in the board of health during the yellow fever epidemic of 1847. He was vice-president of the New York academy of medicine in 1872-3, its president from 1876 till 1880, and was made second vice-president of the New York genealogical and biographical society in 1888. His publications are "The Corpus Luteum" (1846); "Menstruation" (New York, 1846); "Contributions to the Practice of Midwifery" (1853); "Observations on the Remedies employed in Paralytic and Insane Cases in Institutions" (1854); "Observations on Wounds of the Heart" (1855); "Genealogical Memorials of William Bradford, First Printer of New York" (1853); "In Memoriam: Edwin R. Purple" (1880); and "Memoir of the Life and Writings of Hon. Thomas G. Bergen" (1881).—His brother, Edwin Rutheven, lawyer, b. in Sherburne, N. Y., 30 June, 1811; d. in New York city, 23 Oct., 1879. He was in the army of the United States. In 1859 he emigrated to California, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1855, and served as county supervisor and justice of the fifth township in Calaveras county. In the autumn of 1862 he discovered, in connection with John White and five others, the first gold in Montana, on Willard's creek, a tributary of Beaver Head river. He contributed to the "New York Genealogical and Biographical Record," and published "Genealogical Notes on the Golden Family in America" (New York, 1873); "Biographical and Genealogical Notes of the Provoost Family in New York" (1873); "Genealogical Notes relating to Lieut.-Gov. Jacob Leisler and his Family Connections in New York" (1877); "Contributions to the History of the Kip Family of New York and New Jersey" (1877); and "Contributions to the History of Ancient Families of New Netherland and New York," which were collected and published by his brother, with a memoir (New York, 1881).

PURSH, Frederick, botanist, b. in Tobolsk, Siberia, in 1774; d. in Montreal, Canada, 11 June, 1826. He was educated at Westford, camberley, this country in 1799, and spent twelve years in botanical explorations in the United States. He visited England in 1811, and published "Flora Americae Septentrionalis, or a Systematic Arrangement and Description of the Plants of North America" (2 vols., Svo, London, 1814). He then returned, and died while he was collecting materials for a flora of Canada. His manuscript journal still exists. Until superseded by Torrey and Gray's "Flora of North America," Pursh's work was the most important on the botany of North America.

PURVANCE, Hugh Young, mayor of a city, b. in Baltimore, Md., 22 March, 1799; d. there, 21 Oct., 1853. He was educated at St. Mary's college in his native city, and in 1818 was appointed a midshipman in the U. S. navy. He served for two years on the East India station, in 1821-4 on the Pacific, and in 1824-5 in the Mediterranean. In the last year he was commissioned a lieutenant, and he served on the West India squadron in 1828-29, and the Brazil squadron in 1837-8, commanding the brig "Dolphin." He relieved an American schooner from the French blockade of the river Plate, and received a complimentary recognition from the U. S. government for his services on the occasion. In 1846 he commanded the frigate "Constitution," of the blockading squadron in the Mexican war. On 7 March, 1849, he was commissioned commodore, and assigned to the slop-of-war "Marion," on the coast of Africa, where he remained in 1852-5. He received his commission as captain, 28 Jan., 1856, commanded the frigate "St. Lawrence," of the Charleston blockading squadron, in 1861, and captured the privateer "Petrel" off that port, the first prize of the civil war. He took part in the battle of the James River, and the attack on Sewall's point, Hampton Roads. He was retired, 21 Dec., 1861, commissioned commodore, 16 July, 1862, and in 1863-5 was light-house inspector.

PURVIS, Robert, benefactor, b. in Charleston, S. C., 4 Aug., 1810; d. in Philadelphia, 15 April, 1899. His father was a native of England, and his mother was a Miss Young, of Moorish descent. Robert was born in Easton, Md., in 1819. His father, though residing in a slave state, was never a slave-holder, but was an Abolitionist in principle. Before Robert attained the age of manhood he formed the acquaintance of Benjamin Lundy, and in conjunction with him was an early laborer in the anti-slavery cause. Mr. Purvis was a member of the Philadelphia convention of 1876. While a member of the Pennsylvania anti-slavery society, it was his vice-president for many years, and signed its declaration of sentiments. He was also an active member of the Pennsylvania society, and its president for many years. His house was a well-known station on the "Underground railroad," and his horses, carriages, and his personal attendance were always at the service of fugitive slaves. His son, CHARLES BURLEY, is surgeon-in-chief of the Freedmen's hospital at Washington, D. C., and a professor in the medical department of Howard university.

PUSEY, C. B., colonist, b. in Berkshire, England, about 1650; d. in Chester county, Pa., 25 Feb., 1727. He was educated as a Baptist, but subsequently became a Quaker, and was one of the Pennsylvania company that came to Pennsylvania in 1682. Before leaving England he united with Penn and a few others in forming a "joint concern" for the "setting up" of mills in the new province, of which concern Pusey was chosen the manager. He caused the framework to be prepared and shipped in the "Welcome," and in 1683 erected on Chester creek, near Philadelphia, Pa., the famous mills known as the "Chester Mills," which were the first in the province under Penn's government. Penn himself attended at the laying of the corner-stone. Pusey managed the mills for many years, and came finally to own them, conducting an extensive millin business until his death. He held a high place in civil affairs, was engaged in laying out roads and negotiating with the Indians, and for two years was sheriff of Chester county. For many years he was the president of the peace and of the county courts, and an associate justice of the supreme court, serving also for ten years or more in the assembly, and for more than a quarter of a century in the supreme or provincial council. His name constantly appears in the minutes of the Society of Friends among those who were most active in setting difficulties and in promoting delays. But his reputation and name were in the ministry, and as a controversialist and a writer was one of the ablest and most noted of his sect in his day. His reply to Daniel Leed's was liberally subscribed for by the meetings, and widely circulated. He was an intimate friend of George Keith, but, when the latter attacked the Quaker doctrines, Pusey was active among those who pronounced against him. From Pusey, Smith, the early historian, obtained much of the material from which he made up his manuscript history, which formed the basis of Robert Prout's "History of Pennsylvania." In 1695 Pusey was chosen by the Quakers to be one of the committee to examine all books that the society proposed to publish, which post he held till his death. Among his publications may be mentioned "A Discourse on the Prophecies and Prophecies," "A Grave Warning unto All People occasioned by two most Dangerous Epistles to a late Book of John Full- docs," addressed to the people called Anthony Palmer's Church (London, 1695); "A Modest Account from Pennsylvania of the Principal Differences in Point of Doctrine between George Keith and those of the People called Quakers" (1696); "The Harbinger encountered; His False News of a Strumpet detected," etc., a reply to Daniel Leed's "News of a Strumpet" (Philadelphia, 1700); "Daniel Leed's justly rebuked for abusing William Penn, and his Folly and Fals-Heads contends in his Two Printed Challenges to Caleb Pusey made Manifest" (1702); "George Keith once more brought to the Test, and proved a Pro- varicator" (1703); "Protestan Ecclesiastics, or George Keith varied in Fundamental" (1703); "The Bomb searched and found stuffed with False Ingredients, being a Just Confinement of an Abusive Printed Half- Sheets, call'd a Bomb, originally published against the Quakers, by Francis Bagg" (1705); "Some Remarks upon a Late Pamphlet Entitled, A Call to the Indians" (1705); "Daniel Leed's, called the Great Mystery of Fox-Craft" (1705); "And Some Brief Observations made on Daniel Leed's Book, entitled: 'The Second Part of the Mystery of Fox-Craft'" (1706). For a fuller account of the titles of these works see "Issues of the Pennsylvania Press, 1695-1758," by Charles R. Hildebrand (1888). The imprint of Pusey's works, even before the two and the last, bear the name of Reuvier Jansen.

PUSHMATAHAW, Chocow chief, b. in what is now Mississippi, in 1705; d. in Washington, D.C., 24 Dec., 1821. He had distinguished himself on the war-path before he was twenty years old. He joined an expedition against the Osages west of the Mississippi, and was wounded at the by the older members of the party because of his youth and a propensity for talking. The Osages were defeated in a desperate conflict that lasted an entire day. The boy disappeared early in the fight, and when he returned at midnight he was feared at and openly accused of cowardice. "Let those laugh," was his reply, who can show more scars than I can. With the latter, he took five from his back and threw them on the ground. They were the result of an onslaught he had made single-handed on the enemy's rear. This feat gained him for him the title of "The Eagle." After spending several years in Mexico, he went alone in the night to a Toraqua village, killed seven men with his own hand, set fire to several tents, and made good his retreat uninjured. During the next two years he made three additional expeditions into the Toraqua country, and added eight fresh scalps to his war costume. For fifteen years nothing is known of his history, but in 1810 he was living on Tombigbee river, and employed by the Choctaws to turn an Indian ball-playing. He also boasted that his name was Pushmatahaw, which means "The-warrior's seat-is-finished." During the war of 1812 he promptly took sides with the United States. The council that decided the course of the Choctaws lasted ten days. All the warriors counselled neutrality, excepting John Pitchlynn, the interpreter, and Pushmatahaw. Until the last day he kept silence, but then, rising, said: "The Creeks were once our friends. They have joined the English, and we must now follow different trails. When our fathers took the hand of Washington, they told him the Choctaws would always be the friends of his nation, and Pushmatahaw cannot be false to the trust our forefathers have put in both the English and the Creeks. . . . I and my warriors are going to Tuscaloosa, and when you hear from us again the Creek fort will be in ashes." This prophecy was duly fulfilled. The Creeks and Seminoles allied themselves with the British, and Pushmatahaw made war on both tribes with such energy and success that the British called him "The Indian General." In 1824 he went to Washington in order, according to his own phraseology, to brighten the chain of peace between the Americans and the Choctaws. He was treated with great consideration by President Monroe and John C. Calhoun, secretary of war, and a record of his communications is to be found in the state archives. After a visit to Gen. Lafayette he was taken seriously ill. Finding that he was near his end, he expressed the wish that he might be buried with military honors and that "big guns" might be fired over his grave. These requests were complied with, and a procession more than a mile in length followed him to his resting-place in the Congressional cemetery. Andrew Jackson frequently expressed the opinion that he was "the greatest and the bravest Indian he had ever known"; while John Randolph, of Roanoke, in pronouncing a eulogy on him in the U.S. senate, declared that he was "wise in counsel, eloquent in an extraordinary degree and on all occasions, and under all circumstances the white man's friend."

PUTNAM, Frederick Ward, anthropologist, b. in Salem, Mass., 16 April, 1839. He received an election to the Essex institute in 1855, and in 1856 he entered the Lawrence scientific school as a special student under Louis Agassiz, who soon made him assistant in charge of the collection of fishes at the Harvard museum of comparative zoology, where he remained until 1864. Returning to Salem in the latter year, he was given charge of the museum of the Essex institute, and in 1867 he was appointed superintendent of the museum of the East India marine society. These two collections were incorporated as the Peabody academy of sciences, and Prof. Putnam was made its director, which post he held until 1876. He was called to the charge of the collections of the Peabody museum at Any, and in 1881 was appointed professor of the College of Harpect of George Peabody's trust, he was appointed professor of American archaeology and etymology in Harvard University, in 1874, he was an instructor at the School of natural history on Penikese island, and during the same year he was appointed an assistant on the geological survey of Kentucky. In 1875 the engineer department of the U. S. army appointed him to examine and report on the archaeological collections of the geological and geographical society of London. Prof. F. W. Putnam, who was in 1876-8 he was also assistant in charge of the collection of fishes in the Museum of comparative zoology at Harvard.

Prof. Putnam has held the office of state commissioner of Massachusetts on inland fisheries, and in 1887 became commissioner of fish and game. His earliest paper was a "Catalogue of the Birds of Essex County, Massachusetts," which he followed with various researches in zoology, but since 1885 his work has been principally in American archaeology, or anthropology, and his acquaintance with this subject is probably unique in the United States. His papers on this science exceed 200, and embrace descriptions of many mounds, burial-places, and shell-heaps, and of the objects found in them.

Prof. Putnam is a member of many historical and scientific societies here and in Europe, and was elected to membership in 1885 in the National academy of sciences. He is also widely known by his office of permanent secretary of the American association for the advancement of science, which he has held since 1873. At that time the membership of the association was barely 500, and it now exceeds 2,000, a result which is attributable largely to his executive ability. Prof. Putnam has also been vice-president of the Essex institute since 1874, and was elected president of the Boston society of natural history in 1887. He was associated with Alpheus Hyatt, Edward S. Morse, and Alpheus S. Packard in the founding of the "American Naturalist" in 1867, and was one of its editors until 1875. He has also edited many volumes of the "Proceedings of the Essex Institute," the "Annual Reports of the Trustees of the Peabody Academy of Science," and the "Proceedings of the American Association for the Advancement of Science" since 1875, and the "Annual Reports of the Peabody Museum of Archaeology and Ethnology" since 1874. He has also published his researches on the engraving and volumes of the "Report upon Geographical and Geological Explorations and Surveys West of the 100th Meridian" (Washington, 1879).

PUTNAM, Haldimand Sunner, soldier, b. in Cornish, N. H., 15 Oct., 1855; d. near Fort Wagner, S. C., 18 July, 1863. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1857, and entered the artillery later as brevet 2d lieutenant of topographical engineers. From that time till a few months previous to the civil war he was engaged in explorations and surveys in the west. When the war began he was summoned to Washington and intrusted with important dispatches for Fort Pickens. He accomplished his mission, but, while returning to the north, was seized by the Confederates at Mobile, Ala., and spent several months as prisoner. On his release he was placed on Gen. Irvin McDowell's staff, participated in the battle of Bull Run, and gained the brevet of major for gallantry. In October he went to his native state and organized the 7th New Hampshire regiment, of which he became colonel in December, 1861. It was stationed during the first year of service at Jefferson, on Tortugas island, and afterward at St. Augustine, Fla., and in South Carolina. In 1863 Col. Putnam commanded a brigade in the Stono inlet expedition, and in the capture of Morris island. In the assault on Fort Wagner, 18 July, 1863, where he led the second storming column, he was killed on the parapet of the work while rallying his men. He was made brevet colonel, U. S. army, 18 July, 1863. For about four months preceding his death he was acting brigadier-general.

PUTNAM, Israel, soldier, b. in that part of the town of Salem, Mass., which has since been set off as the town of Danvers, 7 Jan., 1718; d. in Brooklyn, Conn., 19 May, 1790. His great-grandfather, John Putnam, with his wife, Priscilla, came from England in 1634, and settled in Salem. They brought with them three sons, Thomas, Nathanael, and John. All three acquired large estates, and were men of much consideration. In 1841, of the total tax levied in Salem village, raised from ninety-four tax-payers, for the support of the local church, the three Putnams paid one seventh. In 1666 Thomas Putnam married, for his second wife, the widow of Nathanael Veren, a wealthy merchant and ship-owner. By this marriage he acquired wealth in Jamaica and Barbados. Joseph, the son of this marriage, was born in 1670, and at the age of twenty married Elizabeth, daughter of Israel Porter. In the witchcraft frenzy of 1692, Joseph's sister was one of the accused, and only saved herself by fleeing to the wilderness and hiding till the search was given up. The Putnam family has always been prominent in the history of Salem and its neighborhood. Of the 74 recording clerks of the parish of Danvers, 24 have been Putnams; and this family has furnished 15 of the 23 deacons, 12 of the 26 treasurers, and 7 of the 18 superintendents of the Sabbath-school. In 1867, of the 800 voters in Danvers, three were Putnams.

Israel Putnam, son of Joseph and Elizabeth, was the tenth of eleven children. At the age of twenty he married Hannah, daughter of Joseph Pope, of Salem village. In 1739 Israel and his brother-in-law, John Pope, bought of Gov. Belcher 514 acres in Mortlake manor, in what is now Windsor county, Conn. By 1741 Israel had bought out his brother-in-law and become owner of the whole tract. The Mortlake manor formed part of the township of Pomfret, but as early as 1734 it was formed into a distinct parish, known as Mortlake parish. In 1754 its name was changed to Brooklyn parish, and in 1780 it was set off as a separate township under the name of Brooklyn. The old Putnam farm is on the top of the high hill between the villages of Pomfret and Brooklyn. For many years Israel Putnam devoted himself to the cultivation of this farm, and it was considered one of the finest in New England. He gave especial attention to sheep-raising and to fruits, especially winter apples. In 1733 the town sustained four public schools; in 1759 there was a public circulating library; and in the class of 1755 at Yale college, ten of the graduates were from Pomfret. These symptoms of high civilization were found in a community not yet entirely freed from the assaults of wild beasts. By 1755 all the wolves of the neighborhood seem to have been slain save one old female that for some seasons more went on ravaging the farm-yards. Her hair was not far from Putnam’s farm, and one night she slew sixty or seventy of his fine sheep. Perhaps no incident in Putnam’s career is so often quoted as his share in the wolf-hunt, ending in his death of a bullet which struck him at very short range, and dragging her forth in triumph. It was the one picturesque event in his life previous to 1755, when Connecticut was called upon for 1,000 men to defend the northern approaches to New York against the anticipated French invasion. This force was commanded by Maj.-Gen. Philip Lyman, and one of its companies was assigned to Putnam, with the rank of captain. Putnam was present at the battle of Lake George, in which William Johnson won his baronetcy by defeating Dieskau. He became one of the leading members of the famous band of Rangers that did so much to annoy and embarrass the enemy during the next two years. In 1757, he was promoted major, and in the same year to the death, of personal bravery, those most often quoted are—first, his rescue of a party of soldiers from the Indians by steering them in a batam down the dangerous rapids of the Hudson near Fort Miller; and secondly, his saving Fort Edward from destruction by fire, at the imminent risk of losing his life in the flames. In a still more terrible way he was brought into peril from fire, in August, 1758, when he was taken prisoner in a sharp skirmish near Wood creek, and after some preliminary tortures, his savage captors decided to burn him alive. He had been stripped and bound to the tree, and the flames were wearying his flesh, when a French officer, Capt. Molin, came rushing through the crowd, scattered the firebrands, cut up and upbraided the Indians, and released their victim. Putnam was carried to Montreal, and presently freed by exchange. In 1759 he was promoted lieutenant-colonel, and put in command of a regiment. In 1760 he accompanied Gen. Amherst in his march from Oswego to Montreal. In descending the St. Lawrence, it became desirable to dislodge the French garrison from Fort Oswego—bute the approach to this place was guarded by the American batteries of St. John, which were twelve guns, and was capable of making serious havoc among the English boats. I wish there were some way of taking that infernal schooner,” said Amherst, “All right,” said Putnam; “just give me some waggons and a millet, and half-a-dozen men of my own choosing, and I’ll soon take her for you.” The British general called incredibly, but presently authorized the adventurous Yankee to proceed. In the night Putnam’s little party, in a light boat with muffled ears, rowed under the schooner’s stern and drove the waggons between the rudder and the stern-post so firmly as to render the helm unmanageable. Then going around under the bow, they cut the vessel’s cable, and then rowed softly away. Before morning the helpless schooner had drifted ashore, where she struck her colors; the other French vessel then surrendered, thus uncovering the fort, which Amherst soon captured. In 1762 Col. Putnam accompanied Gen. Lyman in the expedition to the West Indies, which, after frightful sufferings, ended in the capture of Havana. In 1764 he commanded the Connecticut regiment in the expedition to Spanish Florida, which was completely successful, and Pontiac was besieging. At the end of the year he returned home, after nearly ten years of rough campaigning, with the full rank of colonel. In 1765 his wife died, leaving the youngest of their children an infant about a year old. In 1765 Col. Putnam married Deborah, widow of John Gardiner, with whom he lived happily until her death in 1777. There were no children by this second marriage. Col. Putnam united with the church in Brooklyn, 19 May, 1765. For the next ten years his life was uneventful. During this period he used his house as an inn, swinging before the door a sign-board which read: “Putnam’s pull towards Cape Ann.” This sign is now in the possession of the Connecticut historical society at Hartford. In the winter of 1752-3 he accompanied Gen. Lyman in a voyage to the mouth of the Mississippi, and up that river to Natchez, where the British government had granted some territory to the Connecticut troops who had survived the dreadful West India campaign. In the course of this voyage they visited Jamaica and Pensacola. After 1765 Col. Putnam was conspicuous among the “Sons of Liberty” in Connecticut. In August, 1774, before Gen. Gage had quite shut up the approaches to Boston, and while provisions from all the colonies were pouring into that town, Putnam rode over the Neck with a herd of sheep to the town of Cambridge. During his stay in Boston he was the guest of Dr. Warren. On 20 April following, early in the afternoon, a despatch from the committee of safety at Watertown reached Pomfret with news of the fight at Concord. The news found Putnam ploughing a field. Leaving his plough in the furrow, and without waiting to don his uniform, he mounted a horse, and in the course of half an hour was at Cambridge. Later in the same day he was at Concord, whence he sent a despatch to Pomfret, with directions about the bringing up of the militia. He was soon summoned to Hartford, to consult with the legislature of Connecticut, and, after a week, returned to Cambridge, with the chief command of the forces of that colony, and the rank of brigadier. There has been a great deal of controversy as to who commanded the American troops at Bunker Hill, and there is apparently no reason why the controversy should not be kept up, as long as the question is at bottom one of rivalry between Connecticut and Massachusetts. The difficulty in setting it points to the true conclusion, that the work of that battle was largely done by the partial division organized as yet into an army. It is even open to question how far the troops of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, then engaged in besieging Boston, are to be regarded as four armies or as one army. From the nature of the situation, rather than by any right of seniority, Gen. Ward, of Massachusetts, was practically the command over the whole. On the day of Bunker Hill, it would seem that the actual command was exercised by Prescott at the redoubt and by Stark at the rail-fence. Warren was the ranking officer on the field; but as he expressly declined the command, it left Putnam the ranking officer, and in that capacity he withdrew men with interroting orders from Prescott, on which were depicted the features of Gen. Wolfe. As the more important had the battle of Bunker Hill been characterized by any grand tactics. As no special generalship was involved, and the significance of the battle lay in its moral effects, the question has little interest except for local patriots.
The work of organizing a Continental army began in June, 1773, when congress assumed control of the troops about Boston, and, after appointing Washington to the chief command, appointed Ward, Lee, Schuyler, and Putnam as the four major-generals. In his new capacity Gen. Putnam commanded the centre of the army at Cambridge, while Ward commanded the right wing at Roxbury, and Lee the left wing stretching to the Mystic river. After the capture of Boston, Gen. Washington sent Putnam to New York, where he took command, 5 April, 1776. On 25 Aug., as Gen. Greene, who commanded the works on Brooklyn heights, had been seized with a fever, Gen. Putnam was placed in command there. For the disastrous defeat of the Americans, two days afterward, he can in no wise be held responsible. He was blamed at the time for not posting on the Jamaica road a force sufficient to check Cornwallis's flanking march; but, as Chief-Justice Marshall long ago pointed out, this criticism was simply silly, since the flanking force on the Jamaica road outnumbered the whole American army. Indeed there is no need of blaming any one in order to account for the defeat of 6,000 half-trained soldiers by 20,000 veterans. The wonder is, not that the Americans were defeated on Long Island, but that they should have given Gen. Howe a good day's work in defending them, thus leading the British general to pause, and giving Washington time to plan the withdrawal of the army from its exposed situation. As Putnam deserves no blame for the defeat, so he deserves no special credit for this obstinate resistance, which was chiefly the work of Stirling and Smallwood, and the Maryland "macaques." In these hero defenders of the Gowanus road. After the army had crossed to New York, Putnam commanded the rear division, which held the city until the landing of the British at Kip's bay obliged it to fall back upon Brooklyn. In the action at Harlem heights, part of Putnam's force, under Col. Knowlton, was especially distinguished. The fatal device of barring the entrance of the Hudson river at New York, by Washington and Lee, by chevaux de frise, is generally ascribed to Putnam. In the affair at Chatterton hill, Putnam marched to the assistance of Gen. McDougal, but arrived too late. In the disastrous period that followed the capture of Fort Washington and the treachery of Charles Lee, Putnam was put in command of Philadelphia. After the retreat of the enemy upon New Brunswick, 4 Jan., 1777, he brought forward the American right wing to Princeton, where he remained in command till the middle of May. He was then intrusted with the defence of the highlands of the Hudson river with headquarters at Peckskill. His command there was marked by a characteristic incident. Edmund Palmer, lieutenant in a loyalist regiment, was caught lurking in the American camp, and was condemned to death as a spy. There seemed to be a tacit assumption, on the part of the British, that, while American commanders were in almost daily danger of death, this did not hold true of British spies: that American commanders, as not representing any acknowledged sovereignty, could not possess any legal authority for inflicting the death-penalty. This assumption pervades some British opinions upon the case of André. In reliance upon some such assumption, Sir Henry Clinton, several times, threatened Putnam with signal vengeance, should he dare to injure the person of the king's liege subject, Edmund Palmer. The old general's reply was brief and to the point: "Headquarters, 7 Aug., 1777.—Edmund Palmer, an officer in the enemy's service, was taken as a spy lurking within our lines; he has been tried as a spy, condemned as a spy, and shall be executed as a spy, and the flag is ordered to depart immediately. —Israel Putnam.—P. S. He has accordingly been executed." In October, Clinton came up the river, to the relief of hard-pressed Barclay, and, landling at Tarrytown, captured the forts in the highlands. They were immediately recovered, however, after the surrender of Barclay. At the end of the year, Putnam was superseded at Peckskill by McDougal, and went to Connecticut to labor upon the work of recruiting the army for the next campaign. During the years 1778-9, he was engaged in the western part of Connecticut, with headquarters usually at Danbury, cooperating with the force in the highlands. At this time he made his famous escape from Gen. Tryon's troops by riding down the stone steps at Horseneck, in the township of Greenwich. There is some disagreement between the different accounts as to the date of this incident, and the story is perhaps to be taken with some allowances. When the army went into winter-quarters at Morristown, in December, 1779, Putnam made a short visit to his family at Pomfret. He set out on his return to camp, but, before reaching Hartford, had a stroke of paralysis. His remaining years were spent at home. His birthplace is shown in the accompanying engraving.

Gen. Putnam's biography has been written by Col. David Humphreys (Boston, 1818); by Oliver Peabody, in Sparks's "American Biography"; by William Cutter (New York, 1846); and by Increase X. Tarbox (Boston, 1876). The most complete bibliography of the question as to the command at Dunker Hill is to be found in "Critical History of America" (Boston, 1868), vol. vi, p. 190. An equestrian statue of Gen. Putnam was unveiled in Brooklyn, Conn., 14 June, 1888. His cousin, Rufus, soldier, b. in Sutton, Mass., 9 April, 1758; d. in Marietta, 0., 4 May, 1824, after completing his apprenticeship as a millwright, served through the campaigns of 1776-'79, against the British in Western Pennsylvania, and settled in New Brinittle, pursuing his original vocation and that of farming. At the same time he studied mathematics, in which he attained proficiency, particularly in its application to navigation and surveying. In January, 1773, he sailed to east Florida with a committee to explore lands that were supposed to have been granted there by permission of the British crown, and which had fallen in the French war. On arriving at Pensacola, he discovered that no such grant had been made, and was appointed by the governor deputy surveyor of the province. On his return to Massachusetts he was made lieutenant-colonel in David Brewer's regiment, one of the first that was raised after the battle of Lexington. The ability that he displayed as an engineer in throwing up defenses in Roxbury, Mass., secured for him the favorable consideration of Gen. Washington and Gen. Charles Lee, and the former wrote to congress that the millwright was a more competent officer than any of the French gentlemen to whom it had given appointments in that line. On 20 March, 1776, he arrived in New York, and, as chief engineer, superintended all the defenses in that part of the country during the ensuing campaign. In August, he was appointed to the command of the 5th Massachusetts regiment. In the following spring he was attached to the northern army, and served with great credit at the battle of Stillwater at the head of the 4th and 5th regiments of Nixon’s brigade. In 1778, his cousin, Gen. Israel Putnam, he superintended the construction of the fortifications at West Point. After the surprise of Stony Point he was appointed to the command of a regiment in Gen. Anthony Wayne’s brigade, in which he served till the end of the campaign. From February till July, 1782, he was employed as one of the commissioners to adjust the claims of the United States on the British Navy. He was appointed by the allied armies, and on 7 Jan., 1783, he was promoted to be a brigadier-general. He was several years a member of the legislature, and acted as aide to Gen. Benjamin Lincoln in quelling Shays’s rebellion in 1787. As superintendent of the Ohio company, on 7 April, 1788, he founded Marietta, Ohio, the first permanent settlement in the eastern part of the Northwest Territory. In 1789 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of the territory, and on 4 May, 1792, he was appointed brigadier-general under Gen. Wayne to act against the Indians. From May, 1792, till February, 1793, he was U. S. commissioner to treat with the latter, and concluded an important treaty with eight tribes at Port Vincent (now Vincennes), 27 Sept., 1792. He arrived at Philadelphia, 13 Feb., 1793, to make a report of his proceedings, and then resigned his commission. He was made surveyor-general of the United States in October of that year, and held this office till September, 1803. In 1803 he was a member of the Ohio constitutional convention. At the time of his death he was the last general officer of the Revolutionary army to be living. Gen. Putnam was deeply interested in Sabbath-schools and missions, and with others, in 1812, formed the first Bible society west of the Alleghenies. Gen. Putnam’s manuscript diary is in the Astor Library, New York city.—Israel’s nephew, Gideon, founder of Saratoga Springs, b. in Sutton, Mass., in 1764; d. in Saratoga Springs, 1 Dec., 1812, set out for the west in 1789, seeking a suitable place for business, and finally settled at what has since been known as Saratoga Springs. He married Doanda Risley, of Hartford, Conn., and their first child was the first white child born in Saratoga. In 1802 he built and conducted the first hotel of consequence, which he called Putnam’s Tavern, but which his nephew was pleased to call “Putnam’s Polly.” Putnam’s Tavern of that day is now the Grand Union hotel. Mr. Putnam proceeded to amuse and amaze his fellow-pioneers by purchasing the land on which the village of Saratoga Springs now stands, and on which some of the most famous and lucrative mineral springs in the world, several of which he excavated and tubed, are now laying out the hotel and arranging the streets as to leave the springs in the middle of the public thoroughfares, and absolutely free to all. A public park was also included in his plans, which were suddenly cut short by his accidental death. He died of a fall while assisting in the erection of Congress Hall Hotel, of which he was the projector, and he was the first to be buried in the cemetery that he presented to the village.—Israel’s great-grandson, Abigenece Waldo, author, b. in Marietta, Ohio, 11 March, 1799; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 20 Jan., 1869, studied law, practiced in Marseilles, Ill., and later in Nashville, Tenn., and was president of the Tennessee historical society, to whose publications he was a contributor. In addition to articles in periodicals, he wrote a “History of Middle Tennessee” (Nashville, 1859); “Life and Times of Gen. James Robertson” (1859); and a “Life of Gen. John Sevier,” in wheelwright’s poem “History of North Carolina.”—His wife, Katherine Hunt, b. in Farningham, Mass., 1 March, 1792; d. in New York City, 8 Jan., 1869, was a daughter of Gen. Palmer ofthe army of the Revolution, married Henry Putnam in 1814, and passed most of her married life in Boston. She noted for her piety, and wrote “Scripture Text-Book” (New York, 1837); and “The Old Testament Unveiled; or, The Gospel by Moses in the Book of Genesis” (1854).—Israel’s great-nephew, George Palmer, publisher, b. in Brunswick, Me., 7 Feb., 1814; d. in New York City, 20 Dec., 1872, entered the book-store of Daniel and Jonathan Leavitt, New York, in 1839, became a partner in the house of Wiley and Putnam, and in 1841 went to London and established a branch. In 1848 he returned to New York, dissolved the partnership with Mr. Wiley and engaged in business alone. He early interested himself in the production of fine illustrated books, and in 1852, with the assistance of George William Curtis and others, established “Putnam’s Magazine,” in which in 1837 he issued “A Plea for International Copyright,” the first argument in behalf of that reform that had been printed in this country. He was a founder of the Metropolitan museum of art, of which in 1872 he was honorary superintendent. He had been appointed chairman of the committee on art in connection with the Vienna universal exhibition. He compiled a “Chronology” or “An Introduction and Index to Universal History, Biography, and Useful Knowledge” (New York, 1863); “The Tourist in Europe; A Concise Guide, with Memoranda of a Tour in 1836” (1858); “American Book Circular, with Notes and Statistics” (1843); “American Facts and Statistics relative to the Government of the United States” (1845); “A Pocket Memorandum-Book in France, Italy, and Germany in 1847” (1848); and “Ten Years of the World’s Progress; Supplement, 1850–61, with Corrections and Additions” (1861).—George Palmer’s son, George Haven, publisher, b. in London, England, 2 April, 1844, studied at Columbia in 1860 and at Gottingen in 1861–2, but was not graduated, as he left college to enter the United States military service during the civil war, in which he rose to the rank of brevet major. He was appointed deputy collector of internal revenue in 1866, and in this year engaged in the publishing business in New York, in which he has continued ever since, being now (1898) head of the firm of G. P. Putnam's Sons. He has served on the executive committee of the Free-trade league, the Reform club, the Civil-service reform association, and other political organizations, and in 1857-8 as secretary of the American publishers' copyright g league. He has written articles on literary property and cyclornas and cyphoraphia; a pamphlet on "International Copyright," (New York, 1879); and, conjointly with his brother, John Bishop Putnam, "Authors and Publishers" (1882).

PUTNAM, James, jurist, b. in Danvers, Mass., in 1725; d. in St. John, New Brunswick, 23 Oct.
1799. He was a relative of Gen. Israel Putnam.
He was graduated at Harvard in 1746, studied law with Judge Edmund Trowbridge, and began practice at Worcester. He was appointed attorney-general of the province when Jonathan Sewall was promoted to the bench of the admiralty court, and was the last to hold that office under the provincial government. In 1757 he was a major, and in service under Lord Loudon. In 1758 he was elected as a delegate to the provdence to Gen. Thomas Hutchinson, approving his course, and later he accompanied the British army to New York, and thence to Halifax; where, in 1776, he embarked for England. In 1778 a writ of banishment and prescription was issued against him. On the organization of the government of the province of New Brunswick in 1783, he was appointed a member of the court of session, and a judge of the superior court. He remained in oflice till his death. John Adams was a student at law in Judge Putnam's office.—His son, James, b. in 1756; d. in England in March, 1838, was graduated at Harvard in 1774, and was one of the eighteen country gentlemen that were driven to Boston, and addressed Gen. Gage on his departure in 1775. He went to England, became a barrack-master, a member of the royal household, and an executor of the Duke of Kent.

PUTNAM, James Osborne, lawyer, b. in Attica, N. Y., 4 July, 1818. His father, Harvey (1793-1855), was a representative in congress in 1838-9 and 1847-51, having been chosen as a Whig. The son studied at Hamilton college and then at Yale. He was graduated in 1839. He read law in his father's office, was admitted as a practitioner in 1842, and the same year began practice in Buffalo. In 1851-3 he was postmaster there. In 1853 he was elected to the state senate, where he was the author of the bill, that became a law in 1855, requiring the title of church real property to be vested in trustees. In 1857 he was the unsuccessful candidate of the Democratic party for secretary of state. He was chosen a presidential elector on the Republican ticket in 1860, and appointed U. S. consul at Havre, France, in 1861. In 1860 he became U. S. minister to Belgium, and while he was filling this mission he was appointed by the U. S. government a delegate to the International industrial property congress in Paris in 1861. He has published "Orations, Speeches, and Miscellanies." (Buffalo, 1890).

PUTNAM, John Phelps, jurist, b. in Hartford, Conn., 21 March, 1817; d. in Boston, 5 Jan., 1882.
His father, a native of Hartford, was a merchant there and mayor of the city, and was descended from the same family to which Gen. Israel Putman belonged. The son was graduated at Yale in 1837 and at Harvard law school in 1839, and was admitted to the bar in 1840. He began practice in Boston, and prosecuted his profession for many years in that city with success. In 1851-2 he served in the legislature, and in 1859, when the superior court was established, he was appointed one of the judges. He was a trustee of the Boston music-hall, and one of the chief promoters of the enterprise that resulted in placing the great organ in that building. He was also a trustee of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary. In 1847 and 1848 he edited fifteen volumes of the "Annual Digest" of the decisions of all the courts of the United States (Boston, 1852).

PUTNAM, Sallie A. Broek, author, b. in Madison Court-House, Va., about 1845. She was educated by private tutors, and early developed a taste for literature. She married the Rev. Richard Putnam, of Leominster, Mass., by whom she had three children, including "Richmond During the War," under the pen-name of "Virginia Madison" (New York, 1867): "The Southern Amaranth" (1868); and
"Kenneth My King" (1872). She has in preparation
"Poets and Poetry of America."

PUTNAM, Samuel, jurist, b. in Danvers, Mass., 13 April, 1708; d. in Somerville, Mass., 3 April, 1753. He was graduated at Harvard in 1727, studied law, and began practice in Salem in 1730. He soon attained high rank at the Essex county bar, and represented that county in the state senate in 1780-74, and in the legislature in 1782. From 1814 till 1842 he was judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts. Harvard gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1825.—His daughter, Mary Traill Smith, was born in Somerville, Mass., 1791, daughter of the Rev. Charles Lowell. She married Samuel R. Putnam, a merchant of Boston, in 1822, and subsequently resided several years abroad. She has contributed to the "North American Review" articles on Polish and Hungarian literature (1848-50), and to the "Christian Examiner" articles on the history of Hungary (1850-1), and is the author of "Leaves of an Obscure Man." (1861): "The Tragedy of Errors" and the "Tragedy of Success," a dramatic poem in two parts (1862): "Memoir of William Lowell Putnam" (1862): "Fifteen Days" (1866); and a "Memoir of Charles Lowell" (1886).—Her son, William Lowell, soldier, b. in Boston, 9 July, 1840: d. near Ball's Bluff, Va., 21 Oct., 1861, was educated in France and at Harvard, where he studied medicine and law. He entered the 29th Massachusetts regiment in 1861, was ordered to the field in September, and was killed while leading his battalion to the rescue of a wounded officer. When he was borne to the hospital-tent he declined the surgeon's assistance, bidding him go to those whom his services could benefit, since his own life could not be saved. He was a youth of much promise, possessing remarkable natural dowments and many accomplishments. See the memoir by his mother mentioned above.

PUTNAM, William Le Baron, lawyer, b. in Bath, Me., 12 May, 1855. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1875, admitted to the bar of Portland in 1879, and has since continued there in active practice. He was mayor of Portland in 1890.
He declined the appointment of judge of the supreme court of Maine in 1888. In September, 1897, he was appointed by President Cleveland a commissioner to negotiate with Great Britain in the settlement of the rights of American fishermen in the territorial waters of Canada and Newfoundland.

PUYS, Zachary du, French soldier. He was commandant of the fort of Quebec, in 1668. He was elected to preside over the colony among the Onondagas. With ten soldiers of the garrison and forty other Frenchmen, he established a small settlement on Lake Onondaga. In 1668 the colony was surrounded by Indians, who, as the French were known to have no canoes, made sure of their destruction. Du Puy gave orders to have small light boats built secretly in the garret of the house of the Jesuit missionaries, and, cluding the savages, reached Montreal in fifteen days. There was great joy at his escape, but he expressed his indignation at being forced to abandon so important a settlement for want of succor. He was commissioned to act as governor of Montreal in 1665 during the absence of Maisonneuve.

PUYSÉGUR, Antoine Hyacinthe, Comte de Chabot, b. a French naval officer, b. in Paris, 14 Feb., 1722; d. there, 29 Feb., 1809. He entered the navy as midshipman in 1766, and during a journey to Teneriffe in 1772 discovered, in caves that had been used by the Guanches as cemeteries, well-preserved mummies which afforded anthropologists the means of determining the relationship between the extinct Guanches and the Indians of South America. During the war for American independence he served under D'Estrées in 1778-9, and was present at the siege of Savannah, held afterward an important post in Toldeo, and served for the remainder of the campaign in the West Indies. After the conclusion of peace in 1783 he was attached to the station of Santo Domingo, and in 1786, at the instance of Marshal de Castries, went there to organize the island the following year. He returned to the service of Santo Domingo, and of the currents around the island. He emigrated to Germany in 1791, served for some time in the army of the Prince of Condé, joined the Portuguese navy in 1795 with the rank of vice-admiral, and in 1798 saved King Ferdinand of Naples, and conduced him safely to Sicily. In 1803 he returned to France and received his former estates, but refused the offers of Napoleon to reinstate him in the French service. He published "Détail sur la navigation aux côtes de Saint Domingue, et dans ses déboisements" (Paris, 1787; revised ed., 1821).

PYLE, Howard, artist, b. in Wilmington, Del., 5 March, 1833. He studied art in a private school in Philadelphia, and in 1870 came to New York. After spending three years in that city writing and illustrating for various magazines, he returned to Wilmington, where he has since resided. Besides furnishing illustrations for various books and periodicals, he has written and illustrated numerous articles, most of them for the publications of Harper Brothers. He is the author of the text and drawings for "The Midnight Hood" (1883); "Pepper and Salt" and "Within the Cape" (1885); and "The Wonder Clock" and "The Rose of Paradise" (1887). Mr. Pyle is favorably known as a writer of juvenile fiction, in his illustrations for which he has adopted a quaint style of design.

PYNCHON, William, colonist, b. in Springfield, Essex, England, in 1599; d. in Wraysbury, Buckinghamshire, 29 Oct., 1662. He came to New England with Gov. John Winthrop in 1630. Prior to his emigration to this country he had been named by Charles I., in March, 1629, as one of the patentees in the charter of the colony of Massachusetts bay. In the same charter he was selected as one of the directors of the presidency, and, with the government of the company before its removal to New England, and its treasurer. He was active in founding Roxbury, Mass., as well as in the organization of its first church. When the Massachusetts colony was in danger of being overstocked with people, in May, 1634, the general court granted leave to such inhabitants as might desire to remove their habitations to some convenient place.

In the spring of 1636 William Pynchon with his wife and children and a small party of attendants established a new plantation upon the Connecticut river, at the mouth of the Agawam, from which the settlement took its name. One of their first efforts was to obtain a minister, and in the year following they secured Rev. George Moxon, a personal friend of Mr. Pynchon and a graduate of Sidney college, Cambridge, who remained only as long as Mr. Pynchon. It was supposed at first that the new settlement was within the limits of Connecticut, and Mr. Pynchon sat in the legislature at Hartford, but he soon withdrew, in consequence of various differences, and received a commission from Massachusetts with authority to govern the colony, and subsequently it was shown that Agawam was included in the Massachusetts patent. In April, 1640, the inhabitants assembled in a general town-meeting and changed the plantation name from Agawam to Springfield, as a compliment to Mr. Pynchon and his birthplace. Mr. Pynchon succeeded admirably in maintaining friendly relations between the Indians and his colony by a conciliatory policy. One part of it was to treat them as independent, as far as their relations with one another were concerned. The Indians had confidence in him, and were ready to be guided by his wishes. In 1659 Mr. Pynchon visited London, and while there published his most famous work, entitled "The Meritorious Price of our Redemption" (London, 1650), which is now exceedingly rare. There is one copy in the British museum, one in the Congregational library of Boston, and one, elegantly bound, in the Brinley Library, was sold for £205. The book, which opposed the Calvinistic view of the atonement, made a great excitement in Boston, and it was spoken of as erroneous and heretical. The author was received on a form of indictment. The general court condemned the book, ordered that it should be burned by the public executioner, and summoned the author to appear before them, at the meeting in May, 1651. Rev. John Norton was also deputed to answer the book. Mr. Pynchon acknowledged the receipt of their communication, and said that he had convinced the ministers that they had entirely misconceived his meaning. This letter was complacently received, and he was requested to appear before them again in October of the same year. Not appearing in October, he was requested to do so in the following May; but to this he paid no attention, and so the case ended. However, in consequence of this violent action of the author, the authorities thought it best to limit the treatment to which he had been subjected, he returned to England in September, 1652, leaving his children as permanent residents of New England. He established himself at Wraysbury on the Thames, near Windsor, where he spent the last ten years of his life in the enjoyment of an ample fortune, engaged in theological writing, and in entire conformity with the Church of England. His works include a revised edition of his book, entitled "The Meritorious Price of Man's Redemption, or Christ's Satisfaction discussed and explained," with a rejoinder to Rev. Dr. Chalmers (1655), "To the Reader of "A New History of the World" (1652); "How the First Sabbath was ordained" (1654); and "The Covenant of Nature made with Adam" (1662). On 26 May, 1886, the 250th anniversary of the founding of Springfield by Pynchon and his associates was celebrated in that city. An historical oration was delivered by Henry M. Roby. QUACKENBOS, George Payn, educator, b. in New York city, 4 Sept., 1826; d. in New London, Merrimack co., N. H., 24 July, 1881. He was graduated at Columbia in 1843 and studied law, but relinquished it to become a teacher, and for many years was principal of a large collegiate school in New York city. In 1848-50 he edited the "Literary Magazine." Wesleyan gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1863. He edited several dictionaries of foreign languages, and his school-books include "First Lessons in Composition," of which 40,000 copies have been printed; New York, 1845; "Advanced Course of Rhetoric and Composition" (1854); "School History of the United States" (1857); "Natural Philosophy" (1859); a series of English grammars (1862-4); one of arithmetic (1865-74); and "Language Lessons" (1876). His son, John Duncan, educator, b. in New York city, 22 April, 1848, was graduated at Columbia in 1868, became tutor there in history, was graduated at the New York college of physicians and surgeons in 1871, and in 1884 he became adjunct professor of the English language and literature in Columbia. He received the degree of A. M. from that college in 1871. He has published "Illustrated History of the World" (New York, 1876); "Illustrated History of Ancient Literature, Oriental and Classical" (1878); and "History of the English Language" (1884); and was the literary editor of Appleton's "Standard Physical Geography" (1885).

QUACKENBUSH, Stephen Platt, naval officer, b. in Albany, N. Y., 23 Jan., 1825; d. in Washington, D.C., 4 Feb., 1880. He became a midshipman in 1849, lieutenant in 1853, and hick-tor and commander in 1861. During the civil war he was in charge of the "Delaware," the "Unadilla," the "Pequot," the "Patapsco," and the "Mingo" of the blockading squadron. He covered Gen. Ambrose E. Burnside's army in falling back from Aquia creek and the landing at Roanoke island, scattering a large body of the enemy, took part in the battles at Elizabeth City and New Berne, N. C., flying the divisional flag of Gen. Stephen C. Rowan, and engaged the Confederate batteries and a regiment of flying infantry at Winton, N. C., where 700 or 800 Union men had been reported, and a white flag displayed as a decay for the naval vessels. He was then ordered to deliver to the people Gen. Burnside's and Admiral Louis M. Goldsborough's proclamation concerning the 700 or 800 men reported. When the "Delaware" was close to the shore a body of armed Confederates was reported. She opened fire, and Winton was destroyed according to orders, in consequence of the display of the white flag. He subsequently was in action at Sewell's Point landing, Wilcox landing, and Malvern hill, on James river, where he commanded the "Pequot," and received a shot that took off his right leg. He afterward covered the rear-guard of the army in the retreat to Harrison's landing. While in charge of the steam gun-boat "Unadilla," of the South Atlantic squadron, in 1865, he captured the "Princess Royal," which contained machinery for shaping projectiles, engine for an iron-clad then building in Richmond, and a large quantity of quinine. When commanding the "Patapsco," of the North Atlantic squadron, in 1864, he was engaged in ascertaining the nature and position of the obstructions in Charleston harbor, and, while dragging for torpedoes, his ship was struck by one and sunk twenty seconds. He was then in charge of the steamer "Mingo," protecting Georgetown, S. C., and, with a force of light-draught vessels, prevented the resuscitation of a fort by the enemy. He became commander in 1866, captain in 1871, and commodore in 1880. In 1864-2 he was in charge of the navy-yard at Pensacola, Fla., and in 1885 he was retired as rear-admiral.

QUARTER, William, R. C., bishop, b. in Killarney, King's co., Ireland, 24 Jan., 1806; d. in Chicago, Ill., 10 April, 1848. He received his early training in the classical seminary of Tullamore, and was preparing for the ecclesiastical college of Maynooth when he met a priest who had returned from the United States. The accounts he heard of the spiritual destitution of his countrymen induced him to set thither, and he landed in Quebec on 10 April, 1822. He applied for admission into the seminary, but was rejected on account of his youth, and met with a similar refusal at Montreal, but, after travelling through the United States, he was finally received into Mount St. Mary's college, Emmetsburg, Md. He became professor of Latin and Greek there, studied philosophy and theology at the same time, and was ordained priest on 4 Sept., 1829. He was appointed assistant pastor of St. Peter's church, New York, where, during the cholera epidemic of 1832, he displayed great self-sacrifice. He gathered the children that had been made orphans by the visitation, and intrusted them to the care of the Sisters of Charity, spending all his means on their maintenance. He was appointed pastor of St. Mary's parish in 1833, rebuilt the church, which had been burned, and founded a select and a free school in connection with it. In 1843 his name was transmitted to the pope by the council of Baltimore, which had just created the diocese of Chicago. He received the pontifical briefs on 30 Sept., and was consecrated bishop of Chicago in the cathedral of New York on 10 March, 1844, by Archbishop Hughes. He completed the Chicago cathedral from his own resources and the contributions of members of his family, opened several Roman Catholic schools, and founded a college which afterward was developed into the University of St. Mary's of the Lakes. In 1843 he went to New York to collect money for an ecclesiastical seminary, and in 1846 it was completed and organized. In the same year he introduced the Sisters of Charity, and built a convent for them in Chicago, which soon sent out branches to every part of Illinois. He was the first bishop in the United States to establish theological conferences, at which the clergymen of his diocese assembled twice a year for the discussion of ecclesiastical statutes and questions relating to their calling. He was particularly attentive to the emigrants that were then flocking into the country, and organized benevolent societies to aid them.
QUARTLEY, Frederick William, engraver, b. in Bath, England, 5 July, 1808; d. in New York city, 5 April, 1874. He was apprenticed to the engraving business, and at sixteen years of age, studied in Wales and in Paris, and in 1827 came to New York city, where he connected himself with several publishing-houses. His best-known work is in "Picturesque America" (New York, 1872), and "Picturesque Europe" (1875). He also painted with some success. Among his pictures are "Niagara Falls," "Rienzi," "West Point," and the profession of war—engraving at sixteen years of age. He was elected to the legislature in October, 1803, in the year 1806, and was given to a candidate for that office, and in 1807 was chosen to the U. S. senate, and in 1809 re-elected for a second term.

QUEEN, Walter W., naval officer, b. in Washington, D. C., 6 Oct., 1824; d. there, 24 Oct., 1863. He entered the U. S. navy as a midshipman, was attached to the frigate "Macedonian," and afterward to the sloop "Marton," of the West India squadron, 1842-3. During the Mexican war he served in the frigates "Cumberland" and "Ohio," and was stationed in the fort at Point Isabel during the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, taking part in the attacks on Alvarado, Tampico, Tuxpan, and Vera Cruz. In 1847 he was promoted to passed midshipman, and in the following year was dismissed from service for misconduct, but was reinstated in 1833. Two years later he was commissioned lieutenant, and saw service in the East and West India squadrons. He was on special duty in the "Powhatan" at the re-enforcement of Fort Pickens, and served nineteen days on shore at the fort in charge of the boats of the fleet. He was in command of a division of the mortar boats under David D. Porter during the bombardment of Forts Jackson and St. Philip, also during the attack on Vicksburg, when Flag-Officer David G. Farragut first passed the batteries with his fleet. He became a lieutenant-commander in 1862, was on ordnance duty in Washington and with the North Atlantic squadron in 1862-3, and in command of the "Wyalsuing" in 1862-4. On 5 May, 1864, with that vessel, he engaged the Confederate ram "Alabemarle," with her consorts the "BombsHELL" and the "Cotton-plant," compelling them to seek refuge in the Roanoke river. He became commander, with special duty in Hartford, Conn., in 1866, and later served in the South Pacific and North Atlantic squadrons. In 1873-4 he was on duty in the Washington navy-yard, and in 1878-9 in the harbor of New York, and in the European station. His last service was as commandant of the navy-yard, Washington, in 1865-6. He was commissioned captain in 1874, commodore in 1883, and rear-admiral, 30 Aug., 1886, being retired in the following October, after which date he resided in the city of Washington.

QUEIPÓ, Vicente Vasquez, b. in Spanish states, in Seville, 1814. He received his education in Seville, where he was graduated in law, and entered the colonial magistracy. He was for several years fiscal procurator in Havana, and always advocated the enfranchisement of the negroes in the island. In 1849 he was elected senator by the city of Seville, but he resigned after the overthrow of Queen Isabella and the restoration of Ferdinand, that he might devote his time to literary researches. He has in preparation a history of Cuba. Queipó is a member of the Academy of sciences, and that of historical researches, of Madrid, and a corresponding member of the Institute of France. Among his works are "Cuba, sus recursos administracion y su poblacion" (Madrid, 1830), translated into French, in 1854, and "Essai sur le systeme metrique et monétaire des ancien peuples" (1839), QUEIROS, Pedro Fernandez de (kay-ros), Portuguese navigator, b. in Evora, Alentejo, in 1554, and in Panama in 1614. He is also known under the name of Quieros, and most historians call him a Spaniard. He was a pilot in the Spanish service, and made several voyages to New Spain. In 1604 he received the commission of general and the command of an expedition to explore the Pacific ocean. Two frigates and a sloop were built in Callao and equipped for that place. 2d Dec. 1605, Luis Vasco de Torres acting as his deputy. Their course was west-southwest, and they did not see land for 3,000 miles, when, on 22 Jan., 1606, they passed Archangel island, and afterward the Dzamarchipiao, lying in 17° 35' S. They landed at Sagitaria island (now Tahiti) on 10 Feb., discovered, 7 Apr., Tounamoo, where King Tamay gave them valuable information, and on 23 April described the New Hebrides islands, and an apparent continent, which Queiros named Tierra Austral del Espiritu Santo. He arrived in Acapulco, 3 Oct., 1606, and, proceeding immediately to Madrid, presented to Philip III, a memoir in which he urged the advantages of colonizing the countries that he had discovered. The court of Spain requested Queiros to return to Panama and proceeding to organize a new expedition with his own resources, but died there. His "Cartas al rey Felipe III." (Seville, 1610) are full of interesting details. The original narrative of his voyage has been published in volume xvii. of the "Viejo Universal," but a copy was issued during his life under the title "Narrativo de la Terra Australi incognita." (Amsterdam, 1615). The French version is better known: "Cope de la reccue presente au roi d'Espagne sur la descouverte de la cinquante partie du Monde, appelee la Terre Australe incognesu, et des grandes richesses et fertilites d'icelle." (Paris, 1617). Purchas gave also an English version of it in his "Pilgrimes." (London, 1625).

QUENTIN, Charles Henry (kan-tang), French missionary, b. in Bordeaux in 1621; d. in Sao Paulo, Brazil, in 1685. He became a Jesuit, went in his youth to South America, and was attached to the missions of the Amazon. He became afterward visitor of the order; founded several missions in the provinces of Sao Paulo and Minas Gerais, built schools and convents, and labored much to improve the condition of the native Indians. He has left several manuscripts, both in French and Spanish, which are now in the National Library of Paris. One of them has been published under the title "Journal de la mission du père Charles Quentin dans la terre du Brasil, de 1670 à 1680" (2 vols., Paris, 1852). It contains curious and interesting details of the early stages of the Portuguese conquest of the south-western provinces.

QUÉRARD, Louis François (kay-rar), West Indian poet, b. in Bordeaux, in 1714; d. in Cape Français, in 1749. His father was a colonial magistrate, and the son held for several years an office in the department of the king's lieutenant at Cape Français. In 1736 he published a volume of verses, "Memoires Indiennes." This volume, which appeared in the second part of the year, had a far greater sale than the first, and the author was consequently placed above the French writers. His "Memoires," which were published in 1737, consisted of two volumes, one being a continuation of his "Memoires Indiennes," and the other a new series of Indian poems, which were at first not so well received as his former works, but which, after several reprints, attained a far greater state of civilization than the early discoveries had credit with them, and his success was due to the public. His Indian poems are now considered to rank with Villemari's Celtic songs, and the poem of Clitilde de Survile. The greater part was certainly the original work of the author. They are "Chants de guerre des Caribes," (Saint François, 1737); "Chants de victoire au retour de la bataille." (1737); "L'appel aux armes." (1738); "Lamentations d'un Indien sur le corps de sa fille." (1740); "Danses de mariage." (1740); and "De l'écriture Caribe; comment les Caribes conservent l'antique systeme de cordellettes de diverses couleurs." (1741), which Querard wrote in answer to his detractors.

QUESADA, Gonzalo Jimenez de (kay-sah-dah), Spanish adventurer, b. in Granada in 1495; d. in Marquita in 1587. He studied law in Seville, and in 1535 was appointed chief judge of the province of Santa Marta in South America. He commanded an expedition to explore the interior of the country. He left Santa Marta, 6 Aug., 1536, at the head of 900 men, and, after many hardships and more than a year of warfare with the Indians, conquered the plateau of Bogota, which, on 6 Aug., 1538, he founded a city, which he called Santa Fe. He left the command there arrived on the plateau of Bogota, from different directions, the exploring expedition of Sebastian de Velazquez, one of Pizarro's lieutenants, who came from Quito, and Nicolas Federmann (q. v.), from Coro. Negotiations were opened between the three explorers; Federmann agreed, for $10,000, to turn over his forces to Quesada and Velazquez, who were to retire to the southwestern provinces, leaving Cundimarca to the first conqueror, pending the decision of the crown. Quesada, leaving his brother, Hernan Perez, in charge, set out for Europe. He met the emperor at Ghent, but offended him by an ostentations display of luxury, and he was also opposed by the friends of his former chief. Lugo, who had died. Quesada was passed over, and a son of Lugo, Alonso Luis, obtained the commission of governor of New Granada in 1542. Shortly afterward Quesada obtained leave to join his brother in the New World, but was persecuted by the governor, imprisoned, and exiled. He resolved to seek justice in Spain, and returned to New Granada as commander-in-chief of the troops. In 1549, under his command, the Spaniards made a very successful expedition to discover "El Dorado," returning from the banks of the river Guaviare. He was afterward reinstated as captain-general, and died, a centurian, of leprosy. His remains were transported to the cathedral of Bogota.

QUESADA, Manuel de, Cuban patriot, b. in Puerto Principe about 1830; d. in Costa Rica in 1853. In 1853 he emigrated to Mexico on account of his political ideas, and entered the army, serving under Juarez against the empire. He was soon distinguished by his bravery, was brevetted brigadier-general, and became governor of Cochaula and Durango. When the Cuban insurrection began in 1868, he fitted out an expedition in the United States and landed at Guanaja, on the northwestern part of the island, in December of the same year. He devoted his attention to organizing the Cuban forces and was appointed their commander-in-chief. In this capacity he took part in several engagements, especially at Sabana Grande and Las Tunas, where he defeated the Spanish troops. In 1870 he was deprived of his command by the government, and left the island. He then made a tour in the United States and the South American republics in search of aid for the Cuban cause, and succeeded in sending a few expeditions. with arms and ammunitions to the patriots, among others one in the steamer "Virginii," which was captured by the Spaniards. Among those of the crew that were executed at Santiago de Cuba was a son of Quesada. After the close of the Cuban insurrection he settled in Costa Rica, where he was appointed an official.

QUESADA, Vicente Gaspar, Argentine author, b. in Buenos Ayres, 5 April, 1839. He studied law in the university of his native city, in 1850 was graduated as LL. D., and at once took an active part in politics, contributing, by his articles in the press of Montevideo and Buenos Ayres, to the fall of the tyrant Rosas in 1852. He founded in 1860 the "Revista del Parana," and in 1864 the "Revista de Buenos Ayres," and since 1871 he has been director of the public library of the latter city. He has published "Impresiones de viaje, recuerdos de las provincias de Cordoba, Santiago y Tucuman" (Buenos Ayres, 1852); "La provincia de Cordoba" (1860), which has been translated into German; and a series of articles, "Los Recuerdos," "El Cepoescalo de la tarde," "Lejos del hogar," and "El Chiquite," published in his "Revista," and in a volume (1864).

QUESNEL, Bienville-Gabriel Louis, (kaynel'), South American botanist, b. near Cayenne in 1749; d. in Cayenne in 1801. He received his education in France, served for several years in the army, and fought at Toulago in 1780. After the conclusion of peace he returned, with the brevet of major, to his estate in Guiana, and at the suggestion of Malouet (q. v.), established a model farm and adopted new methods of cultivation. For several years he carried on agricultural experiments, but, unwise management proving detrimental to his fortune, he abandoned agriculture and became a traveller. He explored French Guiana and the northern provinces of Brazil, and formed an important herbarium, which is now deposited in the museum of Cayenne. Among his works are "Herbier explique des plantes de la Guiane" (2 vols., Cayenne, 1792); "Description de la flore Guianaise" (1795); and "Journaux de voyage a travers les Pampas" (1796).

QUESNEL, Joseph, author, b. in St. Malo, France, 15 Nov., 1740; d. in Montreal, Canada, 3 Mar., 1816. After having white sails raised, he shipped on board a man-of-war, visited Pondicherry and Madagascar, travelled in Africa, and after three years returned to France. After resting a few months, he set out for French Guiana, and afterward visited several islands of the Antilles and explored part of Brazil. He then travelled in the valley of the Mississippi, and finally decided on settling in Canada. He married in Montreal, and resided in Boucherville. In 1788 he wrote "Coles et Colinette," a vaudeville, which was played for the first time in Montreal. He followed with "Lucas et Cecile," an opera-coma, "L'Angolomanie," a comedy in verse, and "Les Probables Francais," in prose, which was afterward published in Paris. Besides several songs, he composed sacred music for the parish church of Montreal, and some motets, and wrote a short treatise on the dramatic art (1805). The writings of Quesnel are in the first volume of the "Reperoire national."

QUETZALCOUATL (ket-zal-coo-wat'-el), king of the Toltecs, lived about the sixth century. According to Brasseur de Bourbourg (q. v.), in his "Histoire des Diverses Civilisations de l'Amérique," this personage with long hair reaching to the waist, and a pale visage, who gave his name as Cecalt-Quetzalcoatl, landed one morning at Panuco. He pretended to come from an eastern country of which nobody had heard before, and was accompanied by a troop of architects, painters, and scientists. Proceeding immediately to Tollantzingo, he built a magnificent temple and an underground palace, and was elected king of Tollan, the nations of the Ambato valley receiving him as a messenger of God. His reign lasted twenty years, and proved beneficial to the people. He was to be admitted in the confederacy, till Huemac, king of Aculhuauc, allied with the dissatisfied priests, overthrew the monarchy. Quetzalcoatl retired to the valley of Huittzilapan, where he founded the city of Cholula, which later became the seat of a powerful republic. Some years afterward Cholula was also taken by Huemac, and Brasseur de Bourbourg asserts that Quetzalcoatl died during his flight from Cholula. But other historians say that, after retiring from Tollantzingo, Quetzalcoatl reached the coast of Campeche and founded Xicalanco on an island of the lagoon of Terninos, whence, after some years, he retired again to his fabulous country, while his followers emigrated to Central America and founded the new city of Tenam ready.

QUIK, Charles William, clergyman, b. in New York city, 4 Oct., 1822; d. in Philadelphia, 10 Oct., 1894. He was graduated at Yale and at Alexandria seminary. He was ordained to the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church, and was rector of parishes in New York and Pennsylvania till 1876, when he joined the ministry of the Reformed Episcopal church. He edited the "Episcopal Recorder" in 1866—81; the "Christian Woman" in 1865—93; the works of Ezekiel Hopkins (Philadelphia, 1863); "Righteousness by Faith," by Charles P. Melville (1864); and the works of John Owen (16 vols., 1863).

QUIKENBORNE (or VAN QUIKENBORNE, Charles), Charles van, clergyman, b. in Peterham, Belgium, 21 Jan., 1788; d. at the mission of St. Francis, in the Portage des Sioux, Mo., 17 Aug., 1857. He studied in the College of Ghent, was ordained priest, and held various ecclesiastical places in Belgium. He became a Jesuit in 1813, and at once asked to be sent on the American mission. He arrived in the United States in 1817, and in 1820 was appointed superior of the mission at Annapolis, Md., being also, on the resignation of the first secretary of this office, he built two fine churches, one in Annapolis and one at White Marsh, and lived, at the same time, a vast district under his jurisdiction. After some years he was ordered to transfer his mission to Missouri. He accordingly set out with twelve companions, and, after travelling 1,000 miles, arrived at Florissant and began the novitiate of St. Stanislaus. To form this establishment he had no other materials than the timber that he carried from the woods and the rocks he raised from the bed of the river. He was his own architect, mechanic, and laborer, and, aided by his novices, finally constructed the buildings. In 1828 he set about building a university at St. Louis, and also erected at St. Charles a church, a convent of the Sacred Heart, and a parochial residence. His great desire from the first had been to evangelize the Indians. He therefore made several excursions among the Osages and Iowas, and made numerous conversions. He erected a house and chapel among the Kickapoos, and this tribe became the centre of his missionary labors in 1830. He had visited all the neighboring tribes among the Kickapoos, and was about to make another conversion, when he was recalled to Missouri. After remaining some time in St. Louis, he was sent to the parish of St. Francis, where he at once began the erection of a church.
QUINBY, George Washington, clergyman, b. in Westbrook, Me., 26 Dec., 1810; d. in Augusta, Me., 10 Jan., 1884. He was educated in his native village and in the academies of Parsonsfield and North Bridgton, Me., studied for the ministry, and in 1835 began to preach in Poland, Me. He was subsequently pastor of Universalist churches in Livermore, North Yarmouth and South, Me., Taunton, Mass., and Cincinnati, Ohio. He was editor of the "Star in the West" for several years, subsequently of the "Trumpet" and the "Freeman," and in 1864-84 of the "Gospel Banner," all organs of the Universalist church. His publications include: "The Salvation of Christ" (Cincinnati, 1832); "The Execution and Deliverance of Ulysses" (1834); "Marriage and the Duties of the Marriage Relation: Six Lectures" (1856); "The Gallows, the Prison, and the Poor-House" (1857); and "Heaven Our Home" (1869).

QUINBY, Isaac Ferdinand, soldier, b. near Morristown, N. J., 29 Jan., 1821; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 18 Sept., 1891. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1843. He was a classmate and close friend of Gen. Grant. He was an assistant professor at West Point in 1845-7 and took part in several skirmishes on the Rio Grande and Vera Cruz lines at the close of the Mexican war. He went to Rochester, N. Y., in September, 1851, to become professor of mathematics in the newly founded University of the State of New York. He married at Shawmut, Mass., 16 March, 1852. He held his professorship until the civil war, and then became colonel of the 13th New York regiment. Under his command, it marched through Baltimore on 30 May, being the first body of National troops to pass through that city after the attack upon the 6th Massachusetts regiment on 19 April. Col. Quinby resigned from the service in August and resumed his chair; but he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, 17 March, 1862, and in the following month was assigned to the command at Columbus, Ky. In October, 1862, he was relieved, to take command of the 7th division of the Army of the Tennessee. The division was sent to take part in the movement to turn the Confederate right at Murfreesboro, Tenn. He crossed the river with his men, waded the Tallahatchie, and Yazoo rivers. Amid great difficulties Gen. Quinby pushed on to Fort Pemberton, where he arrived on 23 March. Finding that there was no ground suitable for camping or moving a large body of troops, and the fire of the small gun-boats being ineffectual, he conceived the idea of going around to the east side of Fort Pemberton, crossing the Tallahatchie river on a pontoon bridge, cutting the communications of the fort, and compelling its surrender; but he also constructed works for a direct attack, and sent back to Helena for heavy guns. The boat that carried them brought orders from Gen. Grant to abandon the movement by Yazoo pass, and Gen. Quinby withdrew his forces from before Fort Pemberton on 5 April. The fatigues and anxieties of this expedition in a malarious region brought on a severe illness, and he was ordered home on sick-leave, 1 May, 1863. But learning, a few days after reaching home, the progress of Grant's movement to the rear of Vicksburg, he hastened back, assuming command of his division on the 17th, and taking part in the assault of the 19th, and the subsequent movements. On 5 June illness again rendered him unfit for duty in the field, and he went to the north under Grant's orders, remaining in Rochester until 1 July. He then commanded the rendezvous at Elmira till 31 Dec., 1863, when, convinced that he would not again be able to go to the front, he resigned his commission and resumed his duties as professor in the university. In May, 1869, he was appointed U. S. marshal for the northern district of New York, and he held that office during Gen. Grant's two presidential terms, holding his professorship also till September, 1884. In May, 1883, he was appointed city surveyor of Rochester, and continued to hold that office. He was a trustee of the Soldiers' home at Bath, N. Y., and vice-president of the board from the foundation of the institution in 1879 till his resignation in 1886. In addition to his official duties, he was frequently employed as a consulting engineer. He had revised and rewritten several of the works of Rochester, and continued to do so. He is the author of the treatise on "The Differential and Integral Calculus" in that series is altogether his.

QUINCY, Edmund, emigrant, b. in Wigsthorpe, Northamptonshire, England, in 1602; d. in Mt. Wollaston, Mass., in November or December, 1635. His family seems to have been connected with the Quincys, Earls of Winchester in the 13th century. See Granville, "Memorial respecting the Families of Quincy and Adams," Havanna, 1841. Edmund Quincy came to Massachusetts in 1628, and, after returning to England for his wife and children, sailed again in the ship which brought the Rev. John Cotton, and anchored in Boston harbor, 4 Sept., 1633. He was one of the committee appointed to erect the first school and church, and he is said to have recommended his son, Ed- mund, b. at Achurch, Northamptonshire, in 1627; d. in Braintree, 8 Jan., 1698, was a magistrate and representative of his town in the general court, and lieutenant-colonel of the Suffolk regiment. In 1689 he was appointed one of the committee of safety, which formed the provisional government of the colony until the arrival of Gov. Andros. He had two sons, Daniel and Edmund, the former of whom died before his father.—Daniel's only son, John, statesman, b. in Braintree in 1689; d. there in 1767, was graduated at Harvard in 1708. He held the office of speaker of the house of representatives longer than any other person in the provincial period, and was for forty successive years a member of the council. His great-grandson, John Quincy Adams, was named for him.—Edmund’s younger son, Edmund, statesman, b. in Braintree in October, 1681; d. in Lon- don, 23 Feb., 1738, was graduated at Harvard in 1699, and entered early into public life as representative from his native town, and afterward as member of the council. He was a judge of the supreme court from 1711 till his death. A controversy having arisen as to the boundary between Massachusetts and New Hampshire, he was appointed agent for Massachusetts, and embarked for England in December, 1737. Soon after his arrival in London he fell a victim to small-pox. He left two sons, Edmund and Josiah.—The elder, Ed- mund, merchant, b. in Braintree, in 1708; d. there in 1798, was graduated at Harvard in 1722. He was an author of a "Treatise on Hemp Husbandry," published in 1765. One of his daughters married John Hancock.—The younger, Josiah, merchant, b. in Braintree in 1709; d. there in 1748, was graduated at Harvard in 1728. Between 1737 and 1749 he spent much of his time in Europe. He was appointed in 1755 joint commissioner with Thomas Pownall to negotiate with the colonies of New York and Pennsylvania for aid in erecting a frontier barrier against the French, at Teconioga. He was a friend and correspondent of Franklin and Washington, and erected the mansion seen in the accompanying illustration, which is still occupied by his descendants.—Josiah's second son, Samuel, lawyer, b. in Braintree, Mass., 13 April, 1735; d. in Antigua in 1799, was graduated at Harvard in 1754. He was an intimate friend of John Adams, and the two were admitted to the bar on the same day, 6 Nov., 1758. Samuel Quincy became eminent in his profession, and rose to the dignity of selectman-general of the province. His official position influenced his political views. He became a Tory, and at the end of the siege of Boston in March, 1776, he left the country with other Loyalists. By way of compensation for his exile and losses, he was appointed attorney-general of Antigua, which office he held until his death.—Josiah's third son, Josiah, lawyer, b. in Boston, 28 Feb., 1744; d. at sea off Gloucester, Mass., 29 April, 1775, was graduated at Harvard in 1763. Three years later, on taking his master's degree, he delivered an English oration on "Patriotism," which exhibited his wonderful power as an orator. Herefore the orations had been in Latin. He studied law with Owenbridge Thacher, and succeeded him in his extensive and lucrative practice. He soon rose to the foremost rank in his profession. At the same time he gave much attention to politics, and on the occasion of the Townsend measures of 1767 he published in the Boston "Gazette" a series of extremely able articles, signed "Hyperion." After the so-called "Boston massacre" he was selected, together with John Adams, by Capt. Preston as counsel for himself and his soldiers who had fired on the crowd. The popular excitement was such that it required not only moral but physical courage to perform this duty. Mr. Quincy's own father wrote him a letter of passionate remonstrance. That he should undertake the defence of "these criminals charged with the murder of their fellow-citizens" seemed monstrous. "Good God!" wrote the father, "is it possible! I will not believe it!" The son, in reply, maintained that it was his professional duty to give legal advice and assistance to men accused of a crime but not proved guilty of it. "I never harbored the expectation," said he, "nor any great desire, that all men should speak well of me. To inquire my duty and do it, is my aim." After the excitement was over, Mr. Quincy's course was warmly commended by nearly everybody. During the next two years his business greatly increased, but he still found time to write stirring political pamphlets. He wrote in "Edles and Gilly's Gazette" over the signatures of "Callisthenes," "Tertius in Nubibus," "Edward Sexby," and "Marchmont Nethan," he was also the author of the "Draught of Instructions to the Boston Representatives in May, 1772," and the "Report of a Committee chosen by the Inhabitants of Petersham, 4th January, 1773." All these papers are characterized by clearness and boldness. He was one of the first to say, in plain terms, that an appeal to arms, followed by a separation from the mother-country, was inevitable. He had by this time become evident that he must, for his sufferings from pecuniary consumption, and in February, 1778, by the advice of physicians, he made a voyage to Charleston, and travelled through the Carolinas, returning to Boston late in May. He was present in the Old South meeting-house on 16 Dec., and as the men, disguised as Indians, rushed past the door on their way to the tea-ships, he exclaimed—"I see the colonial culture, which now rise thick and fast upon our horizon, the thunders roll, and the lightnings play, and to that God who rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm I commit my country." In May, 1774, he published his most important political work, entitled "Observations on the Act of Parliament commonly called the Boston Port Bill, with Thoughts on Civil Society and Standing Armies," a distinct voice of independence. He continued as a confidential agent of the patriot party to consult and advise with the friends of America there. He was politically received by Lords North and Dartmouth, as well as by members of the opposition, such as Shelburne and Bute; but the Earl of Hillsborough declared, in the house of lords: "There are men walking the streets of London today who ought to be in New-England at this time. The earl meant Mr. Quincy and Dr. Franklin. In March, 1775, the young man, wasted with disease, sailed for Boston, bearing a message, which died with him, from the Whig leaders in England to their friends in America. As he felt the approach of death, while almost within sight of his native land, he said again and again that if he could only talk for one hour with Samuel Adams or Joseph Warren, he should be content to die. Mr. Quincy's power as an orator was very great, and, in spite of the weakness of his lungs, his voice was remarkable for its resonant and penetrating quality as well as for its sweetness. He married in 1769 Abigail Phillips, and had one son, Josiah. See "Memoir of the Life of Josiah Quincy, Jr., by his Son," by Josiah Quincy, Jr., 1850; "Quincy," by his son, Charles, 1853; "Quincy," by his daughter, Susan Quincy, Boston, 1875. His son, Josiah, statesman, b. in Boston, 4 Feb., 1772; d. in Quincy, Mass., 1 July, 1864. He was fitted for college at the Phillips academy, Andover, and graduated at Harvard in 1790 at the head of his class. He studied law with William Tudor, and was admitted to the bar in 1795. His practice was not large, and he had considerable leisure to devote to study and to politics. In 1797 he married Miss Eliza Susan Morton, of New York. On 4 July, 1798, he delivered the annual oration in the Old South meeting-house, and gained such a reputation thereby that the Federalists selected him as their candidate for congress in 1800. The Republican newspapers ridiculed the idea of a member of congress only twenty-four years old, and called about for a cradle to rock him in. Mr. Quincy was defeated. In the spring of 1804 he was elected to the state senate of Massachusetts, and in the autumn of that year he was elected to congress. During his senatorship he was active in urging his state to suggest an amendment to the Federal constitution, eliminating the clause that permitted the slave states to count three fifths of their slaves as part of their basis of representation. If such a measure could have had any chance of success at that moment, its effect would of course have been to break up the Union. Mr. Quincy dreaded the extension of slavery, and foresaw that the existence of that institution was likely to bring on a civil war; but it was not evident then, as it is now, that a civil war in 1861 was greatly to be preferred to civil war or peaceable secession in 1835. As member of congress, Mr. Quincy belonged to the party of extreme Federalists known as the “Essex junto.” The Federalists were then in a hopeless minority; even the Massachusetts delegation in congress had ten Republicans to seven Federalists. In some ways Mr. Quincy showed a disposition to independent action, as in refusing to follow his party in dealing with Randolph’s maltreatment faction and in violently opposing the embargo of 1807, which nearly caused a war with England. Governor Morris had given expression to such a fear in 1787 in the Federal convention. In 1811, when it was proposed to admit Louisiana as a state, the high Federalists took the ground that the constitution had not conferred upon congress the power to admit new states except such as should be formed from territory already belonging to the Union in 1787. Mr. Quincy maintained this position in a remarkable speech, 4 Jan. 1811, in which he used some strong language. “Why, sir, I have already heard of six states, and some say there will be at no great distance of time more. I have also heard that the mouth of the Ohio will be far to the east of the centre of the continent, and the Alleghanies are one hundred miles farther off. It is impossible such a power could be granted. It was not for these men that our fathers fought. It was not for them this constitution was adopted. You have no authority to throw the rights and liberties and property of this people into hotch-pot with the wild men on the Missouri, or with the mixed, though more respectable, race of Anglo-Hispanic-Aborigines, who belong to the mouth of the Mississippi, . . . I am compelled to declare it as my deliberate opinion that, if this bill passes, the bonds of this Union are virtually dissolved; that the states which compose it are free from their moral obligations; and that, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, to prepare definitely and unmistakably, if they can; violently, if they must.” This was, according to Hildreth, “the first announcement on the floor of congress of the doctrine of secession.” Though opposed to the war with England, Mr. Quincy did not go so far as some of the Federalists in refusing support to the administration; his great speech on the navy, 25 Jan., 1812, won applause from all parties. In that year he declined a re-election to congress. For the next ten years he was most of the time a member of the Massachusetts legislature, but a great part of his attention was given to his farm at Quincy. He was member of the convention of 1829 for revising the state constitution. In the following year he was speaker of the house. From 1823 to 1828 he was mayor of Boston, and his administration was memorable for the number of valuable reforms effected by his energy and skill. Everything was overhauled—the police, the prisons, the schools, the fire department, and the great market was built under him. In 1830 he was elected president of Harvard, and held that position until 1845. During his administration Dane hall was built for the law school and Gore hall for the university library; and it was due mainly to his exertions that the astronomical observatory was founded and equipped with its great telescope, which is still one of the finest in the world. In 1834, in the face of violent opposition, Mr. Quincy succeeded in establishing the principle that “where flagrant outrages were committed against persons or property by members of the university, within its limits, they should be proceeded against, in the last resort, like any other citizens, before the courts of the commonwealth. The effect of this measure was most wholesome in checking the peculiar forms of revolt which had been inclined to tolerate in college students. Mr. Quincy also introduced the system of marking, which continued to be used for more than forty years at Harvard. By this system the merit of every college exercise was valued according to a scale of numbers, from one to eight, by the professor or tutor, at Harvard college. Examinations were rated in various multiples of eight, and all these marks were set down to the credit of the individual student. Delinquencies of various degrees of importance were also estimated in multiples of eight, and charged on the debit side of the account. At the end of the year the balance to the student’s credit was compared with the sum-total that an unbroken series of perfect marks, unaffected by deductions, would have yielded, and the resulting percentage determined the rank of the student. President Quincy was also strongly in favor of the elective system of studies, in so far as it was compatible with the general state of advancement of the students in his time, and with the means of instruction at the disposal of the university. The elective system was tried more thoroughly, and on a broader scale, under his administration than under any other down to the time of President Eliot. From 1845 to 1864 Mr. Quincy led a quiet and pleasant life, devoted to literary and social pursuits. He continued till the last to take a warm interest in politics, and was an enthusiastic admirer of President Lincoln. His “History of Harvard University” (2 vols., Boston, 1840); “History of the Boston Athenæum” (Boston, 1851); “Municipal History of Boston” (Boston, 1852); “Memoir of J. Q. Adams” (Boston, 1858); and “Speeches delivered in Congress” (edited by his son Edmund, Boston, 1874). His biography, by his son, Edmund Quincy, Boston, 1880, is authoritative. But the most interesting work of his son and admirer, R. Lowell’s “My Study Window,” pp. 83-114.—His wife, Eliza Susan (Mouries), b. in New York in 1793; d. in Quincy, 1 Sept., 1850, was a daughter of John Morton, a New York merchant, of Scottish descent, and Maria Sophia Kemper, whose father was a native of Kain, Germany. During the occupation of New York by the British, Mr. and Mrs. Morton lived in New Jersey, first at Elizabeth, QUINCY, Josiah, lawyer, b. in Lenox, Mass., 7 March, 1795; d. in Romney, N. H., 19 Jan., 1855.

Although his father was unable to take a collegiate course, and, on finishing his studies at the Lenox academy, he began at once the study of law in Stockbridge.

Shortly after his admission to the bar he removed to Romney, N. H., where he spent the remainder of his life. In a few years he became one of the most successful lawyers in the state. He was frequently elected to the legislature, and for one year was president of the state senate.

He was a man of great public spirit, and devoted much time to the promotion of the railway and educational interests of New Hampshire.

Mr. Quincy was an active friend of the various enterprises of the Baptist denomination, with which he was identified, serving for years as a trustee of Newton theological seminary.

QUINN, John, R. C., bishop, b. in Cloyne, County Cork, Ireland, 19 Oct., 1826; d. in New Orleans, La., 9 March, 1888.

He received a good classical education, determined to study for the priesthood, and, with this view, emigrated to the United States in 1844.

After a theological course in Mount St. Mary's seminary, Emmetsburg, Md., he was ordained to the priesthood at Portage, Ohio, till 1853, when he was appointed assistant pastor of St. Patrick's church, Cincinnati.

Shortly afterward he was made president of Mount St. Mary's college of the west, at the same time filling the chairs of philosophy and theology. In 1859 he was nominated for the diocese of Mobile, and he was consecrated bishop on 4 Dec. At this time there were very few priests in the diocese, and he went to Europe in 1860 for the purpose of obtaining clerical aid, as well as of paying the customary visit to the pope.

Bishop Quinnan was ardently in his devotion to the temporal and spiritual interests of both sides in the conflict, and after the battle of Shiloh hastened to the field in a special train with sucrée for the wounded.

After the war he exerted himself for the reorganization of his diocese, almost unaided. He built St. Patrick's and St. Mary's churches in Mobile, and erected others in different places, besides restoring those that had been destroyed.

He founded many convents and schools, and introduced various religious orders into his diocese. Bishop Quinlan took part in the canonization of the Japanese martyrs in Rome in 1867, and was present at the visitation of the vicar apostolic in 1868. He visited Rome in 1882, and, by contracting the Roman fever undermined his health. At the time of his death his diocese contained 40 priests, 36 churches, and about 13 convents and academies.

QUINN, James Cochrane, Canadian clergyman, b. near Belfast, Ireland, 25 May, 1845.

He was educated at Queen's college and at the Presbyterian college, Belfont, and then removed to New Brunswick in August, 1872. The same year he went to Newfoundland, and in 1874 to New Brunswick, and, after serving as a Presbyterian minister in that province and Nova Scotia, removed to Manitoba in 1885, and was made pastor of the Presbyterian church at Emerson in that province. He had charge of a station for the American ornithological society at Belfont, and was elected a member of one at Emerson, introduced the system of enlisting into the counties of Northumberland and Gloucester, New Brunswick, and has been interested in improving the stock of sheep and cattle.

He has published "Plain Words to Anxious Inquirers" (Toronto, 1888); "Hand-Book on Poultry," and tracts on temperance and other sub-jects.

QUINN, William, clergyman, b. in Donegal, Ireland, 21 May, 1829; d. in Paris, France, 15 April, 1887. He came to the United States in 1841, entered the ecclesiastical seminary at Fordham, N. Y., and was ordained priest by Bishop Hughes on 17 Dec., 1845. He subsequently became pastor of St. Peter's church in Barclay street, New York, where, besides having to clear off a debt of $14,000, he was opposed by the lay trustees, who had control of the church building. There he also sustained the wagons and women who had intrusted their savings to the care of St. Peter's church. He was actively supported by Bishop Hughes, and finally succeeded in triumphing over the trustees and paying the debts. He was appointed pastor of the cathedral on 1 May, 1853, and was also made vicar-general. During the absence of Cardinal McCloskey in 1875 and 1876, he had charge of the administration of the archdiocese. As vicar-general he had the direction of the purchase, sale, and transfer of all ecclesiastical property, and the supervision of schools, asylums, societies, reformatories, and all other Roman Catholic institutions. He was re-appointed in 1855 by Archbishop Corrigan, and to his other charges was added that of the financial management of the building fund of the new cathedral. His health at length gave way under the pressure of his duties, and he went to Europe in June, 1896. Dr. Quinn was for many years one of the most influential men in the Roman Catholic church of the United States. Under Cardinal McCloskey his power was almost absolute in the archdiocese of New York. He was abrupt in addressing and sometimes gave offence by his unceremonious manners. His care for the needy was well known, and, although millions passed through his hands, he died poor. His remains were brought from Paris to New York and interred in Calvary cemetery. Dr. Quinn was a domestic prelate of the papal throne.

QUINT, Alonzo Hall, clergyman, b. in Barnstead, N. H., 22 March, 1828; d. in Boston, 4 Nov., 1896. He was graduated at Dartmouth and at Andover seminary, was pastor of the Mather church in Roxbury, Mass., from 1853 till 1863; was secretary of the Massachusetts general association of Congregational churches from 1856 till 1861, and of the national council of Congregational churches of New England in 1854; and in 1875 he was chaplain of the 2d Massachusetts infantry. He served in the legislature in 1881-3. Dartmouth gave him the degree of D. D. in 1896. Dr. Quint was a member of many historical and genealogical societies, and served on the Massachusetts board of education from 1855 till 1891. He was, from 1859 till 1851, an editor and a proprietor of the "Congregational Quarterly," contributed numerous articles to the "Dover "Inquirer," and is the author of "The Potomac and the Rapidan, or Army Notes from the Failure at Winchester to the Re-enforcement of Rosecrans" (Boston, 1864) and "The Records of the Second Massachusetts Infantry, 1861-5" (1867) and the "First Parish in Dover, N. H." (1889).

QUINTANA, Agustín (kins-tah-nah), Mexican missionary, b. in Quin-tana about 1660; d. there in 1734. He entered the order of preachers in his native city in 1698, and was soon sent to the missions of the Mije Indians. After twenty-eight years of labor he was appointed superior of the convent of Zacaevila, but he retired later, on account of failing health, to the main convent of Oaxaca, where he wrote several books in the Mije language. As pioneer were the first that had been printed, he made several visits to Puebla, notwithstanding his sickness, to teach the printers how to make new letters. His chief work is "Institución Cristiana, que contiene el Arte de la Lengua Mije y los Tratados de la Santísima Trinidad, de la Creación del Mundo, y la Redención por Jesucristo" (Puebla, 1729).

QUINTANA RIO, Andrés, Mexican statesman, b. in Merida, Yucatan, 30 Nov., 1787; d. in Mexico, 15 April, 1851. He studied in the Seminary of San Ildefonso in his native city, was graduated in law, in 1808 went to Mexico to practise his profession, and rose to power and influence to reputation. When Hidalgo rose against the Spanish dominion, Quintana took an active part in the cause of independence, and was forced to fly from the capital, but in different localities he published a patriotic paper, "Ilustrador Americano," and circulated it, notwithstanding the vigilance of the Spanish authorities. After the capture of Zitacuaro by the insurgents, he joined the governing junta that was formed by his order published, on 16 Sept., 1812, a manifesto under the name of "Aniversario," which explained the principles of independence and related the events of the past two years. When the first Mexican congress assembled at Chilpancingo, 14 Sept., 1813, Quintana was appointed vice-president, and as such signed, in the absence of President Murguía, the first formal declaration of the independence of Mexico, 14 Nov., 1813. For his devoted service to the congress from place to place, and after the capture of Morelos, when that body was dissolved, he suffered from the persecution of the Spanish authorities. Afterward Iturbide appointed Quintana judge of the supreme court, and, when the empire was overthrown, the latter established in 1823 the journal "El Federalista Mexicano," which soon became a leader of public opinion. He was several times deputy to congress and senator, won reputation as eloquent orator, and in 1828 was appointed minister of the interior. He was one of the first to offer a voluntary contribution to aid the government in repelling the French invasion. Besides his journalistic labors and political pamphlets, Quintana wrote many patriotic odes and a translation in verse of the Psalms, but his poetical compositions have only been published in anthologies.

QUINTARD, Charles Todd, P. E. bishop, b. in Stamford, Conn., 22 Dec., 1824; d. in Memphis, Ga., 15 Feb., 1898. His father was born in the same house, and died there in the nineteenth year of his age. The son was a pupil of Trinity school, studied medicine with Dr. James R. Wood and Dr. Valentine Mott, and was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1847. He afterward removed to Georgia, and began the practice of medicine in Athens. In 1851 he accepted the chair of physiology and pathological anatomy in the medical college at Memphis, Tenn., and became co-editor with Dr. Ayres P. Merrill, of the Memphis Medical Recorder. In 1855 he took orders as a deacon of the Protestant Episcopal church. He was advanced to the priesthood in the following year, and in January, 1857, became rector of Calvary church, Memphis. He resigned at the end of the year to accept the rectorship of the Church of the Advent, Nashville, Tenn., at the request of the bishop. At the beginning of the civil war he was appointed chaplain of the 1st Tennessee regiment, and he so continued during the war, in addition to his duties being frequently called upon to act as physician and surgeon. At the close of the war he returned to his parish at Nashville, and the death of Bishop Otey, Dr. Quintard was elected bishop of Tennessee on 7 Sept., 1866, and was consecrated in St. Luke's church, Philadelphia, on 11 Oct. following. He re-established the University of the south at Se- wance, Tenn., and was its first vice-chancellor. He visited England several times in the interest of the university, and received large sums of money and donations from members of the established church in that country. He had labored assiduously in the promotion of schemes for Christian education in his diocese, including Columbia institute, founded by Bishop Otey, Fairmount college, the School of the Sisters of St. Mary's, at Memphis, St. James hall, at Bolivar, and St. Luke's school at Cleveland. Bishop Quintard received the degree of D D. from Columbia in 1866, and that of LL. D. from Cambridge, England, in 1867. He is the author of occasional charges and sermons.

QUIROGA, Juan Facundo (ke-ro-gah). Argentine soldier, b. in San Juan, in the province of Rioja, Argentine Republic, in 1769; d. in Barranca Yaco, near Cordova, 28 Dec., 1835. His parents were shepherds, and sent him in 1790 to school in San Juan, but he soon assuaged his teacher and fled, working as a laborer to gain a livelihood. He was sent in 1806 by his father with a cargo of merchandise to Chihi; but he lost it at the gaming-table, and when on his return he was reproached by his father, the youth assuaged him and fled to the pampas, where, with a few daring companions he led the life of a robber. In 1818 he joined a company of Chichimec Indians, was taken prisoner and imprisoned in San Luis by order of the governor. Despues. In the same prison there were several Spanish officers, and they concerted a plan for escape, removing the shackles from the criminals to aid them, but Quiroga fell on his liberators and killed several of them. For this service he was set at liberty, and the fame of this exploit soon carried him with a numerous band of followers, with whom he began a career as a partisan chief. The province of Rioja had long been divided by the feud of the families of Ocampo and Davila, and in 1820 the government was in the hands of the former family, which attracted Quiroga by giving him the rank of general in command of the forces on the other side, who was to escort the remnants of a mutinous Federal battalion out of the state, made joint cause with them, attacked and captured the capital, and would have shot the governor but for the intervention of one of his chief officers. He now recalled the banished Davila; but, as the latter would not submit to Quiroga's dictation, he was deposed, and, as he resisted with some loyal regiments, he was attacked and killed by Quiroga, who proclaimed himself independent chief of the province. In 1826 the president, Bernardo Rivadavia (q. v.), whose authority was impotent against the provincial chieftains, invited Quiroga to co-operate in the war against Brazil, and the latter defeated La Madrid at Tala, thus gaining supremacy also in the province of Tucuman. After the election of Manuel Dorrego (q. v.) in 1827, Quiroga sustained with enthusiasm the Federal principle, represented by Dorrego, and invited the leaders of the provinces to join only nominally subject to the central government. When Dorrego's successor, Juan Lavalle, of the opposite party, sent Gen. Jose M. Paz (q. v.) against the Federal partisans, Quiroga was defeated at Tablada in 1829 and at Omativa in 1830. He fled to Buenos Ayres, where he was ordered by Rosas, who meanwhile had assumed the power, to march against Paz and Madrid, and at the head of 2000 inmates, whom he had taken from the penitentiary, and some troops, he defeated Paz at Chacoe, and Madrid at Ciudadela in 1831, ravaged the country, and committed numerous crimes. In 1834 he returned to Buenos Ayres, where he began to talk against Rosas. The latter, not daring to attack him openly, tried to get him out of the capital, and committed him to jail, and the governors of Santiago and Tucuman. Quiroga accepted, and, setting out in November, 1835, soon restored order. On his return he was advised that near Cordova a party of gauchito assassins was lying in wait for him; but he answered that there was no man in the pampas who dared to kill him, and, continuing his journey, was murdered in Barranca Yaco by Santos Pereyra's party. See Don Diego F. Sarmiento's "Facundo Quiroga y Aldao, o Civilización y Barbarie en las Pampas Argentinas" (Buenos Ayres, 1852).

QUIROGA, Vasco de, Mexican R. C. bishop, b. in Madrigal, Old Castle, in 1470; d. in Uruapan, 14 March, 1555. He studied law and theology, and was one of the judges of the chancellor's court of Valladolid, when he was appointed by the queen regent in 1530 one of the judges of the second audiencia, which, under Sebastian Ramirez de Fuen- feul, arrived in Mexico in the beginning of 1531. With the proceeds of his office he founded near the capital the hospital of Santa Fe, and by his just measures soon gathered a population of 50,000 Indians, whom he converted to Christianity, and taught to lead a civilized life. Fuefeul having died, when the newly conquered Chichimec Indians of the province of Michoacan became rebellions in 1533, he was sent there as visitor, and soon pacified the rebels by his prudent and just measures, remaining with them as their pastor and protector. The emperor nominated him first bishop of Micho- acan, and the town of Tobacco was named from Tizintzuntz, to Patzcuaro, where he founded a cathedral, the Seminary of San Nicolas, and another hospital of Santa Fe, like the one near Mexico. His exertions to gather the Indians in several large towns, and make each the centre of an industry, were very successful, and he was greatly beloved by his subjects. In 1547 he went to Spain on business, and was sent out by the emperor and council of the Indies to give advice regarding colonial questions. After his return to Mexico he assisted in 1555 in the first provincial council, and died on a pastoral visit in Uruapan. His body was buried in the cathedral of Patzcuaro. Besides several manuscripts on ecclesiastical affairs, he wrote "Doctrina para los Indios Chichimecas," in the Chichimec language (Mexico, 1568), and "Reglas y Ordenanzas para los Hospitales de Santa Fe" QUIROS, Azucena de l'incis Ret. Spanish missionary, b. in Andujar in 1666; d. in Mexico, Dec. 1672. After serving as attorney of the Inquisition in Seville, Cordova, and Granada, he went to South America, and was attached to the missions of Yucatan. He became afterward rector of the Jesuit college in the city of Mexico, and in 1611 was elected to the missions of New Spain, which office he held till his death. His efforts were always directed toward benefiting the country and developing its resources, and he also showed kindness to the Indians, prohibiting the imposition of heavy labor upon them in the missions under his jurisdiction, building schools, convents, and monasteries, and endeavoring to preserve the monuments of Aztec civilization. He wrote commentaries on different books of the Bible (Seville, 1632-38), and left in manuscript “Historia verdadera de la Conquista de Mexico,” which, it is said, discloses important facts that are not generally known. The latter is in the archives of Mexico.

QUITMAN, Frederick Henry, clergyman, b. in Westphalia, Aug. 17, 1809; d. in Rhinebeck, N. Y., July 8, 1858. He was born in Halle, where his father was a Protestant minister, and from which he was born was subsequently swept away by an extraordinary freshet. He received his classical and theological training at the University of Halle, and after its completion he spent two years as private tutor in the family of the Prince of Wolmirstedt. In the year 1781 he was ordained to the ministry by the Lutheran consistory of Amsterdam, and was sent as missionary to the Lutheran congregation on the island of Curacao in the West Indies. Here he remained until 1793, when the political disturbances, caused by the revolution of the negroes in the West Indies, influenced him to take his family to New York, with the intention of returning to Holland, where a life-pension awaited him. But during his stay in New York he ascertained the distressing needs of the Lutheran church in this country, and determined to remain. During the same year, therefore, he accepted a call from the united congregations at Schoharie and Cobleskill, N. Y., where he remained about two years. In 1798 he accepted a call from four congregations near Rhinebeck, N. Y. In 1805 he was elected pastor of the last two, and in 1825 as pastor of all the churches in that vicinity, named Rhinebeck, to which he now devoted all his time. In 1828 he was compelled to retire from all public duties. In 1814 he received from Harvard the degree of D. D. He held high offices in his church, and from 1816, the date of the founding of Hartwick seminary, he was at the head of its board of trustees, as long as the condition of his health permitted. He published a “Treatise on Magic” (Albany, N. Y., 1810); “Evangelical Catechism” (Hudson, N. Y., 1814); and “Sermons on the Reformation” (1817); and edited the “Rhymed Book of the Ministry of New York” (1817).—His son, John Anthony, soldier, b. in Rhinebeck, N. Y., Sept. 17, 1809; d. in Natchez, Miss., July 17, 1859, was killed by the Indians on the western frontier of the United States, at the age of 50, during the Mexican War. The inculcation always had been for the legal profession rather than the ministry, and during his student life he was an avid advocate of the doctrine of state rights and the leader of the extreme southern party. As early as 1851 he claimed for the states the right of secession and the immunity of the Federal government to demand or force the return of a seceding state, and suggested the propriety of organizing a southern confederacy. In 1851 he was appointed Major-General, U. S. A., and Governor of the State of Mississippi,” by J. F. H. Claiborne (New York, 1860).
RABAUD, Charles Heefor (rah-bohr), French administrator, b. in Dieppe in 1711; d. in Paris in 1764. He entered the colonial administration, held employments in Canada, Louisiana, and the Leeward and Windward islands, and from 1736 till his death was assistant colonial intendant of justice and police in Santo Domingo. While he was there he collected the materials for his "Recueil des lois, arrêtés et ordonnances royales, des arrêtés des cours supérieurs, et des modifications introduites par les cours de justice en appliquant la coutume du Paris, pour les colonies des îles du vent et sous le vent" (6 vols., Paris, 1761–5). This work is invaluable to the historian that studies the colonial administration under Louis XIV. and Louis XV., as the archives of the French colonies in the West Indies were for the most part scattered or lost during the colonial insurrections.

RABOURDIN, Henry Étienne (rah-boord-dan), French historian; b. in Cambrai in 1711; d. there in 1764. It is said that he was the natural son of a high dignitary of the church. He entered clerical life, was appointed abbot of a rich abbey, and afterward held the office of assistant deputy-keeper of the logs and charts in the navy department at Paris. His works include "Relation des voyages et découvertes des Français dans les deux Amériques" (4 vols., Paris, 1759); "Histoire de la découverte de l'Amérique" (2 vols., 1761); and "Les precurseurs de Christophe Colomb" in which the author contends that Columbus was not the discoverer of America (2 vols., 1764).

RABUN, William, statesman, b. in Halifax county, N. C., 8 April, 1771; d. at Powelton, Hancock co., Ga., 24 Oct., 1819. To this place his father had removed from North Carolina when he was a youth. The son was frequently elected to the legislature. In 1817 he was president of the state senate, and as such became ex-officio governor of the state on the resignation of Gov. Mitchell. In the following year he was elected to the same post by popular vote, and died in office. While he was governor he had a sharp correspondence with Gen. Andrew Jackson growing out of the Seminole war, then in progress. Gov. Rabun's devotion to the cause of liberty was shown by his prompt movements to pass by his fidelity as a civilian. While he was governor he performed the duties of chorister and clerk in the Baptist church at Powelton.

RACINE, Antoine, Canadian R. C. bishop, b. in Quebec, 26 Jan., 1822; d. 24 July, 1893. His ancestors came to Canada in 1638. One of them was Abraham Martin, who gave his name to the Plains of Abraham. Antoine received his early education from an uncle, who was pastor of a neighboring parish, and in 1834 entered the Petit séminaire of Quebec. He afterward studied theology in the Grand séminaire, and was ordained priest on 12 Sept., 1841, held various charges, took much interest in colonization, and put forward his views, with others, in a journal that he founded and called the "Canadien émigrant." He was transferred to the Church of St. John in Quebec in 1853. On 1 Sept., 1874, he was nominated first bishop of the newly created diocese of Sherbrooke, and he was consecrated by Archbishop Taschereau on 10 Oct. following. He took possession of his see two days afterward, and at once proceeded to erect an ecclesiastical college in his episcopal city, which he opened on 20 Aug., 1875, and dedicated to St. Charles Borromeo. This had become a flourishing institution under his patronage. Bishop Racine had also established several other religious, charitable, and educational institutions. His diocese contains 7 convents, a hospital, an asylum, 140 schools, 2 colleges, 62 priests, and a Roman Catholic population of more than 47,000.

RADA, Juan de (rah-dah), Spanish captain, b. in Navarre, in the latter half of the 15th century; d. in Janua, Peru, in 1542. In 1534 he went to Peru with the expedition of Pedro de Alvarado, and afterward served under the orders of Diego Almagro. He soon won the esteem of Almagro, was appointed mediator in the arrangement with Francisco Pizarro about the government of the province of New Toledo, and took part in the battle of Salinas. After Almagro's death, Rada took charge of his son, as tutor, and was the principal instigator of the plot against the Marquis Pizarro, and the leader of the eighteen men that penetrated into the governor's house on 28 June, 1541, and murdered him. Rada proclaimed the son of Almagro governor of Peru, and concentrated troops to attack the partisans of Pizarro in Cucuo, but died on the march in Janua.

RADCLIFFE, Thomas, Canadian soldier, b. in Castle Coote, County Roscommon, Ireland, 17 April, 1794; d. on Amherst island, Ontario, 6 June, 1841. He was the oldest son of the Rev. Thomas Radcliffe, rector of St. Paul's Episcopal church, Dublin, was educated at Trinity college in that city, and entered the army in 1811. He served as a lieutenant of the 27th regiment in the peninsular war, and saw service in the war with the United States, being present at the battle of Plattsburg. He was with the army of occupation in France, and on its reduction in 1816 was placed on the half-pay list. In 1822 he came to Upper Canada and settled in Adelaide, London district. He served during the rebellion of 1837, and commanded the troops that captured the schooner "Arno," which formed part of the expedition against Amherstburg. At the beginning of the trouble he raised a body of militia, to the command of which he was appointed by Sir John Colborne. After the suppression of the rebellion, Col. Radcliffe was a member of the legislative council in which he sat till his death.

RADDL, Giordano, was born on the island of Rhodes, Italy, 9 July, 1770; d. on the island of Rhodes, 6 Sept., 1829. He was apprenticed to a druggist, but obtained employment in the Museum of natural history of Florence. The grand duke, Ferdinand III., afterward became his protector, and in 1817 sent him to Brazil to study the cryptogams of the country. Raddi explored the basins of Orinoco and Amazon rivers, and formed a collection of plants and animals. In 1828 he was appointed a member of the commission that was charged with studying the Egyptian hieroglyphs under the direction of Champollion, but he was taken sick and died in Rhodes on his return to Florence. His works include "Crittogame Brasiliense" (2 vols., Florence, 1822); and "Plantarum Brasiliensis nova genera et species novae vel minus cognitae," in which he described 150 new species of ferns, etc. (1825). Leandro de Sacramento (q. v.) gave the name of Raddia Raddica to a cryptogamous plant, and Candolle has retained the name in his classification of the American flora.

Rademacher, Joseph (rah-deh-mah-ker), C. bishop, b. in St. Michael's seminary, 1810; d. in Fort Wayne, Ind., 12 Jan., 1909. He was graduated at St. Michael's seminary, was ordained priest in 1863, and stationed at Attica, Ind., at the same time attending several other missions. In 1869 he was transferred to the pastorate of the Church of St. Paul of the Cross, Columbia City, and in 1877 was appointed pastor of the Church of St. Mary, Fort Wayne, and shortly afterward chancellor of the diocese. His next post was that of pastor of St. Mary's church, Lafayette. His zeal and ability in these several places recommended him for promotion. He was transferred to the seeing of Nashville on 21 April, 1888, and consecrated bishop on 24 June following by Archbishop Feehan. After that time he worked earnestly and successfully for the advancement of his diocese, which on his departure contained 28 priests, 5 ecclesiastical schools, 39 churches, 2 orphan asylums, 15 female religious institutions, 5 parochial schools, 5 academies, and a college. He became bishop of Fort Wayne.

RADFORD, William, naval officer, b. in Findley, Va., 1 March, 1808; d. in Washington, D. C., 3 Jan., 1870. He became midshipman on 1 March, 1825, and lieutenant on 9 Feb., 1837. During the war with Mexico he served on the western coast of that country, and commanded the party that cut out the "Lone Star," a Mexican war vessel, at Matamoros in 1847. He was made commander on 14 Sept., 1855, assigned to the "Cumberland" in 1861, and became captain on 16 July, 1862, and commodore on 24 April, 1863. He served on court-martial duty at Fort Monroe, and commanded the "New Ironsides" and the iron-clad division of Admiral Porter's squadron at the two attacks on Fort Fisher, December 1864, and January, 1865. Admiral Porter wrote: "Com. Radford has shown ability of a very high order, not only in fighting and maneuvering his vessel, but in taking care of his division. His vessel did more execution than any other in the fleet, and I had so much confidence in the accuracy of his fire that even when our troops were on the parapet he was directed to clear the traverses of the enemy in advance of them. This he did most effectually, and but for this the victory might not have been ours." He was appointed rear-admiral on 25 July, 1866, commodore of the European squadron in 1869-70, and was retired on 1 March, 1870.

RADIGUET, Maximilien René (rah-le-gay), French explorer, born at Lorient, France, 16 Feb., 1816. After studying in the School of the fine arts at Paris, he became in 1838 secretary to Admiral Charles Baudin and Count de Las Casas, who had been sent to negotiate with the government of Hayti for the payment of an indemnity to the descendants of the French citizens that had been murdered during the troubles of 1798-1803. He was influential in bringing the negotiations to a speedy conclusion, preventing the impatient admiral several times from bombarding Cape Haytien. From 1841 till 1845 he was in South America and the Marquesas islands, as secretary to Admiral Du Petit-Thouars, and he has since devoted himself to literary labors. Among other works, he has published "Amerique Espagnole, Chili, Pérou, Brésil" (Paris, 1853). See "Narrative of an Expedition to the Shores of the Arctic Sea in 1854 and 1847." London, 1856.

RAE, John, explorer, b. in Chester House, Orkney, 30 Sept., 1813; d. in London, 24 July, 1863. Scott visited Chester, when travelling in the Orkney islands, to gain local information for writing "The Pirate." Mr. Rae studied medicine at the University of Edinburgh from 1829 till 1833, when he was graduated, entered the service of the Hudson bay company as surgeon, and lived at Moose fort from 1833 till 1845, making many explorations in British America. In 1846-7 he visited the Arctic sea, and spent the winter in a stone house at Repulse bay without fuel, during which time he traced about 635 statute miles of new land and coast forming the shores of Committee bay. In 1848 he accompanied Sir John Richardson in a search for Sir John Franklin along the coast from Mackenzie river to Coppermine river, and in 1850 was placed in charge of a similar expedition along the Hudson bay company. He chose the route by Great Bear lake and Coppermine river, tracing 690 miles of unexplored coast along the southern shores of Victoria and Wollaston lands, and finding two pieces of wood that were probably parts of Sir John Franklin's vessels. The Esquimaux gave no information regarding the party they had seen a few years before, and Dr. Rae explains in a pamphlet, published in London, that the reason he did not immediately search for his supposed countrymen was owing to his imperfect knowledge of their route, and to the condition of the lowlands flooded by melting snow, which rendered progress impossible. In 1853 the Hudson bay company fitted out a boat expedition at his request to complete the survey of the Arctic coast along the west shore of Boothia, and during this expedition to Repulse bay in 1855—6 he discovered a new river, which falls into Chesterfield inlet. In the following spring, after travelling 1,100 miles, he was the first discoverer of certain traces of Sir John Franklin's party, for which he was paid 410,000 by the English government. He pur chased from the Esquimaux numerous relics, among which were Sir John Franklin's cross of knighthood, a gold cap-band, silver spoons and forks, coin, and several watches. In 1856 he took charge of a survey for laying a cable between England and America, via Pâéro, Iceland, and Greenland, and, moreover, produced a telegraph survey from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast through the British territory, and crossing the Rocky mountains about latitude 53°. This line was not formed, as the Canada Pacific railway was laid in a more southern course, and the telegraph followed the railway. In 1852 he received the founder's gold medal of the Royal geographical society of London. He received the degree of L.H. D. from the University of Edinburgh, and that of M. D. from McGill college, Montreal, in 1880, and was also a member of the Natural history society of that city and of several distinguished societies. Dr. Rae was the author of a "Narrative of an Expedition to the Shores of the Arctic Sea in 1846 and 1847." London, 1856. See "Mr. Rae and the Report of Capt. McClintock." (New York, 1859).
lished anonymously numerous poems, which were collected and printed posthumously under the title of "The Atlantic Journal and Friend of Knowledge, a Cyclopaedic Journal and Review," of which only eight numbers appeared (1832-33). The number of genera and species that he introduced into his works produced great confusion. A gradual deterioration is found in Rafinesque's botanical writings from 1819 till 1830, when the passion for establishing new genera and species seems to have become a monomania with him. He most probably required the production of a new species, and five hundred to a thousand years for a new genus. It is said that he wrote a paper describing 'twelve new species of thunder and lightning.' In addition to translations and unfinished botanical and zoological works, he was the author of numerous books and pamphlets, including "Caractères de quelques noms génériques et nouveaux spécimen d'animales et plante de la Sicilia" (Palmiero, 1810); "Précis de découvertes et travaux sommologiques entre 1800 et 1814" (1814); "Principes fondamentaux de somiologie" (1814); "Analyse de la nature" (Palmiero, 1815); "Antikon Botanikon" (Philadelphia, 1813-40); "Ichthyologie Ophiiensis" (Lexington, 1820); "Ancient History, or Annals of Kentucky, or Eastern Indian Tribes, etc., of the United States" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1828-30); "American Manual of the Grape-Vines" (1830); "American Florist" (1832); "The American Nations, or the Outlines of a National History" (2 vols., 1836); "A Life of Travels and Researches in North America and South Europe" (1836); "New Flora and Botany of America." (4 parts, 1839); "Flora Telluriana" (4 parts, 1839); "Flora Telluriana of the World," a poem (1836); "Safe Banking" (1837); "Notes to Thomas Wright's "Original Theory, or New Hypothesis of the Universe" (1837); "Sylvia Telluriana" (1838); "Alzographia Americana" (1838); "The American Monuments of North and South America" (1839); "Genius and Spirit of the Hebrew Bible" (1828); "Celestial Wonders and Philosophy of the Visible Heavens" (1839); "The Pride and Duties of Wealth" (1840); and a "Dissertation on Water-Naques," published in the London "Literary Gazette" (1819). The Complete Writings of C. S. Rafinesque on Recent and Fossil Conchology have been edited by William G. Binney and George W. Tryon, Jr. (Philadelphia, 1864). See a review of the "Botanical Writings of Rafinesque," by A. S. Grays, in the "American Journal of Science" (1864).

RAF, or RAVN, Kari Christian (1758-1814), Danish archiologist, b. in Braehoborg, Funen island, 16 Jan., 1758; d. in Copenhagen, 20 Oct., 1814. His father, a man of education and refinement, cultivated a farm on his ancestral estate, and sent his son to Odense, and in 1814 to the University of Copenhagen, where he was graduated in jurisprudence and theology, and from the shipwrecked on the Long Island coast, and lost his valuable books, collections, manuscripts, and drawings. In 1818 he went to the west and became professor of botany in Transylvania university, Lexington, Ky. Subsequently he travelled and lectured in various places, endeavored to establish a magazine for botanical garden, but without success, and finally settled in Philadelphia, where he resided until his death, and where he published "The Atlantic Journal and Friend of Knowledge, a Cyclopaedic Journal and Review," of which only eight numbers appeared (1832-33). The number of genera and species that he introduced into his works produced great confusion. at Newport, which is represented in the illustration, he considered a relic of one of their colonies. Many honors were bestowed upon him. In 1828 he was made a knight of the order of Danebrog and also held the title of Esenheit, or state councillor, of his works, which number about 70 volumes, the best known is “Antiquitates Americanae” (1834), which has been translated into various languages. In this he holds that America was discovered by Norsemen in the 10th century, and within the 11th to the 14th century the North American coast had been partially colonized as far as Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and that the Vikings had been as far south as Florida. He gives an account of the discovery of the “Skalholt Saga,” a Latin manuscript dated 1117, found in the ruins of Skalholt college, which describes a voyage along the coast of North America south of Greenland (Massachusetts to a point where the explorers repaired their ships and then sailed northward until stopped by numerous falls, which they named Hvidsaer, and there buried the daughter of Snorri, who was killed by an arrow. The locality was supposed to be the Chesapeake bay, and the falls those of the Potomac river. His works include “Nordische Heldengeschichten” (3 vols., 1825–30); “Krakunam, seu Epidemic Rognarix Lodbroci, regis Danica” (1826); “Formaldir Sigur Nordlanda” (3 vols., 1829–30); “Faregínsa Saga” (1832); “Antiquitates Americanae” (1837); and “Grönlands Historiske Mindesmaerk,” in conjunction with Fria and Magnussen (1838–45).

RAGOZIN, Zenaide Alexeivna, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., April 4, 1812; d. there, 22 March, 1842. He was of French descent, received his education at the University of Pennsylvania, entered the counting-house of a merchant, and was sent as supercargo to Santo Domingo in 1804, where he spent four months. On his return he published “A Short Account of the Present State of Affairs in St. Domingo.” After a second voyage to that island in 1813, he published “An Account of a Remarkable Affair, in the Amistad, And The Slaves of That Name.” He was an active merchant, engaged in the slave trade, and was also a successful merchant. He was a member of the American oriental society, of the Société ethnologique, and of the Athenée oriental, and of the Victoria institute, London. Her most important writings are the volumes “The Story of Chaldea” (New York, 1886); “The Story of Assyria” (1887); and “The Story of Media, Babylonia, and Persia” (1888)—all in the “Story of the Nations” series. They form the first three volumes of a work on the ancient history of the East, more especially in its political and religious aspects, which will be complete in seven or eight volumes, and on which she is now (1898) engaged.

RAGUENEAU, Paul (rahn-no), missionary, b. in Paris, France, in 1698; d. there, 3 Sept., 1699. He was a Jesuit, and was sent to Canada in June, 1698. After his arrival he went to labor among the Hurons, by whom he was named “Aubadechée.” In 1640 he was sent by the French governor to treat with the Iroquois for the restoration of some French prisoners that they held; but, though he was well received, he did not succeed in his mission. He was superior of the missions in 1650, and in that capacity decided to bring such of the Hurons as had escaped the fury of the Iroquois to Quebec for safety. In 1657 he set out with another Jesuit and some French colonists for Onondaga, where large numbers had been converted. He was coldly treated, and, on his approaching the Onondagas for murdering some Hurons among them, a plot was formed to take his life and those of his companions. He escaped to the mission of St. Mary’s, but found that the Indians there had also become hostile, and succeeded, after much difficulty, in reaching Quebec. He continued among the Hurons up to September, 1666, when he returned to France, and acted as agent for the Canadian missions during the remainder of his life. His works are: “Vie de la Mère St. Augustine,” ed. from the manuscript of Quebec by the “Mission de la Nouvelle France” (Paris, 1672; Italian translation, Naples, 1752); “Relation de ce qui s’est passé de plus remarquable es missions des Pères de la Compagnie en la Nouvelle France,” covering the years 1645–52 and 1656–7 (7 vols., Paris, 1647–57). The second volume was translated into Latin under the title “Narratio historia” (1658). The fourth contains “Journées de Pere-Jacques-Ragueneau qu’il a fait pour la mission des Althamagneurs,” and letters from other Canadian missionaries. Ragueneau also wrote “Mémoires touchant les vertus des Pères de Noe, Jogues, Daniel, Brebeuf, Lallemant, Garnier, and Chabanel.”

RAGUET, Condy, merchant, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1812; d. there, 22 March, 1842. He was of French descent, received his education at the University of Pennsylvania, entered the counting-house of a merchant, and was sent as supercargo to Santo Domingo in 1804, where he spent four months. On his return he published “A Short Account of the Present State of Affairs in St. Domingo.” After a second voyage to that island in 1813, he published “An Account of a Remarkable Affair, in the Amistad, And The Slaves of That Name.” He was a most active merchant, engaged in the slave trade, and was also successful. During the war of 1812 he took an active part in the defense of the city, encamping with a regiment, of which he was colonel, near Wilmington, Del. After the war he studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Philadelphia in 1817. He was sent as consul in Rio Janeiro, and he was appointed charged d’affaires in 1825, and negotiated a treaty with Brazil. After his return to the United States in 1830 he edited several journals devoted to free-trade doctrines, and contributed largely to the “Port-Folio” and other periodicals upon this subject. He served in the legislature, was president of the chamber of commerce and other organizations, and was a member of the American philosophical society. In 1839 he received the degree of LL.D. from St. Mary’s college, Baltimore. He edited “The Free-Trade Advocate” (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1829); “The Examiner” (2 vols., 1834–35); and “The Financial Register” (2 vols., 1837–39); and was the author of “An Inquiry into the Causes of the Present State of the Circulating Medium of the United States” (Philadelphia, 1815); “The Principles of Free Trade” (1835); and a treatise “On Currency and Banking” (1839), which was republished in London (1837), and translated into French (Paris, 1840).

RAINEY, Joseph H., congressman, b. in Georgetown, S. C., June 3, 1842; d. there, 1 Aug., 1887. He was born a slave, but acquired a good education, principally by observation and travel. His father was a barber, and the son followed that occupation until 1862, when, after being forced to work on Confederate fortifications, he escaped to the West Indies, remaining there until the close of the war. He then returned to South Carolina, was elected a delegate to the State constitutional convention of 1868, and was a member of the state senate in 1870. He was elected a representative from South Carolina to congress, as a Republican, to fill the vacancy caused by the non-reception of Benjamin F. Whittemore, serving from 4 March, 1869, till 15 Aug., 1876. He took part in the debates of the Minnesota legislature, and was a member of the committee on freedmen's and Indian affairs. He was a conservative, and his political life was remarkably pure.

RAINS, Gabriel James, soldier, b. in Craven county, N. C., in June, 1803; d. in Aiken, S. C., 6 Sept., 1881. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1827, assigned to the infantry, and served in garrison and against hostile Indians till the Mexican war, being promoted captain on 23 Dec., 1837, and brevetted major, 28 April, 1840, for gallantry in the action with the Seminoles near Fort King, Fla., where he routed a superior force, and was twice severely wounded. One of his injuries was considered mortal, and several obituary notices of him were published. He was one of the first to be commissioned in the Mexican war, being one of the defenders of Fort Brown in May, 1846. When the demand for the surrender of this post was made by Gen. Ampudia, Capt. Rains gave the deciding vote against compliance with it in a council of officers. After the battle of Resaca de la Palma he was ordered to the United States on recruiting duty, and organized a large part of the recruits for Gen. Scott's campaign. He became major on 9 March, 1851, and from 1853 till the civil war was on the Pacific coast, where he made a reputation as a successful Indian fighter, and in 1855 was a brigadier-general of Washington territory volunteers. He was made lieutenant-colonel on 5 June, 1860, but resigned on 31 July, 1861, and joined the Confederate army, in which he was commissioned brigadier-general. He led a division at Wilson's Creek, did good service at Shiloh and Perryville, and after the battle of Seven Pines, where he was wounded, was highly commended by Gen. Daniel H. Hill for a rapid and successful flank movement that turned the tide of battle in favor of the Confederates. He was then placed in charge of the conscript and torpedo bureaus at Richmond, and was immediately ordered to Florida, where his efforts were there to protect the harbors of Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, and other places, and invented a subterranean shell, which was successfully used. At the close of the war Gen. Rains resided for some time at Augusta, Ga., but he afterward removed to Aiken, S. C. His death resulted from the wounds that he had received in Florida in 1863—the brother Gen. Pillow was killed in the same engagement. He was a lieutenant of the Washington iron-works and the Highland iron-works at Newburg, N. Y. He entered the Confederate army in 1861, was commissioned colonel, and was at once given the task of building and equipping a powder-mill. This he did under great difficulties, and created at Augusta, Ga., the Confederate powder-works, which were, at the close of the war, among the best in the world. He was promoted brigadier-general before 1865. Since 1865 he had been professor of chemistry and pharmacy in the medical department of the University of South Carolina, and was appointed a member of the faculty till 1884. Gen. Rains had obtained three patents for improvements in steam portable engines. He had published a treatise on "Steam Portable Engines" (Newburg, N. Y., 1860); "Rudimentary Course of Analytical and Applied Chemistry" (Augusta, Ga., 1872); "Chemical Qualitative Analysis" (New York, 1879); a pamphlet "History of the Confederate Powder-Works," which he read before the Confederate survivors' association (Augusta, 1882), and numerous essays. Gabriel James's son, Sevier McClelan, soldier, b. in 1851, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1876, and killed in the action of Craig's Mountain, Idaho, with hostile Indians, 3 July, 1877.

RAINS, James Edward, soldier, b. in Nashville, Tenn., 1809; d. at Newburg, Ind., 31 Dec., 1862. After graduation at Yale in 1834 he studied law, was city attorney of Nashville in 1848, and attorney-general for his judicial district in 1849. He was a Whig, and in 1857 edited the "Daily Republican Banner." In April, 1860, he entered the Confederate army as a private, was appointed lieutenant-colonel, and made commandant of a garrison of two regiments at Cumberland gap. In 1862 he was commissioned brigadier-general. While ordering a charge at the battle of Stone river, 31 Dec., 1862, he received a bullet through his heart.

RAINS, John, pioneer, b. near New river, Va., about 1750; d. in Nashville, Tenn., in 1821. In June, 1783, he was one of a party of hunters that penetrated as far west as Cumberland river, and returned with such glowing accounts of the country as greatly aided James Robertson in forming a colony for its settlement. The colony, numbering about 300, among whom were Rains and his family, arrived at the present site of Nashville in December, 1779. Rains had singular skill in woodcraft, and such prowess as an Indian fighter as to be generally given command in the many expeditions it was necessary to undertake against the savages, who continually harassed the settlement. He had an intense love of the woods, and no great regard for the refinements of civilized society. His definition of political freedom was a state wherein every man did as he pleased, without encroaching upon the rights of his neighbor. Physicians and attorneys he considered the most degraded of society. He once said: "All was health and harmony among us till the doctors came bringing diseases and the lawyers sowing dissensions; and we have had nothing but death and the devil ever since."

RAINSFORD, William Stephen, clergyman, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 30 Oct., 1850. His early education and training were obtained under tutors at home. He was graduated at the United college, Cambridge, England, in 1872, ordained deacon in 1872 by the bishop of Norwich, and priest in 1875 by the same bishop. He was curate of St. Giles's church, Norwich, in 1872-76, went to Canada in 1877, and was assistant rector of St. James's cathedral, Toronto, in 1878-82. In 1883 he was called to the rectoryship of St. George's, New York city, of which he is present incumbent, and is also chaplain of the 31st regiment National guard. He received the degree of D. D. from Trinity in 1587. Dr. Rainesford, besides contributions to current literature, has published a volume of parochial "Sermons" (New York, 1887).

RALEGH, Sir Walter, English navigator, b. in Hayes, in the parish of Budleigh, Devonshire, England, in 1552; d. in Westminster, England, 29 Oct., 1618. His patronymic was written in thirteen different ways, but Sir Walter himself spelled it Raleigh. Little is known of his father, Walter, except that he was a gentleman commoner, and that an earnest wayside remonstrance from him with the Raleghs is extant of the west in 1544 caused his imprisonment for three days, and threats of hanging when he was liberated. His mother was the daughter of Sir Philip Champernowne, of Modbury, and the ward of Otto Gilbert, by whom she was the mother of Sir John, of whom Sir Humphrey, and Sir Adrian Gilbert. Walter became a commoner at Oriel, Oxford, in 1568, and probably attended the University of France in 1569, but left the same year to join a troop that was raised under the Prince de Conde and Admiral Coligny in aid of the French Huguenots. Subsequently, according to most authorities, he served in the Netherlands under William of Orange, and became an accomplished soldier and a determined foe to Roman Catholicism and the Spanish nation. On his return to England he found that his half-brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, had just obtained a patent for establishing a plantation in America, and he entered into the scheme. They went to sea in 1578, but one of their ships was lost, and the rest returning, it is said, were crippled in an engagement with the Spanish fleet, and they returned without making land. Raleigh then served as captain against the Desmond rebellion in Ireland, and won the commendation of his superiors by his bravery and executive ability. On his return, according to the popular legend, he met Queen Elizabeth one day as she was walking in the forest, and, on her approach to a mire place in her path, took off his mantle and laid it down for her to tread upon. The queen, who was susceptible to gallant attention, at once admitted him to court, loaded him with favors, and employed him to attend the French ambassador, Simier, on his return to France, and afterward to escort the Duke of Anjou to Antwerp. A contemporary writer says: "He possessed a good presence in a handsome, well-compacted body, strong natural wit and better judgment, a bold and plausible tongue, the fancy of a poet and the chivalry of a soldier, and was unrivaled in splendor of dress and equipage. He soon used his influence to promote a second expedition to America, but was prevented by an accident from going in person, and left the command of the fleet to Sir Humphrey Gilbert (q. v.), who was lost on the homeward voyage. Raleigh then obtained a new charter in 1584, with power to land colonies "in any remote, heathen, and barbarous lands not actually possessed by any Christian prince or people," and secured the provision that such colonists were "to have all the privileges of free denizens and natives of England, and were to be governed according to such statutes as should by them be established, so that the said statutes or laws conform as conveniently as may be with those of England, and do not impair the Queen's faith or way with draw the people of those lands from our allegiance." These guarantees of political rights were renewed in the subsequent charter of 1606, under which the English colonies were planted in America, and constituted one of the impregnable grounds upon which they afterward maintained the struggle that ensued in separation from Great Britain. This enterprise of Raleigh's was participated in by Sir John White, who, on 9 April, 1584, sent a fleet of seven ships in command of his cousin, Sir Richard Grenville, and in immediate charge of Sir Ralph Lane (q. v.), who soon quarreled with Grenville. The latter, after landing the colony at Roanoke island in July, sailed for England on 25 Aug., promising to return the next Easter to prosecute his misfortunes befell the colonists; they became disheartened, and in July, 1586, desiring of Grenville's return, went to England in one of Sir Francis Drake's vessels, that commander having passed the settlement on his way from his expedition against Santo Domingo, Carthagena, and St. Augustine. The fruit of this settlement was little more than that of the colony that the country by Thomas Harriot: illustrations in water-colors by the artist, John White, of its inhabitants, products, animals, and birds; and the introduction into Great Britain of tobacco and potatoes, the latter being first planted in Ireland on Raleigh's estate. Soon after the departure of the colonists with Lane, a ship arrived with supplies from Raleigh, and a few days afterward Grenville returned to Roanoke island with three ships, well provisioned, but, finding that the colonists had all left, went back to England, leaving fifteen men and supplies sufficient to last them two years. Meanwhile Raleigh had been appointed seneschal of Devon and Cornwall, and lord warden of the stannaries, and had obtained a grant of 12,000 acres of unfortified land in Ireland. His favor in court continued to increase, but he was hated by a large faction. He now determined to found an agricultural state, and in April, 1587, despatched a body of emigrants to make a settlement on Chesapeake bay. He granted them a charter of incorporation and appointed a municipal government for the city of Raleigh, instructing the administration to John White, with twelve assistants. They founded their city, not on the bay, but on the site of the former settlement on Roanoke island, and when their ships returned, Gov. White went home to hasten reinforcements. But the fleet that Raleigh fitted out for the colony's relief was impressed by the government for the war with Spain. While, with Raleigh's aid, subsequently succeeded in sailing with two vessels that fell into the hands of the Spaniards, and he was able to send no relief till 1590, when he arrived, on 13 Aug., to find that all the colonists had disappeared. It was discovered years afterward that four men, two boys, and a girl had been adopted into the Hatterers tribe of Indians. The rest had been starved or massacred. Raleigh had spent £40,000 in his efforts to colonize Virginia. Unable to do more, he therefore leased his patent to a company of merchants, with the hope of achieving his object; but he was disappointed. He made a fifth attempt to afford his lost colony aid in 1602 by sending Capt. Samuel Mace to search for them; but Mace returned without executing his orders. Raleigh wrote to Sir Robert Cecil on 21 Aug., 1602, that he would send Mace back, and expressed his faith in the colonization of Virginia in the words, "I shall yet live to see it an English nation." Although the colonists perished, Raleigh secured North America to the English through his enterprise, made known the advantages of its soil and climate, fixed Chesapeake bay as the proper place for a colony, and created a spirit that led finally to its successful settlement. He was a member of the council of war and lieutenant-general and commander of the forces of Cornwall in 1587, and the next year, when the armada appeared, hung upon its rear in a vessel of his own, and annoyed it by quick and unexpected movements.

He was with Sir Francis Drake in his expedition to restore Don Antonio to the throne of Portugal in 1589, and captured several Spanish vessels. On his return, he visited Ireland, and contracted a friendship with Edmund Spenser, whom he brought to England and introduced to Elizabeth, with the gift of the first three books of the "Faerie Queen." In the hope of shattering the Spanish power in the West Indies, he then collected a fleet of thirteen vessels, for the most part at his own expense, and captured the largest Spanish prize that had been brought to England. In 1591 he offended Elizabeth by his marriage with her maid of honor, Elizabeth Tirogmonton, and was imprisoned for several months, and banished from court. But he spent his time in the Tower in planning another expedition to Guiana, and the next year sent out one Jacob Whiddon to examine the coast near Orinoco river. After receiving Whiddon's report, Raleigh, with a squadron of five ships, sailed on 9 Feb., 1595. When he arrived at the end of March he captured the Spanish town of St. Joseph, and subsequently made a perils voyage up the Orinoco. When he returned the same year, he published an account of his voyage in his "Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana" (London, 1596), in which he related all the wonderful things he had heard from the Spaniards and natives, including El Dorado, the Amazons, the Cannibals, a tribe that had eyes in their shoulders and mouths in their breasts. His book was read eagerly, and, besides these childish stories, is full of valuable information. After his co-operation in the capture of Cadiz he was restored to Elizabeth's favor, and in 1597 went on an expedition under the Earl of Essex against the Azores, but quarreled with the latter and returned. He was made governor of Jersey in 1600, but, having been accused of an agency in the death of Essex, which event was soon followed by the death of Elizabeth, he fell into disfavor, and, on the accession of James I., was stripped of his preferments, forbidden the royal presence, and charged with a plot to place Lady Arabella Stuart on the throne. His estates were confiscated, and he was sentenced to be beheaded, but was reprieved, and passed the thirteen subsequent years in the Tower. During his imprisonment he composed his "History of the World" (London, 1614), which was superior in style and manner to any of the English historical compositions that had preceded it. Raleigh was liberated in 1615, but not pardoned. He then obtained from James a commission as admiral of the fleet, with ample privileges and fourteen ships, and in November, 1617, reached Guiana. His force consisted of 451 men, and he was accompanied by his son Walter and Capt. Lawrence Keymis. Raleigh was too ill with a fever to join the expedition, but sent Keymis and young Walter with 230 men in boats up the Orinoco. They landed at the Spanish settlement of St. Thomas, and, in defiance of the peaceable instructions of James, killed the governor and set fire to the town. Young Walter was killed in the action. Unable either to advance or maintain their position, the British retreated to the ships. Keymis, reprieved with his ill success, committed suicide, many of the sailors mutinied, the ships scattered, and Raleigh landed in Plymouth, 16 June, 1618, broken in fortune and reputation. He was arrested and committed to the Tower, on the charge of having, without authority, attacked the Spanish settlement of St. Thomas. He failed in an attempt to escape to France by feigning madness, and it was subsequently decided to execute him on his former sentence. He was beheaded in the old parish-yard at London, in the presence of the king. His courage, dauntless courage and varied accomplishments. His knowledge of the principles of political economy were far in advance of his age. Among his other literary ventures he founded the Mermaid club. The city of Raleigh, N. C., is named in his honor. The illustration represents his birthplace, Hayes farm. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote many poems of which the most noted of those attributed to him being: "The Soul's Errand." His "Remains" were published by his grandson, Sir Philip Raleigh (London, 1661); his "Miscellanies," with a new account of his life, by Thomas Burch (1748); his collected poems by Sir Edward Bridges (1814); and his complete works, with his life, by William Olythe (8 vol. 1 Oxford, 1829). Numerous works have been written of him, of which the most reliable are those by Arthur Cayley (2 vols., London, 1805-6); Mrs. A. T. Thompson (1830); Patrick Fraser Tytler (1833); Robert Southey (1837); Sir Robert Schomberg, added to his "Voyages to Guiana" (1847); Edward Edwards, with a full collection of Raleigh's letters (2 vols., 1883); John A. St. John (1883); Increase M. Taboox (1884); and Edmund W. Goss, in the "English Worthies Series" (1886).
RAIL, or RAIL, Johan Gottlieb, Russian soldier, b. in Hesse-Cassel, about 1720; d. in Trenton, N. J., 26 Dec., 1776. He served during the seven-years' war in Europe, and with his regiment formed part of the contingent that was hired from the elector of Hesse-Cassel by George III., for service in this country. He participated in the battle of White Plains, and in the capture of Fort Washington, in which he rendered valuable service, and after the evacuation of New Jersey by the patriot army commanded an advanced post at Trenton, where he was surprised and killed in Washington's attack on that town.

RALPH, James, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., about 1685; d. in Chiswick, England, 23 Jan., 1762. He was clerk to a conveyancer in Philadelphia, and about 1718 became the intimate associate of Benjamin Franklin, who describes him as his "inseparable companion, guided in his manners, ingenious, extremely eloquent, and I never knew a prettier talker." He accompanied Franklin to London in 1724, deserting his wife and child for his friend, and, being without money, lived at Franklin's expense. He afterward attempted to become a actor, and subsequently to edit and write for newspapers, but with little success. He then settled as a school-master in Berkshire, secured the notice of Lord Melcombe, and obtained much notoriety as an adherent of the Prince of Wales's faction, employing his talents as pamphleteer, poet, and political journalist in the interest of that party. Toward the close of Sir Robert Walpole's administration he was bought off from the opposition, and at the accession of George III., received a post as a receiver of livery in London, which he held for more than six months. Franklin says he "did his best to dissuade Ralph from attempting to become a poet, but he was not cured of scribbling verses till Pope attacked him in the lines in the 'Dunciad,' beginning:"

"Silence, ye wolves, while Ralph to Cynthia howls, And makes night hideous; answer him, ye crows.
He published "The Muses' Address to the King," an ode (London, 1729); "The Tempest" (1729); "The Touchstone," a volume of essays (1728); "Clarinda," a poem (1729); "Zemina," a poem (1729); "A Taste of the Town, a Guide to all Publick Invention Answered" (1730); "The Fashionable Lady," a comedy (1730); "The Fall of the King," a tragedy (1730); "The History of the Publick Buildings of London" (1734); "The Greens of Germany," a political pamphlet, of which 15,000 copies were sold at once (1734); "The Use and Abuse of Parliament" (2 vols., 1744); the "History of England during the Reigns of King William, Queen Anne, and George I.," which Charles James Fox disdained, and is a work of great importance (1743); "The Cause of Authors by Professor" (1758); "The History of Prince Titus" (Frederick, Prince of Wales), in manuscript, never published, by some ascribed to him; and many dramatic works, pamphlets, and essays.

RALSTON, Robert, merchant, b. in Little Brandywine, Pa., in 1701; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1782. He was a merchant and a man of great influence (1744). "The Cause of Authors by Professor" (1758); "The History of Prince Titus" (Frederick, Prince of Wales), in manuscript, never published, by some ascribed to him; and many dramatic works, pamphlets, and essays.

RALSTON, Samuel, clergyman, b. in County Down, Ireland, in 1756; d. in Carroll, Pa., 25 Sept., 1851. He was educated at the University of Glasgow, came to this country in 1780, and took charge of the Presbyterian congregations of Mingo Creek and Williamsport, Pa., from 1796 until his death. Washington college, Pa., gave him the degree of D. D. in 1822. His writings are controversial for the most part, and include "The Curry Comb" (Philadelphia, 1805); "Baptism, a Review of Alexander Campbell's and Dr. Walker's Defence" (1820); "A Defence of the Prophecies of Daniel and John" (1843); "The Seven Last Plagues" (1842); and "Defence of Evangelical Psalmody" (1844).

RALSTON, Thomas Neely, clergyman, b. in Kentucky in 1806; d. in Newport, Ky., 25 Nov., 1891. He was educated at Georgetown college, joined the state conference of the Methodist church in 1827, and was its secretary for twelve years. He was a member of the convention that met in Louisville, Ky., in 1845, to organize the Methodist Episcopal church, south, and secretary of that body in 1850, subsequently becoming chairman of the committee to revise the discipline of the church. He was president of the Methodist female college of N. C., and in 1851 edited the "Methodist Monthly." Wesleyan university, Florence, Ky., gave him the degree of D. D. in 1857. His publications include "Elements of Divinity" (Louisville, Ky., 1847); "Evidences, Morals, and Institutions of Christianity" (Nashville, Tenn., 1870); "Ecce Unica, a Plea for Christian Unity" (Cincinnati, 1870); and "Ecce Unica, a Plea for Christian Unity." He was a member of the convention that met in Louisville, Ky., in 1845, to organize the Methodist Episcopal church, south, and secretary of that body in 1850, subsequently becoming chairman of the committee to revise the discipline of the church. RAMET, Nicolas (rah-may), French philologist, b. in the county of Soissons in 1757; d. in Paris, Jan. 29, 1821. He was sent in 1772 to the West Indies, Guiana, Louisiana, and several parts of South America, and was a shareholder of the Mississippi company, and an advocate of colonial extension. His works include "Traité d'une politique coloniale" (Utrecht, 1712); "Études sur l'origine et la formation de la langue Caribbe" (1716); "Mon Histoire des voyages du systéme financier du Lurs" (Amsterdam, 1721); "Formations grammaticales et phonétiques des dialectes Indiens" (2 vols., 1723); "Dictionnaire de la langue Tapi" (1726); and "Analogie entre les langues Indiennes de l'Amérique du Sud et les langues Celtiques."

RAMIREZ, Alejandro (rah-me'-reth), Cuban financier, b. in Alagosa, Valladolid, in 1777; d. in Havana, Cuba, in 1821. When he was fifteen years old he entered in the service of the government at Alcala de Henares. In 1794 he went to Guatemala, where he was employed in the department of finance, and became its superintendent. In this capacity he made many important reforms, improved the means of communication in the country, introduced the cultivation of several useful plants, and founded a public library. He was appointed in 1813 superintendent of the finances of Porto Rico, where one of his first measures was to open the ports of the island to foreign commerce. He founded a board of commerce, a board of agriculture, a literary and scientific society, and many public schools, and gave a great impulse to the development and progress of the island. In 1816 he was promoted superintendent of the finances of Cuba, where he founded the cities of Guantanamo, Sagua, Nuevas, and Mariel. A census of the population and resources of the island was taken, and the tobacco monopoly was abolished. He established at Havana a botanical garden, an anatomical museum, a free academy of drawing, and numerous public schools, and promoted the development of the commerce, agriculture, and industries of the island. He was one of the best and most honest officers that was ever sent by Spain to her colonies in America, and his memory is held in high esteem throughout the island. His portrait hangs in the reception-room of the Sociedad Economica, whose president he was, and it has been proposed to erect his statue in his native city.

RAMIREZ, Francisco, R. C. bishop, b. in Mexico in 1823; d. in Brazos Santiago, Texas, 18 July, 1869. He entered the priesthood, and in the revolution of 1857 sided with the clerical party in opposing Benito Juarez. He gained the regard and confidence of the French during the occupation of Mexico, and through the influence of the archbishop of Mexico he was created bishop of Caradro and vicar-apostolic of Tamaulipas. During the empire he was attached to the court, and was appointed by Maximilian to be his almoner and a member of the imperial cabinet and council. On the fall of the empire he escaped to Texas, where he lived in great obscurity and poverty.

RAMIREZ, Ignacio, called El Negromante, Mexican novelist, born in Guanajuato, Mexico, 23 June, 1818; d. in Mexico, 15 June, 1870. He was of pure Aztec blood. He began his studies in Queretaro, and finished them in the College of San Gregorio in Mexico, where he was graduated in law in 1841. In 1846 he founded the paper "Don Simplicio," and began to publish a series of philosophical articles, under the pen-name of "El Negromante," and many satirical poems, in which he very critically criticized the government of Gen. Paredes, that his paper was suppressed and he was imprisoned. When the federal system was established in the same year, Ramirez was appointed to the governor of the state of Mexico, reorganized the administration, and during the American invasion equipped and organized the state troops, taking part in the battle of Puebla.

After the revolution, he was appointed professor of law in the Law School of Mexico, and at the same time gave lectures on literature and philosophy; but his liberal ideas alarmed the Conservatives, and he was removed. In 1851 he was elected deputy to congress by the state of Sinaloa, and in the next year he was appointed government secretary of that state, where he introduced many reforms. The revolution of the same year caused him to emigrate to Lower California, where he discovered rich pearl-oyster banks. In 1853 he was called by Sanchez Solis to his newly founded college in Mexico, where he opened a course of philosophy that attracted students by the thousand, but fell under the suspicion of the dictator, Santa-Anna, who imprisoned Ramirez. After the fall of Santa-Anna, Ramirez was returning to Sinaloa, when he met Gen. Ignacio Composto, who appealed to him for his general support, but when he saw that Composto was separating from the Liberals, Ramirez, being elected deputy for Sinaloa, joined the opposition. After the dissolution of congress by Composto, which he disapproved, he was persecuted, and on his flight to Sinaloa he was captured, carried to Queretaro, and was committed to death; but the sentence was commuted, and after long imprisonment he was liberated. He joined Juarez immediately in Vera Cruz, and was sent to the northwestern states to prepare for the triumph of the Reform measures. After the overthrow of Miramon at Calpulalpan, Ramirez returned to Mexico with Juarez, was appointed minister of justice, instruction, and public works, and as such executed the law of 5 Feb., 1861, dissolving the monastic orders, hastened the building of the Vera Cruz railroad, reformed the law of mortgages, founded the National library, and saved the valuable paintings that existed in the convents, forming a gallery in the Academy of San Carlos. After accomplishing these reforms he resigned, and when the Republican government abandoned the capital before the invading French army, he went to Sinaloa and afterward to Sosiana, where he was taken prisoner by the Federalists. A law of 3 Oct., 1865, was promulgated. Ramirez returned to Sinaloa to defend in the courts-martial the guerrillas that had been captured by the French; but he was soon banished, and went to San Francisco, Cal. Returning afterward to Mexico, he was imprisoned by the imperial government in San Juan De Ulua, and banished to Para. After the re-establishment of the republic, he was appointed judge of the supreme court, and for some years was associate editor of "El Correo de Mexico." After his re-election as judge in 1874, he sided with Iglesias and other judges against Lando de Tejada, and was imprisoned in November, 1876; but after the battle of Teoaco he was liberated, and appointed by President Diaz, secretary of justice, instruction, and public works. He was appointed judge in May, 1877, and returned to the supreme court, where he served until his death. His many literary works were never collected, but his "Proyecto de enseñanza primaria," written in 1873, was published by the governor of Chihuahua, Carlos Pacheco (1884).

RAMIREZ DE QUINONES, Pedro, b. in Spain late in the 15th century; d. at Lima, Peru, about 1570. When the audiencia of Cofines, or Central America, was created in 1542, Ramirez was appointed judge, and took possession of his office in connection with the British General Pedro de la Gasca (c. r.) arrived at Santa Marta. Ramirez was commissioned by the audience to carry him a renouncement of 200 men, and took part in the battle of Naquixaguamu. He returned to Guatemala in 1549, went to Spain in 1554, and on his return to Guatemala was elected by royal decree to subdue the rebellious Indians of Patechuan and Lencan, which he accomplished in three months devoted to the purpose. For his services, in 1555 he was elected president of the Council, and later he was promoted to Lima, where he died.

Ramos Arizpe, Miguel (rah'-mos-ah-rith'-pay), Mexican statesman, b. in San Nicolas (now Ramos Arizpe), Coahulla, 15 Feb., 1775; d. in Mexico, 28 April, 1843. He studied in the Seminary of Monterey and the College of Guadalajara, where he was graduated in law, and began to practise his profession, but later he entered the church, and was ordained in 1803 by the bishop of Monterey, who made him his chaplain. Soon he was appointed professor of civil and canonical law in the Seminary of Monterey, and afterward he became vicar-general and ecclesiastical judge of several parishes in the states of Chihuahua and Coahuila. He returned to Guadalajara, and was graduated as doctor in theology and canonical law, and made a canon of the cathedral. He was elected in September, 1810, deputy to the cortes of Cadiz, took his seat in March, 1811, and labored to prepare for the independence of his country; but when the constitution was abrogated by the returning king, 1813, and Ramirez refused the honors offered him to renounce his principles, he was imprisoned. When the constitution was re-established in 1820, he regained his liberty, took his seat again in the cortes, and was appointed in 1821 preacher of the cathedral of Mexico. In the next year he returned to his country, was elected to the constituent congress, and formed part of the commission that modelled the Federal constitution of 1824. In November, 1825, he was called by President Guadalupe Victoria to his cabinet as secretary of justice and ecclesiastical affairs, which place he occupied till March, 1828. In 1830 he was sent as minister to Chili, and on his return in 1831 he was appointed dean of the cathedral of Mexico. When President Mexican Hernandez took refuge in the capital, the reactionary government, taking advantage of the absence of the emperor, in December, 1832, he made Ramos Arizpe secretary of justice, which portfolio he also held under Valentin Gomez Farins till August, 1835. In 1841 he was a member of the government council, and in 1842 he was deputy to the constituent congress, which was dissolved by President Nicholas Bravo. He was afterward a member of the junta de defensa, but failing health forced him to retire, and soon afterward he died.

Ramsay, David, b. in Lancaster county, Pa., 2 April, 1749; d. in Charleston, S. C., 8 May, 1813. He was graduated at Princeton in 1765, at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1775, meanwhile teaching for several years. Settling in Charleston, he soon acquired celebrity as a physician, and also was active with his pen in behalf of colonial rights. At the beginning of the Revolutionary war he took the field as a surgeon, and served during the siege of Savannah. He was an active member of the South Carolina legislature in 1776-83, and a member of the council of safety, in which capacity he became so obnoxious to the British government that he was compelled to leave Charleston in May, 1780, when he was included among the forty inhabitants of that place that were held in close confinement at St. Augustine for eleven months as hostages. Dr. Ramsay was a delegate to the Continental congress in 1782-8, long a member of the South Carolina senate, and its president for seven years. His death was the result of wounds that he received from the pistol of a maniac, concerning whose mental unsoundness he had testified. In the progress of the Revolution, Doctor Ramsay collected materials for its history, and his great impartiality, his fine memory, and his acquaintance with many of the actors in the contest, eminently qualified him for the task. His occasional papers relating to the times had a considerable influence, notably these: a "Sermon on Tea," from the text "Touch not, taste not, handle not;" and an "Oration on American Independence" (1778). His other works include "History of the Revolution of South Carolina from a British Province to an Independent State" (1780); "History of the American Revolution" (Philadelphia, 1789); "On the Means of Preserving Health in Charleston and its Vicinity" (Charleston, 1790); "Review of the Improvements, Progress, and State of Medicine in the Eighteenth Century" (1802); "Life of George Washington" (New York, 1805); "History of South Carolina from its Settlement in 1670 to the Year 1808" (Charleston, 1809); "Memoirs of Mrs. Martha Laurens Ramsay, with Extracts from her Diary" (1811); "Eulogy on Dr. Benjamin Rush" (Philadelphia, 1816); "History of the United States, 1607-1808," continued to the treaty of Ghent by Samuel S. Smith and others (Philadelphia, 1816-17), forming the first three volumes of "Universal History Americanized," or an Historical View of the World collected from the earliest records to the Nineteenth Century, with a Particular Reference to the State of Society, Literature, Religion, and Form of Government of the United States of America" (12 vols., 1819). Dr. Ramsay married, first, Frances, a daughter of John Witherspoon; and then Martha, daughter of Henry Laurens.—His second wife, Martha Laurens, b. in Charleston, S. C., 3 Nov., 1766; d. there, 10 June, 1811, accompanied her father, Henry Laurens, on his missions abroad, and spent ten years of her early life in England and France. While Mr. Laurens was minister at Paris he presented his daughter with 500 guineas, with part of which she purchased 100 French testaments and distributed them among the destitute of Vigen and its vicinity, and with the rest she established a school. In 1858 she returned to Charleston, and in 1875 she married Dr. Ramsay. Subsequently she assisted her husband in his literary work, and prepared her son for college. See "Memoirs of Mrs. Martha Laurens Ramsay, with Extracts from her Diary" by her husband (Charleston, 1811).—Dr. Ramsay's brother, Nathaniel, b. in Lancaster county, Pa., 1 May, 1751; d. in Baltimore, Md., 23 Oct., 1817, was graduated at Princeton in 1767, and, after studying law, was admitted in 1771 to the Maryland bar. In 1775 he was a delegate from his county to the Maryland convention, and contributed actively in the American cause, becoming in 1776 captain in the first battalion that was raised in the state. He reached the army in time to take part in the battle of Long Island, and continued under Washington, attaining the rank of lieutenant-colonel commandant of the 3d regiment of the Maryland line. When Gen. Charles Lee's command retired before the British troops, Monongahela, in 1779, Col. Charles Stewart and Col. Ramsay, and, taking the latter by the hand, said: "I shall depend on your immediate exertions to check with your two regiments the progress of the enemy till I can form the main army." Col. Ramsay maintained the ground he had taken till he was left without troops.

In this situation he engaged in single combat with some British dragons, and was cut down and left for dead on the field. This important service arrested the progress of the British army, and gave time to the commander-in-chief to bring up and assign proper positions to the main army. Col. Ramsay was then captured, and subsequently saw no active service. A long period was passed on parole or in imprisonment, and when exchange brought release he found the vacancy had been filled. After the war he resumed the practice of his profession, and represented Maryland in congress during 1786-7. He was made marshal of the district of Maryland in 1790, and again in 1794, in addition to which he received the appointment of naval officer for the district of Baltimore in 1794, which he held during five admiral administrations.

Ramsay, George Douglas, soldier, b. in Dunfries, Va., 21 Feb., 1802; d. in Washington, D. C., 23 May, 1882. His father, a merchant of Alexandria, Va., removed to Washington early in the 19th century. The son was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1829, assigned to the artillery, and served on garrison and topographical duty till 25 Feb., 1833, when he was made captain of ordnance. He then had charge of various arsenals till the Mexican war, when he was engaged at Monterey and brevetted major for gallantry there. He was chief of ordnance of Gen. Taylor's army in 1847-8, and again commanded arsenals till 1863, when he was a member of the ordnance board. He was made lieutenant-colonel, 3 Aug., 1861, and in charge of Washington arsenal from that time till 1863. On 13 Sept., 1861, he was made chief of ordnance of the U. S. army with the rank of brigadier-general, and he was at the head of the ordnance bureau in Washington till 12 Sept., 1864, when he was retired from active service, being over sixty-two years of age. He continued to serve as inspector of arsenals till 1866, then in command of the arsenal at Washington till 1870, and afterward as member of the ordnance board. He was brevetted major-general, U. S. army, 13 March, 1865, "for long and faithful services." Gen. Ramsay was an active member of the Protestant Episcopal church, and for many years served as senior warden of St. John's church, Washington.—His son, Francis Monroe, naval officer, b. in the District of Columbia, 5 April, 1856, entered the navy as a midshipman, and served on the same board. In 1862, he was made lieutenant-commander, and participated in the engagements at Haines's bluff, Yazoo river, 30 April and 1 May, 1863, in the expedition up the Yazoo river, destroying the Confederate navy-yard and vessels, and in the fight at Liverpool's landing. He commanded a battery of three heavy guns in front of Vicksburg from 19 June till 4 July, 1863, and the 3d division of the Mississippi squadron from the latter date till September, 1864. He was in charge of the expedition up Black and Ochlockonee rivers in 1864, and of that into Atchafalaya river in June of that year, and engaged the enemy at Simmsport, La. He commanded the gun-boat "Unadilla," of the North Atlantic squadron, in 1864-5, participated in the attacks on Fort Fisher, for which he was commended in the official report for "skill, conduct, judgment, and bravery," and in the several engagements with Fort Anderson and other forts on Cape Fear river. He became commander in 1866, fleet-captain and chief of staff of the South Atlantic squadron in 1867-9, captain in 1877, and was in command of the torpedostation in 1878-80. He was superintendent of the U. S. naval academy, commanded the "Boston," was promoted commodore in 1889, rear-admiral in 1894, and died in 1897.

Ramsay, Thomas Kennedy, Canadian jurist, b. in Ayr, Scotland, 2 Sept., 1826; d. in St. Hugues, Quebec, 23 Dec., 1886. He was educated at St. Andrews, came to Canada early in life, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1852. He received the degree of M. A. from Lennanxvile university in 1856, was secretary of the commission for codifying the laws in 1867, and was appointed judge of the supreme court of Quebec in 1870, and puisne judge of the court of queen's bench in 1873. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the Dominion parliament in 1867. Judge Ramsay founded the "Lower Canada Jurist," and early in his career was editor of the "Journal de jurisprudence" of Montreal. He is also the author of various law-books.

Ramsay, Stephen Dobson, soldier, b. in Lunenburg, N. C., 31 May, 1837; d. in Winchester, Va., 20 Oct., 1864. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1859, assigned to the 4th artillery, and placed on garrison duty at Fort Monroe. In 1861 he was transferred to Washington, but he resigned on 6 April and entered the Confederate service as captain of the light artillery. Late in 1861 he proceeded to Virginia and was stationed on the south side of the James, and in the spring of 1862 he was ordered to report with his battery to Gen. John B. Magruder. During Gen. McClellan's campaign up the peninsula he had command of the artillery of the right wing with the rank of major. Soon afterward he was promoted colonel, assigned to the 4th North Carolina infantry, and with this regiment participated in the latter part of the peninsular campaign. He received the appointment of inspector-general on 1 Nov., 1862, was attached to the brigade, composed of North Carolina regiments, that was formerly commanded by Gen. George B. Anderson, and was attached to Gen. Thomas J. Jackson's corps, serving with credit at Chancellorsville and Gettysburg. Subsequently he served in the Wilderness, and on 1 June, 1864, was given the temporary rank of major-general and assigned a division that had been commanded by Gen. Jubal A. Early. Gen. Ramsay followed the latter commander in the brief campaign in the Shenandoah valley, participated in the battle of Winchester, and was mortally wounded at Cedar Creek while rallying his troops.

RAMSEY, Alexander anatomist, b. probably in London, England, in 1534; d. in Parsonsfield, Me., 24 Nov., 1824. He studied medicine under George Cruikshank in London for several years, and became famous for his anatomical preparations. He came to this country about 1800, and delivered a short course of lectures on anatomy and physiology in Columbia college. He possessed much professional learning, but his vanity, arrogance, and pomp, combined with his grotesque person, interfered with his success as a teacher, and won him the name of "the Caleb of science." He adopted the theory that the bite of a venomous snake was rendered innocuous by alkalies, and died from the results of an experiment on himself. He published "Anatomy of the Heart, Cranium, and Brain" (Edinburgh, 1813), and "Plates on the Brain" (London, 1813).

RAMSEY, Alexander, secretary of war, b. near Harrisburg, Pa., 8 Sept., 1813. He was educated at Lafayette college, and in 1828 became clerk in the register's office of his native county. He was secretary of the Electoral college at Pennsylvania in 1837, and in 1840, the next year was clerk of the state house of representatives, was elected to congress as a Whig in 1842, and served till 1847. He was chairman of the state central committee of Pennsylvania in 1848, and was appointed first territorial governor of Minnesota in 1849, holding office till 1853. During this service he negotiated a treaty at Mendota for the extinction of the title of the Sioux half-breeds to the lands on Lake Pepin, and with the Ojibwa Sioux nation by which the U. S. government acquired the Sanilac land in Minnesota west of Mississippi river, thus opening that state to colonization. He also made treaties with the Chippewa Indians on Red river in 1851 and 1853. He became mayor of St. Paul, Minn., in 1855, was governor of the state in 1860-3, and in the latter year was elected to the U. S. senate as a Republican, holding his seat in 1863-73, and serving as chairman of the committees on Revolutionary claims and pensions, on post-roads and on territories. He became secretary of war in 1879, succeeding George W. McCrary, and held office till the close of Hayes' administration. He was appointed by President Arthur, in 1882, a member of the Utah commission, under the act of congress known as the Edmunds bill (see Edmunds, George P.), continuing in that service till 1886. In 1887 he was a delegate to the centennial celebration of the adoption of the constitution of the United States.

RAMSEY, James Gattis Mcgregor, author, b. in Knox county, Tenn., in 1796; d. in Knoxville, Tenn., in 1883. His father, Francis A. Ramsey, (1750-1819), emigrated to the west early in life, and became secretary of the state of "Franklin," which was subsequently admitted to the Union under the name of Tennessee. The son was liberally educated, and studied medicine, receiving the degree of M. D., but never practised his profession. In early manhood he engaged in banking, and in later days he was elected president of the Bank of Tennessee, at Knoxville. While yet a young man he began the collection of material for a history of Tennessee. The papers of Gov. Sevier and Gov. Shelby were placed in his hands, and from them and other valuable documents he published the "Annals of Tennessee to the End of the Eighteenth Century" (Philadelphia, 1833). He also founded the first historical society in the state, and at his death was president of the one at Nashville, which he left in a flourishing condition. When Tennessee seceded from the Union he was appointed financial agent for the southern wing of the Confederacy. He joined the Confederate army on its retreat from Knoxville, and remained with it till its final dissolution. During the occupation of that city by National troops the house in which his father had lived and he had been born was burned, and all the valuable historical papers it contained were destroyed. In consequence of the war he lost most of his property.

RAND, Asa, clergyman, b. in Ridge, N. H., 6 Aug., 1757; d. in Ashburnham, Mass., 24 Aug., 1829. He was a native of New Hampshire, and ordained as a minister of the Congregational church in January, 1800. After a pastorate of thirteen years' duration at Gorham, Me., he edited the "Christian Mirror" at Portland, Me., in 1822-5, afterward conducted the "Recorder," and the "Youth's Companion" at Boston, and in 1833 established a beaver and printing-office at Lowell. He published the "Christian Observer" at that place, lectured against slavery, and was then pastor of churches at Pomfret and Petersborough, N. H. He published "Teacher's Manual for Teaching in English Grammar" (Boston, 1832), and "The Slave-Catcher caught in the Meshes of the Eternal Law" (Cleveland, 1832).—His son, William Wilberforce, author, b. in Gorham, Me., 8 Dec., 1816, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1837, at the Theological seminary at Bangor, Me., in 1840, and in the latter year was licensed to preach as a Congregational minister. He was pastor of the Reformed Dutch church of Canastota, N. Y., from 1841 till 1845, editor for the American tract society, New York city, in 1848-72, and has since taught in various colleges. He published "75 of Songs of Zion" (New York, 1850; enlarged ed., 1860); "Dictionary of the Bible for General Use" (1860; enlarged and largely rewritten, 1887); and other smaller books.

RAND, Benjamin Howard, educator, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 16 Feb., 1792; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 June, 1862. He settled in Philadelphia early in the 19th century, and was engaged in the teaching of penmanship, in which for more than twenty-five years he had a high reputation. Mr. Rand published "The American Penman" (Philadelphia, 1856); "Rand's Penmanship" (8 parts); "Rand's Copy-Book" (9 parts); and "Appendix" (6 parts). These books ran through several editions, and at the time of his death the sale of the different numbers had aggregated more than one and a half million copies.—His daughter, Marion Howard, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 Jan., 1824, d. in Grahamville, S. C., 9 June, 1849, contributed largely to "The Offering," "The Young People's Book," "Graham's Magazine," "Godey's Lady's Book," and other periodicals. Numerous pieces of her poetry are contained in "Rand's Female Poets of America" and in May's "American Female Poets."—His son, Benjamin Howard, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 Oct., 1857; d. there, 31 Dec., 1883, was graduated at Jefferson medical college in 1881, and was the first student ever admitted to the medical school of the university of Pennsylvania. He resided at 16 West Wyoming St., Philadelphia. During the last two years of his student life he served as clinical assistant to Dr. Thomas D. Mütter and Dr. Joseph Pancoast. In 1830 he was elected professor of chemistry in the Franklin institute, and he also held a similar chair in the Philadelphia medical college in 1852-54. From 1852 till 1864 he was curator of the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences. In 1834 he accepted the professorship of chemistry in Jefferson medical college, which he held until his resignation in 1877. Dr. Rand was elected a fellow of the Philadelphia college of physicians in 1853, a fellow of the American philosophical society in 1858, and, besides membership in other societies, was connected with the American medical association. He made many contributions to medical journals, edited the third edition of Dr. Samuel L. Metcalf's "Cortic: Its Agencies on the Phenomena of Nature" (Philadelphia, 1859), and was the author of "An Outline of Medical Chemistry" (1855) and "Elements of Medical Chemistry" (1863).—Another son, Theodore Dehon, mineralogist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 16 Sept., 1836, was elected to the chair of geology and natural history in the Episcopal church in Philadelphia, and then studied law. After his admission to the bar he opened an office in his native city, and has since continued in practice. Mr. Rand early turned his attention to natural science, especially to mineralogy, and his cabinet of specimens ranks as one of the best private collections in the United States, containing very nearly a complete set of the rocks and minerals of Philadelphia and its vicinity. In 1871 he became a member of the board of managers of the Franklin institute, and since 1873 he has been treasurer of the American institute of mining engineers. Mr. Rand has been a member of the council of the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences since 1873, and director of its mineralogical and geological section. His publications include many papers on the mineralogy and geology of Philadelphia and its vicinity in the transactions of scientific societies of which he is a member, and he has prepared a geological map and explanatory text for the reports of the geological survey of Pennsylvania.

RAND, Edward Sprague, merchant, b. in Newburyport, Mass., in 1822; d. there, 25 Nov., 1856; h. in Newburyport, Mass., in 1846, Edward Sprague, who was a wealthy merchant in his native place, and afterward entered his father's store as a clerk. When he was eighteen years of age he went to Europe as a supercargo, and before he was twenty-one he was established as a commission merchant in Amsterdam. Leaving that city, he made voyages to the Canaries islands, Havana, and elsewhere in various parts of this country he went to Russia. On his return from St. Petersburg in 1810 he was shipwrecked on the Naze, Norway. After the treaty of peace with Great Britain in 1815 he was for many years engaged in the East India trade. In 1821, with others, he purchased a woolen-mill at Salisbury, now known as the Salisbury mills, of which he was for many years the owner, and he was responsible for the promotion of the manufacture of woolen cloth from commerce and engaged in manufacturing. From 1827 till 1835 he was president of the Mechanics' bank, Newburyport, and he sat for several years in each branch of the legislature. He was often a delegate to the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal church.—His grandson, Edward Sprague, floriculturist, b. in Boston, 20 Oct., 1854; d. in Para, Brazil, 28 Sept., 1879, was graduated at Harvard in 1877, and formed a partnership with his father. He devoted much time to floriculture and literature at the time he was a student at Harvard. His MS. on "Harris on Insects Injurious to Vegetation" (Boston, 1862), editor of the floral department of "The Homestead," and partially prepared a new edition of Dr. Jacob Bigelow's "Flora Bostoniensis.

RAMAND, Alexander Williams, statesman, b. in James, Montgomery co., N. Y., 31 Oct., 1810; d. in Elmira, N. Y., 25 July, 1872. His father, Phineas, a native of Massachusetts, resided in Montgomery county, N. Y., from 1818 till 1851, was judge of the court of common pleas there in 1837-47, and removing to Waukesha, Wis., died there in 1863. Alexander received a thorough academic education, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began, to practise in Waukesha in 1840. He became soon afterward postmaster of that place, and in 1847 was chosen a member of the legislature on the Republican ticket. In 1857, he was elected governor of Wisconsin, and at the beginning of the civil war, and pending the convening of the legislature, in extra session, he called the 21st regiment into existence, and used the public funds in advance of lawful appropriation; but he was fully sustained by the legislature when it assembled. At the close of his gubernatorial term, 1 Jan., 1861, was discredited from his purpose of entering the army by President Lincoln, and appointed U. S. minister to Italy. On his resignation and return in 1862, he was made first assistant postmaster-general, and in July, 1866, postmaster-general, and served in that capacity till March, 1869.

RANDALL, David Austin, author, b. in Colchester, Conn., 14 Jan., 1813; d. in Columbus, Ohio, 27 June, 1870. He was educated at a private school in his native town, and at Canandaigua, N. Y., academy, and became a Baptist clergyman. He was chaplain of the Ohio asylum for the insane in 1854-66, pastor of a church in Columbus in 1858-66, and corresponding secretary of the Ohio Baptist conference in 1856-63. Mr. Randall was for many years editor of the "Washingtonian," the first temperance paper in Ohio, and in 1845-58 edited the "Crossey Journal," a Baptist newspaper. He was widely known as a lecturer, and was also a member of a book-selling firm and director of a bank. He travelled in Egypt and Palestine in 1861-2, and wrote "God's Handwriting in Egypt, Sinai, and the Holy Land" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1862), and "Ham-Mishkan, the Wonderful Tent: a Study of the Structure, Significance, and Symbolism of the Hebrew Tabernacle." (Cincinnati, 1866).

RANDALL, George Maxwell, P. E., bishop, b. in Warren, R. I., 23 Nov., 1810; d. in Denver, Colo., 28 Sept., 1873. He was graduated at Brown in 1835, and at the Episcopal general theological seminary, New York, in 1838. He was ordained deacon in St. Mark's church, Washington, D. C., 17 July, 1838, by Bishop Griswold, and priest, in the same church, 2 Nov., 1839, by the same bishop. His first parochial charge was that of the Church of the Ascension, Fall River, Mass. In 1844 he accepted the rectoryship of the Church of the Messiah, Boston, Mass., which post he held for twenty-nine years. He received the degree of D. D. from Brown in 1856. He was a clerical deputy from the diocese of Massachusetts from 1856 till 1865, inclusive, and was chosen secretary to the house of clerical and lay deputies in 1862 and 1863. He was appointed by the general convention to be missionary bishop of Colorado, and was consecrated in Trinity church, Boston, Mass., 28 Dec., 1865. Bishop Randall published numerous sermons, addresses, and lectures, and contributed freely to church literature, chiefly through the columns of "The Christian Witness and Church Advocate," of which he was editor for many years. He also published a tract entitled "Why I am a Churchman," which has had a very large circulation, and "Observations on Confirmation," (6th ed., 1868).

RANDALL, James Ryder, song-writer, b. in Baltimore, Md., 1 Jan., 1839. He was educated at Georgetown college, D. C., but was not graduated, and afterward travelled in South America. When he was a young man he went to Louisiana and edited a newspaper at Point Coupee, and after- wards worked in New Orleans, and at New Orleans and Mobile Delta." His delicate constitution prevented him from entering the Confederate army, but he wrote much in support of the southern cause. His "Maryland, my Maryland," which was published in Baltimore in April, 1861, was set to music, and became widely popular. It has been called "the Marseilles of the Civil war," and "the New Orleans battle-cry." Other poems from his pen were "The Solent Sonnet," "Ar- lington," "The Cameo Bracelet," "There's Life in the Old Land Yet," and "The Battle-Cry of the South." After the war he went to Augusta, Ga., where he became associate editor of "The Constitutionalist," and in 1866 its editor-in-chief.

RANDALL, John Witt, poet, b. in Boston, 6 Nov., 1813; d. there, 27 Jan., 1892. He was graduated at Harvard and at the medical department. While in college he devoted his attention to scientific studies, especially entomology, and also cultivated his taste for poetry. His attainments as a naturalist gained for him the honorary appointment as zoologist in the department of invertebrate animals to the South sea exploring expedition, under Commodore Charles Wilkes. But the delays in the sailing of the expedition caused him to resign the appointment, and he then turned his attention to his favorite pursuits. He had been largely occupied with the cultivation of an ancestral country seat in Stow, Mass., and had accumulated one of the rarest and most original collections of engravings in the United States. Dr. Randall has contributed a paper a paper on the "Crustacea" to the "Transactions of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences," and two on insects to the "Proceedings of the Boston Society of Natural History," and he prepared a volume on the "Animals and Plants of Maine" for the geological survey of that state, but the manuscript was lost. In his literary work, he has written six volumes of poems, of which only one has been published, "Consolations of Solitude" (Boston, 1856).

RANDALL, Robert Richard, philanthropist, b. in New Jersey about 1749; d. in New York city, 5 June, 1801. He was a son of Thomas Randall, and was a member of the commission which controlled the affairs of the city of New York in 1735. In early life Robert appears to have followed the sea, and he became a merchant and shipmaster, in consequence of which he is generally styled captain.
Captain Randall became a member in 1771 of the Marine society of New York for the relief of indigent and distressed masters of vessels, their widows and orphan children, and in 1780 was elected a member of the chamber of commerce. In 1790 he purchased from Baron Pouchy the property known as the Minto farm, or Minthorne, consisting of more than twenty-one acres of land in what is now the 13th ward of New York city, the southern boundary of which was then the approach of Broadway. This, together with four lots in the 1st ward of New York, and stocks valued at $10,000, he bequeathed to found the home called the Sailors' Snug Harbor, "for the purpose of maintaining aged, decrepit, and worn-out sailors." It was his intention to have the home erected on the family estate, but, in consequence of suits by alleged heirs, the control of the property was not absolutely obtained until 1831. Meanwhile the growth of the city made it more advantageous to rent the farm and purchase a site elsewhere, and 130 acres were bought on Staten island near New Brighton. In October, 1831, the corner-stone was laid, and the dedication ceremonies took place two years later. In 1834 Capt. Randall's remains were removed to Staten island, and in 1884 a heroic statue of him, in bronze, by Augustus St. Gaudens, was unveiled, with appropriate ceremonies, on the lawn adjoining the buildings. At present (1898) the property has increased by purchase to 180 acres, on which there are eight large dormitory buildings capable of accommodating 1,000 men, besides numerous other buildings, thirty-eight in all, including a hospital, church, and residences for the officers.

Samuel Jackson, a statesman, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., 10 Oct., 1828; d. in Washington, D. C., 12 April, 1890. He was the son of a well-known lawyer of Philadelphia, was educated as a merchant, and, after being four times elected to the city council and once to the state senate, was sent to Congress, taking his seat in March, 1863. He afterward represented without intermission the only Democratic district in Philadelphia. He served on the committee on banking, rules, and elections, distinguished himself by his speeches against the force bill in 1873, was a candidate for speaker in the next year, and was appointed chairman of the committee on appropriations. He gained credit by his success in curtailing expenditures by enforcing a system of proportional reduction in the appropriations, and, on the death of Michael C. Kerr, was elected speaker, 4 Dec., 1876. He was re-elected speaker in the two following congresses, serving in that capacity till 3 March, 1881. Mr. Randall bore a conspicuous part in the debates on the tariff as the leader of the protectionist wing of the Democratic party. His widow is a daughter of Aaron Ward, of New York.

Randolph, Alfred Magill, P. E., bishop, was born in Winchester, Va., 31 Aug., 1836. He is the fourth child of Robert Lee Randolph, who, after studying law, devoted himself to farming on his inherited estate, Eastern View, Fauquier co., Va. After graduation at William and Mary in 1855, the son studied at Virginia theological seminary, Alexandria, where he graduated in 1858. In the autumn of the same year he was appointed rector of St. George's church, Fredericksburg, Va. After the bombardment of the town, in December, 1862, by which the church edifice was much injured, the congregation dispersed. Dr. Randolph left, and from 1863 until the close of the civil war served as a chaplain in the Confederate army, in hospitals, and in the field. He was appointed rector of Christ Church, Alexandria (ecclesiastical in 1772; see illustration), in 1865, and in 1867 became the pastor of Emmanuel church, Baltimore, where he remained until he was elected, in 1886, assistant bishop of Virginia. He received the degree of D. D. from William and Mary college in 1875, and that of LL. D. from Washington and Lee university in 1884. During his ministry in Maryland Dr. Randolph was the chief opponent of tractarianism and ritualism, and leader in a successful resistance to the assumption of episcopal powers that he believed to be unconstitutional. The conflict was one of much interest to his church throughout the country, and the qualities that Dr. Randolph displayed secured him the confidence of his wing of the church.

Bishop Randolph's published discourses and periodical contributions show him to be in churchmanship and religious philosophy largely in sympathy with the views of Dr. Thomas Arnold, of Rugby.

RANDOLPH, Beverley, governor of Virginia, b. in Chatsworth, Henrico co., Va., in 1755; d. at Green Creek, his home, in Cumberland, Va., in 1797. He was a graduate of William and Mary college, of which he was appointed a visitor in 1784. He was a member of the assembly of Virginia during the Revolutionary war and actively supported all measures for securing American independence. He was chosen in 1787 president of the executive council of Virginia. He succeeded his relative, Edmund Randolph, as governor of the state. After two years of service he became unpopular with a part of the legislature, which at that time elected the governor. The malcontents had resolved to surprise the legislature by the nomination of ex-Gov. Benjamin Harrison, but Harrison discovered the scheme and defeated it, restoring his son to office. Randoph, who thus was chosen for a third term.

RANDOLPH, Edward, British agent, b. in England in July, 1632; d. in Virginia about 1703. The British government sent him to the New England colonies in 1675 to ascertain their condition. He arrived in June, 1676, with a letter from Charles II., and with complaints from Ferdinando Gorges, the lord proprietary of Maine, and from Robert T. Mason, who laid claim to New Hampshire. Randolph at once began to menace the trade and the charter of Massachusetts, demanding of Gov. Leverett that the letter he bore from the king should "be read with all convenient speed to the magistrates." Leverett, however, professed ignorance of the signers of the letter, and denied the right of parliament or king to bind the colony with laws adverse to its interest, receiving Randolph only as an agent of Mason. Randolph returned to England after six weeks' stay in the colonies, and, by exaggerating their population fourfold, and their wealth to a still greater extent, induced the English government to retain him in its employment. In the course of nine years he made eight voyages to this country, each time taking back false reports of its condition and presenting stronger reasons for the taxation and oppression of the colonies. He was enrolled as collector of customs in December, 1679, and twice within the next three years visited England to assist in directing and to correct the government. A writ of quo warranto was issued in July, 1683. Massachusetts was arraigned before an English tribunal, and in October Randolph arrived in Boston with the writ. In June, 1684, the charter was adjudged to be conditionally forfeited. He met Gov. Edmund Andros on 20 Dec., 1686, when the latter landed in Boston, and at once attached himself to the governor. "His excellency," said Randolph, "has to do with a perverse people." He became secretary of New England the same year, and a member of the governor's council, and in 1688 carried off to Boston, from the secretary's office in New York, the archives of the Dutch governors, where they remain till 1694. In response to the complaints of the people Randolph replied: "It is not to his majesty's interest that you should thrive," The taxes were for public purposes, and Randolph persuaded the colonists to take out new grants for their lands, with the intention that when they should possess them in fee simple they should be subjected to extorcionate taxation. "Early in the autumn," William and Mary reached Boston, 4 April, 1689, there was a "grand buzzing among the people in great expectation of their old charter." On the morning of the 18th Andros and Randolph were marched to prison. When the latter was released he went to Virginia, where he died.

RANDOLPH, Jacob, physician, b. in Philadelphia, 25 Nov., 1790; d. there, 12 April, 1836. His ancestor, Edward Fitz-Randolph, emigrated to this country from England in 1630. His father was an officer in the 4th Pennsylvania regiment during the Revolution, but subsequently became a member of the Society of Friends, and dropped the prefix from his family name. Jacob studied at the Friends' school in Philadelphia, and at the University of Pennsylvania in 1787, and became surgeon on an American ship that was bound for Canton, China. Afterward he returned to Philadelphia and settled in the practice of his profession in that city in 1822, in which year he married the daughter of Dr. Philip Syng Physick. He was appointed surgeon to the Almshouse infirmary and lecturer on surgery in the Pennsylvania school of medicine in 1830. From 1835 until his death he was a surgeon to the Pennsylvania hospital.

He was in Europe in 1840-42, spending most of his time in the surgical departments of the Paris hospitals. During his absence he declined the chair of surgery in Jefferson medical college. Dr. Randolph became lecturer on clinical surgery in the University of Pennsylvania in 1845, and professor of that branch in 1847. Meanwhile he had acquired a wide reputation as a surgeon, and in 1831 introduced in the United States the operation of lithotripsy. He was a member of the American philosophical society, of the Philadelphia college of physicians, and of the Philadelphia medical society, and was successively secretary to the latter and its president.

He published several reports of successful operations for stone in the bladder by lithotripsy, "History of a Case of Female Amenorrhea in which the Femoral Artery was tied for the Second Time in the Medical History of Philadelphia," in the "North American Medical and Surgical Journal," 1829, in a "Memoir of Philip Syng Physick," Philadelphia, 1839; See a memoir of him by George W. Norris (1848). His great-nephew, Nathaniel Archer, physician, b. in Chadd's Ford, Pa., 7 Nov., 1858; d. in Longport, N.J., 22 Aug., 1887, was educated at Swatmore college, Pa., and at Cornell, and was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1882. The same year he was appointed assistant demonstrator in Philadelphia, and in 1883, becoming professor of hygiene in 1886, Dr. Randolph's early death by drowning cut short a brilliant career. He was a member of many scientific societies, a contributor to scientific periodicals, and, with Samuel G. Dixon, published "Notes from the Physiological Laboratory of the University of Pennsylvania." (Philadelphia, 1887). His favorite amusement there, becoming professor of hygiene in 1886, Dr. Randolph's early death by drowning cut short a brilliant career. He was a member of many scientific societies, a contributor to scientific periodicals, and, with Samuel G. Dixon, published "Notes from the Physiological Laboratory of the University of Pennsylvania." (Philadelphia, 1887).
country in 1839. After receiving a common-school education, James entered a printing-office, and in 1812 became co-editor of the "Frederick," a weekly newspaper, in which he continued for thirty years. He was U. S. collector of internal revenue in 1815-16, and was subsequently clerk of common pleas for Middlesex county, and a member of the legislature for twenty years. He was elected to Congress in 1839. The seat was vacated by the death of George Bolongino, served till 1853, and subsequently invested largely in coal lands. — His son, Theodore Frelinghuysen, senator, b. in New Brunswick, N. J., 24 June, 1816; d. in Morristown, N. J., 7 Nov., 1883, was educated at Rutgers grammar-school, and entered mercantile life at sixteen years of age. He settled in Vicksburg, Miss., about 1840, where he married a granddaughter of Chief-Justice Marshall, and on his return to New Jersey in 1850 resided first in Hudson county and subsequently in Morristown, N. J. He was a member of the legislature in 1859-60, declined the speakership of that body, was chairman of the special committee on the peace congress in 1861, and was the author of the measure for relief of the wounded and southerners of self-sacrifice during the civil war. He became state senator the same year, served by re-election till 1865, and was appointed commissioner of draft for Hudson county in 1862. He was president of the Morris and Essex railroad in 1867, doubled its gross tonnage in eighteen months, and negotiated the existing lease of that road to the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western railroad by which the bondholders were guaranteed seven per cent. in perpetuity. He became governor of New Jersey in 1868, during his tenure of office caused a repeal of the Camden and Amboy monopoly tax, established a general railway law, made the state-prison system self-supporting, and suggested the plan of the present State Lunatic asylum at Morris Plains, which is the largest in the world. On 11 July, 1871, the day preceding the Orange riot in New York city, he issued a proclamation insuring the right of parade to the Orangemen of New Jersey. To secure the speedy transmission of this proclamation throughout the state and in New York city, where it was alleged rioters were arranging to invade New Jersey, he went in person to the telegraph-office and took "constructive" possession of several of them. He also ordered out the militia, and by these measures prevented disturbance. He was elected U. S. senator in 1874, served one term, was chairman of the committee on military affairs, and a member of the special committee to investigate election frauds in South Carolina. He procured patents for several inventions, including a "watch," and an application of steam to typewriting machines.

RANDOLPH, Thomas Mann, patriot, b. at Tuckahoe, his father's homestead, in Virginia, in 1741; d. there, 19 Nov., 1793. He was the son of "William of Tuckahoe," who, at his death (1745), confided his infant and only child to Peter Jefferson, father of Thomas, who thereupon removed to the child's estate (Tuckahoe) in Goochland (now Albemarle) county, Va. The young man was graduated at William and Mary college, and in 1761 married Anne, daughter of Col. Archibald Cary (b. 1746; d. 1780), widely known by her charities. He was a member of the Virginia house of burgesses, and of the convention of 1776. He was also a member of the Colonial committee of safety during the Revolutionary war. Thomas Mann Randolph, of Virginia, b. at Tuckahoe, on James river, Va., 1 Oct., 1798; d. in Monticello, Charlottesville, Va., 20 June, 1858. In 1875 Randolph was sent with a younger brother to Edinburgh university, where he was very studious, and formed the friendship of Sir John Leslie, who returned with the brothers and was for two years tutor in their Virginia home. While at Edinburgh he formed a scientific society, of which Thomas Jefferson was elected an honorary member. Jefferson acknowledged the diploma with a letter, written in the most cordial and affectionate terms, for the benefit of the youth, with whose father he had been brought up almost as a brother. In the summer of 1788 he visited the Jeffersons in Paris, and there first met Martha Jefferson (q. v.), whom he married, 23 Feb., 1790, at Monticello. This marriage of his daughter gratified Jefferson, who described the youth as "a man of science, sense, virtue, and composure. The event also put an end to his daughter's desire for a conventional life, which had distressed him. Randolph, at the entreaty of Jefferson, resided at Monticello for a time, and gave much attention to study. Among his frequent visitors was the Abbé Corca, a botanist. In 1803 he was elected to the house of representatives, where he sharply rebutted remarks of John Randolph of Roanoke, and a duel was agreed to be fought, and was actually continued in congress until 1807. While in Washington the family resided in the executive mansion. In 1812 he enlisted in the military service, and on 3 Jan. became lieutenant of light artillery. He marched to Canada as captain of the 20th infantry, but resigned on 6 Feb., 1813, on account of a misunderstanding with Gen. Armstrong. He was governor of Virginia in 1819-21. His death was caused by exposure while riding, after giving his cloak to an aged and thinly clad man whom he passed on the high-road.—His son, Thomas Jefferson, b. at Monticello, Va., 12 Sept., 1792; d. at Edge Hill, Albemarle co., Va., 8 Oct., 1875, was Thomas Jefferson's oldest grandson, and was described by his grandfather as "the staff of his old age.

When six years of age he used to walk five miles to an "old-field school," so called, and used to say that he had a watch in his pocket before he had a leg on his feet. He went to school in Philadelphia at fifteen, and afterward in Charlottesville, Va. In 1824 he married Jane Hollins, daughter of Gov. Wilson Cary Nicholas. After the sale of Jefferson's property, debts to the extent of $40,000 remained, and these were paid by Randolph out of regard for his grandfather's honor. He also supported and educated his brothers and sisters. He had been appointed literary executor of Jefferson, and in 1829 published the "Life and Correspondence of Thomas Jefferson" (4 vols., Boston). Being in the Virginia legislature at the time of the Southampton negro insurrection in 1832, he introduced a bill for emancipation on what was called the "post-natal" plan, originally suggested by Jefferson. This was necessarily postponed to the following session, and then failed through his opposition, but it went excited by the harangues of George Thompson, who was regarded as an "abolition emissary" from Great Britain. Rodolph was an eminent financier, and secured the passage of a tax-bill through the Virginia legislature in 1642 which placed the state finances on a sound basis. He wrote an able pamphlet, entitled "Sixty Years' Reminiscences of the Currency of the United States," a copy of which was presented to every member of the legislature. It is still a document of historical interest. In 1681–2 he was in the convention that revised the Virginia constitution. After the fall of the Confederacy, which he supported, he devoted himself to restoration of the prosperity of his state. He was for seven years rector of the University of Virginia, and for thirty-one years on its board of visitors. In his last illness he had his bed removed to a room from which he could look on Monticello, where he was buried. In taking the chair at the Baltimore Democratic convention of 1872 he was described as "six feet six inches high, as straight as an arrow, and stood before the convention like one of the big trees of California."—Another son, George Wythe, b. at Monticello, 10 March, 1818; d. at Edge Hill, near Charlottesville, Va., 10 April, 1878, at the death of his grandfather, Thomas Jefferson, was placed under the care of his brother-in-law, Joseph Coolidge, of Boston, by which he was better provided for than the majority of the Randolphs. At the age of thirteen he received from President Jackson a midshipman's warrant, and he was at sea almost continuously until his nineteenth year, when he entered the University of Virginia. After two years of study he resigned his naval commission, studied law, and gained high rank at the Richmond bar. While the state was in Brown's rebellion at Harper's Ferry he raised a company of cavalry, which continued its organization, and was the main Confederate force against Gen. Butler at the battle of Bethel. He was then given a large command, with the commission of brigadier-general, which he held until he was appointed secretary of war of the Confederate states. He afterward resigned and reported for service in the field. He was one of the commissioners sent by Virginia to consult President Lincoln, after his election, concerning his intended policy, with the hope of maintaining peace. A pulmonary affection having developed during the war, he ran the blockade to seek health in a warmer region, and remained abroad for several years after the fall of the Confederacy. He resided in New York, where he lived until his death, which occurred in a hotel on Fifth Avenue. The body was removed to Virginia. Another son, Nicholas, author, b. at Edge Hill, near Charlottesville, Va., 12 Oct., 1839, has become widely known in Virginia by her school at Edge Hill and as principal of Patapsco institute. Later she opened a school in Baltimore. She has published "Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson (New York, 1871); a story for the young, "The Lord will Provide" (1872); a paper on Martha Jefferson Randolph in Mrs. Wister's "Famous Women of the Revolution" (Philadelphia, 1876); and "Life of Stonewall Jackson" (1876). In addition, Miss Randolph has written various contributions to current literature, among which is an article of historical value entitled "The Kentucky Resolutions in a New Light," founded on family papers, printed in the "Nation," 5 May, 1857.

RANDOLPH, William, colonist, b. at Morton Morrell, Warwickshire, England, in 1651; d. on Turkey island, Va., 11 April, 1711. He belonged to a family line of which were Thomas Randolph, mentioned in "Domesday Book" as ordered to defend a vessel against an English king of France (1294); John Randolph, an eminent king's attorney, and connected with the exchequer (1355); Avery Randolph, principal of Pembroke college, Oxford (1590); Thomas Randolph, ambassador of Queen Elizabeth; and Thomas Randolph the poet (1604–54). Col. William was a son of Richard (of Morton Morrell, Warwickshire), a half-brother of the poet. Col. William was preceded in Virginia by his uncle Henry, who came in 1643, and died there in 1702. He also founded a family; his widow married Peter Field, an ancestor of President Jefferson. Col. William arrived in the year 1671 in Virginia, and became owner of large plantations on the James river. He fixed his residence on Turkey island (not now an island), about twenty miles below the city of Richmond, where as yet there was no settlement. He built, with bricks imported on his ship which plied regularly between Bristol and Turkey island, a mansion with lofty dome, whose picturesque ruin remains. Col. William Byrd's letters written at the time show Randolph to have been a man of high character as well as of much influence. He was a member of the house of burgesses in 1684, and either he or his eldest son was the William Randolph mentioned as clerk of the house in 1705. Tradition says that he was a member of the governor's council. He was active in the work of civilizing the Indians, was a founder and trustee of William and Mary college, and on its first board of visitors appears "William Randolph, Gentleman," as he is also described in the college charter. He married Mary Isham, by whom he had ten children. The family and the family names so multiplied that the seven sons of William were conveniently distinguished by the estates he bequeathed them: William of Turkey island, William of Byrd's Island, William of Tuckahoe, William of Curles, Henry of Chatsworth, Sir John of Tazewell Hall (see illustration), and Edward of Bravo. Six of these sons begin the list of forty graduates of the Randolph name to be gathered from the catalogues of William and Mary college. The sons all appear to have entered with energy on the work of colonial civilization, save Edward, who married and resided in England. His eldest son, William, b. 1681, was visitor of William and Mary college, a burgess in 1718, 1723, and 1729, a councillor of state, and treasurer of the colony of Virginia in 1735. —The third son, Isham, b. 24 Feb., 1687; d. 2 Nov., 1743, resided in London in early life, where he married in 1717. On his return to Virginia he built himself a grand mansion at Dungess, where a baronial hospitality was dispensed. He was a member of the house of burgesses for Goochland (now Albemarle) county in 1740, and adjutant-general of the colony. He was a man of scientific culture, and is honorably mentioned in the memoirs of Bartram the naturalist.—The fifth son, Richard, b. 1691; d. 1 Dec., 1748, was a member of the house of burgesses for Henrico county in 1740, and succeeded his brother William as treasurer of the colony.—The sixth son, Sir John, lawyer, b. on Turkery island, Va., in 1639; d. in Williamsburg, Va., 9 March, 1737, was graduated at William and Mary college, and studied law at Gray's Inn, London. At an early age he was appointed king's attorney for Virginia. He represented William and Mary college in the house of burgesses, and in 1739, while visiting England to obtain a renewal of the college charter, he was knighted. In 1756 he was chosen speaker of the Virginia house of burgesses, and in the same year was appointed recorder of the city of Norfolk. Sir John is said by his nephew, William Stith, to have intended to write a preface to the laws of Virginia, "and therein to give an historical account of our constitution and government, but was prevented from prosecuting it to effect by his many and weighty public employments, and by the vast burden of private business from his clients." The materials he had collected were used by Stith in his history of Virginia. His library is believed to have been the finest in Virginia. His natal tablet in William and Mary college was destroyed by fire, but its Latin epitaph is preserved in President Ewell's history of the college. See a notice of him in the Virginia Law Journal, 5th April, 1857.—Sir John was a noted scholar of the time. He was a fellow-member in the college, a member of the library, a patriot, b. in Tazewell, Va., d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Oct., 1775, after graduation at William and Mary. Sir John was chosen representative of Williamsburg in the house of burgesses in the same year. At the opening of his career as law officer he was brought in opposition to the apostle of Presbyterianism, the Rev. Samuel Davies (q. v.). The attorney having questioned whether the toleration act extended to Virginia, Davies replied that if not neither did the act of uniformity, which position was sustained by the attorney-general in England, in 1751 the newly appointed governor, Dinwiddie, and his family, were guests of Peyton Randolph, but the latter presently resisted the royal demand of a pistol fee on every land patent. In 1754 the burgesses commissioned the king's attorney to repair to London to impress on the English ministry the unconstitutionality of the exaction. He there encountered the crown lawyers, Campbell and Murray (afterward Lord Mansfield), with marked ability. The pistol fee was removed from all lands less in extent than one hundred acres, and presently ceased altogether. Gov. Dinwiddie was naturally angry that the king's attorney should have left the colony without his consent, and on a minor pretence to his demand. A petition of the burgesses that the office of attorney should remain open until Peyton Randolph's return pointed the governor to his revenge; he suspended the absent attorney, and in his place appointed George Wythe. Wythe accepted the place, only to retain it until his friend's return. Randolph's promised compensation for the suspension and this commission, $2,500, caused a long struggle between the governor and the burgesses, who made the sum a rider to one of $20,000 voted for the Indian war. The conflict led to a prorogation of the house. Meanwhile the lords of trade ordered reduction of the pistol fee, and requested the reinstatement of Randolph. "You must think y't some w't absurd," answered Dinwiddie (23 Oct., 1754), "from the bad Tretmnt I have met with. However, if he answers properly w't I have to say to him, I am not inflexible; and he may depend by this time I have given up all share of my Fays, and Com'tence than any other in the Gov't." The attorney acknowledged the irregularities and was reinstated. There was a compromise with the new house about the money. The following year the burgesses again demanded the resignation of Dinwiddie, but he refused to go. Randolph was one of the few intimate friends of Washington. Jefferson, in a letter to his grandson, declares that in early life, amid difficulties and temptations, he used to ask himself how Peyton Randolph would act in such situation, and what course would meet with his approbation. Randolph drew up the remonstrance of the burgesses against the threatened stamp act in 1764, but when it was passed, and Patrick Henry, then a burgess, had carried, by the smallest majority, his "reasonable" resolutions, the attorney was alarmed; Jefferson heard him say in going out, "By God, I would have given five hundred guineas for a single vote!" When he was appointed speaker in 1766, Randolph resigned his office as king's attorney and devoted his attention to the best interests of the country. The burgesses recognized in his legal knowledge and judicial calmness a balance for the sometimes tempestuous patriotism of Patrick Henry, and he was placed at the head of all important committees. He was chairman of the committee of correspondence between the colonies in May, 1775, presided over the Virginia convention of 1 Aug., 1774, and was first of the seven deputies appointed by it to the proposed congress at Philadelphia. On 10 Aug. he summoned the citizens of Williamsburg to assemble at their court-house, where the proceedings of the State convention were ratified, instructions to their delegates given, declaring the unconstitutionality of binding American colonies by British statutes, and aid subscribed for the Boston sufferers. For his presidency at this meeting his name was placed on the roll of those to be attained by parliament, but the bill was never passed. He was unanimously elected first president of congress, 5 Sept., 1774. He was but fifty-three years of age, but is described by a fellow-member as "a venerable man," to which is added "an honest man: has knowledge, temper, and experience, and an execution of them, above all integrity—a true Roman spirit." His noble presence, gracious manners, and imperturbable self-possession won the confidence of all. He was constantly relied on for his parliamentary experience and judicial wisdom.

On 29 Jan., 1775, he issued a call to the counties and corporations of Virginia, requesting them to elect delegates to a convention to be held at Richmond, 21 March, the call being signed "Peyton Randolph, moderator." He was elected to that convention on 4 Feb. On the night of 20 April, 1775, the gunpowder was clandestinely removed from the magazine at Williamsburg by order of Lord Dunmore, governor of Virginia. Randolph persuaded the enraged citizens not to assault the governor's residence. To 700 armed men assembled at Fredericksburg, who offered their services, he wrote a reply assuring them that the wrong would be redressed if menace did not compel Dunmore to ttobey. Through his negotiations with Lord Dunmore, assisted by the approach of Henry's men, $300 were paid for the powder, and hostilities were delayed. Randolph resumed his duties as speaker of the burgesses in May, 1775, and after their adjournment he returned to the congress at Philadelphia, where he died of apoplexy. His death is attributed to sorrow in one of Washington's despatches to congress. He married the daughter of Governor Peyton of Virginia, but left no issue. His body was conveyed from Philadelphia in the following year by his nephew, Edmund Randolph, and buried in the chapel of William and Mary college.—Another son of Sir John, John, lawyer, b. in Tazewell Hlll, Williamsburg, Va., in 1715; d. in Brompton, London, 31 Jan., 1784, after graduation at William and Mary, studied law and attained high rank at the bar. His home at Williamsburg was the centre of literary society as well as of fashion. He was a man of fine literary culture, an accomplished violinist, and of religion a freethinker. For interesting anecdotes concerning him see Wirt's "Life of Patrick Henry," and Randolph's "Jefferson." In 1766 John Randolph was appointed king's attorney under Gov. Fauquier, to succeed his brother Peyton. When, during the excitement that followed the removal of the gunpowder from Williamsburg, Lord Dunmore, fearing assassination, took up his abode on a man-of-war at York (8 June, 1775), John Randolph was the medium of communication between him and the burgesses. When hostilities began, he came to Philadelphia, and, by his oath of office to assist a rebellion, as it then appeared, and in August he sailed for England with his wife and two daughters, leaving his only son Edmund, on the shore. His subsequent correspondence with his constant friend, Thomas Jefferson, proves that he was regarded by that statesman as in sympathy with the American cause. For a time Lord Dunmore gave him a house at his house in Scotland, and there one of the daughters, Arianna, was married to James Worpley, of Virginia. When the newly married pair sailed for Virginia, on the first ship bound thither after the peace, they bore the dead body of John Randolph, whose dying request was to be buried in his native country. He was buried in the church of William and Mary college. Another son, Edmund Joseph Randolph, b. in Williamsburg, Va., 10 Aug., 1753; d. in Clarke county, Va., 13 Sept., 1813. He was distinguished for scholarship and eloquence at William and Mary college, and at eighteen years of age was orator to commemorate the royal founders, the oration being printed by the faculty. After studying law with his father he was admitted to the bar. He was a favorite of Lord Dunmore, and when his parents left for England was only withheld from sailing with them by enthusiasm for the American cause. Washington took him into his family as aide-de-camp, 15 Aug., 1775, and Randolph received the guests at headquarters; but on the sudden death of his uncle Peyton he returned to Williamsburg. In the Virginia convention of 1776 he assisted in framing the constitution and passing the bill of rights. He opposed the demand of Patrick Henry that the governor should have power of veto. At the close of the convention he was elected mayor of Williamsburg, and he was also the first attorney-general of Virginia under the new constitution. In 1779 he was elected to congress, but soon resigned. In 1780 he was re-elected, and remained in congress two years. There he was occupied with foreign affairs. He resigned his seat in 1782, and after his father's death in 1783 succeeded to the property of his uncle Peyton, which had become encumbered with claims against his father. These he might have met by selling the negroes, but, being conscientiously opposed to this, he had to work hard at his profession. He was one of the commissioners at the Annapolis convention which induced congress to summon the Constitutional convention of 1787. Being governor of Virginia (1786-88), he largely influenced the choice of delegates, and it was due to his persuasion that Washington's resolution not to attend was overruled. As leader of the Virginia delegation he introduced the general plan of a constitution that had been agreed on among them as a basis for opening the convention. He also drafted a detailed scheme of his own, which was discovered in 1887 among the papers of George Mason. His career in the convention was brilliant, and elicited admiration from Benjamin Franklin, who generally agreed with him. He earnestly opposed the single executive, the presidential re-eligibility and partitioning power, the vice-presidential office, and senatorial equality of states. He desired an executive commission chosen by the national legislature, and resembling that of the present Swiss republic. He favored a strong Federal government which was to have power of directly negative state laws that should be decided to be unconstitutional by the supreme court. On his motion the word "slavery" was eliminated from the constitution. He refused to sign the document except on condition that a second National convention should be called after its provisions had been discussed in the country; but in the Virginia convention of 1788 he advocated its ratification on the ground that a ninth state needed to secure the Union, and that within the Union amendments might be passed. The opposition, led by Patrick Henry, was powerful, and the ratification, even by a small majority (ten), was mainly due to Gov. Randolph, whose inflexible independence of party was then and after described as oscillation. He urged amendments—owing to his vigilance the clause of Art. X., on religious tests for office, implying power over the general subject, was supplemented by the first article added to the constitution. He resigned the governorship in 1788, and secured a seat in the assembly for the purpose of working on the committee for making a codification of the state laws. The code published at Richmond in 1794 was mainly his work. While so occupied he was appointed by the president (27 Sept., 1789) attorney-general of the United States. In response to a request of the house of representatives he wrote an extended report (1790) on the judiciary system. Among the many important cases arising prior to the first session of Congress, the main one was Chisholm v. Georgia, involving the right of an alien to sue a state. To the dismay of his southern friends, Randolph proved that right to the satisfaction of the court. His speech was widely circulated as a pamphlet, and was reprinted by legislative order in Massachusetts, while the alarm of debtors to England led to the 13th amendment. Early in 1798, Randolph issued, under the name of "Dementius," an effective pamphlet against the "Democratic societies," which were charged with fomenting the whiskey rebellion at Pittsburg, and exciting an American Jacobinism. Randolph tried to pursue, as usual, a non-partisan course in foreign affairs with a leaning toward France. Washington doing the like, Randolph acquiesced very reluctantly. 2 Jan., 1794, the office of secretary of state. His advice that an envoy should go to England, but not negotiate, was overruled. He advised the president to sign the Jay treaty only on condition that the "provision order" for the search of neutral ships were revoked. The Republicans were furious that the president and Randolph should think of signing the treaty apart from the "provision order"; but Washington, after the objectionable 12th article had been eliminated, was willing to overlook its other faults, but for the order issued to search American ships and seize the provisions on them. Meanwhile France was so enraged about the treaty that Monroe could hardly remain in Paris. During Jay's secret negotiations, the French minister, Fauchet, left Philadelphia in anger. The president had carried on through Randolph soothing diplomacy with France, and especially flattered the vanity of Fauchet, the French minister in Philadelphia, with an affection of confidence. The Frenchman did not fail in despairs to his employers to make the most of this. Also, being impeached, he hinted to his government that if things were not altered, he would probably influence American affairs, alleging a suggestion by Randolph to that effect. This despatch was intercepted by a British ship and forwarded to the English minister in Philadelphia (Hammond) just in time to determine the result of the struggle concerning the treaty. Washington had made up his mind not to sign the treaty until the "provision order" was revoked, and so informed the secretary of state in a letter from Mount Vernon, 22 July, 1796. The intercepted despatch of Fauchet altered this determination, and the treaty was signed without the condition. The only alternatives of the administration were to acknowledge the assurances diplomatically given to Fauchet, as egregiously falsified by him, or, as Washington thought, to sign the treaty he had been ordered not to sign. In the latter example, Randolph was scapengit. It is difficult to see how Washington could have saved his friend, even if ready to share his fate. Randolph, having ingenuously resigned his office, pursued Fauchet (now recalled) to Newport, and obtained from him a full retraction and exculpation. He then prepared his vindication. After this he retired, and was seen very seldom, but withheld from the doomed secretary, Washington treated Randolph with exceptional affection, visiting his house, and twice giving him the place of honor at his table. It was maintained by Randolph's biographer (M. D. Conway) that this conduct, and his failure to send for the other despatches alluded to, indicate Washington's entire disbelief of the assertions of Fauchet, whose intrigues he well knew (despatches to Monroe, 29 July, 1796). Randolph had attended to Washington's law-business in Virginia, and was appointed receiver of payment, and could hardly have been suspected of venality. The main charge against Randolph was based on Fauchet's allegation of "précieuses confessions" made him by the secretary. But that despatch was closely followed by another, discovered in 1888, at Paris, in which Fauchet announced that he had found them "fause confidences." The charges of intrigue and revealing secrets is thus finally disposed of. In addition to the "Vindication of Mr. Randolph's Resignation" (Philadelphia, 1795), the ex-secretary wrote a remarkable pamphlet, published the following year, "Political Truth, or Annadversions on the Past and Present State of Public Affairs." After his resignation, Randolph was received with public indignation in Richmond, where he resumed the practice of law. The ruin of his fortunes was completed by an account made up against him of $39,000 for "moneys placed in his hands to defray the expenses of foreign intercourse. Under the system of that period the secretary of state personally disbursed the funds provided for all foreign service, and if any money was lost through a breach of the law, he was held responsible. After repeated suits in which juries could not agree, Randolph, confident in the justice of his case, challenged an arbitration by the comptroller of the treasury, Gabriel Daviau, who decided against him. Thenceupon his hands, and the negroes so consecutively kept from sale and dispersion, were made over to Hon. Wilson Cary Nicholas, by whom the debt was paid in bonds, from which the government gained $7,000 more than the debt and interest. Meanwhile Randolph had again taken his place at the head of the Virginia bar. He was one of the counsel of Aaron Burr on his trial for treason at Richmond. He also wrote an important History of Virginia, the greater part of which is based on Historical Society of Virginia. Though much used by historians, it has never been published. In it there is an admirable sketch of the life and character of Washington, concerning whom no bitterness survived in his breast. For the fullest account of Edmund Randolph, and of his ancestors, see "Omitted Chapters of History, disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," by Monroe D. Conway (New York, 1888)." never afterward a candidate for office, though he took an active part in California politics, and was a popular orator. William Walker fixed on Randolph as the chancellor of his proposed Nicaraguan empire. To what extent Randolph participated in that enterprise is not known, but his absence from California was brief. In the great Almaden mine case the advocacy of the claim of the United States devolved mainly on Randolph. In his case Jeremiah Black says: "In the bulk of the evidence and the magnitude of the interest at stake, this is probably the heaviest case ever heard before a judicial tribunal." On Randolph's argument, submitted after his death, the United States won the case. He was for years engaged chiefly on this case, and his life was shortened by it. The government paid his widow $12,000 in addition to the $5,000 fee which her husband had received. Randolph was the author of "An Address on the History of California from the Discovery of the Country to the Year 1849," which was delivered before the Society of California pioneers, at San Francisco, on 10 Sept., 1859 (San Francisco, 1860). His argument in the Almaden mine case has also been printed. -William's great-grandson, Randolph B. B. Randolph, b. at Cavson's, Va., 2 June, 1773; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 24 June, 1833, was seventh in descent from Pocahontas by her marriage with John Rolfe. Richard Randolph of Curles, father of John Randolph of Roanoke, died in 1755. In 1788 his mother married, George Uber, who subsequently had a family with her four children, among whom were divided the large possessions of their father, including more than 40,000, acres. According to an unpublished manuscript of his nephew, by marriage, John Randolph Bryan, his advantages of education were necessary, not only to meet his highest [Revolutionary] exigencies of the times. Such as he had were furnished by his step-father. His mother was a lady of rare intelligence, and "little Jack," as he was always called, found in her a parent and guide such as few children have. For her love and admiration were unbounded. She was a beautiful woman, with a charm of manner and grace of person most captivating. In addition, she possessed a voice which had rare power. Jack was a beautiful boy, and the picture of the child and his mother was greatly admired. Randolph never spoke of her in after-life but with peculiar tenderness.

From his mother he learned the power of tone in reciting, of which he made use in manhood. It was a great speech in congress (1811) Randolph said: "Bred up in the principles of the Revolution, I can never pollute, much less defend [the outrages and injuries of England]. I well remember flying with my mother and her new-born child from Arnold and Phillips; and they had been driven by Tarleton and other British pandours from pillar to post while her husband was fighting the battles of his country." Although Randolph was argumentatively pugnacious, he would appear to have imbibed a hatred of war, which animated his diatribes against Napoleon and his resolution opposition to the war policy of Madison. The Randolph-Tucker library was well supplied with history and romance, of which the child made good use. After attending Walker Maury's school in Orange county for a time he was sent, in his twelfth year, to the grammar-school connected with William and Mary college. He did not mingle easily with other boys, but attached himself vehemently to one or two. In 1784 he went with his parents to the island possessions. Here he lived eight months. In the autumn of 1787 he was sent to Princeton, but in 1788 his mother died, and in June of that year he went to Columbia college, New York, where he studied for a short time. On 30 April, 1789, he witnessed the first president's inauguration. "I saw Washington, but could not hear him take the oath to support the Federal constitution. I saw what Washington did not see; but two other men in Virginia saw it—George Mason and Patrick Henry—the poison under its wings." When Edmund Randolph, a year later, entered on his duties as attorney-general, John, his second cousin, was sent to Philadelphia and studied law with him. Among his unpublished letters are discovered a personal and temporary lapse into gambling and other dissipations about this time, and suggest an entanglement, if not indeed a marriage, in Philadelphia, as the explanation of the rupture of his engagement with the famous beauty, Maria Ward, whose marriage (to Peyton, only son of Edmund Randolph) completed the tragedy of his private life. While in Philadelphia he does not appear to have availed himself of opportunities for hearing political debates, and attended lectures in anatomy and physiology. He had been a precocious skeptic, but passed into a state of emotional religion, under the influence of which he writes to a friend (24 Feb., 1791): "I prefer a private to a public life, and domestic pleasure to the great honors of popular esteem." At the beginning of the French revolution he was filled with enthusiasm, and at the same time his ideas were Jefferson and Burke. A strange combination of opposite natures was always visible in him. As his father before him had sold slaves to supply the cause of freedom with powder, so the son was at once ardent and fervent, but, after hesitating, by addressing him without adding any title, and signing "Your Fellow-citizen." He built up a distinctly pro-slavery party, and wrote a will liberating his slaves on the ground that they were equally entitled to freedom with himself. In 1795 Randolph returned to Virginia and lived in the family of his brother Richard, to whom he was devoted. The death of this brother (1796), under the shadow of a painful scandal, was a heavy blow. At "Bizarre," the family mansion, Randolph now dwelt as head of a large household. In 1797 he writes to his friend, Henry Rutledge, of another calamity; "I have been deprived by the Federal court of more than half my fortune. To an inquisitive a essays, and too little has been said here. The less affects me very little, since I have as yet a competence, but I am highly chagrined at being robbed in so villainous a manner. I have but little thought of practising law." Randolph's first speech was made in 1799, in answer to Patrick Henry. The power of expelling foreigners from the country without trial, conferred on the president by the alien and sedition acts, had been answered in Virginia by legislative denunciation of the acts as infractions of the constitution. The issue had arisen in Virginia as to the reversal of those resolutions. When Randolph stepped forth to defend the resolutions, he encountered Patrick Henry. There is little doubt that the powerful speech, ascribed to Randolph in Hugh Garland's "Life" was based on reports from hangers, and the language is characteristic. Randolph was now elected to congress. His first speech in that body (10 Jan., 1800) had ominous results. Advocating a resolution to diminish the army, he used the phrase "standing or mercenary armies," contending that all who made war a profession or trade were "wolves of war" and that they were insufficient for certain officers, who took occasion to insult him in the theatre. Randolph wrote to President Adams, improving the occasion to let him and the Federalist party know his opinion of the executive office. He addressed Mr. Adams with no other title than "President of the United States," and signed himself, "With Respect, Your Fellow-citizen, John Randolph." Mr. Adams sent the complaint to the house, where the question of dealing with the affair as a breach of representative "privilege" ended in a deadlock. Quickly becoming Republican leader of the house, chairman of the ways and means committee, Randolph became the pride of Virginia. He commanded the heart of the nation by his poetic eloquence, his absence from the house when the embargo was exposed every corrupt scheme. In his slight boyish form was sheathed a courage that often fought single-handed, and generally won a moral if not a technical victory, as in the great Yazoo fraud which, after repeated defeats, could only be passed in his absence; also in the impeachment of Judge Chase, who was saved only because the constitutional apparatus was inadequate to carry out the verdict of a large majority. President Jefferson admired his young relative, and gained much by his support: but it speedily became evident that their connection was untrue. Jefferson idealized Napoleon, Randolph abhorred him. John had learned from Edmund Randolph a knowledge of the English constitution rare at that time, and some of the most impressive passages of his speeches were those in which he pointed out the reactionary character of certain events and tendencies of the time. The appearance of a postmaster-general as agent of two land companies to urge the Yazoo claims on congress in 1805 pointed one of Randolph's finest speeches. At this time he was so national in his political ideas that in defending the measure he based his argument upon the constitutionality of the transaction. It was of importance to the president that his act should be regarded as extra-constitutional. Owing to Randolph's course, the constitutional amendment that the president asked was never gained, and any further development of executive authority continued extra-constitutional. It was inevitable that the administration, the杰判断, and Randolph. In the heat of a moment, as when the outrage on the ship "Chesapeake" occurred, the revolutionary element in him might appear; in the case alluded to he advocated an embargo; but when the embargo came from the senate, and he saw his momentary wrath systematized into a permanent war-measure, under which his own life was to be endangered, he took the advantage of "that coward Napoleon" (his favorite phrase), he voted against it. It seems impossible to ascribe this apparent inconsistency to anything except Randolph's moral courage. This is not the only instance in which he confronted the taunt of admitting himself to have been in the wrong. He never desired office; his ambition was to be a representative of Virginia and to fight down every public wrong. This involved mar- cells, alienations, and a gradual lapse into a possibly state of friends, unfortunately, by domestic distresses and physical ailments. After his great struggle to prevent the war of 1812, and his conflict with Madison, he was left out of congress for two years, and during that time lived at Roanoke. When he returned to congress in 1815 the aspect of affairs filled him with horror, and he devoted himself to the formation of a western state. He vaguely dreamed of the restoration of the "Old Dominion." His ideal country was now England. Although in his state-rights agitation he appealed to the fears of southerners for their property, that revolutionary attitude passed away. Hatred of slavery was part both of his Virginian and his English inheritance: only the legal restrictions on emancipation, and the injustice to his creditors that would be involved, prevented manumission of his slaves before his death. At the same time he voted against the Missouri compromise, and originated the term "dough-messes" which he applied to its northern supporters. He had no dream of a southern confederacy: none would have more abhorred a nationality based on slavery. He had no respect for Calhoun, or for Henry Clay, however much he admired their language in a speech, and shot at him, but was spared by the Virginian. He had been elected to the U. S. senate in December, 1824, to fill a vacancy, and served in 1825—7, being defeated at the next election. Though he accepted the Russian mission in 1830 from Jackson, whom he had supported in 1828, he soon returned and joined issue with the president on the nullification question. In 1829 he was a member of the Constitutional convention of Virginia, and, though he was very infirm, his eloquence enthralled the assembly. He died of consumption in a hotel in Philadelphia as he was preparing for another trip abroad. His last will was set aside on the ground that it was written with unsound mind. By the earlier will, which was sustained, his numerous slaves were liberated and they were colonized by Judge William Leigh in the west. Although eccentric and sometimes morose, Randolph was warm-hearted. He was fond of children. His fondness for young people, says the Bryan MS., "was particularly shown in a correspondence with his niece, during which he wrote her more than 200 letters." Randolph's personal appearance was striking. He was six feet in height and very slender, with long, skinny fingers, which he pointed and shook at these gegen whom he spoke. His "Letters to a Young Relative" appeared in 1834. See "Life of John Randolph," by Hugh A. Garland (2 vols. New York, 1850); also "John Randolph," by Henry Adams (Boston, 1882).
RANKIN, David Nerin, physician, b. in Shippensburg, Cumberland co., Pa., 27 Oct., 1834. After graduation at Jefferson medical college in 1854, he practiced with his father in his native town until the beginning of the civil war, in which he served as acting assistant surgeon, and aided in opening many of the largest U. S. army hospitals during the war, among which were the Mansion-house hospital in Alexandria, Va., and the Douglas hospital in Washington, D. C., the latter of the thirty surgeons in the volunteer aid corps of surgeons of Pennsylvania, which rendered efficient service. In 1861-6 he was medical examiner of the U. S. pension bureau, and since 1865 he has been chief physician of the penitentiary of western Pennsylvania. Dr. Rankin was a member of the British medical association in 1884, a delegate to the 8th and 9th international medical congresses, and is a member of various medical societies. He has contributed numerous articles to medical journals.

RANKIN, Jeremiah Eames, clergyman, b. in Thornton, N. H., 2 Jan., 1828. After graduation at Middlebury college in 1848, and at Andover theological seminary in 1854, he was pastor of Presbyterian churches in N. Y., St. Albans, Vt., Lowell and Charlestown, Mass., and Washington, D. C. Since 1884 he has been pastor of the Valley church in Orange, N. J. He was a trustee of Howard university in 1870-7, and professor of homiletics and pastoral theology there in 1878-84. He has been twice a delegate to the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, and in 1854, as chairman of the Congregational union of England and Wales. Middlebury gave him the degree of D. D., in 1880. He has contributed to religious periodicals, edited the "Pilgrim Press" and the "Congregational Review," has written several national hymns, including "For God and Home and Native Land" and "Keep your Colors Flying," and is the author of the "Bridal Ring" (Boston, 1869); "Auld Scotch Mither" (1875); "Subduing Kingdoms" (Washington, 1882); "The Hotel of God" (Boston, 1883); "Atheism of the Heart" (1884); "Christ His Own Interpreter" (1894); and "Ingleside Rhains" (New York, 1887).

RANKIN, John, clergyman, b. near Danbridge, Jefferson co., Tenn., 4 Feb., 1793; d. in Forton, Greenbriar co., Va., 20 March, 1880; was pastor of two Presbyterian churches in Carlisle, Ky., and about 1815 founded an anti-slavery society. Removing to Ripley, Ohio, he was pastor of the 1st and 3d Presbyterian churches for forty-four years. He joined the Garrison anti-slavery movement, and was mobbed for his views more than twenty times. About 1824 he addressed letters to his brother in Middlebrook, Va., dissuading him from slave-holding, which were published in Ripley, in the "Liberator," in 1832, and afterward in book-form in Boston and Newportport, and ran through many editions. He assisted Eliza and her child, the originals of those characters in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," to escape. He founded the American reform book and tract society of Cincinnati, and was author of several books, including "The Covenant of Grace" (Pittsburg, 1869). See his life entitled "The Soldier, the Battle, and the Victory," by Rev. Andrew Ritchie (Cincinnati, 1870).

RANKIN, John Chambers, clergyman, b. in Guilford county, N. C., 18 May, 1825. He was educated at Princeton theological seminary in 1846-9, and was ordained and appointed missionary to India, where he remained from 1840 till 1848, and there wrote and published in the Urdu language a reply to a Mohammedan book against Christianity. Owing to impaired health, he returned to the United States, in 1851 became pastor of the Presbyterian church in Baskingridge, N. J., which charge he now (1886) holds. Princeton gave him the degree of D. D., in 1867. He is the author of "The Coming of the Lord" (New York, 1885).

RANKIN, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Dunbar, Scotland, about 1770; to London, England, 17 May, 1810. He joined the Methodist Episcopal conference, began to preach in 1784, and was appointed to the Sussex, Sheffield, Devonshire, and other circuits by John Wesley, with whom he also traveled on a preaching tour in that year. He was the first in authority under Wesley, was appointed superintendent, and came to this country as a missionary, arriving in Philadelphia, with George Shadford, on 3 June, 1775. Soon after his arrival he called a conference, which met in Philadelphia in July, 1775, and was the first of that denomination ever held in this country. After preaching in New Jersey and elsewhere, he was stationed in New York, and while officiating at a quarterly meeting in 1776 he was told that he might be shot if he continued preaching, but although many soldiers were in the congregation, he was not molested. In September, 1777 he fled from his post and entered the British lines. On reaching Philadelphia, which was in their possession, he declared from the pulpit his belief "that God would not revive his work in America until he humbly submitted to their rightful sovereign, George III." He endeavored to get the British preachers back to England. "It appeared to me," said Asbury, "that his object was to sweep the continent of every preacher that Mr. Wesley sent to it, and of every respectable travelling preacher from Europe who had graduated among us, whether English or Irish. After his return to England in 1788 he was supernumerary for London until a few months before his death.

RANNEY, Ambrose Arnold, lawyer, b. in Townsend, Vt., 16 April, 1821; d. in Boston, 5 March, 1890. He was graduated at Dartmouth, taught for two years, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1848. He established himself in practice in Boston, Mass., and attained a high reputation. In 1853, he was elected to the legislature in 1855-6, and a member of the legislature in 1857, and again in 1863 and the subsequent session. He was elected a representative in congress by the Republicans for three successive terms, serving from 5 Dec., 1881, till 5 March, 1887, and was an active member of the judiciary committee.

RANNEY, Rufus Percival, jurist, b. in Blandford, Mass., 13 Oct., 1813; d. 6 Dec., 1891. When fourteen his father removed to a farm in freedom, Portage co., Ohio, where Rufus was brought up with small educational advantages, yet by manual work and teaching he obtained the means to fit himself for college. He studied for a short time at Wittenberg, and then returned to his study law in Jefferson, Ohio. He was admitted to the bar in 1858, and was taken into partnership by Benjamin F. Wade. In 1845 he opened an office in Warren, Trumbull co. He was the Democratic candidate for congress in 1846 and 1848, and in 1850 was a member of the State constitutional convention, and took an active part in the discussions. He was chosen by the legislature, about the same time, a judge of the supreme court, and in 1851 was elected by the people, under the new constitution, to the same office, which he held till 1857. In that year he was appointed United States district attorney for Ohio, and in 1859 was declared the Democratic candidate for governor. In 1862 he was again elected a judge of the supreme court, but in 1864 resigned, and resumed practice in Cleveland.

RANNEY, William, artist, b. in Middletown, Conn., 9 May, 1813: d. in West Hoboken, N. J., 18 Nov., 1857. The name that was given him at baptism was William Tylee, but he never used the last name. About the age of ten he left his home in Middletown, N. Y., by his uncle, where he was apprenticed to a tinsmith, but seven years later he was studying drawing in Brooklyn. When the Texas struggle began, Ranney enlisted, and during the campaign became acquainted with many trappers and guides of the west. After his return home he devoted mainly to portraying their life and habits. Among his works are "Boone's First View of Kentucky," "On the Wing," "Washington on his Mission to the Indians" (1847), "Duck-Shooting," which is in the Corcoran gallery, Washington, "The Sleigh-Ride," and "The Trapper's Last Shot." Many of these have been engraved. He was a frequent exhibitor at the National academy, of which he was elected an associate in 1859.

RANSEY, Alonzo Jacob, politician, b. in Cohoes, N. Y., 3 Jan., 1835; d. there, 17 Aug., 1882. He was the son of free colored people, and, having obtained by himself some education, was employed, when sixteen years of age, as a shipping-clerk by a merchant of Charleston. In October, 1865, he took part in a convention of the friends of equal rights in Charleston, and was deputed to present to Congress the memorial that was adopted. He was elected a member of the Constitutional convention of 1868, was an elector on the Grant and Colfax presidential ticket, and was sent to the legislature in the following year. He was also chosen chairman of the Republican state central committee, filling that office till 1872, and in 1870 was elected lieutenant-governor of South Carolina by a large majority. He was president of the convention from the southern states that was held at Columbia, S. C., in 1871, and was a vice-president of the Republican national convention at Philadelphia in 1872. In that year he was elected a representative in congress, and served from 1 Dec., 1873, till 3 March, 1875. When the Democratic party reached power in South Carolina in 1877, he left Congress and after laboring among the people, he became employed, from that time till his death, as a street-laborer.

RANSOM, George Marcellus, naval officer, b. in Springfield, Otsego co., N. Y., 18 Jan., 1820. He was educated in the common schools of New York and Ohio, and entered the navy as a midshipman on 25 July, 1837, and was made a full midshipman on 27 July, 1843, a master on 28 June, 1853, and a lieutenant on 21 Feb., 1854. He served on the coast of Africa in 1856-7, was commissioned lieutenant - commander on 10 July, 1862, and, in command of the steam gun-boat "Reno," of the Western Gulf blockading squadron, had several engagements with the enemy in May and June, and was severely wounded in one of them. He was appointed commander on 2 Jan., 1863, and, with the North Atlantic blockading squadron in command of the steamer "Grand Gulf" in 1864, and captured three steamers off Wilmington. He was commissioned captain on 2 March, 1870, and commodore on 28 March, 1877, and was retired, 18 June, 1882.

RANSOM, Matt Whitaker, senator, b. in Warren county, N. C., 8 Oct., 1826. He was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1847, and admitted to the bar the same year, and was presidential elector on the Whig ticket in 1852. For the subsequent three years he was state attorney-general. Governor Geo. W. Jones, of the antislavery party, was a member of the legislature in 1858, and, in 1861 one of the three North Carolina commissioners to the Confederate congress in Montgomery, Ala. He did his utmost to avert the war, but, on the secession of his state, volunteered as a private in the Confederate service, and was at once appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 1st North Carolina infantry, with which he marched to the seat of war in Virginia. He was chosen colonel of the 55th North Carolina infantry in 1862, participated with his regiment in all the important battles of the Army of Northern Virginia, was severely wounded in the seven days' fight around Richmond, and was promoted brigadier-general in 1863 and major-general in 1865, but the fall of the Confederacy found him still colonel of the 55th North Carolina regiment, and he resigned his commission. He resumed his profession in 1866, exerted a pacific influence in the politics of his state, was elected to the U. S. senate as a Democrst in 1872, and has served successively by re-election until March, 1895.—His brother, Robert, soldier, b. in North Carolina about 1830; d. in New-berne, N. C., 14 Jan., 1862. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, and assigned to the 1st dragons. He was promoted 1st lieutenant in the 1st cavalry, 3 March, 1855, and captain, 31 Jan., 1861, but resigned, 24 May, 1861, and was appointed captain of cavalry in the Confederate army in June. He was made colonel of the 9th North Carolina cavalry soon afterward, became brigadier-general, 6 March, 1863, and major-general, 29 May, 1863. He commanded a brigade and the defenses near Kinston, N. C., in 1862, and the Department of Richmond from 25 April till 13 June, 1864. He also commanded the sub-district, No. 2, of the department that included South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida in November, 1864.

RANSOM, Truman Bishop, soldier, b. in Woodstock, Vt., a city of Mexico, 13 Sept., 1847. He was early left an orphan, entered Capt. Alden Partridge's military academy soon after its opening, taught in several of the schools that Capt. Partridge established subsequently, and on the incorporation of Norwich university in 1855 became vice-president and professor of natural philosophy and engineering. He was also instrumenal in having the legislature recognize the Vermont militia, in which he was major-general in 1857-4, and in 1844 succeeded Capt. Partridge as president of the university. He was an unsuccessful Democratic candidate for congress in 1849, and for lieutenant-governor in 1846, Gen. Ransom volunteered for the Mexican war, was appointed major of the 9th U. S. infantry on 16 Feb. 1847, was made colonel of the 11th Illinois, and was made major of the 14th Illinois, and was mustering a regiment at Charleston, Mo., 20 Aug., 1861. He participated in the capture of Fort Henry, and led his regiment in the assault upon Fort Donelson, where he was again severely wounded, yet would not leave the field till the battle was ended. He was promoted colonel for his bravery and skill.

At Shiloh he was in the hottest part of the battle, and, though wounded in the head early in the action, remained with his command through the day. He served as chief of staff, 1812-'15, under Gen. John A. McClellan, inspector-general of the Army of the Tennessee, and subsequently on the staff of Gen. Grant, 1865-66.

T. E. Ransom was made a brigadier-general, his commission dating from 29 Nov., 1862. He distinguished himself at Vicksburg, and was at the head of a division in the Red River campaign, taking command of the corps when Gen. McClellan fell ill. In the battle of Sabine Cross-Roads he received a wound in the knee, from which he never recovered. He commanded a division, and later the 17th corps, in the operations about Atlanta, and, though attacked with sickness, directed the movements of his troops in the pursuit of Gen. John B. Hood's army until he sank under the disease. Gen. Ransom was buried in Rose Hill cemetery, Chicago. He was brevetted major-general on 2 Feb., 1865. Before Grant's premonition Ransom had been among the ablest volunteer generals in their commands. A Grand army post in St. Louis was named in his honor, and a tribute to his memory was delivered at Chicago on Decoration-day, 1886, by Gen. William T. Sherman. See "Sketches of Illinois Officers," by James Grant Wilson (Chicago, 1892).

RANSONNIER, Jean Jacques, surgeon and physician, born in Burgundy in 1600; d. in 1640. He finished his studies in Malines, entered the Society of Jesus in 1619, and at his own request was sent to Paraguay in 1625. After laboring successfully among the Indians for several years, he visited the tribe of the Matilles in 1632, converted them, and became their legislator as well as their apostle. He spent the remainder of his life among them. His letters were published under the title "Lettres Annuelles 1626 et 1627, province Paraguay, Societatis Jesu" (Antwerp, 1656). Pinedo asserts that Ransonnier's letters were merely translations from the manuscript of an Italian missionary.

RANTOUL, Robert, reformer, b. in Salem, Mass., 30 Nov., 1787; d. in Beverly, Mass., 21 Oct., 1858. His father, Robert, a native of Kinross-shire, Scotland, was descended from an ancient family prominent in the ecclesiastical and literary annals of Scotland, came to America at the age of sixteen, and settled in Salem. The son became a druggist at Beverly in 1796. He sat in the legislature from 1806 till 1829, in the state senate from 1821 till 1823, and in the house of representatives again till 1833. He was a member of the State constitutional conventions of 1820 and 1851. After taking part in the militia and coast-guard service of 1812-'15, he became a member of the Massachusetts peace society. He enlisted, as early as 1803, in movements to suppress the common use of ardent spirits, and became a life member of the Massachusetts state temperance society at its inception in 1819. While in the legislature he raised a question as to the expediency of capital punishments, prompted by the hanging for arson on Salem neck, in 1821, of a lad of seventeen, and the continued agitation of this question by himself and his son has done much to ameliorate the criminal legislation of the country. He was a pioneer in the liberal religious movements of the first years of the nineteenth century, and when these took form, in 1819, in Dr. William E. Channing's Baltimore sermon he became a pronounced Unitarian, and two after it published a correspondence on the subject of popular beliefs with Rammohun Roy, of Calcutta. In 1810 he took part in establishing at Beverly a charity-school which was the first Sunday-school in America. His sister, Polly, was the mother of Dr. Andrew P. Peabody. He was an active member of the Massachusetts historical society. His son, Robert, statesman, b. in Beverly, Mass., 13 Aug., 1805; d. in Washington, D. C., 7 Aug., 1872, was graduated at Harvard in 1826, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1829, and began practice in Salem, but transferred his practice in 1839 to South Reading, Mass. In 1832 he removed to Gloucester. He was elected to the legislature in 1834, serving four years, and assuming at once a prominent position as a leader of the Jacksonian Democracy, in which interest he established at Gloucester a weekly journal. In the legislature he formed a friendship with John G. Whittier, who wrote a poem in his memory. He sat upon the first commission to revise the laws of Massachusetts, and was an active member of the judiciary committee. He interested himself in the establishment of lyceums. He represented the state in the first board of directors of the Western railroad, and in 1837 became a member of the Massachusetts board of education. In 1839 he established himself in Boston, and in 1840 he appeared in defence of the principles of the boomers' organization, indicted for a conspiracy to raise wages, and procured their discharge on the ground that a combination of individuals to effect, by means not unlawful, that which each might legally do, was not a criminal conspiracy. He opposed the central railroad in Rhode Island two persons indicted for complicity in the Dorr rebellion of 1842, Daniel Webster being the opposing counsel. He was appointed U. S. district attorney for Massachusetts in 1845, and held that office till 1849, when he resigned. He delivered in April, 1850, at Concord the address in commoration of the outbreak of the Revolution. In 1850 he was the organizer and a corporator of the Illinois Central railroad. Daniel Webster having withdrawn from the senate in 1850, on the appointment of the secretary of state, and having been succeeded by Robert C. Winthrop, Mr. Rantoul was elected, serving nine days. He was chosen as an opponent of the extension of slavery by a coilation of Democrats and Freesoilers to the National House of representatives, and served from 1 Dec., 1851, till his death. In 1832 he was refused a seat in the National Democratic convention on the ground that he and his constituents were disfranchised by their attitude toward slavery. He was an advocate of various reforms, and delivered lectures and speeches on the subject of educational advancement, several of which were published, and he published in Massachusetts's legislature a report in favor of the abolition of the death-penalty that was long quoted by the opponents of capital punishment. He took a prominent part in the agitation against the fugitive-slave law. As counsel in 1851 for Thomas Simms, the first escaped slave delivered up by Massachusetts, he took the ground that slavery was a benevolent institution, and that the general government had no power to return fugitives from justice, or runaway apprentices or slaves, but that such extradition was a matter for arrangement between the states. He lent his voice and pen to the movement against the use of stimulants, but protested against prohibitory legislation as an invasion of personal rights. After leaving the legislature, he practiced the law in the county of Essex, and became a member of its bar and capable counselor of the people. His oratory was famous for its power, eloquence, and his ardent convictions against the protection of native industry and other enlargements of the sphere of government, and in favor of educational and moral reforms had attracted attention, he became a favorite lecturer and political speaker throughout New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. He edited a "Workingmen's Library," that was issued by the lyceum in a series of a "Common School Library" that was published under the sanction of the Massachusetts board of education. See his "Memoirs, Speeches, and Writings," edited by Luther Hamilton (Boston, 1854).—The second Robert's son, Robert Samuel, antiquarian, b. in Beverly, Mass., 2 June, 1832, was graduated at Harvard in 1855 and at Harvard law-school in 1856. On being admitted to the bar, he settled in Beverly, which he represented in the legislature in 1858, and afterward removed to Salem, Mass. He was collector of Salem in 1863-9, and representative from that town in 1864-5. Besides an oration on the "Centennial of American Independence," delivered in Stuttgart, Germany, 4 July, 1876, and one delivered in Salem on the "Landing of John Winthrop," and "Fifteenth Anniversary Celebration of the "Mishna," which he issued jointly with Rev. D. A. de Sola, of London (1840). His principal work was a "Post-Biblical History of the Jews," a collection of his lectures on that subject (2 vols., New York, 1855; new ed., 1896). His other books include "Festivals of the Lord," essays (London, 1839); "Devotional Exercises for the Daughters of Israel" (New York, 1852); "The Path to Immortality" (1839); and "Bible View of Slavery," a discourse (1861). He also undertook, with other scholars, an annotated translation of the Scriptures, of which the volume on "Genesis" was issued in 1844.

RAPP, George, founder of the sect of Harmonists, or Harmonites, b. in Wurttemburg, Germany, in 1770; d. in the Borough of Franklin (New York, 1848). He early conceived the idea of reforming modern society by the literal realization of the precepts in the New Testament, and collected a band of believers who were anxious to revive the practices of the primitive church; but the civil authorities interfered. Rapp and his followers therefore emigrated in 1803 to Pennsylvania, and on Connequoc, a portion of the estate of Henry Wilkins, established a religious society in which all things were held in common, and members of both sexes adopted the practice of celibacy. Their settlement was named Harmony. By the cultivation of the land, and by weaving and other industries, they acquired wealth. In 1815 the community removed to a tract of 27,000 acres, lying along the Wabash river in Indiana. In their new settlement, which they called New Harmony, they attained a much higher state of prosperity. In 1824, however, they sold the land and improvements to Robert Owen, for the purpose of establishing a socialistic colony, and settled in Beaver county, Pa., on the right bank of the Ohio river, seventeen miles northwest of Pittsburg, where they built the village of Economy, containing a church, a school, a museum, a hundred dwellings, and mills for the manufacture of wollen cloth, flax, cotton goods, caplets, and flour. Proselytes are received into the society, and admitted to full membership after a probation of six months. Those who sever their connection with the community receive back, without interest, the treasure that they put into the common store. Offences are punished by temporary suspension or expulsion. In 1855, 300 Harmonists went to France to labor among the masses. John Miller, an impositor, who had been admitted under the name of Proli, and who persuaded his dupes that he was the Lord's anointed, sent to establish the millennial kingdom. After founding New Jerusalem, near Pittsburg, Miller absconded with the greater part of $100,000, belonging to his followers, that had been paid over to the chest of the Harmonist community. The Harmony society increased in numbers by the accession of other converts. Rapp was the spiritual head and dictator of the community, and when he died his place was taken by the merchant Becker. On their farm, which embraces 3,500 acres, the Harmonists raise live-stock, pursue, silk-culture, make wine, and cultivate flax, grain, fruits, and vegetables. In 1851 the village of Harmony was set off from the township of Economy.

RAPPE, Louis Amadens, R. C. bishop, b. in Andenheim, France, 2 Feb., 1804; d. in St. Alban's, Vt., 9 Sept., 1877. His parents were peasants, and up to his twentieth year he labored in the fields. Believing that he was called to the priesthood, he applied himself to study, and, after a classical course, entered the seminary of Arras, and was ordained a priest, 14 March, 1829. He was appointed pastor of Wisme, and subsequently chaplain of the Ursuline convent in Boulogne. With the permission of his superiors, he sailed for the United States in 1840, and in 1841 was appointed to minister to the laborers on the Erie and Erie canals and the settlers along Maumee river. He established a branch of the Sisters of Notre Dame in Toledo, and prepared a convent and school for them. In 1847 the northern part of Ohio was erected into the see of Cleveland, and Father Rappe was nominated its first bishop, and consecrated at Cincinnati by Bishop Purcell on 10 Dec., 1847. He began at once building a cathedral in Cleveland in the following year, and consecrated it in 1852. In 1851 he opened St. Mary's orphan asylum for girls, and founded the order of Sisters of Charity of St. Augustine, gave them charge of St. Vincent's asylum for boys in 1853, and introduced many other religious organizations. The want of a hospital was felt severely in Cleveland during the civil war. Bishop Rappe offered to build one in 1863 and provide nurses, on condition that the public would aid him. His offer was accepted, and the hospital was completed in 1865 at a cost of $75,000, and placed in charge of the Sisters of Charity. He attended the Vatican council in 1869, although in feeble health. He had met with bitter opposition from some members of his flock, who made unwarranted attacks on his character, and he tendered his resignation, which was accepted, on 22 Aug., 1870. He was offered another diocesan several years afterward, but declined it, and spent the remainder of his life in the diocese of Burlington, engaged in the duties of a missionary priest. When Bishop Rappe died possession of the diocese of Cleveland it contained about 25,000 Roman Catholics, with 28 priests and 34 churches. He left it with more than 100,000 Roman Catholics, 107 priests, 160 churches, and 90 schools.

RAREY, John S., horse-tamer, b. in Franklin county, Ohio, in 1828; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 4 Oct., 1866. At a very early age he drove his father's team of aging horses, and by degrees he worked out a system of training that was founded on his own observations. He went to Texas in 1856, and, after experimenting there, gave public exhibitions in Ohio, and from that time was almost continuously before the public. About 1860 he went to Europe and surprised his audiences everywhere by his command of the horses, which was considered almost unmanageable. In England particularly the most vicious were brought to him, and he never failed to control them. One of the greatest triumphs of his skill was the taming of the racing-colt "Cruiser," which was so vicious that he had killed one or two grooms, and was kept under control by an iron muzzle. Under Mr. Rarey's treatment he became perfectly gentle and tractable, and was sent to Mr. Rarey to this country. In 1863 Mr. Rarey was employed by the government to inspect and report upon the horses of the Army of the Potomac. He was the author of a "Treatise on Horse-Taming," of which 15,000 copies were sold in France in one year (London, 1857; new ed., 1864).

RASLE, Sebastien, French missionary, b. in Dale, France, in 1658; d. in Norridgewock, Me., 12 Aug., 1724. His name is often improperly spelled Rasle, Rale, and Rie. His family was distinguished in the province of Franche-Comte, and, after completing his studies in Dijon, he became a Jesuit, most against the wish of his parents, and taught Greek for a time in the college of the society at Besancon. He had been a Jesuit in the missions of Canada, and, sailing from La Rochelle, 23 July, he landed at Quebec on 13 Oct. After having charge of various missions he was placed in charge of the station of Norridgewock, on Kennebec river, about 1806. Here he made a thorough study of the Abenaki language, and, by sharing the dangers and hardships of the Indians, he acquired such an intimacy among them that the French authorities at Quebec thought advisable to utilize it in the struggle against England. A correspondence was carried on between Rasle and Gov. Vaudreuil, and the latter induced him to promote a hostile sentiment among the Indians against the English settlers. Rasle readily accepted the suggestion, as it not only agreed with his patriotic feelings, but was also a means of checking Protestantism, which the English represented. But it has been incorrectly stated that Rasle instigated also the attacks of the Indians on the English settlements along the coast, as he only endeavored to prevent the Abenakis from having dealings with the English. Public opinion in New England came aroused against him, especially after the failure of the conference between Gov. Dudley, of Boston, and the Abenaki chiefs in 1702, at which Rasle was present, and in which the Indians declined the English alliance and affirmed their resolution to stand by the French. President Lincoln on the evening of his murder.—Henry Reed's brother, Jared Lawrence, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., 29 Sept., 1844, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1865, was assigned to the 12th infantry, in 1866—70 was aide to Gen. John M. Schofield, and was transferred to the artillery in 1880. Resigning in 1872, he engaged in stock-raising and mining in California. He was appointed U. S. commissioner for the Pacific Maritimes.

RATTRAY, William Jordan, Canadian author, b. in London, England, in 1835; d. in Toronto, Canada, 26 Sept., 1883. His father, a Scotchman, came to Canada in 1848, and settled with his family in Toronto. The son was graduated at the University of Toronto in 1858, and afterward was a journalist in that city. Among his writings was a series of articles on the conflict of agrarianism and revealed religion, which presented the orthodox side of the question with great force. He was for many years connected with the Toronto "Mail," wrote for the "Canadian Monthly" and other periodicals, and published "The Scot in British North America" (4 vols., Toronto, 1883).

RAE, Charles, a Roman Catholic in Vervain, Belgium, in 1856; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 25 July, 1887. He was educated in Germany, came to the United States in 1848, and taught in the west and afterward in New York city. From 1853 until his death he was curator in the department of antiquities in the U. S. national museum in Washington, D. C. Devoting his attention to archaeology, he began to write on American antiquities for "Die Natur." His contributions to the publications of the Smithsonian institution first appeared in 1863, and subsequently his articles were published in nearly every annual report of that institution, gaining for him a high reputation as an authority on American archaeology. The University of Freiburg, Baden, gave him the degree of Ph. D. in 1882. He was a member of the principal archaeological and anthropological societies of Europe and America, and published more than fifty papers, among which was a series on the "Stone Age in Europe," originally contributed to "Harper's Magazine," and afterward issued in book-form as "Early Man in Europe" (New York, 1876). His other publications were The Archeological Collection of the United States National Museum (Washington, 1876); "The Palenque Tablet in the United States National Museum" (1879); "Articles on Anthropological Subjects," 1853—87 (1882); two partly published works on the types of North American implements; and one that was designed to be a comprehensive treatment of archeology in America. Dr. Rau bequeathed his library and collection to the U. S. national museum in Washington.

RAUCH, Friedrich August, educator, b. in Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, 27 July, 1806; d. in Merecsburg, Pa., 2 March, 1841. He was graduated at the University of Marburg, afterward studied at Giessen and Heidelberg, and became extraordinary professor at the University of Giessen. He fled from the country on account of a public utterance on some political subject, and landed in the United States in 1831, learned English in Easton, Pa., where he gave lessons on the piano forte, was professor of German in Lafayette college for a short time, was then chosen as principal of a classical school that had been established by the authorities of the German Reformed church at York, Pa., and a few months later was ordained to the ministry and appointed professor of biblical literature in the theological seminary at York, while retaining charge of the academy, which, in 1835, was removed to Merecsburg. RATHBONE, John Finley, manufacturer, b. in Albany, N. Y., 18 Oct., 1821. He was educated at Albany academy and the Collegiate institute at Brockport, N. Y. In 1845 he built a foundry in Albany that is now one of the largest establishments of the kind in the world. In 1861 he was appointed brigadier-general of the 9th brigade of the National guard of New York, and at the beginning of the civil war he was made commandant of the Albany depot of volunteers. From this depot he sent to the front thirty-five regiments. In 1867 he resigned his office as commander of the 9th brigade. Under the administration of Gov. John A. Dix he was appointed adjutant-general of the state, with the rank of major-general. As a private citizen Mr. Rathbone has been conspicuous for his zeal in promoting works of philanthropy. He is one of the founders of the Albany orphan asylum, and for many years has been president of its board of trustees. He is a trustee of the University of Rochester, in connection with which he established, by his contribution of $40,000, the Rathbone library.—His cousin, Henry Reed, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., 1 July, 1847, was appointed major of U. S. volunteers on 29 Nov., 1862, and resigned on 8 July, 1867. He received a wound from the assassin's dirk in the theatre-box with management the school flourished, and in 1836 was transformed into Marshall college, of which he became the first president. He published "Psychology, or a View of the Human Soul" (New York, 1840), and left in an unfinished state works on "Christian Ethics" and "Esthetics." A volume of his sermons, edited by Emmanuel V. Gerhart, was published under the title of The Inner Life of the Christian. Cincinnati, 1859.

JOSEPH, III. Jacob, physician, b. in Lebanon, Pa. 4 Sept., 1828: d. in Chicago, 24 March, 1894. He was graduated in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania and settled in Burlington, Iowa. In 1850, on the organization of the State medical society, he was appointed to report on the "Medical and Economic Botany of Iowa," and this report was afterward published (1851). He was an active member of the Iowa historical and geological institute, and made a collection of material—especially ichthyology—from the upper Mississippi and Missouri rivers for Prof. Agassiz, a description of which was published in "Silhman's Journal" (1859). In 1857 he was appointed professor of materia medica and medical botany in Rush medical college, Chicago, and served in that capacity for ten years. In 1868 he was one of the organizers of the Chicago college of pharmacy and filled its chair of materia medica and medical botany. During the civil war he served as assistant medical director of the Army of Virginia, and then in Louisiana till 1864. At the close of the war he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel. On his return to Chicago, Dr. Raumer published a paper on "Influence and Interments and their Influence on Health and Epidemics" (Chicago, 1869). He aided in reorganizing the health service of the city, and in 1867 was appointed member of the newly created board of health and sanitary superintendent, which office he filled until 1873. During his incumbency the great fire of 1874 occurred, and the task of organizing and enforcing the sanitary measures for the welfare of 112,000 houseless men, women, and children was suddenly thrown upon his department. In 1876 he was elected president of the American public health association, and delivered the annual address on the "Sanitary Problems of Chicago" at the 1877 meeting of the association. In 1877, when the city was under a state of financial depression, Dr. Raumer was appointed one of its members, and elected its first president. He was elected secretary, to which office he had been re-elected annually for years. In 1878-9 the yellow-fever epidemics in the southwest engaged his attention, resulting in the formation of the sanitary council of the Mississippi valley and the establishment of the river-inspection service of the National board of health, inaugurated by Dr. Raumer in 1879. His investigations on the relation of small-pox to foreign immigration are embodied in an address before the National conference of state boards of health at St. Louis, 13 Oct., 1884, entitled "Practical Recommendations for the Exclusion and Prevention of Asiatic Cholera in North America" (Springfield, 1884). In 1887 he published the preliminary results of his investigations into the character of the water-supplies of Illinois. Dr. Raumer was a member of many scientific bodies and the author of monographs, chiefly in the domain of sanitary science and preventive medicine. His chief work as a writer is entitled "Life and Health of the Illinois state board of health in eight volumes.

RAUTE, Charles Godlove, physician, b. in Saxon, 11 May, 1820: d. 6 Aug., 1896. He was graduated at the College of teachers in Bautzen, Saxony, in 1844, and at Philadelphia medical college in 1850. From 1864 to 1872 he was professor of pathology and practice at the Homoeopathic college of Pennsylvania, and at Hahnemann medical college in Philadelphia. He is the author of "Die neue Sedenlehre Dr. Benecke's, nach methodischen Grundsatzen fur Lehrer bearbeitet" (Bautzen, 1847); "Special Pathology and Diagnosics with Therapeutic Hints" (Philadelphia, 1865); and Annual "Annals of Homoeopathic Literature" (New York, 1870).

RAUMER, Green Berry, Commissioner of Internal revenue, b. in Golconda, Pope co., Ill., 3 Dec., 1829. He received a common-school education, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1856. In 1856 he removed with his family to Kansas, and at once affiliated with the Free-state party. Becoming obnoxious to the pro-slavery faction, he returned to the following year to Illinois and settled at Harrisburg. At the opening of the civil war he made his first speech as a "war" Democrat while he was attending court at Metropolis, Ill. Subsequently he entered the army as major of the 56th Illinois regiment, and was promoted lieutenant-colonel, colonel, and brevet brigadier-general. He was brevetted major-general by the act of June 5, 1865, which commission he resigned on 6 May. He served under Gen. William S. Rosecrans in the Mississippi campaign of 1862. At the battle of Corinth he ordered and led the charge that broke the Confederate left and captured a battery. He was with Gen. Grant at Vicksburg, and was wounded at the battle of Missionary Ridge in November, 1863. He was re-elected to Congress in 1864-5, and held the line of communication from Dalton to Aeworth and from Kingston to Rome, Ga. In October, 1864, he re-enforced Resaca, Ga., and held it against Gen. John B. Hood. In 1866 he obtained a charter for the Cairo and Vincennes railroad company, aided in securing its construction, and became its first president. He was then elected to Congress, and served from 4 March, 1867, to 3 March, 1869. In 1876 he was president of the Illinois Republican convention, and in the same year he was a delegate to the National convention of that party in Cincinnati. He was appointed commissioner of internal revenue, 2 Aug., 1876, and retained the office till 31 May, 1885. During this period he was styled "the millionaire commissioner," and was credited with $30,000,000 without loss. He wrote "Reports" of his bureau for seven successive years. He is also the author of "The Existing Conflict between Republican Government and Southern Orientaly" (Washington, 1884). He afterward engaged in the practice of law in Washington, D. C.

RAUMER, Friedrich Hugw Georg von (now-reich, German historian, b. in Weilheim, near Dussau, 14 May, 1841; d. in Berlin, 14 May, 1873. He studied in the universities of Halle and Gottingen, was a civil magistrate in 1801, became in 1809 councillor to the state chancellor, Count von Hardenberg, was professor of history in the University of Breslau in 1811-14, and in 1813 became professor of political science and history at the University of Berlin. He was elected to the parliament of Frankfort by the latter city in 1848, and appointed by the Archduke John of Austria, vicar of the German empire, his ambassador to Paris in 1848. From 1851 up to the time of his death he was a member of the house of lords of Prussia. After 1866 Raumer undertook several journeys through France, Italy, Switzerland, and the United States, which he visited in 1841-3 and again in 1853-5. He is justly considered as one of the great historians of the 19th century. His works include "Geschichte der Hohenstaufen und ihrer Zeit." RAUSCHENBUSCH, Augustus, clergyman, b. in Altena, Westphalia, Germany, 13 Feb., 1836. He was graduated at the gymnasium at Elberfeld, and went in his nineteenth year to the University of Berlin to study for the Lutheran ministry. Subsequently he spent some time at the University of Bonn in the study of natural science and theology. On the death of his father, who was a Lutheran pastor in Altena, the son was chosen in 1841 as his successor. His ministry here, while fruitful in spiritual results, excited so much opposition, and was so hampered by his ecclesiastical relations, that he resolved to remove from the country. He came to this country in 1846, and preached for some time to the Germans in Missouri. In 1847 he removed to New York, where he edited the German tracts published by the American tract society. While he was residing in New York his views on the question of baptism underwent a change, and in 1850 he entered the Baptist communion, though retaining his connection with the Prussian government. The following year he published his famous work, "Geschichte Europas seit dem Ende des xvi. Jahrhunderts," (8 vols., 1852-59); "Beiträge zur neuen Geschichte" (5 vols., 1856-69); and "Die Vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika" (2 vols., 1855), which was translated into French (1840), and English (London, 1847). It was this work that brought him to the attention of the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge in that part of the world, and the bishop of the Missouri Conference arranged for him to spend a year at the University of Bonn in the study of natural science and theology.

Subsequently he spent some time at the University of Bonn in the study of natural science and theology. On the death of his father, who was a Lutheran pastor in Altena, the son was chosen in 1841 as his successor. His ministry here, while fruitful in spiritual results, excited so much opposition, and was so hampered by his ecclesiastical relations, that he resolved to remove from the country. He came to this country in 1846, and preached for some time to the Germans in Missouri. In 1847 he removed to New York, where he edited the German tracts published by the American tract society. While he was residing in New York his views on the question of baptism underwent a change, and in 1850 he entered the Baptist communion, though retaining his connection with the Prussian government. The following year he published his famous work, "Geschichte Europas seit dem Ende des xvi. Jahrhunderts," (8 vols., 1852-59); "Beiträge zur neuen Geschichte" (5 vols., 1856-69); and "Die Vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika" (2 vols., 1855), which was translated into French (1840), and English (London, 1847). It was this work that brought him to the attention of the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge in that part of the world, and the bishop of the Missouri Conference arranged for him to spend a year at the University of Bonn in the study of natural science and theology.

RAUSCHENBUSCH, Augustus, clergyman, b. in Altena, Westphalia, Germany, 13 Feb., 1836. He was graduated at the gymnasium at Elberfeld, and went in his nineteenth year to the University of Berlin to study for the Lutheran ministry. Subsequently he spent some time at the University of Bonn in the study of natural science and theology. to Virginia on family affairs, and, having a desire to study law, he entered William and Mary with this object; but he never accomplished it.

In 1792 he went to Scotland again, settled his father's estate, and, on coming back to Virginia, surrendered himself to a country life in Lunenburg county, regardless of religion and religious obligations. In 1810 he united with a body of professing Christians, called "Reformers," but the connection did not last long. In 1815 he became a candidate for the Protestant Episcopal church, and was elected by it.

In order to supplement his salary, he assumed the rectorship of Christ Church, Raleigh, which he held for five years, during which time his health failed. He attended the general convention in Philadelphia in August, 1829, but, on his return home, gradually sank until his death. Bishop Ravencroft published numerous sermons that he preached on special occasions and were published, together with 61 sermons, selected by himself, and a memoir of his life, edited by Dr. (afterward Bishop) Wainwright (2 vols., New York, 1839).

RAWLLE, Francis, colonist, b. in England about 1660; d. in Philadelphia, 9 March, 1727. He was a member of the Society of Friends. With his father, of the same name, he came to Pennsylvania in 1681, to escape persecution on account of his religious faith. He located 2,500 acres in Plymouth township, where, with a few others, he founded the settlement known as "The Plymouth Friends." In 1688 he was commissioned a justice of the peace of the Province of Pennsylvania, and in 1691 was appointed to the city charter. In 1692 he was named as one of the six aldermen; in 1695 he became a deputy in the Assembly; and in 1694 he was a commissioner of property. He was subsequently chosen to the provincial Assembly, in which he served for ten years, and to the provincial council. He was said to be the first person in the British colonies in America that wrote on the subject of political economy and its application to local requirements. In 1721 he published "Some Remedies Proposed for the Restoring the sunk Credit of the Province of Pennsylvania; with Some Remarks on its Trade, Humbly Offer'd to the Consideration of the worthy Representatives in the General Assembly of this Province. By a Lover of his Country." During the following year numerous petitions came to the Assembly, praying for the issuance of paper money, and a committee, with Rawle at the head, was appointed, to whom was committed "the drawing up the bill for issuing bills of credit, &c." The bill then drawn became a law. The paper money issue was renewed under it, and the first, in the Province of Virginia. In 1727 he published "Ways and Means for the Inhabitants of Delaware to become Rich; Wherein the several Gains and Products of these Countries are demonstrated to be a sufficient Fund for a flourishing Trade. Humbly submitted to the Legislative Authority of these Colonies." This book is said to be the first that was printed by Franklin. George Brinley's copy of this work sold for $100. In the following year he published "A Just Rebuke to a Dialogue betwixt Simon and Timothy, shewing What's therein to be found, &c.," being a reply to James Logan's "Dialogue shewing What's therein to be found, &c." (Philadelphia, 1725), printed by Logan Rawley. "Ways and Means."—His great-grandson, William, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, 28 April, 1759; d. there, 12 April, 1836, was educated at the Friends' academy, and was yet a student when the war for independence was begun. His immediate relatives and connections were loyalists. On the evacuation of Philadelphia by the British, young Rawle accompanied his stepfather, Samuel Shoemaker, who had been one of the civil magistrates of the city under Howe, to New York, and there began the study of the law. Mr. Rawle completed his studies in the Middle Temple, London, and returned to Philadelphia, where, in 1783, he was admitted to the bar. In 1791 he was appointed by President Washington U. S. district attorney for Pennsylvania. By direction of the president, Mr. Rawle accompanied the U. S. district judge and the military on the western expedition in 1794, and it became his duty to prosecute the offenders after the insurrections in that year and in 1798 had been put down. In 1792 he was offered by the president the office of judge of the U. S. district court for Pennsylvania, but declined it on account of his youth and professional prospects. He was for many years the assistant counsel for the Bank of the United States. From 1796 till his death he was a member of the American philosophical society, and for twenty years he was one of its councilors. In 1799 he was chosen to the assembly. He was one of the original members of the Society for political inquiries, founded by Franklin, which held its weekly meetings at his house. From 1796 till his death he was a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania. He was the chancellor of the Assembly, and one of the members of the bar of Philadelphia, and when, in 1827, this institution was merged in the Law association of Philadelphia, he became chancellor of that society in 1828, and held the office till his death. He was chosen the first vice-president of the Law academy, was one of the founders of the Historical society of Pennsylvania in 1834, and its first president. He was also a member of the Agricultural, Humane, Linnæan, and Abolition societies and the president of the latter. For many years he was secretary and afterward a director of the Library company of Philadelphia. In 1830 he was appointed, with Thomas I. Wharton and Joel Jones, to revise the civil code of Pennsylvania, and he was the principal author of the reports of the commission, the results of whose labors are embodied in statutes that still remain in force. Among his published writings are "An Address before the Philadelphia Society for promoting Agriculture" (Philadelphia, 1819); "Two Addresses to the Associated Members of the Bar of Philadelphia" (1824); "A View of the Constitution of the United States" (1825); and "The Study of the Law" (1822). To the literature of the Historical society he contributed a "Vindication of the Rev. Mr. Heckewelder's History of the Indian Nations," a "Biographical Sketch of Sir William Keith," and "A Sketch of the Life of Dr. Logan" (1825). Mr. Rawle was a contributor of short descriptions on theological matters, among them an "Essay on Angelic Influences," and an argument on the evidences of Christianity. He was a fine classical scholar. He translated from the Greek the "Phaedo" of Plato, adding thereto a commentary thereon. These "would in themselves alone," according to David Paul Brown, "suffice to protect his name against oblivion." He received the degree of LL. D. from Princeton in 1827, and from Dartmouth in 1828. See a sketch of him by Thomas I. Wharton (Philadelphia, 1840).—William's son, William, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, 19 July, 1788; d. in Montgomery county, Pa., 9 Aug., 1858, was educated at Princeton, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia in 1810. During the war of 1812 he served as captain of the troop of Philadelphia city cavalry. Returning to the practice of the law, he in due time attained a rank at the bar but little inferior to that of his father. He was for four years president of the common council. He was a member of the American philosophical society, for many years a vice-president of the Historical society of Pennsylvania, and secretary, and afterward a director, of the Library company, and for twenty years a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania. As reporter of the state supreme court, he published 25 volumes of reports (1818–33). Among his published writings are an "Address before the Law Academy of Philadelphia" (1855), and "An Address before the Trustees of Lafayette College, Easton, Pa." (1856).—The second William's son, William Henry, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, 31 Aug., 1823; d. there, 19 April, 1889, was graduated in 1841 at the University of Pennsylvania, from which he received in 1882 the degree of LL. D. He studied law with his father, was admitted to practice in 1844, and has won reputation in his profession. In 1862, upon the "emergent call," Mr. Rawle enlisted as a private of a company of artillery; on the same call, he served as quartermaster. He was a vice-provost of the Law academy from 1865 to 1873, later vice-chancellor of the Law association, and was for several years the secretary, and afterward a director, of the Library company. He published a treatise on the "Law of Covenants for Title" (Philadelphia, 1852); the 3d American edition of John W. Mifflin's "Political Economy," with notes (1853); with additional notes by George Sharswood, 1866); the 3d American edition of Joshua Williams' "Law of Real Property" (1857); "Equity in Pennsylvania," a lecture, to which was appended "The Registrar's Book of Gov. William Keith's Court in Chancery" (1868); "Some Contrasts in the Growth of Pennsylvania in English Law" (1858); a work on "The Marquess of Hastings' Monument erected by the Bar of the U. S. to Chief-Justice Marshall" (Washington, 1884); and "The Case of the Educated Unemployed," an address (1885).—William Henry's nephew, William Brooke-Rawle, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, 29 Aug., 1843, is the son of Charles Wallace Brooke by his wife, Elizabeth Tilghman, daughter of the second William Rawle, and has taken his surname Brooke-Rawle. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania.
Pennsylvania in 1863, and immediately afterward entered the army as lieutenant in the 3rd Pennsylvania cavalry. He was promoted captain and brevetted major and lieutenant-colonel, at the close of the war, studied law, and in 1867 was admitted to the Philadelphia bar. He is secretary of the Historical society of Pennsylvania, treasurer of the Law association of Philadelphia, and agent for the University of Pennsylvania. Col. Rawlins has published "The Right Flank at Gettysburg" (Philadelphia, 1878); "With Gregg in the Gettysburg Campaign" (1884); and "Gregg's Cavalry Fight at Gettysburg," an address delivered at the unveiling of the monument on the site of the cavalry engagement (1884).—The first William Rawlins' grandson, Henry, iron-master, b. in Millin county, Pa., 21 Aug., 1832, is the son of Francis William Rawle, a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, who served in the war of 1812, became a civil engineer, was largely engaged in the manufacture of iron, and was for some time judge of Clearfield county. The son studied civil engineering, and as a young man engaged in constructing the Pennsylvania railroad, and became principal assistant engineer in western Pennsylvania and Erie railroad. He subsequently engaged extensively in the coal and iron business in Erie, Pa., and established the Erie blast-furnace and Erie rolling-mill. In 1874-6 he was mayor of Erie, and from 1876 till 1878 he was treasurer of Pennsylvania.—Henry's brother, Francis, lawyer, b. in Millin county, Pa., 7 Aug., 1835, was graduated Harvard in 1859 and a lawyer licensed in 1874, and in the latter year was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia. He has published two revised editions of Bouverie's "Law Dictionary," in which are given seven hundred subjects not named in the original work (Philadelphia, 1883-5).

RAWLINGS, Moses, soldier, b. in Anne Arundel county, Md., about 1749; d. in Hampshire county, Va., in 1808. His ancestor, Henry, was among the first settlers of Maryland, having emigrated to the colony in 1639. In 1659 his son, Anthony, was a member of Gov. Calvert's colonial council. Moses Rawlings was educated in the parish school of his native county and afterward by private tutors. His father was a wealthy tenant farmer, and the family held the occupation. He was a zealous patriot, and when in June, 1775, Maryland was called upon to furnish two companies of riflemen, he was among the first to volunteer for the service. He received a lieutenant's commission, and afterward joined Washington at Boston. In 1776 congress ordered several companies from Virginia and two more from Maryland, which, with the two companies that had been already raised, were formed into a regiment, of which Rawlings was commissioned lieutenant-colonel. At the storming of Fort Washington, 16 Nov., 1776, the Maryland riflemen withstood the attack of 30,000 Hessians for several hours, but, being unsupported by other troops, were at last obliged to retire under the guns of the fort, which was soon afterward surrendered to the enemy. In this action Rawlings commanded the Maryland riflemen with skill and bravery. He received the warmest praise from Washington for his conduct on this occasion. After his exchange he was made colonel of the riflemen, and fought in all the battles where the Maryland troops were engaged. At the close of the Post-war tratified of 1783, he was of Scotch-Irish extraction. His father, James D. Rawlings, removed from Kentucky to Missouri and then to Illinois. John passed his early years on the family farm, and attended the district school in winter. He also assisted at burning charcoal and hating it to market: but this work became disagreeable to him as he approached manhood. He sold his farm, carrying all the books within his reach, he attended the Mount Morris seminary in Ogle county, Ill., in 1852–3. His money having given out, he resumed his occupation of charcoal-burner that he might earn more; but, instead of returning to the seminary, as he had intended, he studied law with Isaac P. Stevens in Galena, and in October, 1854, was admitted to the bar and taken into partnership by his preceptor. In 1855 Mr. Stevens retired, leaving the business to be conducted by Rawlins. In 1857 he was elected attorney for the city of Galena, and in 1860 he was nominated for the electoral college on the Douglas ticket. During the contest that followed he held a series of joint discussions with Allen C. Fuller, the Republican candidate, and added greatly to his reputation as a public speaker. He held closely to the doctrines of Judge Douglas, but was, of course, defeated with his party. His own opinions were strongly opposed to human slavery, and yet he looked upon it as an evil protected within certain limits by the constitution of the United States. His love for the Union was, however, the master sentiment of his soul, and while he had followed his party in all peaceful advocacy of its claims, when the South Carolinians fired upon Fort Sumter, April 14, 1861, he did not hesitate for a moment to declare for coercion by the use of arms. He was outspoken for Union and for the war to maintain it, and at a mass-meeting at Galena on 16 April, 1861, Rawlins was called on to speak; but, instead of depreciating the war, as had been expected, he made a speech of an hour, in which he upheld it with signal ability and eloquence. Among those of the audience that had acted with the Democrats was Capt. Ulysses S. Grant. He was deeply impressed by the speech, and thereupon offered his services to the country, and from that time forth was the warm friend of Rawlins. The first act of Grant after he had been assigned to the command of a brigade, 7 Aug., 1861, was to offer Rawlins the post of aide-de-camp on his staff, and almost immediately afterward, when Grant was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, he offered Rawlins the position of captain and assistant adjutant-general, to date from 30 Aug., 1861. He joined Grant at Cairo, Ill., 15 Sept., 1861, and from that time was constantly with the latter till the end of the war, except from 1 Aug. to 1 Oct., 1861, when he was absent on sick-leave. He was promoted major, 14 April, 1862, lieutenant-colonel, 1 Nov., 1862, brigadier-general of volunteers, 11 Aug., 1863, brevet major-general of volunteers, 24 Feb., 1865, chief-of-staff to Lieu-tenant-Gen. Grant, with the rank of brigadier-general, U. S. army, 3 March, 1863, and brevet major-general, U. S. army, 13 March, 1865. Finally he was appointed secretary of war, 9 March, 1869, which office he held till his death. Before entering the army Rawlins had never seen a company of uniformed soldiers nor read a book on tactics or military organization, but he soon developed rare executive abilities. During Grant’s earlier career he was assistant adjutant-general, but his grant was small and his staff became larger, Rawlins became chief of staff. Early after joining Grant, Rawlins acquired great influence with him. He was bold, resolute, and outspoken in counsel, and never hesitated to give his opinion upon matters of importance, whether it was asked or not. His relations with Grant were closer than those of any other man, and so históly varied his sterling qualities and his great abilities that, in a letter to Henry Wilson, chairman of the senate military committee, urging his confirmation as brigadier-general, he declared that Rawlins was more nearly indispensable to him than any officer in the army. He was a man of austere habits, severe morals, aggressive temper, and of inflexible will, resolution, and courage. He verified, reasserted, and constantly repeated necessary, all the statements of Grant’s official reports, adhering as closely as possible to Grant’s original drafts, but making them conform to the facts as they were understood at headquarters. While he did not originate the idea of running the batteries at Vicksburg with the gun-boats and transports and marching the army by land below, he was its first and most persistent advocate. His views upon such questions were sound and vigorous, and were always an important factor in Gen. Grant’s decisions concerning them. At Chattanooga he became an ardent advocate of the plan of operations devised by Gen. William F. Smith, and adopted by Gen. Thomas and Grant, and for the relief of the army at Cha- nanooga, and for the battle of Missionary Ridge, where his persistence finally secured positive orders from Grant to Thomas directing the advance of the Army of the Cumberland that resulted in carrying the heights. He accompanied Grant to the Army of the Potomac, and, after careful study, threw his influence in favor of the overland campaign, but throughout the operations that followed he deprecated the repeated and continued marches that were in the nature of a retreat, and favored the flanking movements by which Lee was finally driven to the south side of the Potomac. It has been said that he opposed the march to the sea, and appealed to the government, over the head of his chief, to prevent it; but there is no evidence in his papers, nor in those of Lincoln or Stanton, to support this statement. It is doubletress true that he thought the time chosen for the march somewhat premature, and it is well known that he opposed the transfer of Sherman’s army by steamer from Savannah to the James river for fear that it would leave the country open for the march of all the southern forces to a junction with Lee in Virginia before Sherman could reach that field of action, and it is suggested that the recollection of these facts has been confused with such as would justify the statement above referred to, but which was not made till several years after his death. He was a devoted and loyal friend to Gen. Grant, and by far too good a disciplinarian to appeal secretly over his head to his superiors. His whole life is a refutation of this story, and when it is remembered that Rawlins did not gain, as of his own knowledge, it may well be dismissed from history. Rawlins, as secretary of war, was the youngest member of the cabinet, as he was the youngest member of Grant’s staff when he joined it at Cairo in 1861. He found the administration of the army as fixed by the law somewhat interfered with by an order issued by his predecessor, and this order he at once induced the president to countermand. From that time till his death he was a great sufferer from pulmonary consumption, which he had contracted by exposure during the war, but he performed all the duties of his office and exerted a commanding influence in the counsels of the president to the last. A bronze statue has been erected to his memory at Washington. He was married twice. After his death provision was made by a public subscription of $30,000 for his family.

Rawlins, Albert Leighton, author, b. in Clinton, Va., in 1829, was educated at the University of Virginia, theology, and art, he made four visits to the Orient, and in 1851 and 1852 made a pilgrimage from Cairo to Mecca with the annual caravan disguised as a Mohammedan student of medicine. He also explored the Indian mounds of the Mississippi valley, and visited Central America. In 1854-5, publishing “The Crania of the Mound-Builders of the United States and of Central America,” he traveled in the Hudson Bay territories in 1863. Mr. Rawlins has been adopted as a brother by the Adwan Bedawins of Moab and initiated by the Druzes in Mount Lebanon, is a founder of the Theosophical society in the United States, and is a member of various literary, scientific, and geographical societies. He has received honorary degrees, including that of Doctor of Laws from the University of Paris. He has published many maps and has illustrated books from original sketches, including “The Life of Jesus,” by Rev. Henry Ward Beecher (New York, 1871), has executed more than 5,000 engravings, contributed to magazines, and is the author of “Bible Dictionaries” (Philadelphia, 1870-5); “Histories of all Religions” (1879); “Statistics of Protestantism” (1876); “Antiquities of the Orient” (New York, 1870); “Vocabulary of the Bedawin Languages of Syria and Egypt” (Cairo, 1874); “Dictionaries of Arabic, German, and English” (Leip- zic, 1876); “Vocabulary of Persian and Turkish Languages” (Cairo, 1877); “Chorography of Palestine” (London, 1880); a translation of “The Symposium of Basra” (1880); “Historical and Archæo- logical Monuments of the Orient” (New York, 1884); and “The Unseen World” (1889).

Rawlins, Edward, colonial secretary, b. in Gillingham, Dorsetshire, England, 16 April, 1615; d. in Boston, Mass., 27 Aug., 1693. He settled in Newbury, Mass., about 1639, was graduated at Harvard in 1633, and represented Newbury in the general court, of which he was clerk. For many years he was secretary of Massachusetts colony, and he was also chosen “steward or agent for the receiving and disposing of such goods and commodities as should be sent to the United colonies from England toward Christianizing the Indians.” He is believed to have been one of the authors of a small book published in 1691, entitled “The Revolution in New England Justified,” and signed “E. R.” and “S. S.” He paid Maspits “The General Laws and Liberties concerning the Inhabitants of Massachusetts” (1690).—His son, Grindall, clergy- man, b. in Boston, Mass., 23 Jan., 1650; d. in Men- don, Mass., 6 Feb., 1713, was graduated at Har- vard in 1678, and was pastor of a church in Men- don from 1680 until his death. He was instructed by the commissioners for the propagation of the gospel, in 1698, to visit the Indians in New Eng- land. An account of this visit was published in the “Massachusetts Historical Collections” (1st series, vol. x). Several interesting anecdotes are recorded of Rev. Grindall Rawlins in connection with Cetton Mather, who mentions him in his "Mantissa," and says in one of his sermons: "We generally esteemed him as a truly pious man, and a very prudent one." He was an accomplished scholar and writer, and preached to the Indians in their own language. He published a sermon "preached to and at the request of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery company in 1763," an election sermon work entitled "The Confession of Faith," written in English and also in the Indian dialect.—Edward's daughter. Rebecca, b. in Boston, Mass., 23 May, 1656, was the heroine of a romantic episode in the history of the colony, commemorated by John W. Whittier in "Leaves from Margaret Smith's Journal" (1849). Her portrait is in possession of the New England historic-genealogical society. See Sullivan S. Rawson's "Memoir of Edward Rawson, with Genealogical Notices of his Descendants" (Boston, 1849), and "Genealogy of the Descendants of Edward Rawson," by Reuben Rawson Dodge (1849; revised ed., Worcester, Mass., 1875).

RAY, Isaac, physician, b. in Beverly, Mass., 16 Jan., 1779; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 31 March, 1851. He was graduated in medicine at Bowdoin in 1807, and practised in Portland and Eastport, Me. In 1841 he was appointed superintendent of the state insane asylum in Augusta, and in 1845 he was made superintendent of the Butler hospital for the insane in Providence, R. I. He held this office until 1856, and then removed to Philadelphia. Rawson gave him the degree of J. D. in 1859. In addition to many contributions to medical journals and other periodicals, and a series of valuable official reports, he was the author of "Conversations on Animal Economy" (Portland, 1829); "Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity" (Boston, 1838; London, 1839; 5th ed., enlarged, Boston, 1852); "Education in Relation to the Health of the Brains" (1834); and "Sensational Medicine" (1836).

RAY, James Brown, governor of Indiana, b. in Jefferson county, Ky., 19 Feb., 1794; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 4 Aug., 1848. After studying law in Cincinnati, he was admitted to the bar, and began to practise in Brookville. In 1822 he was elected to the legislature, in which he frequently served as president. In 1831 he was appointed governor of Indiana, and in 1836 he was appointed U. S. commissioner, with Lewis Cass and John Tipton, to negotiate a treaty with the Miami and Pottawattamie Indians for the purchase of lands in Indiana. The constitution of the state prevented the governor from holding any office under the U. S. government, and he was consequently involved in a controversy. Through his exertions the Indians gave land to aid in building a road from Lake Michigan to Ohio river. Gov. Ray was active in promoting railroad concentration in Indianapolis. He practised law, was a defeated candidate for congress in 1837, and in his later years became very eccentric.

RAY, John, b. in Washington county, Md., 18 Oct., 1818; d. in New Orleans, La., 4 March, 1888. His grandfather, John Ray, emigrated to Missouri, and was associated with Daniel Boone. He was a member of the 1st Constitutional convention there, and Ray county was named for him. The grandson was educated at Augusta college and Transylvania university, where he was graduated in 1837. He removed to Monroe, La., studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1839, and took high rank in his profession. He was elected in 1844 to the state house of representatives, and in 1850 to the state senate. In 1854 and again in 1859 he was nominated by the Whigs for lieutenant-governor, but was defeated. In 1860 he was an elector on the Bell-and-Everett presidential ticket, and canvassed northern Louisiana for these candidates, against the growing feeling in favor of secession. Throughout the civil war Mr. Ray was a consistent Unionist, and at its close he favored the plan of reconstruction that was advocated by the Republican party. In 1865 he was elected to congress, but, with all other representatives from "southern" states, he was refused a seat in that body. In 1868-72 he was again state senator. During the former year he was appointed to revise the civil code, the code of procedure, and the statutes of the state of Louisiana, and his revisions were adopted by the legislature of 1873. In 1872 he represented the 1st district in the state legislature until his death, and where he served as registrar of the state land-office from 1873 till 1877. In 1873 he was elected to the U. S. senate by the "Kellogg" legislature; but his election was contested by William L. McMillen, who had been chosen by the "Menery" legislature. Neither contestant was given a seat. In 1878 Mr. Ray was appointed by John Sherman of Ohio, as attorney for the United States to prosecute the "whiskey cases." He was also one of the attorneys of Mrs. Myra Gaines (q. v.), and at the time of his death was engaged in the prosecution of an important suit by which Louisiana is endeavoring to establish her title to certain swamp lands given her by the general government. He was also a member of the great majority of the French citizens of New Orleans to prosecute their claims under the international commission of 1850 to adjust the claims of French subjects against this government growing out of the operations of the National forces in Louisiana during the civil war. He published "Ray's Digest of the Laws of Louisiana" (2 vols., New Orleans, 1820-1840).

RAYMOND, Benjamin Wright, merchant, b. in Rome, N. Y., 33 Oct., 1801; d. in Chicago, Ill., 5 April, 1883. His father, a native of Massachusetts, was for several years engaged in surveying the northern counties of New York, selected the site of Potomac, lived there for several years, and was judge of the county. After serving as a clerk he removed to Cincinnati, and was elected U. S. senator from Ohio in 1851, and became secretary of the interior, and again re-elected senator in 1856. In 1860 he was elected to the United States Senate, and went to Chicago and began business as a merchant. In 1869 he was elected the third mayor of Chicago, and he was re-elected in 1872. He was one of the organizers of the city of Lake Forest, a founder of Lake Forest university and president of its board of trustees, and was a member of the board of trustees of Beloit college and Rockford female seminary. In 1864 he organized the Elgin national watch company, and became its president.

—His son, George Lansing, educator, b. in Chicago, Ill., 3 Sept., 1839, was graduated at Williams in 1862, studied theology at Princeton, and was pastor at Darby, Pa., in 1870. He was professor of oratory at Williams in 1874-85, and became professor of oratory and aesthetic criticism at Princeton in 1881. He is the author of "Orator's Manual" (Chicago, 1879); "Modern Fishers of Men," a novel (New York, 1879); "A Life in Song" (1886); "Poetry as a Representative Art" (1886); "Ballads of the Revolution, and other Poems" (1887); and "Sketches in Song" (1887).

RAYMOND, Henry Jarvis, journalist, b. in Lima, Livingston co., N. Y., 24 Jan., 1829; d. in New York city, 18 June, 1869. His father owned and cultivated a small farm on which the son was employed in his youth. He was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1840, studied law in New York, and maintained himself by teaching in a young ladies' seminary and writing for the "New Yorker," a literary weekly edited by Horace Greeley. On the establishment of the "Tribune" in April, 1841, Mr. Raymond became assistant editor and was well known as a reporter. He made a specialty of lectures, sermons, and speeches, and, among other remarkable feats, reported Dr. Dyonysius Lamb's lectures so perfectly that the lecturer consented to their publication in two large volumes, by Greeley and McLure, with his certificate of their accuracy. In 1845 their publication was issued. In 1851, when he resigned and went to Europe to benefit his health. While on the staff of the "Courier and Enquirer," he formed a connection with the publishing-house of Harper Brothers, which lasted ten years. During this period a spiritual discussion of Fourier's views, partly carried on between Mr. Raymond and Mr. Greeley, and the articles of the former on this subject were afterward published in pamphlet form.

In 1849 he was elected to the state assembly by the Whigs. He was re-elected in 1850, and chosen speaker, and manifested special interest in the school system and canal policy of the state. The New York "Times" was established by him, and the first number was issued on 18 Sept., 1851. In 1852 he went to Baltimore to report the proceedings of the Whig national convention, but was given a seat as a delegate, and made an eloquent speech in exposition of northern sentiment. In 1854 he was elected lieutenant-governor of the state. He was active in organizing the Republican party, and the "Address to the People," which he delivered at Athens, Ohio, was promulgated at the National convention at Pittsburg in February, 1856, and spoke frequently for Frémont in the following presidential campaign. In 1857 he refused to be a candidate for governor of New York, and in 1858 he invited Stephen A. Douglas, but he finally resumed his relations with the Republican party. In 1860 he was in favor of the nomination of William H. Seward for the presidency, and it was through his influence that Mr. Seward was placed in the cabinet. He was a warm supporter and personal friend of Mr. Lincoln in all his active measures, though at times deploring what he considered a hesitating policy. After the disaster at Bull Run he proposed the establishment of a provisional government. In 1861 he was again elected to the state assembly, where he was chosen speaker, and in 1863 he was defeated by Gov. Edwin D. Morgan for the nomination for U.S. senator. In 1864 he was elected to congress, and in a speech on 22 Dec., 1865, maintained that the southern states had never been out of the Union. He sustained the reconstruction policy of President Johnson. On the expiration of his term he declined renomination, and he refused the mission to Austria in 1867. He assisted in the organization of the "National Union convention" which met at Philadelphia in August, 1866, and was the author of the "Philadelphia Address" to the people of the United States. In the summer of 1868 he visited Europe with his family, and after his return resumed the active labors of his profession, with which he was occupied till his death. As an editor Mr. Raymond possessed great power. As a journalist he did good service during the toils of newspaper discussion, showing by his own example that it was possible to be earnest and brilliant without transgressing the laws of decorum. He wrote "Political Lessons of the Revolution" (New York, 1834); "Letters to Mr. Van- cey" (1860); "History of the Administration of President Lincoln" (1864); and "Life and Services of Abraham Lincoln," with his State Papers, Speeches, Letters, etc. (1865). After his death his brother, R. J. Raymond, and the New York Press for Thirty Years" (Hartford, 1870).

R. J. Raymond, lawyer, b. in Connecticut in 1796; d. in Westminster, Md., in January, 1858. He was graduated at Yale in 1818, removed to Maryland, studied law in Frederick city, and was admitted to the bar in 1835. After practicing at Frederick he removed to Pittsburg, where he resided till his death. In 1844 he was elected a member of the house of delegates, and in 1847 he was appointed state's attorney. He was a profound lawyer, and was exceptionally well read in the literature of his profession. He published "Digest of the Maryland Chancery Decision" (New York, 1839), and "Political," a book in opposition to "Know Nothingism" as a phase of politics in the state of Maryland.

Raymon_12, John Howard, educator, b. in New York city, 7 March, 1814; d. in Poughkeepsie, N.Y., 14 Aug., 1878. He was for a time a student in Columbia, but was graduated at Union college in 1832. Immediately thereafter he entered upon the study of the law in New Haven, and the constraint of religious convictions led him to abandon this pursuit, and in 1834 he entered the theological seminary at Hamilton, N. Y., with the intention of preparing for the Baptist ministry. His progress in the study of Hebrew was so marked that before his graduation he was appointed a tutor in that language. In 1839 he was raised to the chair of rhetoric and English literature in Madison university, and, by 1845, had a constantly growing reputation as a teacher and orator. In 1850 he accepted the professorship of belles-lettres in the newly established Rochester university. In 1856 he was selected to organize the Collegiate and polytechnic institute in Brooklyn, and accomplished the task with great success. He was summoned in 1865 to perform a similar service in connection with the recently founded Vassar college at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where he was made president and professor of mental and moral philosophy. His varied gifts and accomplishments were found scope for their highest exercise. Though an able and eloquent preacher, ministering regularly as chaplain of the college, he was never ordained. His published works were confined to sermons and addresses. He received the honorary degree of LL.D. See his "Life and Letters" (New York, 1880).—His brother, Robert Raikes, educator, b. in New York city in 1817; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 16 Nov., 1888. He was graduated at Union college in 1839. He edited the Syracuse "Free Democrat" in 1852, and the "Evening Chronicle" in 1863-4. He published "Letters on the Canals and English in Brooklyn polytechnic institute from 1857 till 1864. He published "Gems from Tupper" (Syracuse, 1834); "Little Don Quixote," from the German (1855); "Patriotic Speaker" (New York, 1858).
1864); and single sermons and addresses.—Robert's son, Rosseur Worthington, mining engineer, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 27 April, 1849, was graduated at Brooklyn polytechnic institute in 1871, and spent three years in professional study at the Royal mining academy in Freiberg, Saxony, and at the universities of Heidelberg and Munich. On his return to the United States he entered the army as additional aide-de-camp, with the rank of captain, on 31 March, 1862, and resigned on 6 April, 1864. Subsequently he settled in New York city as a consulting engineer, with special reference to mining property and metallurgical processes. In 1875 his U.S. geological and mining statistics, which office he held until 1876, issuing each year "Reports on the Mineral Resources of the United States West of the Rocky Mountains" (8 vols., Washington, 1869-76), of which several were published in New York with the titles of "American Mines and Mining," "The United States Mining Industry," "Mines, Mills and Furnaces," and "Silver and Gold." He was invited to lecture on economic geology at Lafayette in 1870, and continued so engaged until 1882. Dr. Raymond has travelled extensively throughout the mining districts of the United States in connection with his official appointments, and from his knowledge of the subject he has been largely consulted concerning the value of mines, serving also as an expert witness in suits brought by the U.S. commissioners to the World's fair in Vienna in 1873, and was appointed in 1885 New York state commissioner of electric subways for the city of Brooklyn. Dr. Raymond was one of the original members of the American institute of mining engineers, its vice-president in 1871, president in 1872-4, and secretary in 1874. In 1874 he published the four annual volumes of its "Transactions" since his election. He is a member of the Society of civil engineers of France, and of various other technical and scientific societies at home and abroad. In 1867 he was editor of the "American Journal of Mining," which in 1868 became the "Engineering and Mining Journal," of which he continues senior editor. In addition to his mining papers, he has published "Die Leibgarde" (Boston, 1864), being a German translation of Mrs. John C. Fremont's "Story of the Guard:" "The Children's Week" (New York, 1871); "Brave Hearts," a novel (1873); "The Man in the Moon and other People" (1874); "The Book of Jobs" (1878); "The Merry-go-Round" (1890); "Camp and Cabin" (1888); "A Glossary of Mining and Metallurgical Terms" (1881); and "Memorial of Alexander L. Holley" (1883).

RAYMOND, John T., actor, b. in Buffalo, N. Y., 5 April, 1836; d. in Evansville, Ind., 10 April, 1887. His original name was John O'Brien; was educated in the common schools, and made his first appearance, 27 June, 1853, at the Rochester theatre in Rochester, N. Y., and afterward appeared at Charleston as Asa Trenchard in "Our American Cousin," with Sothern as Lord Dundreary. He went to England in 1857, and on 1 July he appeared in London at the Haymarket theatre as Asa Trenchard with Sothern, making a great success, and afterward made a tour of the British provincial theatres in company with Sothern, and also acted in Paris. Returning to this country in the summer of 1857 he accompanied Edward Sothern to Halifax, N. S., and afterward appeared at Charleston as Asa Trenchard in "Our American Cousin," with Sothern as Lord Dundreary. He went to England in 1857, and on 1 July he appeared in London at the Haymarket theatre as Asa Trenchard with Sothern, making a great success, and afterward made a tour of the British provincial theatres in company with Sothern, and also acted in Paris. Returning to this country in the autumn of 1858, he reappeared in New York, playing Toby Twinkle in "All that Glitters is not Gold." A little later he went to San Francisco, where, on 18 Jan., 1883, he made his first appearance as Graves in Bulwer's comedy of "Money." Mr. Raymond returned to New York in 1871, and there his greatest success was achieved in 1874, when he brought out at the Park theatre "The Gilded Age." In this Mr. Raymond took the part of Colonel Mulberry Sellers, which he rendered peculiarly his own, and in which he delighted thousands by the original character of his humor. He went to England on a professional engagement in 1880, but his character of Colonel Sellers did not prove popular and he soon returned. He appeared on the stage for the last time in Hopkinsville, Ky. Though Mr. Raymond's talent as a comedian was not of the highest order, it was of such a peculiar character as to secure him success. Mr. Raymond's wife accompanied her husband to Europe, and played Florence Trenchard in "Our American Cousin" at the Théâtre des Italiens, Paris. She also accompanied him to California, and took the role of Clara Douglas in "Money.

RAYMOND, Miner, clergyman, b. in New York city, 29 Aug., 1811; d. in Evanston, Ill., 25 Nov., 1897. He was educated at Wesleyan academy, where he became a teacher in 1824, and was its principal in 1848-64. Since 1864 he has been professor of systematic theology in Garrett biblical institute, Evanston, Ill. He has been a member of the annual conferences of his church for forty-eight years, and six times a delegate to the general conferences of his church. He was graduated at the degree of D. D., and Northwestern university that of LL. D. Dr. Raymond published "Systematic Theology" (3 vols., Cincinnati, 1877).

RAYNAL, Guillaume Thomas Francois, called ABBE, French historian, b. in St. Geniez, Romergue, 14 April, 1713; d. in Paris, 6 March, 1793. Being of the Jesuits, he was called "Father Raynal," and was educated at the Jesuits at Pezenas, and was ordained priest. In 1747 he moved to Paris, and was attached to the parish of St. Salpice, but was dismissed for conduct unbecoming a clergyman. He then entered literary life, became an editor of the "Mecuere de France," and, soon acquiring fame, gained entrance to fashionable society, where he made the acquaintance of Dupont, de Vaugelas, Voltaire, and others. By their advice he undertook the publication of a philosophical history of the discovery and conquest of the American colonies, and devoted nearly ten years to that work, which made a great sensation, and was translated into all European languages. It is entitled "Histoire philosopique et politique des établissements et du commerce des Européens dans les deux Amériques" (4 vols., Paris, 1770; revised ed., with new documents furnished by the Comte d'Aranda, Spanish secretary of state, 16 vols., Geneva, 1780-5). Several of the most noted authors of the time contributed to the work. Raynal's history contained virulent attacks on the Roman Catholic church, and the author was obliged to seek refuge in England. In 1764 he was one of the members of the parliament of Paris pronounced condemnation upon Raynal's history, and it was burned by the public executioner in the Place de Grève in 1781. Towards 1785 he obtained permission to return to France, and fixed his residence in Toulon. He was elected to the states-general in 1789 by the city of Marseilles, but declined the office of account of his age. During the revolution he lived chiefly in Montpellier. Besides those already cited, Raynal's works include "Histoire du stathoudat" (The Hague, 1758); "Anecdotes littéraires" (2 vols., Paris, 1759); "Histoire du parlement d'Anjou et d'Atalante," (London, 1751); and "Mémoires politiques de l'Europe" (3 vols., 1754-74). William Mazzey, Virginia, published a refutation...

RAYNER, Kenneth, jurist, b. in Berrien county, X. C. in 1808; d. in Washington, D. C., 4 March, 1881. He was a lawyer, a member of the legislature of North Carolina for three successive terms, and served from 2 Dec., 1839, till 3 March, 1845. He was a presidential elector on the Taylor and Fillmore ticket in 1849. Mr. Rayner afterward removed to Mississippi. In 1874 he was appointed by President Grant a judge of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and in 1877 he became solicitor of the treasury, which post he held till his death.

RAYNOLD'S, William Franklin, soldier, b. in Canton, Ohio, 17 March, 1820; d. in Detroit, Mich., 18 Oct., 1894. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, and made brevet 3d lieutenant in the 5th infantry. He served in the war with Mexico in 1847-8, and was in charge of the exploration of Yellowstone and Missouri rivers in 1863, and was chief engineer of the Department of Virginia in 1861, and was appointed colonel and additional aide-de-camp, 31 March, 1862. Besides serving as chief engineer of the middle department and the 5th army corps from January, 1863, till April, 1864, he was in charge of the defenses of Harper's Ferry during the Confederate invasion of Pennsylvania in 1863, and was chief engineer of the defenses of Baltimore, Md., 28 June, 1863. He was superintending engineer of fort and northwest lakes, and engineer of light-houses on northern lakes, and in charge of harbor improvements in the entire lake region from 14 April, 1864, till April, 1870.

At the end of the civil war he was brevetted colonel and brigadier-general in the regular army. He was brevet lieutenant-colonel, 1862, colonel, 1881, and was retired in 1884.

RAYON, Ignacio Lopez (ni-yong), Mexican patriot, b. in Tlapalpanu in 1773; d. in Mexico, 2 Feb., 1827. He was graduated at the College of San Ildefonso in Mexico, and practised law. In September, 1810, he espoused the cause of independence, joined Miguel Hidalgo in October in Matamoros, and was appointed general secretary. He was chosen to represent the state of Veracruz, and, in 1812, he was appointed to the office of chief of the general government. In February, 1827, he was appointed chief of the general government. In December he was appointed by Hidalgo secretary of state and foreign relations. He followed the fugitives to Saltillo, and, after they went to the United States, became the real chief of the revolution in Mexico. He gathered a force of 3,500 men and marched to the south, defeating several Spanish detachments, and on 15 April, 1811, occupied Zacatecas, where he cast cannon, and was busy organizing his army. On the approach of Gen. Felix Calleja he abandoned the city, and in Zacatecas convened the insurgent chiefs, who appointed in August a governing junta, over which Rayon presided. He published proclamations until Gen. Calleja surrounded the town. Although it was valiantly defended by Rayon, it was not captured by him, and he retired into the fortress of Copora, which he had erected, and where he held out for more than two years against the repeated attacks of the royalists, till he was forced by want of provisions and a military mutiny to sign an honorable capitulation, 7 Jan., 1817. He was so much esteemed by his enemies that he obtained in 1818 from the Viceroy Apodaca the pardon of his brother Ignacio. After the triumph of Tampico he retired to private life, and opened several industrial establishments. In 1834 Santa-Anna appointed him chief of operations against the insurgents of Michoacan, and in a short campaign he pacified the province, capturing Morelia on 14 June, 1834, and resuscitating confidence by his humane measures. At the time of his death he was governor of the state of Mexico.

REA, John, member of congress, b. in Pennsylvania in 1755; d. in Chambersburg, Pa., 6 Feb., 1829. He served during the Revolutionary war, was several times a member of the state house of representatives, and was five times elected as a Democrat to congress, serving from 1805 till 1815, except in 1811.

REA, John Patterson, soldier, b. in Lower Oxford, Chester co., Pa., 13 Oct., 1840. He was educated in the public schools, and, after working for some time in a factory, he removed in the autumn of 1860 to Miami county, Ohio. In the spring of 1861 he enlisted as a private in the 11th Ohio infantry, and in August he joined the 1st Ohio cavalry. He was commissioned 2d lieutenant soon afterward, promoted 1st lieutenant, 12 March, 1862, captain, 1 April, 1863, and brevet major, 23 Nov., 1863. He participated in all the campaigns and battles of his regiment, which formed part of the cavalry division, Army of the Potomac. After the war and during his service was never absent from duty except while he was a prisoner for eight days. After leaving the army he entered the Wesleyan university, Delaware, Ohio, where he was graduated in 1867. He afterward returned to Pennsylvania, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1868. He was elected to the House of representatives from a district in which he had always resided, and was re-elected in 1869-73. He was made an admiral in the navy, 29 Oct., 1876, and resigning from the service of that department, went to California, where he was a resident and engaged in business for several years.

READ, Charles, jurist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 Feb., 1715; d. probably in North Carolina about 1780. His father, of the same name, was mayor of Philadelphia in 1728, sheriff of the county in 1738, and was one of the first ward collectors of the port of Burlington, N. J., and at his death was a provincial councillor and sole judge of the admiralty. The son succeeded his father as collector of the port of Burlington, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1753. About 1760 he became an associate justice of the supreme court, which office, as well as that of collector, he held till the Revolution, acting for a time as chief justice on the death of Robert H. Morris in 1764. He was several times mayor of Burlington. He was chosen colonel of a regiment of militia in 1776, was a deputy to the convention to frame a new constitution, and on 18 July was made colonel of a battalion of the flying camp, but in December he made his submission to the British. On 22 Nov. he was made a member of the council of the United States, confounded Gen. Joseph Reed with the officer that submitted to Sir William Howe. Reed was afterward taken prisoner by the Americans and sent to Philadelphia, whence he was removed to North Carolina. He was one of the founders of the American philosophical society.

—His brother, James, jurist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 29 Jan., 1716; d. there, 17 Oct., 1733, studied law and was admitted to the bar in September, 172. He was deputy protonotary of the supreme court of the province, and also a justice of the peace. About the time of the formation of Berks county he settled in Reading, where in 1732 he became the first protonotary, register of wills, and clerk of the courts, which offices he held for more than twenty-five years. He served in the general assembly in 1777, and in the supreme executive council from June, 1778, till October, 1781. From 1781 till 1783 he was register of the admiralty. In 1783 he became one of the council of censors whose duty it was to propose amendments to the constitution. From 1787 till 1790 he was again a member of the executive council. Shortly afterward he removed to Philadelphia, where he resided until his death. He was a man of scholarly attainments. His correspondence, which is still in existence, besides remarks on gardening and observations of nature, gives his views on education and politics and criticisms on current French and English works. His death was caused by yellow fever during the great epidemic.—James's son, Collinson, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1751; d. in Reading, Pa., 1 March, 1815, studied law at the Temple, London, and was admitted to the bar of Berks county on 13 Aug., 1772. He was appointed district attorney respectively of the counties of Reading and afterward practised law in Philadelphia. He was a presidential elector when George Washington was first chosen president of the United States. He published a "Digest of the Laws of Pennsylvania" (Philadelphia, 1801); "Abridgment of the Laws of Pennsylvania" (1804); "American Pleader's Assistant" (1800); and "Precedents in the Office of a Clerk of the District Court." His daughter, Sarah, married Gen. William Gates.

READ, Daniel, educator, b. in Marietta, Ohio, 24 June, 1802; d. in Keokuk, Iowa, 3 Oct., 1878. He was graduated at Ohio university in 1824, and for eleven years was principal of the preparatory department, at the same time studying law, and obtaining admission to the bar, although he never practised. He became professor of ancient languages in the university in 1839, and when in 1838, a separate professorship of Greek was established, taught political economy in connection with Latin till 1843, when he accepted the chair of languages at the Indiana state university. He was a member of the State constitutional convention of Indiana in 1850. In 1853-4 he performed the duties of president of the university. In 1856 he was made professor of modern languages and literature at the University of Wisconsin, and in 1868 entered on the presidency of the Missouri state university. Columbia, which office he filled until 1876. He was a frequent speaker on educational subjects.—His brother, Abner, naval officer, b. in Urbana, Ohio, 5 April, 1821; d. in Baton Rouge, La., 32 July, 1863, was educated at the Ohio university, but left in his senior year, having received an appointment as midshipman in the U.S. navy. After a voyage to South America, he studied for a year at the Naval school in Philadelphia, and was appointed acting sailing-master, in which capacity he gained a reputation as a navigator. He took part in the later naval operations of the Mexican war, and in 1855 was placed on the reserve list with the rank of lieutenant, but was afterward reinstated by the examining board. In the early part of the civil war he performed important services as commander of the "Wyandotte" in saving Fort Pickens from falling into the hands of the Confederates. He was assigned to the command of the "New London," in 1862, and cruised in Mississippi sound, taking more than thirty prizes and breaking up the trade between New Orleans and Mobile. He captured a battery at Biloxi, and had several engagements with Confederate steamers. He was commissioned lieutenant-commander on 16 July, and commander on 13 Sept., 1862. In June, 1863, he was placed in charge of the steam sloop Menoungula, and while engaging the batteries above Donaldsonville, received a fatal wound.

Davidson, Theodore, soldier, b. in Athens, Ohio, 11 April, 1836; d. near Farmville, Va., 5 April, 1865, was graduated at the Indiana state university in 1854, studied law, was appointed district attorney, afterward held a clerkship in the interior department at Washington, and in 1860 began practising law at Paris, Ill. At the beginning of the civil war in 1861, and served him-terested in developing the interior districts of the South. He was then given a staff appointment with the rank of cap-nan, 24 Oct., 1861, received a wound at Chancel-orsville, at Gettysburg, and for the third time at Cold Harbor. He was promoted major on 23 July, 1864, and was chief of staff to Gen. Edward O. C. Ord from the time when the latter took command of a corps in the Army of the James. He served in various battles in Gen. Grant’s campaign, and on 29 Sept., 1864, was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers for services in the field. He lost his life in the last encounter between the armies of

Read to burn the bridge at Farmville, in the line of Lee’s retreat. The small party was overtaken by the advance of the entire Confederate army, and supposed to be a officer had been killed, having, however, accomplished its purpose of checking Lee’s movement. (See DEARING, JAMES.)

Read, George Campbell, naval officer, b. in Ireland about 1787; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 August, 1862. He came to the United States at an early age, was appointed a midshipman in the navy on 2 April, 1804, and advanced to the rank of lieutenant on 27 April, 1810. He was 3d lieutenant on the “Constitution” when the British frigate “Guerrière” was captured, and Capt. Isaac Hull asnigned to him the honor of receiving the surrender of Capt. James K. Dacres, the British commander.

He took an active part in other engagements of the war of 1812, and near his close commanded the brig “Chippewa,” of the flying squadron com-dined by Capt. Oliver H. Perry that was sent out to destroy the enemy’s commerce. He was promoted commander on 27 April, 1816, and captain on 3 March, 1825, took charge of the East India squadron in 1840, and of the squadron on the coast of Africa in 1846, and, after commanding the Mediterranean squadron for some time, was placed on the list of invalids in 1855. In 1857 he was appointed governor of the Naval asylum in Philadelphia, and on 31 July, 1862, by virtue of an act of congress that had been recently passed, was made a rear-admiral on the retired list.

Read, Hollis, missionary, b. in Newfane, Vt., 26 Aug., 1803; d. in Somerville, N. J., 7 April, 1857. He was graduated at Williams in 1826, and afterwards became ordained as an evangelist at Newburyport, Mass., 24 Sept., 1829, and in the following year sailed for India. He labored for five years as a missionary in Bombay, then returned to the United States, and was for two years an agent for the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. He was pastor in 1837-8 of the Presbyterian church at Princeton, N. J., and in 1842-3 of the Congregational church at Derby, Conn. He was agent for the American tract society in 1843-4, pastor of the Congregational church at New Church, Conn., in 1845-51, a teacher at Orange and agent for the Society for the conversion of the Jews in 1851-5, and afterward preached at Cranford, N. J., till 1864.

He published “Journal in India” (New York, 1852);

“Babaji, the Christian Brahmin” (New York, 1857); “Footprints of Satan” (1866). Rev. William Ramsey published an account of a missionary tour in India made with Mr. Read.

Read, Jacob, senator, b. in South Carolina in 1752; d. in Charleston, S. C., 17 July, 1816. He received a liberal education, studied law in England from 1773 till 1776, and practised in Charleston. During the Revolution he served as a major of South Carolina volunteers, and was taken prisoner, and confined for four years at St. Augustine, Fl. He was elected a member of the legislature, and in 1781 was sent as a delegate of South Carolina to the Continental congress, of which body he was a member till 1786. He was elected as a Federalist to the U. S. senate, taking his seat

2 Dec., 1796, and served throughout the term, which ended on 3 March, 1801, President John Adams appointed him judge of the U. S. court for the district of South Carolina, which office he held until his death.

Read, John, lawyer, b. in Connecticut, 14 Feb., 1689; d. in Boston, Mass., 24 Feb., 1749. He was graduated at Harvard in 1697, studied theology, and was for some time a popular preacher. Subsequently he studied law, and attained eminence at the bar. He was an active member of the provincial house of representatives, and of the coundil during Gov. William Shirley’s administration.

He contributed greatly to the reform of legal phraseology, being the first to reduce the ante-quated forms and redundant phrases of deeds of conveyance to simpler and clearer language.

Read, John, planter, b. in Dublin, Ireland, in 1688; d. at his seat in Delaware, 17 June, 1756. He was the son of an English gentleman of large fortune belonging to the family of Read of Berkshire, Hertfordshire, and Oxfordshire. Having received a severe shock by the death of a young lady to whom he was attached, he came to the American colonies, and, after the close of the war of 1745, entered into extensive enterprises in Maryland and Delaware. He purchased, soon after his arrival, a large landed estate in Cecil county, Md., and, founded, with six associates, the city of Charlestown, on the head-waters of Chesapeake bay, twelve years after

Baltimore was begun, with the intention of creating a rival metropolis for the North. He held various offices during his life, and in his later years resided on his plantation in Newcastle county, Del.—His eldest son, George, signor of the Declaration of Independence, b. at the family-seat, Cecil county, Md., 17 Sept., 1733; d. in Newcastle, Del., 21 Sept., 1798, was one of the two state-men, and the only southern one, that signed the three great state papers that underlie the foundations of our government: the original petition to the king of the 1st Continental congress, the Declaration of Independence, and the constitution of the United States. He received a classical education, first at Chester, Pa., and afterward at New London, and, at the age of nineteen, was admitted to the Philadelphia bar. He removed in 1751 to Newcastle, where the family had large landed estates. While holding the office of attorney-general of Kent, Delaware, and Sussex counties in 1763-73, he pointed out to Lord Shelburne the danger of taxing the colonies without giving them direct representation in parliament, and in a letter to Sir Richard Neave, afterwards governor of the Bank of England, written in 1765, he prophesied that a continuation in such a policy would ultimately destroy the colonies only to independence, but to the colonies surpassing England in her staple manufactures. He was for twelve years a member of the Delaware assembly, during which period, as chairman of its committee, he wrote the address to the king which Lord Shelburne said so impressed George III., that the latter read it twice. Chagrined at the unchanged attitude of the mother country, he resigned the attorney-generalship, and was elected to the first congress which met at Philadelphia in 1774. Although he voted against independence, he finally signed the Declaration, and thereupon was one of the staunchest supporters of the cause of the colonies. He was president of the first naval committee in 1775; of the Constitutional convention in 1787; author of the first constitution of Delaware, and the first edition of her laws; vice-president of Delaware, and acting president of that state after the capture of President McKinnly; judge of the national court of admiralty cases in 1782; and a commissioner to settle the controversy between Massachusetts and New York in 1783. Mr. Read was a delegate to the Annapolis convention in 1786, which gave rise to the convention that met in Philadelphia in 1787 and framed the constitution of the United States. In the latter convention he ably advocated the rights of the smaller states to an equal representation in the U.S. Senate. He was twice elected U.S. senator, serving from 1789 till 1793, when he resigned to assume the office of chief justice of Delaware, which post he filled until his death. In person, Read was tall, slightly and gracefully formed, with pleasing features and lustrous brown eyes. His manners were dignified, bordering upon austerity, but courteous, and at times captivating. He commanded entire confidence, not only from his profound legal knowledge, sound judgment, and impartial decisions, but from his severe integrity and the purity of his private character. He married in 1766 Gertrude, daughter of the Rev. George Ross, and sister of George Ross, a signer of the Declaration. See his "Life and Correspondence," by William T. Read (Philadelphia, 1857).

Thomas, naval officer, b. in Newcastle, Del., in 1740; d. at White Hill, N.J., 26 Oct., 1788, was the first naval officer to obtain the rank of commodore in command of an American fleet. He was appointed on 29 Oct., 1741, a midshipman of the Pennsylvania navy, having as the surgeon of his ship Dr. Benjamin Rush, and while holding this command he made a successful defence of the Delaware. He was appointed, 7 June, 1756, to the highest grade in the Continental navy, and assigned to one of its four largest ships, the 32-gun frigate "George Washington," then building on Delaware river. While commanding the celebrated ship which is remembered for land service, and was sent as captain by the committee of safety to join Washington. He gave valuable assistance in the crossing of the Delaware, and at the battle of Trenton commanded a battery made up of guns from his frigate, and with it raked the stone bridge across the Assumpink. For this service he received the formal thanks of all the general officers that participated in that action, as is stated in a letter of 14 Jan., 1777, written by his brother, Col. James Read (who was near him during the engagement), to his wife. After much service on sea and land he resigned his commission, and, retiring to his seat near Bordentown, N.J., dispensed a liberal hospitality to his old companions-in-arms, especially to his brother members of the Congress of the Confederation. He was induced by his friend, Robert Morris, to take command of his old frigate, the "Alliance," which had recently been bought by Morris for commercial purposes, and make a joint adventure to the China seas. Taking with him as chief officer one of his old subordinates, Richard Dale, afterward Com. Dale, and George Harrison, who became an eminent citizen of Philadelphia, and as second officer, his friend, Robert Morris, to take command of his old frigate, the "Alliance," which had recently been bought by Morris for commercial purposes, and make a joint adventure to the China seas. in 1817, and succeeding his wife's uncle, George Clymer, as president of that bank in 1819, he filled that post till 1841, when he resigned. He was prominent in the councils of the Episcopal church. During the yellow-fever plague in Philadelphia in 1793, Mr. Read and Stephen Girard remained in the city, and he opened his purse and exposed his life in behalf of his suffering fellow-citizens. Mr. Read was the author of a valuable work entitled "Arguments on the British Debts" (Philadelphia, 1788),—John's son, John Meredith, jurist, b. in Philadelphia, 29 Nov. 1774, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1812, and admitted to the bar in 1818. He was a member of the Pennsylvania legislature in 1823-3, city solicitor and member of the select council, in which capacity he drew up the first clear exposition of the finances of Philadelphia, U. S. attorney for the eastern district of Pennsylvania in 1834-44, solicitor-general of the United States, attorney general of Pennsylvania, and chief justice of that state from 1860 until his death. He early became a Democrat, and was one of the founders of the free-soil wing of that party. This induced opposition to his confirmation by the U. S. senate when he was nominated in 1845 as judge of the U. S. supreme court, and caused him to withdraw his nomination. He was one of the ablest and stanchest advocates of the annexation of Texas and the building of railroads to the Pacific, and was also a powerful supporter of President Jackson in his war against the U. S. bank. He was leading counsel with Thaddeus Stevens and Judge Joseph J. Lewis in the defense of Castner Hanway for constructive treason, his speech on this occasion having given his party its most favorable prominence. He entered the Republican party on its formation, and at the beginning of the presidential canvass of 1856 delivered a speech on the "Power of Congress over Slavery in the Territories," which was used throughout that canvass (Philadelphia, 1856). The Republican party gained its first victory in Pennsylvania in 1858, electing him judge of the supreme court by 30,000 votes. He entered his ward as a candidate for the presidency of the United States in 1860; and Abraham Lincoln's friends were prepared to nominate him for that office, with the former for the vice-presidency, which arrangement was defeated by Simon Cameron in the Pennsylvania Republican convention in favor of Stephen A. Douglas. He nevertheless received several votes in the Chicago convention, notwithstanding that all his personal influence was used in favor of Mr. Lincoln. The opinions of Judge Read run through forty-one volumes of reports. His "Views on the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus" (Philadelphia, 1863) were adopted as the basis of the act of 3 March, 1863, which authorized the president of the U. S. to issue writs of habeas corpus. He refused an invitation to prevent the running of horse-cars on Sunday, since he could not consent to stop "poor men's carriages." Many thousand copies of this opinion (Philadelphia, 1865) were printed. His amendments form an essential part of the constitutions of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and his ideas are found in almost all the constitutions of the United States. Brown gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1860. Judge Read was the author of a great number of published addresses and legal opinions. Among them are: "Plan for the Administration of the Girard Trust" (Philadelphia, 1833); "The Law of Evidence" (1864); and "Jefferson Davis and his Complicity in the Assassination of Abraham Lincoln" (1866).—John Meredith's son, John Meredith, diplomatist, b. in Philadelphia, 21 Feb., 1857; d. in Paris, France, 27 Dec., 1896. He was a graduate of Bryn Mawr, where he was graduated at Albany law-school in 1859, studied international law in Europe, was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia, and afterward removed to Albany, N. Y. He was adjutant-general of New York in 1869-70, was one of the originators of the "Wide-Awake" political clubs in 1869. He was chairman in April of the convention which adopted the constitutional amendment for the purchase of arms and equipments, and he subsequently received the thanks of the war department for his ability and zeal in organizing, equipping, and forwarding troops. He was first U. S. consul-general for France and Algeria in 1869-70 and 1870-2, acting consuls-general for Germany during the Franco-German war. After the war he was appointed by Gen. de Cissey, minister of war, to form and preside over a commission to examine into the desirability of teaching the English language to the French troops. In November, 1873, he was appointed U. S. minister resident in Greece. One of his first acts was to secure the release of the American ship "Armenia" and to obtain from the Greek government the withdrawal of the order that prohibited the sale of the Bible in Greece. During the Russo-Turkish war he discovered that only one port in Russia was still open, and he pointed out to Secretary Evarts the advantages that would accrue to the commerce of the United States were a grain-fleet despatched from New York to that port. The event justified his judgment, since the exports of cereals from the United States showed an increase within a year of $73,000,000. While minister to Greece he received the thanks of his government for his effectual protection of American persons and interests in the dangerous crisis of 1878. Soon afterward congress, from motives of economy, refused the appropriation for the legation at Athens, and Gen. Read, believing that the time was too critical to draw the legation away, carried on at his individual expense until his resignation. 23 Sept., 1879. In 1881, when, owing in part to his efforts, after his resignation, the territory that had been adjudged to Greece had been finally transferred, King George created him a Knight grand cross of the order of the Redeemer, the highest dignity in the gift of the Greek government. Read was chairman of the Social science congress at Albany, N. Y., in 1868, and vice-president of the one at Plymouth, England, in 1872. He is the author of an "Historical Enquiry concerning Henry Hudson," which first threw light upon his origin, and the sources of the ideas that guided that navigator (Albany, 1868), and contributions to current literature. appliances. This boiler was either horizontal or upright, cylindrical, and contained the furnace within itself. A double cylinder formed a water-jacket, connecting with a water-steam-chamber above, and a narrow water-chamber below. Numerous small, straight tubes parallel to the axis of the boiler, and about three quarters its length, connected these chambers. He also invented another form of boiler, in which the fire passed through small spiral tubes on the principle of the present locomotive-boiler, an arrangement that had the advantage of consuming the smoke. In addition he had several other forms with numerous small, straight tubes parallel to the axis of the boiler, and about three quarters its length, connected these chambers. He also invented another form of boiler, in which the fire passed through small spiral tubes on the principle of the present locomotive-boiler, an arrangement that had the advantage of consuming the smoke.

In 1768, he was a member of the Mercantile Association, and of the Virginia conventions of 1774 and 1776, and by the last-named body was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 4th Virginia regiment. He was promoted colonel in August, 1776, and participated in the battles of White Plains, Trenton, and Princeton. His death resulted from exposure in camp.

READ, Thomas,雕刻家, b. in that part of Maryland that is now part of Chester county, Pa., in March, 1746; d. in Wilmington, Del., 14 June, 1823. He was the son of a farmer, who came to the United States from Ireland several years before Thomas's birth. After his graduation at Philadelphia academy in 1764, he became a tutor in a classical school at Newark, Del., was licensed to preach in 1768, and was installed as pastor of a Presbyterian church at Drawyer's Creek, Del. In 1787 he accepted the pastorate of the 2d Presbyterian church at Wilmington, Del. He was an ardent patriot in the Revolutionary war. In 1776 he marched with a company of neighbors and members of his church to Philadelphia for the purpose of volunteering in the American army. After serving in the victories at Trenton and Princeton, which rendered its services unnecessary. In August, 1777, he performed an important service for the American cause by drawing for Gen. Washington a map that showed the topography of the country and a route by which he could retreat from Stanton, and avoid a conflict with the British force that had landed at Elk ferry, and was advancing on the American camp. He received the degree of D.D. from Princeton in 1786, and exercised his pastoral functions with great success till 1817, when bodily infirmities impelled him to resign his charge. Even after that he supplied the pulpit of the Ist Presbyterian church in Wilmington.

READ, Thomas, poet, b. in Chester county, Pa., 12 March, 1822; d. in New York city, 11 May, 1872. His mother, a widow, apprenticed him to a tailor, but he ran away, learned in Philadelphia the trade of cigar-making, and in 1837 made his way to Cincinnati, where he found a home with the sculptor, Shebal V. Cleven-ger. He learned the trade of a sign-painter, and attended school at intervals. Not succeeding in Cincinnati, he went to Dayton, Ohio, and obtained an engagement in the theatre. Returning to Cincinnati in about a year, he was enabled to open a studio as a portrait-painter. He did not remain long in Cincinnati, but wandered from town to town, painting signs when he could find no sitters, sometimes giving public entertainments, and reverting to cigar-making when other resources failed. In 1841 he removed to New York city, and within a year to Boston. While there he... made his first essays as a poet, publishing in the "Courier" several lyric poems in 1842-4. He settled in Philadelphia in 1844 and his work was visited Europe in 1856. In 1858 he went again to Europe, and devoted himself to the study and practice of art in Florence and Rome till 1858. He afterward spent much time in Philadelphia and Cincinnati, but in the last years of his life made Rome his principal residence. While in the United States during the civil war he gave public readings for the benefit of the Union. His work was visited Europe in 1848, and his portrait was drawn by Mrs. Missin, a sculptor, in 1858.

His "Longfellow's Children," "The Star of Bethlehem," "Undine," "Longfellow's Children," "Cleopatra and Her Barge," and "Sheridan's Ride." He painted portraits of Elizabeth Barrett Browning, the ex-queen of Naples, George M. Dallas, Henry W. Longfellow, and others. His group of Longfellow's daughters was popular in photographs. He turned his hand occasionally to sculpture, producing one work, a bust of Sheridan, that attracted attention. He possessed a much more thorough mastery of the means of expression in the art of poetry than in painting. His poems are marked by a fervent spirit of patriotism and by artistic power and fidelity in the description of American scenery and rural life. His first volume of "Poems" (Philadelphia, 1847) was followed by "Lays and Ballads" (1849). He next made a collection of extracts and specimens from the "Female Poets of America" (1848), containing also biographical notices and portraits drawn by himself. An edition of his lyrics, with illustrations by Kenny Meadows, appeared in London in 1852, and in 1853 a new and enlarged edition was published in Philadelphia. A prose romance entitled "The Pilgrims of the Great St. Bernard" was published as a serial, "The New Pastoral," his most ambitious poem, describes in blank verse the pioneer life of a family of emigrants (Philadelphia, 1854). The more dramatic and imaginative poem that followed, entitled "The House by the Sea" (1856), gained for it more readers than had been attracted by its own superior merits. Next appeared "Sylva, or the Lays of the Forest Poems" (1857), and "A Voyage to Iceland" (1857), and the same year a collection of his "Rural Poems" was issued in London. His "Complete Poetical Works" (Boston, 1860) contained the longer and shorter poems that had been already published. His next narrative poem was "The Wagoner of the Alleghany," a tale of Revolutionary times (Philadelphia, 1862). Here he wrote many patriotic lyrics, including the stirring poem of "Sheridan's Ride," which was printed in a volume with "A Summer Story" and other pieces, chiefly of the war (Philadelphia, 1865). His last long poem was "The Good Samaritans" (Cincinnati, 1867). The fullest editions of his "Poetical Works" were printed in Philadelphia (3 vols., 1863 and 1865).}

READY, Samuel, philanthropist, b. near Baltimore, Md., 8 March, 1789; d. in Baltimore, 28 Nov., 1871. He received a common-school education, learned the trade of a sail-maker, worked in the government navy-yard at Washington for several years, returned to Baltimore about 1815, and engaged in the business of sail-making, which he pursued with success till 1846, and after that the lumber business till 1861, when he retired. Having observed the helpless condition of poor girls who frequented his lumber-yard and wharves, he determined to establish an institution for female orphans. He obtained a charter in 1864, and, having no immediate family, left $371,000, constituting the bulk of his fortune, as an endowment for the Samuel Ready asylum. The fund increased after his death, providing an invested capital of $905,000, after the expenditure of $145,000 on land and buildings. The institution, which is in the northern part of Baltimore, was opened in 1888. The children who are admitted are maintained without expense to them, and are educated in industrial pursuits.

REAGAN, John Henninger, senator, b. in Scott county, Tenn., 8 Oct., 1818. From an early age he was engaged in various occupations, which included ploughing, chopping wood, keeping books, running a flat-boat on Tennessee river, and managing a mill, and through his diligence he earned sufficient money to procure a good education. Before he was twenty years old he went to Nashville, and in 1839 removed to the Cherokees from Texas, and was selected by Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston and one of a party of scouts for dangerous service, but declined the offer of a lieutenantcy, and became a surveyor. He penetrated into the Indian country about the Three Forks of Trinity, and was engaged in surveying that region about three years. This was the first party that escaped massacre by the Indians. In 1844 he began the study of law, and in 1848 he received his license to practise. In 1846 he was elected colonel of militia and probate judge of Henderson county, and in 1847 he was chosen to the legislature, where he was chairman of the committee on public lands. In 1849 he was a defeated candidate for the state senate, but in 1852 he was elected district judge. In the enforcement of the laws he was brought into personal collision with the gamblers and desperadoes that then held the frontier towns in awe, but his physical strength, skillful manner of formulating law for law and order, Judge Reagan was first elected to Congress in 1856 as a Democrat, after a severe contest. He remained in Congress until 1861, when he returned home, and was elected to the state convention, in which he voted for secession. He was chosen by the convention to the provisional Confederate congress. On 6 March, 1861, he was appointed postmaster-general under the provisional government, and the next year he was reappointed to the same office under the permanent government. He was also acting secretary of the treasury for a short time near the close of the war. He was the only one of the cabinet that was captured with Jefferson Davis, and was confined for many months in Fort Warren. He has conferences with Lincoln, and with John, Wilkes, H. L. Thaddeus, Henry Wilson, James Speed, and others on reconstruction, and wrote an open letter to the people of Texas, advocating laws for the protection of negroes, which should grant them civil rights and limited political rights with an educational qualification. His letter subjected him to misconstruction, and he was retired from politics for nine years. But he was elected to Congress by 5000 majority in 1874, in 1876 by 8000, and after 1878 with little or no opposition. For nearly ten years he held continuously the post of chairman of the committee on commerce, with the exception of one term, and has been noted for his decided views and efforts to regulate inter-state commerce. He was one of the authors of the Cullom-Reagan inter-state commerce bill, which became a law in 1887. In 1887 he took his seat in the U. S. Senate, having been chosen for the term that ended in 1893.

REALF, Richard (refi, poet, b. in Framfield, Sussex, England. 14 June, 1834; d. in Oakland, Calif., 28 Oct., 1878. At the age of fifteen he began to write verses, and two years later he became an assistant to the editor of the Brighton (England) poet and lecturer on phrenology recited some of the boy's poems, as illustrations of ideality, and thereupon several literary people in Brighton sought him out and encouraged him. Under their patronage a collection of his poems was published, entitled "Guesses at the Beautiful" (London, 1852). Realf spent a year in Leicestershire, studying scientific agriculture, and in 1854 came to the United States. He explored the shuns of New York, became a Five-Points missionary, and assisted in establishing there a course of cheap lectures and a self-improvement association. In 1856 he accompanied a party of free-state emigrants to Kansas, where he became a journalist and correspondent of several eastern newspapers. He made the acquaintance of John Brown, accompanied him to Canada, and was to be secretary of state in the provisional government that Brown projected. The movement being deferred for two years, Realf made a visit to England and a tour in the southern states. When Brown made his attack on Harper's Ferry in October, 1859, he was in Texas, where he was arrested and sent to Washington, appearing in open court in a grave danger of instant execution. In 1862 he enlisted in the 8th Illinois regiment, with which he served through the war. Some of his best lyrics were written in the field, and were widely circulated. After the war he was commissioned in a colored regiment, and in 1866 was mustered out with the rank of captain and brevet lieutenant-colonel. In 1868 he established a school for freedmen in South Carolina, and a year later was made assessor of internal revenue for Edgefield district. He resigned this office in 1870, returned to the north, and became a journalist and lecturer, residing in Chicago. In 1873 he delivered a poem before the Society of the Army of the Potomac. He was a brilliant talker and a fine orator. Among his lectures were "Battle-Flashes" and "The Unwritten Story of the Martyr of Harper's Ferry." His most admired poems are, "My Stain," "An Old Man's Ily," "Indirection," and the verses that he wrote just before he took the poison that ended his life. He committed suicide in consequence of an unfortunate marriage and an imperfect divorce. Mr. Realf's "Guesses at the Beautiful, and other Poems" was edited with an introduction by Thomas D. Surplice (Buffalo, 1890); "Poems" (new ed., New York, 1899).

REAMY, Thaddeus Ashby, physician, b. in Frederick county, Virginia, 27 June, 1822; studied medicine and graduated from the University of Pennsylvania medical school, 1844; married, 1844, Miss Emily Hume; accompanied his parents in 1852 to Zanesville, Ohio, was graduated at Starling medical college in 1854, and followed his profession in Zanesville until 1870, when he removed to Cincinnati. During the civil war he served as surgeon in the 122d Ohio volunteers. In 1858 he was elected to the chair of materia medica and therapeutics in Starling medical college, which he held for two years, and in 1855 was chosen professor of the diseases of women and children, but he resigned in 1851 to accept the chair of obstetrics, clinical midwifery, and diseases of children in the Medical college of Ohio. Dr. Reamy has made a specialty of obstetrical practice, and holds the office of gynecologist to the Good Samaritan hospital in Cincinnati. He has invented various modifications of instruments that are used in his specialty. Besides being a member of several gynecological societies and other medical associations, he was, in 1879, president of the Ohio state medical society. Dr. Reamy has been a frequent contributor to medical journals. Among his papers are "Metastasis of Mumps to the Testicle treated by Operation," "Puerperal Diphtheria" (1859); "Puerperal Eclampsia" (1869); and "Laceration of the Perineum" (1870).

REAVIS, Logan Uriah (revi), journalist, b. in Sangamon Bottom, Mason Co., Ill., 26 March, 1831; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 25 April, 1889. After attending the village high-school, he taught from 1851 till 1855. In the latter year he entered the office of the Beardstown Ill., "Gazette," in which soon afterward he purchased an interest, and continued its publication under the name of "The Central Illinoisan" till the autumn of 1857, when he sold his share and removed to Nebraska. Returning to Beardstown he repurchased "The Illinoisan" after the nomination of Abraham Lincoln for the presidency. In the spring of 1860 he disposed of that journal for the latter, and settling in St. Louis earnestly advocated the removal of the National capital to that city. His first effort in this direction was the publication of a pamphlet entitled "The New Republic, or the Transition Complete, with an Approaching Change of National Empire, based upon the Commercial and Industrial Expansion of the North West," 1862. This was followed by "A Change of National Empire, or Arguments for the Removal of the National Capital from Washington to the Mississippi Valley," with maps (1869). Besides issuing the fore-REBOUCAS, Manoel Mauricio (ray-bo-soes), Brazilian soldier, b. in Maragogipe in 1792; d. in Bahia, 19 July, 1866. After finishing his studies he was appointed assistant clerk of the probate court of the districts of Maragogipe and Jaguaripe, but, at the opening of hostilities between the Portuguese troops and the patriots, he retired with the independents to the interior, and served till 2 July, 1823. He served again, 24 May, 1866, in the battle of Tuyuty. He wrote "Sobre a instituição dos cemitérios extra-mural" (Bahia, 1856); "Da Educação privada e publica tratando de explicar por onde se gasta, hasta su emancipacion civil e política" (Rio Janeiro, 1859); and "Estudos sobre os membros mais convenientes para impedir no interior da Bahia afflicto de aridez, e de sua consequência, de su repetição de devastação" (Bahia, 1860).

RECARBARRON DE MARIN, Luisa (ray-ca-ba-ren-ern), Chilean patriot, b. in Serena in 1777; d. in Santiago, 31 May, 1839. She became an orphan at the age of eight years and was educated by her uncle, Estanislao Rosario, dean of the cathedral of Santiago. In 1796 she married Dr. Jose Gaspar Marin (g.v.), in whose house she aided in preparing for the events of 18 Sept., 1810. After the reconquest of Chili by the Spaniards in October, 1814, her husband fled to the Argentine Republic, but she remained in Santiago, attending to the education of her children. In the last days of 1816 the authorities captured the correspondence of a patriot in Valparaiso, and found letters from the Mariscal Martin for Luisa, together with a list in cipher of the persons concerned in the conspiracy against the government. By order of Marco del Pont she was arrested, 4 Jan., 1817, and imprisoned in the convent of the Augustines nuns, whence she was liberated by the triumphant entry of the patriots, 29 Feb., 1817. She lived afterward greatly honored by the public, but survived her husband only three months.

RECLUS, Jean Jacques Elisee (ray-ko-les), French geographer, b. in Sainte-Foy-la-Grande, Gironde, 15 May, 1839. He was the son of a Protestant clergyman, and was educated by the Moravian brethren at Neuwied, and afterward in the universities of Montauban and Berlin. From 1852 till 1880 he traveled extensively in England, India, and South America, and wrote between 1860 he devoted himself to writing works on his travels and the social and political condition of the countries that he had visited, most of which were published in the "Revue des deux mondes" and the "Tour du monde." In 1871 he supported the Commune of Paris, and was taken prisoner and sentenced to transportation, but the U.S. minister and representatives of the republic of South America, supported by eminent scientists, interceded in his behalf, and his sentence was commuted to banishment. He fixed his residence at Clarence in Switzerland, but returned to Paris after the amnesty of March, 1879. He has since devoted himself to the publication of a universal geography. His publications include "Le Missisipi, études et souvenirs" (Paris, 1839); "Le delta du Mississipi et la Nouvelle Orleans" (1879); "En voyage a la Louisiane et au Golfe, les Etats-Unis, et les Grandes Antilles" (1839); "Voyage a Saint Marthe et a la Borbotta" (1860); "Le Rio Hacha, les Indiens Gigantes et la Sierra Negra" (1860); "Les Araques et la Sierra Nevada" (1860); "De l'esclavage aux Etats-Unis, le code noir et les esclaves" (1860); "Les planteurs de la Louisiana et les abolitionistes" (1861); "Le Marmonisme et les Etats-Unis" (1861); "La cotonnerie de la vallée du bassin des Amazonas et les Indiens" (1862); "Les provinces du littoral du Brésil, les noirs et les colonies Allemandes" (1862); "Le coton et la crise Américaine, les compagnies cotonnières, et les tentatives du commerce Anglais depuis la rupture de l'Union" (1862); "Les livres sur la crise Américaine, guerre de la sécession" (1862); "L'élection présidentielle de la Plata, et la guerre du Paraguay" (1862); "Les noirs Américains depuis la guerre civile aux États-Unis" (1863); "Les planteurs de la Louisiana et les régimes Africains" (1863); "Histoire de la crise Américaine aux États-Unis, les deux dernières années de la grande lutte Américaine" (1864); "La poésie et les poètes dans l'Amérique Espagnole depuis l'indépendance" (1866); "La cotonnerie de la vallée des Plaines et les Indiens aux États-Unis, 1861-64" (1864); "La guerre de l'Uruguay et les républicaines de la Plata" (1865); "Les républicaines de l'Amérique du Sud, leurs guerres et leur projet de fédération" (1866); "La guerre du Paraguay" (1867); "La terre" (2 vols., 1867-68); "Les républicaines de l'esthme Américain" (1869); "Les phénomènes terrestres, le monde et les émissions" (2 vols., 1871), which was translated into English under the title "The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life" (New York, 1872); and "Géographie universelle" (1875-88, 13 vols.; English translation. New York, 1877-86).—His brother, Elie Armand Ebenhezer, b. in Orthez, 13 March, 1843, served in the navy, and in 1870 was sent by Ferdinand de Lesseps to Panama to make, in conjunction with Liet. Bonaparte Wyse, the preliminary surveys for the project. He afterward has since interested himself in the canal, and held conferences upon the subject. His works include "Explorations aux isthmes de Panama et de Darien, en 1876-78" (Paris, 1880).

REDDALL, Henry Frederick, author, b. in London, England, 25 Nov., 1852. He was educated at the Birbeck Institution, and since coming to this country has been a contributor to periodicals under the pen-name of "Frederic Allred." Since 1881 he had been associate editor of "The People's Cyclopaedia." He has published: "From the Golden Gate to the Golden Horn" (New York, 1888); "Who Was He?" six historical sketches (1886); "School-Boy Days in Merrie England" (1888); "Courtship, Love, and War" (1888); and "Persian, French, and Fable" (1888).

REDDING, Benjamin Barnard, pioneer, b. in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, 17 Jan., 1824; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 21 Aug., 1882. He was educated at Yarmouth academy, and in 1840 went to Boston, where he became a clerk and afterward entered the grocery and ship-chandlery business. In 1849 he went to California, and in 1850 returned from Yarmouth for California, where they arrived on 12 May, 1850. He went to the Yuba river diggings, and afterward to the Pittsburg bar, working as a laborer. Subsequently he was employed in drawing papers for the sale of claims, acted as arbitrator, was elected a member of the assembly from Yuba and Sierra counties, and during the session wrote for the San Joaquin "Republican" and the Sacramento "Democratic State Journal," of which he was an editor and proprietor. In 1856 he was mayor of Sacramento, and from 1863 till 1867 he was secretary of state. From 1864 until his death he was land agent of the Central Pacific railroad. Mr. Redfield was a regent of the University of California, and a member of the California academy of sciences, and of the geographical society of the Pacific. He was also a state fish commissioner, holding the office at the time of his death. He was interested in all scientific work, especially in the paleontology of the coast, and collected numerous prehistoric and aboriginal relics, which he presented to the museum of the academy.

He contributed a large number of papers to various California journals.

REDFIELD, Amelia Angell, lawyer, b. in Clayle, Wayne co., N. Y., 19 May, 1837. He was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1860, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began to practice in New York city. From 1877 till 1882 he was the official reporter of the surrogate's court in that city. He was a contributor to the "Knickerbocker" magazine, and has published "Reports of Judgments" (New York, 1859); "Reports of the Surrogate's Court of the State of New York" (5 vols., 1864-82); "Law and Practice of Surrogates' Courts" (1855-56 ed., 1884); and, with Thomas G. Shearman, "The Law of Negligence" (1863-4th ed., 1888).

REDFIELD, Isaac Fletcher, jurist, b. in Westfield, Windsor co., Vt., 10 April, 1804; d. in Charlestown, Mass., 28 March, 1876. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1825, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practiced at Derby and Windsor, Vt. He was state's attorney for Orleans county from 1822 till 1835, when he became judge of the Vermont supreme court, and in 1852 he was appointed chief justice. He finally retired from the bench in 1860. From 1857 till 1861 he was professor of medical jurisprudence at Dartmouth. In the latter year he removed to Boston, where he remained until his death. From January, 1867, he was for two years special counsel of the United States in Europe, having charge of many important suits and legal matters in England and France. He received the degree of L.L. D. from Trinity in 1849, and from Dartmouth in 1853. He is the author of "Law of Railway, Telegraph, and Canal "ways" (Boston, 1857; 5th ed., 2 vol., 1875); "The Law of Wills" (part i., 1864; 3d ed., 1869); and parts ii. and iii., 1870); "A Practical Treatise on Civil Pleading and Practice, with Forms," with William A. Herrick (1868); "The Law of Carriers and Railroads" (1869); and Leading American Railway Cases, 2d ed., 1870. He also edited Joseph Story's "Equity Pleadings," and "Conflict of Laws"; and Greenleaf's "On Evidence." From 1862 till his death he was an editor of the "American Law Register" (Philadelphia).

REDFIELD, Justus Starr, publisher, b. in Wallingford, Conn., 2 Jan., 1810; d. near Florence, N. J., 24 March, 1888. After receiving a limited education, he learned the printing business, and at times boarding-school teaching. In 1831 he opened an office in New York, and began the publication of "The Family Magazine," the first illustrated monthly in this country, which he continued for eight years. Benson J. Lossing and A. Sidney Dowe at different times acted as editors. The early death of Mr. Redfield's brother, who had charge of the engraving department, discouraged the further prosecution of the work. About 1841 he opened a book-store in the same city, and carried on the business of book-selling, printing, and publishing until 1860. He was the original American publisher of the works of Edgar Allan Poe, William Makepeace and John Dorm. He also issued "Noces Ambulanes," the revised novels of William Gilmore Simms, and a large miscellaneous list. From 1855 till 1860 George L. Duyckinck was interested with Mr. Redfield as a special partner. In 1861 he was appointed U. S. consul at Ortno, Italy, and in 1863 he was transferred to Brixis; but resigned in 1866. He edited "Italy's History, by the "bouche de pain" (Paris, 1861), and translated from the Italian "The Mysteries of Neapolitan Convents," by Henrietta Caracciolo (Hartford, 1867).

REDFIELD, William C., meteorologist, b. near Middletown, Conn., 20 March, 1879; d. in New York city, 12 Feb., 1857. He assumed the initial form coming of age. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to a saddler in Upper Middletown (now Cromwell). In 1810, on the expiration of his apprenticeship, he went on foot to visit his mother in Ohio, and kept a journal of his experiences. After spending the winter in Ohio he returned to Upper Middletown, and engaged in his trade for nearly fourteen years, also keeping a small country store. He then came to New York city. Meanwhile, after the great hurricane of 1821, Mr. Redfield arrived at the conclusion that the storm was a progressive whirlwind; but other enterprises prevented the development of his theory at that time. He became interested in steam navigation, and as the general community had become alarmed by several disastrous steamboat explosions he established a line of safety-large, consisting of large and commodious passenger-boats towed by a steamboat at sufficient distance to prevent danger, to run between New York and Albany. When the public confidence was restored he transformed his line into a system of low-boats for conveying freight, which continued until after his death. He was largely identified with the introduction of railroads, and in 1829 he issued a pamphlet in which he placed before the American people the plan of a system of railroads to connect Hudson river with the Mississippi by means of a route that was substantially that of the New York and Erie railroad. During the same year he became convinced of the desirability of street-railways in cities, and petitioned the New York corporation to construct a line along Canal street. In 1832 he explored the proposed route of the Harlem railroad, and was instrumental in securing the charter of that road; also, about that time he was associated with James Brewster in the movement that resulted in the construction of the Hartford and New Haven railroad. His first paper on the "Atlantic Storms," was published in 1854 in the "American Journal of Science," and in 1853 it was followed by his memoir on the "Hurricanes and Storms of the United States and West Indies," which subject he continued later, with numerous papers, descriptions, and tables of particular hurricanes. Subsequently he devoted some attention to geology, studying the fossil fishes of the sandstone formations. In 1836 he demonstrated that the fossils of the Connecticut river valley and the New Jersey sandstones, to which he gave the name of the Newark group, belonged to the lower Jurassic period. In 1839 he received the honorary degree of A. M. from Yale, and he was an active member of the American association of naturalists and geologists. To his influence the change of the latter organization to the more inclusive American association for the advancement of science was largely due, and in 1843 he was its first president, having charge of the Philadelphia meeting of that year. See "Scientific Life and Labors of William C. Redfield," by Denison Olmsted (Cambridge, 1858). His son, John Howard, naturalist, b. in Cromwell, Conn., 10 July, 1815; d. in Philadelphia, 27 Feb., 1895, removed to New York city in 1827, and was educated at the high-school, which he left to enter business, and was engaged in freight-transportation on the Hudson below from 1833 till 1861, when he removed to Philadelphia, where, until 1885, he was cashier of a car-wound foundry. In 1836 he became a member of the Lyceum of natural history (now the New York academy of sciences), and he was its corresponding secretary from 1839 till 1861. He contributed to its "Annual" numerous papers, of which the first, in 1837, was upon "Fossil Fishes," and contained the earliest intimation that the sand-tones of Connecticut and Massachusetts were of a more recent formation than that to which they had been previously referred. His subsequent papers were chiefly on zoological subjects. He was appointed conservator of the herbarium of the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences in 1876, and he has contributed botanical papers to the "Buffalo Biologist," the "Torrey Botanical Club," and to the "Botanical Gazette." Mr. Redfield has also published "Genetical History of the Redfield Family in the United States" (Albany, 1860).

REDAJET, or SAGOVETHA ("He keeps them awake"), chief of the Wolf tribe of the Senecas, b. at Old-Castle, near Geneva, N. Y., 1751; d. in Seneca Village, N. Y., 30 Jan., 1830. Several portraits have been taken of the great Seneca. George Catlin painted him twice, Henry Inman once, and Robert W. Wier in 1828, when he was on a visit to New York city; Fitz-Greene Halleck has celebrated him in song. With as much justice as Rienzi has been styled the last of the Romans, may Red-Jacket be called the last of the Senecas. Like Rienzi, he was more energetic in speech and action than in action, and failed in courage and presence of mind in great emergencies. The vignette is from Wier's portrait. See his life by William L. Stone (New York, 1841).

REDMAN, John, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 27 Feb., 1762; d. there, 13 March, 1808. He received his preparatory education at the academy of Rev. William Tennent, and began his medical studies under Dr. John Brown. At the age of twenty he went to Bermuda, where he practised his profession for several years, and then visited Europe to complete his education. After attending lectures and "walking" the hospitals in Edinburgh, London, and Paris, he proceeded to Leyden, where he was graduated at the university in July, 1784. About 1762 he was attacked by disease of the liver, and subsequent delicate health compelled him largely to restrict his practice. On the foundation of the Philadelphia college of physicians in 1786 he was chosen president of that body, and for many years he was one of the physicians of the city hospital. From both these institutions, in which he was deeply interested, he retired only when he was forced to do so by the infirmities of age. Dr. Redman was a strong advocate of heroic remedies, and considered more energetic measures necessary in the cure of diseases in this climate than in Europe. He bled largely in the yellow-fever epidemic of 1762, and advocated the same treatment in 1793. He wrote an account of the former visitation, and presented it to the College of physicians in the city. In his later years he was employed freely in all chronic afflictions, and in the diseases of old age he relied chiefly on slight but frequent bleedings. He was considered one of the foremost practitioners of his time.
REDPATH, James, author, b. in Berwick-on-Tweed, Scotland, 24 Aug., 1833; d. in New York city, 10 Feb., 1891. He emigrated with his parents to Michigan. At the age of eighteen he came to New York, and devoted himself to journalism. At the age of nineteen he became an editor of the New York "Tribune," and soon afterward he formed a resolution to visit the southern states in order to witness for himself the conditions and effects of slavery. He not only visited the plantations of slave-owners as a guest, but went on foot through the southern seaboard states. In the course of his long journey he slept frequently in slave-cabins, and visited the religious gatherings and merry-makings where the negroes con-sorted, and penetrated law and semblance of law to speak the truth about slavery, he did not hesitate to do so, and consequently became noted as a fiery Abolitionist. In 1855 he became the Kansas correspondent of the St. Louis "Democrat." He took an active part in the events of that time, and in 1859 made two visits to Hayti. During the second one he was appointed by Presi- dent Fillmore commissioner of emigration in the United States. Immediately upon his return home, Mr. Redpath founded the Haytian bureau of emigration in Boston and New York, and several thousand negroes availed themselves of it. In connection with the Haytian bureau Mr. Redpath established a weekly newspaper called "Pine and Palm," in which were advocated the emigration movement and the general interests of the African race in this country. He was also appointed Haytian consul in Philadelphia and then joint commissioner to the United States, and was largely instrumental in procuring recognition of Haytian independence. He was with the armies of Gen. William T. Sher-man and Gen. George H. Thomas during the civil war, and subsequently with Gen. Quincy A. Gilmore in Charleston. At the latter place he was appointed superintendent of education, organized the school system of South Carolina, and founded the Colored orphan asylum in Charleston. In 1868 he established the Boston lyceum bureau, and subsequently Redpath's lecture bureau. In 1881 he went to Ireland, partly to recruit his health and partly to fill the position of associate editor of the New York "Tribune." On his return in the following year he made a tour of the United States and Canada, lecturing on Irish subjects, and in the same year founded a newspaper called "Red- path's Weekly," devoted to the Irish cause. In 1886 he became an editor of the North American Review. Besides contributions to the newspa-pers, magazines, and reviews, he published "Hand-Book to Kansas" (New York, 1858); "The Roving Editor" (1859); "Echoes of Harper's Ferry" (Boston, 1860); "Southern Notes" (1860); "Guide to Hayti" (1860); "The John Brown Invasion" (1860); "Life of John Brown" (1860); "John Brown, the Hero" (London, 1882); and "Talks about Hayti" (New York, 1881).

REDWAY, Jacques Wardlaw, geographer, b. near Nashville, Tenn., 5 May, 1849. He was educated at the University of California, and then followed a special course in mining engineering at the University of Munich. Subsequently he became instructor in chemistry at the University of California, and then was professor of physical geography and geology at the State normal school of California. From 1870 till 1875 he was connected with various mines in California and Arizona as engineer or superintendent. Since 1880 he has devoted his attention exclusively to geographical science, and has travelled in North and South America, Europe, Asia, and Africa. His works in book-form, for schools, are "Complete Geography" (Philadelphia, 1887); "Manual of Physical Geography" (1887); "Elementary Geography" (1888); also "Manual of Geography and Travel" (1888); and "Sketches in Physical Geography," in preparation.

REDWOOD, Abraham, philanthropist, b. in the island of Antigua, W. I., in 1709; d. in New- port, R. I., 6 March, 1788. His father (b. in Bris- tol, England, in 1665) came into possession by mar- riage of a large sugar-plantation in Antigua, known as Cassada Garden, where he resided until 1712, when he removed to the United States. After living a few years in Salem, Mass., he settled perma-nently in Newport, R. I. His son was educated at Philadelphia, where he remained until he was eighteen years old. He returned soon afterward to Newport, married, and divided his time between his town and country residence. The latter compr-ised an estate of 145 acres at Portsmouth, R. I., which is still known as "Redwood Farm," and reconnection he maintained until his death. In 1834 he was deputed, with Rev. James Matheson, by the Congregational union of England and Wales, to visit the United States and report on the condition of religion and education in that country, and on his return he published, with Mr. Matheson, "Visit to the American Churches" (2 vols. London, 1836), which made a valuable addition to English knowledge of American institutions and society. He founded in 1833 the London orphan asylum; in 1837, the Infant orphan asylum at Croydon; and subsequently the Royal asylum for idiots, and the Royal hospital for incurables. He gave freely to these and other charities, but made it a principle throughout his life never to receive in any form a recompense for his services in their behalf. At his death he left over £2,000 to the above and similar institutions.

Besides his book on this country, he published "No Fiction" (London, 1818; 24th ed., 1860); "Martha" (1836); "The Day of Pentecost," "The Revival of Religion," and "Earnest Piety essential to Eminence and Usefulness" (1839); and "Advancement of Religion the Claim of the Times" (1847). See "Memoirs of the Life and Labors of Andrew Reed, D. D.,” by his sons, Charles and Andrew (1863).

REED, David, editor, born in Motley, Vt., March 17, 1817; died in Boston, Mass., July 6, 1870. He was the son of Rev. William Reed, who was born in 1755, and had charge of the Congregational church at Easton from 1784 until his death in 1809. David was graduated at Brown in 1810, and for several years was principal of the Bridgewater, Mass., academy. He subsequently studied theology, and in 1814 was licensed to preach as a Unitarian clergyman. In 1821 he established at Boston the "Christian Register," an organ of that denomination, and he continued to publish and edit it until 1866. From the outset Mr. Reed had the assistance, editorially and as contributors, of many of the ablest writers in the Unitarian denomination, and his journal exercised much influence. He was also a founder of the American anti-slavery society in 1829.

REED, Horatio Blake, soldier, b. in Rockaway, L. I., Jan. 22, 1837; d. in Togus, Kennebec co., Me., July 3, 1888. He was educated at Troy Polytechnic institute, and on May 14, 1861, was commissioned 2d lieutenant in the 6th U. S. artillery. He took part in the battles of Bull Run (for which he was brevetted 1st lieutenant); Manassas Court-House, Mechanicsville, Gaines's Mills, Malvern Hill, and Manassas. He was also present at Antietam, where he was severely wounded. He was brevetted captain, 1 July, 1862, for the peninsular campaign, and commissioned lieutenant, 19 Sept., 1863. The following October he was brevetted major for the skilful handling of his guns at Bristol Station, Va. The latter part of the war, and especially the surrender of Gen. Gouverneur K. Warren, who declared in his report that Capt. Reed had saved the day. From November, 1863, till April, 1864, he was acting assistant adjutant-general of the 1st brigade of horse artillery. In October, 1864, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the 23d New York cavalry, having already commanded the regiment at Charleston, during the evacuation of Charleston, and the action at Laceys Springs. He was promoted colonel in January, 1865, and commanded a cavalry brigade in the valley of Virginia from May till August of that year under Gen. George A. Custer. On March 18, 1865, he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel in the regular army for meritorious services during the war. On 8 May, 1870, he resigned from the army to become a civil engineer in the employment of the railroad through the Adirondacks, N. Y., and he subsequently served in the Erie Railroad.

REED, Hugh, soldier, b. in Richmond, Wayne co., Ind., Aug. 19, 1830. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1853, and promoted 2d lieutenant, 1st infantry, served on garrison and frontier duty, and was then attached to the signal service, being professor of military science and tactics in the signal school at Fort Ripple (now Fort Wayne), Va., from 1858 to 1861. In 1858-2, on garrison and frontier duty at Forts Apache and Lowell, Arizona, and San Diego, Cal., in 1863-4. In 1861 he was appointed inspector-general on the staff of Gov. Albert G. Porter, of Indiana. Since 1864 he has been on leave of absence, owing to impaired health from exposure on the plains. Lieut. Reed has invented a metallic shelving, using castiron shelves and gas-pipe supports, for which two patents have been issued, and has also invented a folding cash-box. He compiled "A Calendar of the Dakota Nation," which was printed in 1877, and included in the fourth annual report of the bureau of ethnology to the secretary of the Smithsonian institution (Washington, 1880), and the manual of "Military Regulations" (Richmond, Ind., 1881); and "Upton's Infantry Tactics," abridged and revised (Baltimore, 1882); "Artilley Tactics," abridged and revised (1882); "Military Science and Tactics" (1882); "Standard Infantry Tactics" (1883); and "Broon Tactics, or Calisthenes in a New Form" (1883).

REED, James, soldier, b. in Wolburn, Middlesex co., Mass., Dec. 14, 1814; d. in Fitchburg, Mass., Oct. 13, 1867. He married in 1848 and settled in Brookfield, but subsequently removed to Lunenburg, Mass. He commanded a company in Col. Joseph Blanchard's regiment in the campaign against the French and Indians under Sir William Johnson in 1755, was with Gen. James Abercrombie at Ticonderoga in 1758, and served under Gen. Jeffrey Amherst in 1760. In the early days of the Revolution his military experience, energy, and commanding address made him unusually successful in securing recruits for the patriot cause. In 1775 he had settled in the town of Fitzwilliam, N. H., of which he was an original proprietor. In 1770 he was made lieutenant-colonel, and in May, 1775, was in command of the 2d New Hampshire regiment at Falmouth. In the action at Bunker Hill, he held the rail-fence with John Stark, and protecting the retreat of the main body from the redoubt, joining the army in Canada under Gen. John Sullivan early in 1776, his regiment suffered severely from disease, and more than one third died during the campaign. Before arriving at Ticonderoga on the retreat Col. Reed was captured, and detained for several months without release from his bed incapacitated for further service. He had meanwhile been appointed brigadier-general on the recommendation of Gen. Washington, and retained the commission in the hope that he might be able again to take the field, but he was compelled to return home, nearly blind and deaf, and accepted half-pay.—His son, Sylvanus, d. in 1736, served throughout the war, and saw service through the entire campaign of 1778, and afterward promoted colonel.

REED, John, clergyman, b. in Framingham, Mass., Nov. 17, 1753; d. in West Bridgewater, Mass., Feb. 18, 1831. He was the son of Solomon, minister at Middleborough, Mass., and was graduated at Yale in 1772. After studying theology and being licensed to preach, he was employed for two years as chaplain in the navy, although he never went to sea. On 7 Jan., 1750, he was installed at Bridgewater, Mass., as colleague pastor of Rev. Daniel Perkins, who died in 1752, and maintained the connection until his death. In 1794 he was elected to congress as a Federalist, and he was twice reelected, serving from 7 Dec., 1795, till 2 March, 1801. He was a follower and warm friend of George Washington and John Adams. His opinions on ecclesiastical affairs were so just and acceptable as to receive the approval of courts and judges; the report of a church council drawn up by him was adopted in substance as the foundation of an important division of the supreme court of Massachusetts, his theological views were Arminian, and he excelled as a metaphysician and controversialist. Although the last ten years of his life were spent in blindness, he continued to preach regularly until a short time before his death. He was a member of the Unitarian council that was called to consider the case of Rev. Abel Abbott. He received the degree of D. D., from Brown university in 1802. Besides eight occasional sermons, Dr. Reed published "An Apology for the Rite of Infant Baptism" (1806).—His son, John, legislator, b. in West Bridgewater, Mass., 2 Sept., 1781; d. there, 25 Nov., 1859, was graduated at Brown in 1809, where he was tutor from 1809 till 1810. He was also for one year principal of the Bridgewater academy. He afterward studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1814, and practiced in Bridgewater, Mass. He soon became popular and was elected to the 13th congress as a Federalist, and reelected to the 14th, serving from 24 May, 1815, till 3 March, 1817. Four years later he was again elected, this time as a Whig, and he was successively reelected until he had served from 3 Dec., 1821, till 3 March, 1825, and during that period nearly 20 years of congressional experience. He was sometimes facetiously alluded to by his political opponents as the "life-member." In 1844 he was elected lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts, with George N. Briggs at the head of the ticket. Both served until 1851, when both retired to private life. Gov. Reed received the degree of LL. D., from Brown in 1817, and of S. D., from Yale, in 1818, and of A. D., from Harvard, in 1822. He was installed at Bridgewater, Mass., 22 April, 1797; d. in Boston, 14 Oct., 1854, was graduated at Harvard in 1817, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practiced at Yarmouth, Mass., until 1827. He then became a partner in the firm of Cyrus Alger and Co., carrying on an iron-foundry at South Boston. This connection he maintained until his death. He was a believer in the doctrines of Swedenborg, and for more than twenty years edited the "New Jerusalem Magazine," devoted to their promulgation. He published "The General Principles of English Grammar" (Boston, 1821).—Another son, Sampson, editor, b. in West Bridgewater, Mass., 10 June, 1800; d. in Boston, Mass., 8 July, 1859, was graduated at Harvard in 1828, and studied theology at Cambridge, but in 1833, converting to the doctrines of Swedenborg, he abandoned the design of preparing for the ministry, and engaged in business. He subsequently edited the "New Church Magazine," and was co-editor of the "New Jerusalem Magazine." He was the author of "Observations on the Growth of the Mind" (Boston, 1826; London, 1829).—Another son, Henry, b. in Germany about 1760; d. in Cabarrus county, N. C., about 1838. He came to this country as a Hessian soldier, and after the war of the Revolution settled on a farm in Cabarrus county, N. C. But little is known of his history, except that he seems to have been grossly ignorant on many subjects regarding which he would naturally be presumed to be well informed. Thus he lived to be more than eighty years old before discovering that he was entitled to become a citizen of the United States. He was then naturalized at Concord. N. C. Reed was the owner of the first gold-diggers that was discovered in this country. In 1799 his son, Concord, while shooting fish with a bow and arrow in a small stream, called Meadow creek, near his father's house, found in the water a piece of glistening yellow metal, which he carried home. It was about the size of a "small smoothing-iron." His father did not recognize it, and, a silversmith at Concord proving equally ignorant of its value, he was allowed for many years used as a convenient door-weight. Finally it was submitted to a jeweler at Fayetteville, N. C., who, by fluxing, produced from it a bar of gold from six to eight inches long. In 1803 a piece of gold weighing twenty-eight pounds was found in the same stream. Other pieces were afterward gathered ranging in weight from sixteen pounds down to the smallest particles. In 1811 quartz veins were discovered, and Reed died a wealthy man.

REED, John, clergyman, b. in Wickford, R. I., in 1777; d. in Poulticeps, N. Y., 6 July, 1845. He was graduated at Union in 1805, studied theology, and was ordained deacon, 27 May, 1806, by Bishop Benjamin Moore, and priest, 17 June, 1808. His first charge after ordination was St. Luke's church, Concord, C. H. He afterward went to Poulticeps, N. Y., to the rectorship of Christ church, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and occupied that post for the remainder of his life. He received the degree of D. D., from Columbia in 1822. Dr. Reed was a man of good abilities, and devoted himself chiefly to pastoral work. He published a small work in defense of the Episcopal constitution of the church, and a work on the "Principles of the Constitution of New York," 1817. His son, John, b. in Berwick, Mass., 1821, was graduated at Harvard in 1844, and studied medicine at Boston. He was married to Catherine, daughter of John C. A. Archibald, and died in 1846.

REED, John, jurist, b. in Adams county, Pa., in 1786; d. in Carlisle, Pa., 19 June, 1850. He was a member of the class of 1806 in Dickinson college, but left that institution before graduation. He studied law and was admitted to the bar of Westmoreland county, Pa., in 1808. In 1815 he was elected sheriff of that county, and in 1823 he was judge of the 9th judicial district of Pennsylvania. From 1834 until his death he was professor in the law department of Dickinson college. In 1839 he received the degree of LL. D., from Washington college, Pa. He wrote "The Pennsylvania Blackstone" (3 vols., Carlisle, 1838), "a medley of English, Federal, and local law."

REED, Joseph, statesman, b. in Trenton, N. J., 27 Aug., 1741; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 March, 1785. He was graduated at Princeton in 1765, and then studying law with Robert Stockton, was admitted to the bar in 1763, after which he spent two years as a law student in the Middle Temple, London. On his return in 1755 he followed his profession in Trenton, and in 1757 was appointed assessor of New Jersey. In 1770 he went again to England, where he married Esther De Berdt, daughter of Dennis De Berdt (q. v.), agent of Massachusetts. He returned to this country in October, and settled in Philadelphia, where he followed his profession with success. He took an active part in the popular movements in Pennsylvania, serving in the Provincial congress, and was a member of the committee of correspondence for Philadelphia in November, 1774, and in January, 1775, was president of the 2d Provincial congress. On the formation of the Pennsylvania associated militia after the battle of Lexington, he was chosen lieutenant-colonel, and, when George Washington was appointed to the command of the American forces, Mr. Reed left his practice in Philadelphia to become Gen. Washington's military secretary. As he had been educated to the orderly and methodical transaction of business, and was a reading man, there could be no doubt that the opening of books of record, preparing forms, directing correspondence, composing legal and state papers, and establishing the general rules and etiquette of headquarters, can be traced principally to him. In October, 1775, he returned to Philadelphia, and in January, 1776, he was also a member of the assembly, although at the time he was acting chairman of the committee of safety. He was appointed on 5 June adjutant-general of the American army, with the rank of colonel, and was exceedingly active in the campaign that terminated with the battle of Long Island. Admiral Howe, who reached New York in July, 1776, was charged, as special commissioner, with opening negotiations with the Americans, and under a flag of truce a meeting took place, at which Col. Reed represented Gen. Washington, but the communication from the British admiral being addressed to "George Washington, Esquire," he declined to receive it. In 1776, on Washington's solicitation, he was appointed brigadier-general and tendered command of all the American cavalry, and meanwhile, on 20 March, 1777, he was appointed first chief justice of Pennsylvania under the new constitution; but he declined both of these offices, preferring to remain attached to Washington's headquarters as a volunteer aide without rank or pay, in which capacity he served with credit at the battles of Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth. In September, 1777, he was elected to the state congress, but continued with the army and was again chosen in December. He declined the commissionership of Indian affairs in November, 1778, but accepted the chairmanship of a committee to confer with Washington concerning the management of the ensuing campaign, to concert measures for the greatest efficiency of the armament and the city of Philadelphia. In December, 1777, he was elected to the assembly, and the county made him a member of the council; but he declined the former election. In December, 1778, he was chosen president of the supreme executive council of Pennsylvania, and he was continued in that office for three years. During his administration he aided in founding the University of Pennsylvania, and favored the gradual abolition of slavery and the being away with the proprietary powers of the Penn family. While Benedict Arnold (q. v.) was in command of Philadelphia, after the evacuation by the British, he was led into extravagances that resulted in his being tried by court-martial. In the presentation of the charges Gov. Reed, as president of the council, took an active part, and so incurred the displeasure of many friends of Arnold. After the failure of the British peace commissioners to treat with congress, attempts were made to bribe high officials, and among others, Gov. Reed was approached and offered $12,000, together with any office in the colonies in his majesty's gift. His reply was: "I am not worth purchasing, but, such as I am, the king of Great Britain is not rich enough to do it." In 1780 he was invested with extraordinary powers, and largely through his influence the disaffection of the Pennsylvania militia was suppressed, and he assumed the practice of his profession in 1781, and was appointed by congress one of the commission to settle the dispute between the states of Pennsylvania and Connecticut. Failing health led to his visiting England in 1784, hoping that a sea-voyage would restore him; but he returned in a few months, and died soon afterward. Meanwhile he had been chosen to congress, but he never took his seat. Gov. Reed was charged with mediating a treacherous abandonment of the American cause, and a determination to go over to the British, and George Bancroft in his history introduced the statement on what appeared to be reliable testimony. A bitter controversy ensued, in which William B. Reed (q. v.) took part, and it was ultimately shown that he had been charged without cause (q. v.). He published "Remarks on Gov. Johnstone's Speech in Parliament" (Philadelphia, 1779), and "Remarks on a Late Publication in the Independent Gazetteer," with an Address to the People of Pennsylvania" (1785). The latter elicited "A Reply," by John Gedwahler. See "Life of Joseph Reed" by Henry Reed, in Sparks's "American Biography" (Boston, 1846), and "Life and Correspondence of Joseph Reed," by his grandson, William B. Reed (2 vols. Philadelphia, 1847).—His wife, Esther De Berdt, b. in London, 22 Oct., 1746; d. in Philadelphia, 18 Sept., 1789, became acquainted with Mr. Reed when he was a law student in London, and soon after the death of her father married him in London in May, 1779. After the evacuation of Philadelphia she was chosen president of a society of ladies in that city which united for the purpose of collecting, by voluntary subscription, additional supplies in money and clothing for the army, which was then in great destitution. In a letter to Gen. Washington she writes: "The amount of the subscription is $200,580, and $625 5s. 8d. in specie, which makes in the whole, in paper money, $996,662 5s. 8d. The letters and valuable correspondence with Gen. Washington are given in the life of Joseph Reed mentioned above. See also "The Life of Esther De Berdt, afterward Esther Reed of Pennsylvania" (1853).—Their son, Joseph, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 11 July, 1772; d. there, 4 March, 1846, was graduated at Princeton in 1792, and trained law. From 1800 till 1801 he was a prothonotary of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and then attorney-general of Pennsylvania in 1810-11. He became recorder of the city of Philadelphia in 1810, continuing in that office till 1826, and published "The Laws of Pennsylvania" (5 vols., Philadelphia, 1822-3).—The second Joseph's son, William Bradford, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 30 June, 1806; d. in New York city, 15 Feb., 1876, was a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania in 1825, and then accompanied Joel R. Poinsett to Mexico as his private secretary. On his return he studied law and practised with such success that, in 1838, he was elected attorney-general of Pennsylvania. In 1859 he was appointed professor of American history at the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1857 he became a native of that city, in 1858 he surveyed the important treaty of June, 1858, that secured to the United States all the advantages that had been acquired by the allies from the Chinese. Mr. Reed for a long time was the most brilliant and effective of the antagonists of the Democratic party in Pennsylvania, but on the nomination of James Buchanan he became his firm friend and supporter, even entering heartily into the extreme views of those who sympathized with the south, and on his return to this country in 1860 he continued to act with the Democratic party. Subsequently he settled in New York, became a regular contributor to the press of that city, and for a time was American correspondent of the London Times. Mr. Reed wrote prolifically and, besides contributions to "The American Quarterly Review" and "The North American Review," he was the author of numerous orations, addresses, and controversial pamphlets on historical subjects. Among the latter were several relating to his grandfather, President Joseph Reed, whose reputation was assailed by George Bancroft. These included "President Reed of Pennsylvania, a Reply to George Bancroft and Others" (Philadelphia, 1867), to which Mr. Bancroft responded with "Joseph Reed, an Historical Essay" (New York, 1867); and "A Rejoinder to Mr. Bancroft's Historical Essay" (Philadelphia, 1867). Besides editing the posthumous works of his brother, Henry (q. v.), he published a comprehensive history of the United States, which, according to Chancellor Kent, is "a most interesting and admirable history of one of the ablest and purest patriots of the Revolution" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1847); and "Life of Esther De Berdt, afterward Esther Reed" (1854).—William Bradford's brother, Henry, author, b. in Philadelphia, 11 July, 1767, d. at sea, 25 Sept., 1851, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1785, and in 1789 was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia. In 1804 he was elected assistant professor of English literature in the University of Pennsylvania and abandoned the legal profession. The same year he became assistant professor of moral philosophy, and in 1825 he was made professor of rhetoric and English literature. He served the university until 1834, when he visited Europe. In September he emigrated from Liverpool for home in the steamship "Arctic," in which he was lost at sea. He was a member of the American philosophical society and a vice-provost of the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1846 received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Vermont. He was early brought into communication with physiology and, by the supervision and arrangement of an American edition of his poems (Philadelphia, 1837), he was the author of the preface to this work, and an elaborate article on Wordsworth in the "New York Review" (1829). After the death of the poet he supervised the publication of the American edition of the memoirs by Dr. Christopher Wordsworth (2 vols., Boston, 1841), in 1845 he prepared an edition of Alexander Reid's "Dictionary of the English Language" (New York, 1845), and George F. Graham's "English Synonyme," with an introduction and illustrative authorities (1847), and edited American reprints of Thomas Arnold's "Lectures on Modern History" (1845); Lord Mahon's "History of England from the Peace of Treaties of Paris" (2 vols., 1849); and the poetical works of Thomas Gray, for which he prepared a new memoir (Philadelphia, 1856). He delivered two "Lectures upon the American Union" before the Smithsonian institution (1857), and several addresses at various times before other bodies. He wrote a life of his grandfather, Joseph Reed, in Sparks's "American Biography." His chief compositions were several courses of lectures at the University of Pennsylvania, of which collections have been published since his death by his brother, William B. Reed, with the titles "Lectures of English Literature, from Chaucer to Tennyson" (Philadelphia, 1859); "Lectures on English History and Tragic Poetry, as illustrated by Shakespeare," to which is prefixed a biographical sketch (1855); "Lectures on the History of the American Union" (1856); and "Lectures on the British Poets" (2 vols., 1857).—Henry's son, Henry, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Sept., 1846, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1865, and was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1869. In November, 1886, he was appointed a judge of the court of common pleas in Philadelphia, and in 1887 was elected to the office for a term of years. He is the author of a work on the "Statute of Frauds" (3 vols., 1884), and has published numerous articles on legal subjects. He translated "The Daughter of an Egyptian King," by George Ebers (Philadelphia, 1875).

REED, Philip, senator, b. in Kent county, Md., about 1759; d. in Kent county, Md., 2 Nov., 1829. He received an academical education, and served as a captain in the Revolutionary army. Afterward he was elected to the U.S. Senate in place of Robert Wright, resigned, and held the seat from 23 Dec., 1806, to 18 Oct., 1808. On his return home he commanded, as colonel of militia, the regiment of home-guards that met and defeated at Mooresfield, Md., 30 Aug., 1814, a superior British force under Sir Peter Parker (q. v.), who was killed in the engagement. Col. Reed was elected to the 15th congress, serving from 1 Dec., 1817, till 3 March, 1819, and re-elected to the 17th, having previously served in the state legislature. His health not having recovered from the blow received in the battle, he was enabled to make a full course of law lectures, and in 1820 he was elected a judge of the circuit court of Montgomery and Prince George's counties. He died Oct. 2, 1841. He was the father of B. D. Reed, who was a member of the legislature of Virginia in 1865, and in 1869 was appointed postmaster of Roanoke, Va., a position he held until his death in 1871. His two daughters received an excellent education at private academies, and were married to prominent men who followed the legal profession. He was a man of large means, and was a gentleman and scholar of the old school. When his health failed, the old days of leisure were again enjoyed, and he died at his residence in Montgomery county, Va., 2 Nov., 1829. He was a marriage of long duration, but he had no children. He left to his widow a large fortune, which he had accumulated. She lived in ill health for many years, but at an advanced age took pleasure in her time, and was beloved by all who knew her. She died Oct. 26, 1871.

REED, Rebecca Theresa, presbyyte, b. in East Cambridge, Mass., about 1813. Her father was a farmer in straitened circumstances, who gave his three daughters the best education within his reach. The eldest, Rebecca, was sent to a neighborhood school for three years, and displayed an unusual aptitude for making lace and other ornamental work. She was a serious, well-behaved girl, and thoughtful, according to the testimony of her teachers, beyond her years. Her attention was first called to muse and numeraries in the summer of 1826, about which time an Ursoline convent had been established on Mount Benedict, and the sixteen-year-old girl interested herself in the convent, and was anxious to enter the institution with the intention of consecrating herself to a religious life. Through the influence of Roman Catholic friends, and notwithstanding the opposition of her family, she was admitted to the convent on 7 Aug., 1831. Although she remained within its walls nearly six months, she soon began to be dissatisfied with the continual repression of youthful impulses, the strict discipline, the physical discomforts, and the apparent want of sympathy of those in charge. Having accidentally overheard a conversation between the convent authorities, from which she learned that she was to be removed to the east coast of America if she continued to be dissatisfied, and that her mother, again became interested in the subject, and was anxious to enter the institution with the intention of consecrating herself to a religious life. Miss Reed's escape, and the statements that she made of what had occurred during her stay in the convent, gave rise to an acrimonious controversy. Two years later the excitement was increased by the escape of Sister Mary John on 28 June, 1834, and on the 11th of the following August the convent, a large three-story building, was sacked and burned by a mob. The foregoing statements are gathered from “Six Months in a Convent; or, The Narrative of Rebecca Theresa Reed. Who was under the Influence of the Roman Catholics about Two Years,” etc., and “Supplement to ‘Six Months in a Convent,” confirming the Narrative of Rebecca Theresa Reed by the Testimony of more than One Hundred Witnesses” (Boston, 1835). See also “The Memorial History of Boston,” edited by Justin Winsor (vol. iii., Boston, 1881), for details of the destruction of the Ursuline convent.

REEDER, Thomas R., senator, b. in Kentucky; d. in Lexington, Ky., 26 Nov., 1829. Although his early educational advantages were limited, he was able to study law. On being admitted to the bar in 1818 he removed to Lexington, Ky., and had already acquired some reputation in his profession before removing to Mississippi territory. There he found a wide field for the exercise of his talents in the solution of the intricate questions that arose from the variety of land-tenures and the difficulty of applying the rules of common law to the novel conditions of frontier life. Mr. Reed settled at Natchez, and made his appearance in the supreme court of the state in the first criminal case that was brought before that tribunal. “The State against the Blennerhassetts,” which he argued for the defence at the June term in 1818. His reputation at the bar continued to increase, and in 1821 he was elected attorney-general of the state, discharging the duties of the office for four years which he was re-elected for the full term, but died while on his way to Washington to take his seat.

REED, Thomas Brackett, legislator, b. in Portland, Me., 18 Oct., 1839. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1860, and studied law, but was appointed assisting paymaster in the navy, 19 April, 1864, and served until his honorable discharge, 4 Nov., 1865. He was soon afterward admitted to the bar and began practice at Portland. In 1868-9 he was a member of the lower branch of the Maine legislature, and in 1870 he sat in the state senate. From the latter year until 1872 he was attorney-general, and in 1874-7 he served as solicitor for the city of Portland. He was elected a member of congress in 1876, and has been re-elected until the present time (1888). Mr. Reed is the leading Republican representative, and has been several times speaker of the house.

REED, William, philanthropist, b. in Marblehead, Mass., in 1776; d. there, 18 Feb., 1837. He became a merchant in his native town, and was elected to congress as a Federalist, serving from 1 Nov., 1811, till 3 March, 1813. He was active in educational and religious matters, acting as president of the Sabbath-day union of Massachusetts and of the American tract society, and as vice-president of the Education society. He was also one of the board of the Andover theological seminary and a trustee of Dartmouth college. Of $68,000 that was given by him in his will to benevolent objects, $17,000 were left to Dartmouth, $10,000 to Woburn; $9,000 to an American board of foreign missions, $16,000 to two churches in Marblehead, and $5,000 to the library of Andover theological seminary.

REEDER, Andrew Horatio, governor of Kansas, b. in Easton, Pa., 6 Aug., 1807; d. there, 5 July, 1864. He spent the greater part of his life in Easton, Pa., where he practised law, and was a Democratic politician, but declined office till 1854, when he was appointed the first governor of Kansas. Gov. Reeder had come to the territory a firm Democrat, but the conduct of the "border ruffians" shook his partisanship. He prescribed distinct and rigid rules for the conduct of the first legislature, which, it was then believed, would determine that Kansas would become a free or a slave state. But all his precautions came to naught. On 30 March, 1855, 5,000 Missourians took possession of nearly every election district in the territory. Of the total number of votes cast 1,110 were found to be illegal, and 5,427 were given to the pro-slavery and 891 to the free-state and other candidates. But on 9 April Reeder issued certificates of election to all but one of the candidates, and the returns in these cases he rejected on account of palpable defects in the papers. As a lawyer he recognized that he had the power to question the legality of the election of the several claimants only in those cases where there were protests lodged, or where there were palpable defects in the returns. Notices were sent throughout the territory that protests would be received and considered, and the time for filing protests was extended so that facilities might be given for a full hearing of both sides. In nearly two thirds of the returns there were no protests or official notice of fraud, and the papers were on their face regular. In the opinion of Gov. Reeder, this precluded him from withholding certificates, and he accordingly issued them, notwithstanding the personal objections of the petitioners that the claimants had nearly all been fraudulently elected. His contention always was that any other course would have been revolutionary. This action endowed the notoriously illegal legislature with technical authority, and a few weeks later, when Gov. Reeder went to Washington, D. C., to invoke the help of the administration, the attorney-general refused to prosecute, as Reeder's few certificate pronouncing the elections true. One of the first official acts of this legislature was to draw up a memorial to the president requesting Gov. Reeder's removal, but before its bearer reached Washington the governor was dismissed by President Pierce. He then became a resident of Lawrence, Kan., where the free-state movement began. Its citizens held a convention at Big Springs a few miles west of that town, on 5 Sept., 1855. Gov. Reeder wrote the resolutions, addressed the convention, and received their nomination, by acclamation, for the post of territorial delegate to congress. These resolutions declared that "we will endure no longer the tyrannical enactments of the bogus legislature, will resist them to the uttermost," and recommended the "formation of volunteer companies and the procurement of arms." On 9 Oct., at a separate election, Mr. Reeder was again chosen delegate to congress. Under the newly framed territorial constitution, which was known as the Topeka constitution, a legislature formed of the free-state party. 13 July, 1856, elected him, with James H. Lane, to the U. S. senate, which choice congress refused to recognize, and neither senator took his seat. At the beginning of the civil war he and Gen. Nathaniel Lyon were the first brigadier-generals that were appointed by President Lincoln. But Mr. Reeder declined, on the plea that he was too far advanced in life to be called to arms in the defense of his country. He returned to Easton, Pa., where he resided until his death. See "Life of Abraham Lincoln," by John G. Nicolay and John Hay.

REEDER, Charles, manufacturer, b. in Baltimore, Md., 31 Oct., 1817. He was educated in public schools in Baltimore, and has since devoted his attention to the construction of marine steam-engines, which have held a high rank for efficiency and durability, Mr. Reeder in this way became interested in steamships, and in 1855 was an owner of the "Tennessee," the first that cleared from Baltimore to a European port. He has been called to directorships in banking and other establishments, and has published "Caloric." A Review of the Dynamos (Baltimore, 1851).

REESE, John Krom, educator, b. in New York city, 27 Oct., 1851. He was graduated at Columbia in 1872, and at the School of mines in 1873, and in 1873-5 he was in assistant in mathematics at the latter institution. In 1876 he was called to the professorship of mathematics and astronomy in Washington University, St. Louis, where he remained until 1881 when he was removed to Columbia, given charge of the department of geodesy and practical astronomy, and made director of the observatory. While he was in St. Louis the time system radiating from the Washington university observatory was established by his aid, and the observatory was built. In July, 1875, he was a member of the Fort Worth solar eclipse party, and contributed a report to the publications of the expedition. Prof. Rees is a member of scientific societies, and has been active in the American association for the advancement of science, having been local secretary at the St. Louis meeting in 1878, secretary of the section on mathematics and physics in 1879, and general secretary in 1880. He has edited various publications in the American astronomical society since 1883. He has been chairman of the board of editors of the "School of Mines Quarterly" since 1884, and has published "Report on the Total Solar Eclipse, July, 1878," "Observations of the Transit of Venus, 6 Dec., 1882," and, in addition to various papers and lectures before the New York academy of sciences, has written a cyclopaedia of art and science for the educational society of New York. He has been secretary of the local section of the American Association for the Advancement of Science since 1886, and was one of the members of the committee on organization of the association selected at the annual meeting in New York in 1887.

REESE, Chauncey B., soldier, b. in Cambridge, N. Y., 28 Dec., 1857; d. in Mobile, Ala., 22 Sept., 1870. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1859, and at the beginning of the civil war was sent to Fort Pickens, Fla., as assistant engineer in defense of that work. He was then transferred to similar duty at Washington, D. C., and became 1st lieutenant of engineers, 6 Aug., 1861. He rendered valuable service in the Virginia peninsular campaign from March till August, 1862, in constructing bridges, roads, and field-works, particularly the bridge, 2,000 feet in length, over the Chickahominy. He became captain of engineers in March, 1863, and was engaged in the Rappahannock campaign in support of operations conducted by Gen. Hooker before Fredericksburg, defensive works and bridges at Chancellorsville, and at Franklin's crossing of the Rappahannock, in the face of the enemy. He participated in the battle of Gettysburg, in the siege of Fort Wagner, S. C., and was chief engineer of the Army of the Tennessee during the Atlanta campaign, the subsequent march to the sea, and that through the Carolinas. In December, 1864, he was brevetted major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel, "for gallant and distinguished services during the campaign through Georgia and ending in the capture of Savannah," and in March, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, and appointed a special agent, "for valuable public services in the capture of New Orleans," and was given charge of the military works at Pensacola, Fla., and the military department of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, which appointments he continued till the close of the war. In May, 1865, he was brevetted major-general of volunteers, "for gallant and meritorious service during the same campaign. He became lieutenant-colonel in June, 1865, was superintending engineer of the construction of Fort Montgomery, N. Y., and recorder of the board of engineers to conduct experiments on the use of iron in permanent defences in 1865-7. In March of the latter year he became major in the corps of engineers. He was then secretary of the board of engineers for fortifications and harbor and river obstructions for the defence of the United States.

REESE, David Meredith, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1800; d. in New York city, 12 Aug., 1861. He was graduated at the medical department of the University of Maryland in 1820, and subsequenlly engaged in the U. S. army for faithful and meritorious service. He published "Observations on the Epidemic of Yellow Fever" (Baltimore, 1819); "Strictures on Health" (1828); "The Epidemic Cholera" (New York, 1830); "Humphs of New York" (Boston, 1833); "Review of the First Annual Report of the American Anti-Slavery Society," of which 25,000 copies were sold at once (1834); "Quakerism vs. Calvinism" (New York, 1834); "Phrenology known by its Fruits" (1838); and "Medical Lexicon of Modern Terminology" (1835); and contributed constantly to medical literature. He also edited the scientific section of "Chamber's Educational Course" (Edinburgh, 1844), and American editions of Sir Astley P. Cooper's "Surgical Diet," Dr. John M. Good's "Book of Nature," J. Moore Neligan's work on "Medicines," with notes (1850), and the "American Medical Gazette" (New York, 1850-3).

REESE, John James, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 18 Jan., d. in Baltimore City, 4 Sept., 1892. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania and at the medical department, and began practice in his native city. He entered the U. S. army as surgeon of volunteers in 1861, and was in charge of a hospital in Philadelphia. Dr. Reese continued to reside in that city, was professor of jurisprudence and toxicology in the University of Pennsylvania, and was a member of foreign and domestic professional societies. He was president of the Philadelphia medical jurisprudence society in 1883-7, and was physician to several city hospitals. He contributed largely to professional literature, edited the 7th American edition of Taylor's "Medical Jurisprudence," and published "American Medical Formulary," (Philadelphia, 1858); "Analysis of Pharmacoe and War" (1858); "Manual of Toxicology" (1874); and a "Text-Book of Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology" (184).}

REESE, Levi H., clergyman, b. in Harford county, Md., 8 Feb., 1806; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 21 Sept., 1851. He was educated in the public schools in Baltimore, taught for several years, and in 1826 entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church. In the controversy that resulted in the formation of the Methodist Protestant church, he joined the "Union" society, became secretary of that body, and was the first pastor that was ordained in that organization. He was chaplain to Reese, William Brodhead, jurist, b. in Jefferson county, Va., Nov. 1793; d. near Knoxville, Tenn., 7 July, 1860. He was graduated at Greeneville college with the first honors, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1817. In 1831 he became chancellor of the state, and in 1835 he was elected to the bench of the supreme court in Tennessee. He resigned in 1847. In 1850 he was chosen president of the University of East Tennessee, which placed him in an unusual position, but he continued in the office until his death. In 1845 the University of East Tennessee conferred upon him the degree of LL.D. Judge Reese's opinion in a case involving a construction of the "rule in Shelly's case" elicited high commendation from Chancellor Kent. He was a man of literary tastes and an able scholar.

Reeve, Isaac Van Duzen, soldier, b. in Berturners, Otsego co., N. Y., 29 July, 1813; d. in New York city, 31 Dec., 1890. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1833, was engaged in the Florida war in 1836-7 and in 1840-2, and served throughout the war with Mexico. He became captain of the 1st U. S. dragoons and the second major and lieutenant-colonel for gallant and meritorious service at Contreras, Churubusco, and Molino del Rey. He commanded the expedition against the Pima Apache Indians in 1858-9, became major in May, 1861, was made prisoner of war by Gen. David E. Twiggs on 9 May of that year, and was exchanged to 20 Aug., 1862. He was chief muster and discharging officer in 1862-3, became lieutenant-colonel in September, 1862, and was in command of the draft rendezvous at Pittsburg, Pa., in 1864-5. He became colonel of the 13th infantry in October, 1864, and was brevetted brigadier-general in the U. S. army, 13 March, 1865, "for faithful and meritorious service during the civil war." In January, 1871, he was retired at his own request.

Reeve, Tapping, jurist, b. in Brookhaven, L. I., in October, 1741; d. in Litchfield, Conn., 13 Dec., 1823. He was graduated at Princeton in 1763, and in 1767-70 was a tutor there. In 1772 he removed to Litchfield, Conn., and began the practice of law, and in 1784 he established there a law-school that attained to great reputation throughout the country. Many men that afterward became celebrated obtained their legal education there. He was its sole instructor till 1798, when he associated with him James Gould (q. v.), but he continued to give lectures till 1820. The modest one-story building where Messrs. Reeve and Gould delivered their lectures is still standing in a dilapidated condition. It has been removed to the outskirts of the town, and is used as a dwelling. Mr. Reeve was a judge of the Connecticut superior court from 1798 till 1814, when he became chief justice of the state, but he retired in the latter year, on reaching the age of seventy. He was a Federalist in politics, and though aversely disposed toward a reverse to the American arms in 1776, he was active in raising recruits, going as an officer to the vicinity of New York, where the news of the victories at Trenton and Princeton made his services unnecessary. He was the first eminent lawyer in this country that labored to effect a change in the laws respecting the property of married women. He received the degree of LL.D. from Middlebury in 1808, and from Princeton in 1813. He married Sarah, sister of Aaron Burr. Judge Reeve published "The Law of Baron and Femme; of Parent and Child; of Guardian and Ward; of Master and Servant, etc." (New Haven, 1816; 2d ed., by Lucas E., Chittenden, Burlington, Vt., 1846; with appendix by J. W. Allen, 1857; 3d ed., by Amasa J. Parker, and C. E. Baldwin, Albany, 1862); and "Treatise on the Law of Descent in the Several United States of America" (New York, 1823).

Reeves, John, English jurist, b. in England in 1572; d. there in 1589. He was created at Princeton college, Oxford, called to the bar in 1780, and in 1791-2 was chief justice of Newfoundland. In the latter year he founded the Association for preserving liberty and property against Levelers and Republicans. He became one of the king's printers in 1800, was superintendent of aliens in 1803-14, and was also a law-clerk to the board of trade. His numerous publications include "History of the English Law" (2 vols., London, 1783-4; with additions, 4 vols., 1787); "History of the Government of Newfoundland" (1793); and two tracts, showing that Americans who were born before the war of independence are not aliens by the laws of England (1814 and 1826).

REEVES, Marian Calhoun Legare, author, b. Charleston, S. C., 26 July, 1847. His grandfather invested a sum of money which served as a home education, and began to write about 1866 under the pen-name of "Padette." Her publications include "Ingenicom" (New York, 1865); "Rudolph Honer" (1868); "Sea-Drift" (Philadelphia, 1869); "Wearthorne" (1872); "A Little Maid of Acadia" (New York, 1888); and, with Emily Read, "Old Martin Roseman's Jest" (New York, 1878), and "Of People" (Boston, 1885).

Reihan, Ada, actress, b. in Limerick, Ireland, 22 April, 1859. She came to this country at an early age, was educated in the Brooklyn public schools, and made her first public appearance on the stage at fifteen years of age, but subsequently resumed her studies for a year. After two seasons in Mrs. Drew's theatre, Philadelphia, she joined Angustina Daly's company in 1876. She has been eminently successful in light comedy roles, such as Katherine in "Tamion of the Shrew," and the principal female characters in such plays as "Cinderella at School," "Needles and Pins," "A Wooden Spoon," "The Railroad of Love," "After Business Hours," and "Our English Friend." Miss Reihan met with great success and favorable criticism when she appeared in London with Daly's American company in May, 1888.

Rehn, Frank Knox Morton, artist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 12 April, 1848. He studied under Christian Schussele at the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts, and for several years painted portraits in Philadelphia, but later devoted himself almost exclusively to marine and coast painting. He has exhibited at the academy, Philadelphia, and since 1879 at the Academy of Design, New York, to which city he came about 1832. He was awarded in 1882 the first prize for marine painting at the St. Louis exposition, in 1883 the first prize at the water-color exhibition of the American art association, and in 1886 a gold medal at the Prize fund exhibition. His paintings include "Looking down on the Sea from the Rocks at Magnolia, Mass." (1884-5): "A Missing Vessel" (1886): "Close of a Summer Day": and "Evening,高新区," exhibited in 1886.

REICHEL, Charles Gottlieb, Moravian bishop, b. in Herrmsdorf, Silesia, 14 July, 1851; d. at Niesky, Prussia, 18 April, 1895. He was educated in the Moravian college and theological seminary of Germany. In 1874 he came to this country in order to open a boarding-school for boys at Nazareth, which is still in existence, and over which he presided, as its first principal, for sixteen years. Having been appointed presiding bishop of the southern district of the Moravian church, he was consecrated to the episcopacy in 1891. During his residence at Salem, N. C., the University of North Carolina conferred on him the degree of D. D. In 1891 he was appointed presiding bishop of the northern district of the church, and removed to Bethlehem. In 1898 he visited Europe, where he remained for about two years, after which he remained in Europe and retired from active service. -His son, Levin Theodore, Moravian bishop, b. in Bethlehem, Pa., 4 March, 1842; d. in Bertheldorf, near Herrnhut, Saxony, 23 May, 1878, accompanied his parents to Germany in 1878, and was educated at the Moravian college and theological seminary, but returned to the United States in 1894. He is currently the principal of Schoeneck, Emnass, Nazareth, and Lititz, Pa., and subsequently labored at Salem, N. C. In 1857 he attended the general synod at Herrnhut, where he was elected to the mission board. This office he filled until his death. On 7 July, 1899, he was consecrated to the episcopacy at Herrnhut. He published, the "Living in the Danish and Jewish and to Labrador. He was the author of "History of Nazareth Hall at Nazareth, Pa." (Philadelphia, 1855): "The Moravians in North Carolina" (1857): and "Missions-Atlas der Brüder-Kirche" (Herrnhut, 1860). An important history from his pen of the American branch of the Moravian church remains in manuscript. Charles Gottlieb's grandson, William Cornelius, author, b. in Salem, N. C., 9 May, 1824; d. in Bethlehem, Pa., 15 Oct., 1876, was the son of Rev. Benjamin Reichel, of Salem female academy. He entered Nazareth Hall in 1834, and in 1836 the Moravian theological seminary, where he was graduated in 1844. After serving as tutor for four years at Nazareth Hall, he became a professor in the theological seminary. In 1862 he was appointed professor of Latin to the theological seminary, Lititz, Pa., which he resigned in 1868. From 1868 till 1870 he filled the duties of professor of Latin and natural sciences in the seminary for young ladies at Bethlehem. He was ordained a deacon in June, 1862, and a presbyter in May, 1864. Prof. Reichel did more than any one else elucidate the early history of the Moravian church in this country, as well as articles in "The Moravian" and the local press, and a sketch of Northampton county, prepared for Dr. William H. Egle's "History of Pennsylvania." He wrote "History of Nazareth Hall" (Philadelphia, 1855): enlarged ed., 1895); "History of the Bethlehem Female Seminary, 1785-1895 (1895); "Moravianism in New York and Connecticut" (1860); "Memorials of the Moravian Church" (1870); "Wyalusing, and the Moravian Mission at Friedenshuetten" (Bethlehem, 1871); "Names which the Lenni Leenape or Delaware Indians gave to Rivers, Streams, and Localities within the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, and Virginia, with their Significations," from the manuscript of John Heckewelder (1831): "A Red Rose from the Olden Time, or a Rambles through the Annals of the Rose Inn on the Barony of Nazareth in the Days of the Province" (Philadelphia, 1872): "The Crown Inn, near Bethlehem, Pa., 1743" (1872): "The Old Sun Inn at Bethlehem, Pa., 1758" (1873); "A Register of Members of the Moravian Church, 1727-1873" (Bethlehem, 1873); and a revised edition of John Heckewelder's "History, Manners, and Customs of the Indian Nations who once inhabited Pennsylvania and the Neighboring States" (Philadelphia, 1876). He left unfinished "History of Bethlehem" and "History of Northampton County.

REID, David Boswell, chemist, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 10 May, 1808; d. in Washington, D. C., 5 April, 1883. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, where he also studied medicine. After graduation he taught practical and analytical chemistry for four years at the university. In 1832 he created a class-room and laboratory larger than any in Edinburgh, which he opened in 1836, and which he left under the charge of 300 pupils annually in his chemical classes. He was a great advocate of the introduction of improved methods of ventilation and sewerage in most of the cities of the United Kingdom. In 1856 he came to the United States, and after various engagements, including that of professor of applied chemistry in the University of Michigan, he accepted in 1853 the chair of Chemistry in the University of the U.S. sanitary commission. Dr. Reid was a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and, besides scientific contributions to journals in the United States and Europe, published "Introduction to the Study of Chemistry" (Edinburgh, 1853): "Elements of Chemistry" (1853); "Text-Book for Students of Chemistry" (1854): "Rudiments of the Chemistry of Daily Life" (1856): "Outlines of the Ventilation of the House of Commons" (London, 1857): "Ventilation of the Niger Steamships" (1841): "Illustrations of the Theory and Practice of Ventilation, with Remarks on Warming" (1844): "Ventilation in American Dwellings" (New York, 1858): and "Short Note for the Revision of Education in Science" (Philadelphia, 1863).

REID, David Settle, senator, b. in Rockingham county, N. C., 19 April, 1818; d. there, 19 June, 1891. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began to practise in 1834. In 1835 he was elected to the legislature, serving continuously until 1842, when he was elected a representative to congress as a Democrat, serving from 4 Dec., 1845, till 3 March, 1847. In 1848 he was the defeated Democratic candidate for governor of North Carolina, but he was afterward successful, and held the office in 1851-5. He was then elected to the U.S. senate as a Democrat, in place of Willie P. Mangum, serving from 4 Dec., 1854, till 3 March, 1859. He was chairman of the committee on patents, on the patent-office, and on commerce. He was a delegate to the Peace convention that met in Washington in February, 1861. Gov. Reid served in the Confederate congress, and after the civil war resided on his farm in Rockingham county.

REID, George, soldier, b. in Londonderry, N. H., in 1733; d. there in September, 1815. His education was meagre. He became captain of a company of minutemen, and was on the field of the battle of Lexington. Gen. John Stark's regiment at Medford, and took an honorable part at Bunker Hill. On 4 Nov., 1775, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 24th New Hampshire regiment, served as colonel after the capture of Nathan Hale, took part in the battle of Benning Heights in October, 1777, and was present at the surrender of Burgoyne and Cornwallis. He was made brigadier-general of New Hampshire militia in 1785, and sheriff of Rockingham county, N. H., in 1791.

REID, Hugh Thompson, soldier, b. in Union county, Ind., 18 Oct., 1811; d. in Keokuk, Iowa, 21 Aug., 1874. He was of Scotch-Irish descent, and, after graduation at Bloomington college, Ind., studied law, was admitted to the bar, and removed to Iowa in 1839, living there until 1849, when he removed to Keokuk and practised occasionally. In 1840-2 he was prosecuting attorney for Lee, Des Moines, Henry, Jefferson, and Van Buren counties, holding high rank as a land lawyer. He was president for four years of the Des Moines Valley railroad. He entered the volunteer service as colonel of the 10th Iowa infantry in 1862, and commanded at Shiloh, where he was shot through the neck and fell from his horse, but remounted and rode down the lines, encouraging his men. He was in other actions, was appointed brigadier-general on 13 March, 1863, and commanded the posts of Lake Providence, La., and Cairo, III., until he resigned on 4 April, 1864.

REID, John, British soldier, b. in Scotland, 18 Feb., 1721; d. in London, England, 6 Feb., 1807. He was the son of Alexander Robertson, of Stracho, was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and entered the army as a Lieutenant on 8 June, 1745. On 3 June, 1752, he became captain in the 42d regiment, and in 1758 he was appointed major. He served under Gen. James Wolfe and Gen. Jefrey Amherst in the French war, and was wounded in the battle against Martiniere in 1759, and promoted lieutenant-colonel. In 1763 he was sent to the relief of Fort Pitt, and defeated its Indian besiegers in the well-fought battle of Bushy Run. In the summer of 1761 the 42d again participated in Col. Henry Bouquet's expedition against the Muskingum Indians. Lieut.-Col. Reid commanded all the British forces in the district of Fort Pitt in 1763, and an officer of the same name is mentioned as commandant at Fort Chastrees, Ill., in 1766. In 1771 he obtained a large tract of land in Otter Creek, Vt., from which his tenants were expelled in 1772 by the people of Bennington. He became major-general in October, 1781, lieutenant-general on 12 Oct., 1793, and general on 1 Jan., 1798.

REID, John Morrison, lawyer, b. in New York city, 30 May, 1820; d. there, 16 May, 1896. He was graduated at the University of New York in 1839, and became principal of the Mechanics' institute school, holding this office until 1844. After graduation at Union theological seminary he was admitted to the New York Methodist Episcopal conference in 1844, and was pastor in Connecticut and New York city. From 1858 till 1864 he was president of Genesee college, Lima, N. Y., and he became corresponding secretary of the Missionary society of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1872. The University of the city of New York gave him the degree of D. D. in 1858, and the University of Syracuse that of LL. D. in 1883. He was editor of the "Western Christian Advocate," Cincinnati, in 1864, and of the "Northwestern Christian Advocate," Chicago, in 1868. He is the author of numerous books and articles on missions and missionary society, and of "The Methodist Episcopal Church" (2 vols., New York, 1890), and had edited "Doomed Religions" (1884). Dr. Reid was active in securing for the University of Syracuse the valuable library of Prof. Leopold von Ranke, the German historian, which includes about 50,000 volumes, some of his manuscripts, and several paintings by German artists.

REID, Mayne, author, born in Ireland in 1818; d. near London, England, 22 Oct., 1883. He was the son of a Presbyterian clergyman, and was educated for the church, but, preferring adventure to theology, came to this country in 1840. He engaged in hunting and trading expeditions on Red and Missouri rivers, and travelled through nearly every state of the Union. Subsequently, he settled in Philadelphia and was a correspondent of various magazines and journals until the beginning of the Mexican war, when he became a captain in the U. S. service, and was present at Vera Cruz and Chapultepec, where he led the forlorn hope and was wounded. In 1849 he raised a company in New York to aid the Hungarian revolutionists, but when he reached Paris the revolution had been suppressed. He then settled in London, and devoted his life to writing tales of adventure for boys. His numerous stories, in which he usually incorporated much information on natural history, and which number about fifty volumes, include "The Rifle Rangers" (London, 1850); "The Scalp-Hunters" (1851); "The Quadroon" (1853); "Oceola" (1858); "The Massasoits" (1862); "The Chief-Clammers" (1864); "Alone in the Forest" (1865); "The Castaways" (1870); and "Gwen-Wyne" (1874). A collective edition of his works was published in New York (15 vols., 1898). Late editions of his works have been published in London in 1875 and 1878. In 1869 he established in New York a short-lived journal, called "Onward.

REID, Robert Raymond, governor of Florida, b. in Prince William's Co., Va., 8 Sept., 1789; d. near Tallahassee, Fla., 1 July, 1844. In early years he removed to Georgia, where he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised. From 1816 till 1819, and again from 1823 till 1825, he was a judge of the state superior court, serving in the interval in congress from 18 Feb., 1819, till 3 March, 1823, having been chosen as a Democrat. At the close of his term he was elected mayor of Augusta, Ga., and in 1832 he was appointed judge of the superior court for the eastern district of Florida, and while holding this office he was a member of the convention that formed a state constitution, of which body he was also president. From 1839 till 1841 he was governor of Florida.

REID, Samuel Charles, naval officer, b. in Norwich, Conn., 25 Aug., 1783; d. in New York city, 28 Jan., 1861. He was the son of Lieut. John Reid of the British navy, who was taken prisoner in a night boat expedition at New London, Conn., and afterward resigned his commission. At the age of eleven the son went to sea, was captured by a French privateer and confined six months at Brest. Subsequently he served as acting midshipman in the "Baltimore" in Conn. Thomas Truxtun's West India squadron, and during the war of 1812 he commanded the privateer brig "General Armstrong," with which he fought
The "General Armstrong" carried 7 guns and 90 men. In a series of encounters Reid defeated the enemy, and in his account of the engagement he wrote: "About 3 a.m. I received a message from the American consul requesting to see me on shore, where he informed me the governor had sent a note to Capt. Lloyd, begging him to desist from further hostilities. To which Capt. Lloyd sent an answer that he would not suffer the neutral privateer of having the ship which it had taken cleared to be armed and manned, and to have the privateer at the risk of knocking down the whole town: and that if the governor suffered the Americans to injure the privateer in any manner, he should consider the place an enemy's port, and treat it accordingly. Finding this to be the case, I considered it a hope of saving a man of war. I resolved to go on board. I therefore went on board and ordered all our wounded and dead to be taken on shore and the crew to save their effects as fast as possible. Soon after this it became day-light, when the enemy's brig stood close in and commenced a heavy fire on us with all her force. After several broadsides she hauled off, having received a shot in her hull, her rigging muchSet and her masts all shot. She soon after came in again and anchored close to the privateer. I then ordered the "General Armstrong" to be stationed to prevent the enemy from getting her off. She was soon after boarded by the enemy's boats and set on fire, which soon completed her destruction. They also destroyed a number of houses in the town and wounded some of the inhabitants." The British lost 120 men killed and 180 wounded, while the Americans lost two killed and seven wounded. A letter written from Fuyal, by an Englishman who witnessed the scene, describes the second attack: "At midnight, it being about full moon, fourteen large hatches, containing about forty men each, were discovered in rotation for a second attack. When they got in guns, a tremendous and effectual discharge was made from the privateer, which threw the boats into confusion. They now returned a spirited fire, but the privateer kept up so continual a discharge it was almost impossible for the boats to make any progress. They finally succeeded, after immense loss, to get alongside of her, and attempted to board at every quarter, cheered by the officers with a shout of "No quarter!" which we could distinctly hear, as well as their shrieks and cries. The termination was near about a total massacre. Three of the boats were sunk, and but one poor solitary officer escaped death in a boat that contained fifty souls; he was wounded. The Americans fought with great firmness. Some of the boats were left without a single man to row them; others with three and four. The most that any one returned with was about ten. Several boats floated on shore full of dead bodies. . . . This bloody and unfortunate contest lasted about forty minutes. At daylight next morning the 'Carnation' handed in alongside and engaged her, when the 'Armstrong' continued to make a most gallant defence, causing the 'Carnation' to cease firing and to hand off to repair. . . . We may well say 'God deliver us from our enemies' if this is the way the Americans fight. The defeated vessels went part of an expedition concentrating at Jamaica for a direct attack upon New Orleans; their crippled condition prevented their immediate union with Admiral Sir Alex. F. J. Cochrane, Earl of Dundonald, and consequently the expedition did not reach New Orleans until four days after Gen. Andrew Jackson's arrival, which saved Louisiana from British conquest. After burning the abandoned wreck, Capt. Van Lloyd informed the governor that, unless the gallant little crew he had failed to capture should be given to him as prisoners, he would send a force of 500 men to capture them. This was refused, and Reid and his men then took possession of and fortified an old convent, declaring that they would defend themselves to the last; but they were not molested. The attack upon the "General Armstrong" was the last diplomatic correspondence, from 1815 to the administration of President Zachary Taylor, who took measures to compel Portugal to assert the inviolability of its neutral port, and indemnify the claimants for the loss of the vessel; but after his death the case was submitted to the arbitration of Louis of Holland and its friends to defend against the Americans. The British government at last sent a fleet for the violation of the neutrality. Congress finally paid the claim in 1822. On his return to the United States Capt. Reid landed at Savannah, and in travelling to the north received many honors. The legislature of New York gave him his thanks and a sword on 7 April, 1818. He was appointed hereditary captain of the volunteer militia until his death, serving, meanwhile, as harbor-master and warden of the port of New York. He invented and erected the signal telegraph at the Battery and the Narrows, and regulated and numbered the pilot-boats of New York, and established the light-ship off Sandy Hook. He was also the designer of the present form of the United States flag, proposing to retain the original thirteen stripes and to add a new star whenever a new state should be admitted to the Union. This suggestion was adopted, and a flag conforming to his design was first raised over the hall of representatives in Washington on 13 April, 1818. See "The Origin and Progress of the U. S. Flag in the United States," by Williston, Albany, 1832.—His son, Sam. Chester, lawyer, b. in New York city, 21 Oct., 1818; d. in Washington, 13 Aug., 1867. He shipped before the mast, was attached to the U. S. survey of Ohio river, and in 1839 settled in Nateche, Miss., where he studied law under Gen. John A. Quitman, and was appointed U. S. deputy marshal. He was admitted to the bar of Mississippi in 1841, to that of Louisiana in 1844, to the U. S. supreme court in 1846, and served in the Mexican war in Capt. Ben McCulloch's company of Texas rangers, being mentioned for "meritorious services and distinguished gallantry," at Monterey. In 1849 he was attached to the "New Orleans Picayune," and in 1851 he was a delegate to the National railroad convention in Memphis, Tenn., to decide upon a line to the Pacific. In 1857 he declared the appointment of U. S. minister to Rome. He returned at the close of the Louisiana exsession convention in 1861, and during the civil war was the Confederate war correspondent for a large number of southern newspapers. In 1865 he resumed his law-practice, and in 1867 he delivered an "Address on the Restoration of Southern Trade and Commerce" in the principal cities of the South. After the war he was admitted in 1874 at the Mississippi Valley and Brazil steamboat river St. Louis, Mo. He presented the battle-word of his father to the United States in 1887. Mr. Reid is the author of "The U. S. Bankrupt Law of 1841, with a Synopsis and Notes, and the Leading American and English Decisions" (Natchez, 1842); The Scouting Operations of McCulloch's Texas Rangers (Philadelphia, 1847); The Battle of Chiomango, a Concise History of Events from the Evacuation of Chattanooga (Mobile, 1863); and The Daring Raid of Gen. John H. Morgan, in Ohio, his Capture and Wonderful Escape with Capt. T. Henry Lines" (Atlanta, 1864); and reported and edited "The Case of the Private-armed Brig-of-War 'General Armstrong,'" with the Brief Of Facts and Authorities on International Law, and the Arguments of Chinn, O'Connor, S. Reid, and P. Phillips, before the U. S. Court of Claims at Washington, D. C., with the decision of the Court (New York, 1857). He also prepared The Life and Times of Col. Aaron Burr" in vidication of Burr's character, but the manuscript was destroyed by fire in 1850.

REID, Whitelaw, journalist, b. near Xenia, Ohio, 27 Oct., 1837. He was graduated at Miam university in 1856, took an active interest in journalism and politics before attaining his majority, made speeches in the Fremont campaign on the Republican side, and soon became editor of the Xenia "Gazette." At the opening of the civil war he was sent into the field as correspondent of the Cincinnati "Gazette," making his headquarters at Washington, whence his letters on current politics (under the signature of "Agate") attracted much attention by their thorough information and pungent style. From that point he made excursions to the army wherever there was a prospect of active operations. He served as aide-de-camp to Gen. William S. Rosecrans in the western Virginia campaign of 1861, and was present at the battle of Shiloh. He was elected to the U. S. Congress in 1863, serving in that capacity three years. He egaged in cotton-planting in Louisiana after the close of the war, and embodied the results of his observations in the south in a book entitled "After the War" (Cincinnati, 1869); then returning to Ohio he gave two years to writing "Ohio in the War" (2 vols. Cincinnati, 1868). This work is far the most important of all the state histories of the civil war. It contains elaborate biographies of most of the chief generals of the army, and a complete history of the state from 1861 till 1865. On the conclusion of this labor he came to New York at the invitation of Horace Greeley, and became an associate in the "Public Ledger," and after the death of Mr. Greeley in 1872, Mr. Reid succeeded him as editor and principal owner of the paper.
In 1878 he was chosen by the legislature of New York to be a regent for life of the university.
With this exception, he had declined all public employment. He was minister to France under Harrison, and was special ambassador to attend the Queen's jubilee in 1877. He is a director of numerous financial and charitable corporations, and had been for many years president of the Lotos club. Mr. Reid has travelled extensively in this country and in Europe. 1880-1886 the works mentioned above and his contributions to periodical literature, he has published "Schools of Journalism" (New York, 1871); "The Scholar in Politics" (1875); "Some Newspaper Tendencies" (1878); and "Town-Hall Suggestions" (1881).

REID, Sir William, governor of Bermuda, b.
Kinglassie, Fifeshire, Scotland, in 1791; d. in London, England, Dec. 21, 1858. He was educated at the Royal military academy, Woolwich, and entered the army in 1809, served in the peninsula in this country during the war of 1812, and in Belgium in 1815. He became major-general in 1856, and was elected a fellow of the Royal society in 1839. He was appointed governor of Bermuda in 1840, improved the agriculture of the island, which was in a deplorable condition, and through his efforts introduced its products into the markets of New York. His many interests for their welfare greatly endeared him to the islanders, who remember him as the "good governor." In 1846 he was appointed governor of the Windward islands, and in 1848 he returned to England and was made commanding engineer at Woolwich.
In September, 1851, he was appointed governor of Malta, post which he held through the Crimean war, returning to England in 1858. His interest in meteorology first took a definite form in 1831, when he was detailed to superintend the repair of the injuries that had been done in Barbadoes bys a severe hurricane. His correspondence with William C. Redfield (q. v.), in three folio volumes, was presented to the library of Yale university by John H. Redfield, Gen. Gen. Reid published "An Attempt to develop the Law of Storms by Means of Facts, arranged according to Place and Time" (London, 1858; 3d ed, 1859), and "The Progress of

REID, William, clergyman, b. in Scotland in 1816; d. in Toronto, 19 Jan., 1896. He was educated at King's College, where he received the degree of M. A. in 1833, afterward studied in Divinity Hall, in the same city, and was licensed as a preacher in 1839. In August of that year he was sent to Canada as a missionary of the established church of Scotland, and in January, 1840, he was ordained pastor of the congregation of Gratton and Courcey, Upper Canada. After the cessation of the rebellion in 1847 he left Canada in his lot with the Free church, and was one of the founders of the Presbyterian church of Canada. In 1849 Mr.
Reid became minister of the church in Picton, about the same time became clerk of the synod, and soon afterward general agent of all the schemes of the church, and editor of the "Eclesastical and Missionary Record," of which he had the charge with John A. Paton, the moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian church of Canada in 1851, of the Canada Presbyterian church in 1873, and of the general assembly of the Presbyterian church in Canada in 1879. In 1876 he received the degree of D. D. from Queen's university, Kingston.
REILLY, James William, soldier, b. in Akron, Summit co., Ohio, 21 May, 1828. He received his education at Mount St. Mary's college, Emmitsburg, Md., and was admitted to the bar, and early in 1861 was elected to the legislature of Ohio from Columbus county. He entered the army in 1861, and on 30 Aug., 1862, he was made colonel of the 104th volunteer infantry of Ohio, and for faithful and meritorious services in several campaigns and important battles became brevet colonel and lieutenant-colonel. His brigade distinguished itself for gallantry at the battle of Franklin, Tenn., 30 Nov., 1864, where many Confederate battle-flags were captured; engaged in various skirmishes during the Knoxville campaign in the early winter of 1863; and also achieved distinction in the operations at Nashville, 15-16 Dec., 1864. Gen. Reilly resigned his command in 1866, and after devoting his attention as a farmer, he devoted himself to the practice of his profession in his native state.

REILLY, John, soldier, b. in Leeds, England, 12 April, 1792; d. in Myerstown, Lebanon co., Pa., 2 May, 1810. He emigrated with his father, Benjamin, to Pennsylvania, studied law, and was admitted to the bar just before the Revolution. He was commissioned as captain in the 12th Pennsylvania regiment, and was transferred to the 31st regiment in 1778, and severely wounded at Bonhamton, N. J. Returning to his home, he recovered. He was not a brilliant orator, but was a polished writer, and left several manuscripts. He published "A Compendium for Pennsylvania Justices of the Peace," which was the first work of its character printed in this country (Harrissburg 1795). He married Elizabeth Myer, daughter of the founder of Myerstown, Pa. One of their sons, Luther, practiced medicine in Harrisburg, was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 4 Sept., 1855, till 3 March, 1859, and died soon after the expiration of his term.

REILLY, William McClellan, clergyman, b. in York, Pa., 24 Apr., 1825. After graduation at Pennsyl vania college, Gettysburg, in 1856, he studied at Princeton theological seminary and at Berlin and other German universities. He was ordained in the German Reformed church, held pastorates in Lewisburg and Jonestown, Pa., professor of languages at P hiladelphia college, Pa., its president in 1866, and is now (1896) president of the Allegheny, Pa., female college. He is the author of "The Artist and his Mission" (Philadelphia, 1881).

REIMENSNYDER, Junius Benjamin, clergyman, b. in Stanton, Va., 24 Feb., 1841. He was graduated at Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1861, and at the theological seminary there in 1865. Meanwhile he served in the 131st regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers from 4 Aug., 1862, till 26 May, 1863. Immediately after his resignation in 1865 he became pastor in Philadelphia, where he remained until 1874. Afterward he was pastor in Savannah, Ga., in 1874-'80, and then in New York city, where he still (1898) remains. In 1880 he received the degree of D. D. from Newberry college, Newberry, S. C. His published works are: "Heavenward, or the Race for the Crown of Life" (Philadelphia, 1874); "Christian Unity," a sermon (Savannah, Ga., 1876); "Doom Eternal—The Bible and the Church—Doctrine of Everlasting Punishment" (Philadelphia, 1884); and "The Six Days of Creation; The Fall and the Deluge" (1886).

REINAGLE, Hugh, artist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., about 1790; d. near New Orleans, La., in May, 1834. He studied under John J. Holland, and became known as a landscape-painter, working in oil and water-colors. For many years he was engaged as a scene-painter in New York, and produced also a panorama of New York, which was exhibited in that city. In 1830 he went to New Orleans, where he died of cholera four years later. He was one of the original thirty members of the National academy of design, and exhibited there, in 1831, a "View of the Falls of Mount Ida." His "Mac donough's Victory on Lake Champlain" was engraved by Benjamin Turner in 1816.

REINA MALDONADO, Pedro, Cuan R. C. born, b. in Santiago de Cuba, 218, 1831, and was educated at the College of St. Francis at Havana. He graduated at the College of the Propagation of the Faith, 111:.., in 1850. He was elected to the provincial council, and subsequently he studied at the National academy, New York, for three years. After visiting several of the western cities and painting many portraits, he went to Europe in 1856. For the next three years he studied in Paris and Düsseldorf, with the intention of devoting himself more to historical and genre painting. He followed his profession in New York and Maryland, and then went to England, where he remained until 1868. After his return he settled in New York. In 1871 he was elected an associate of the National academy, where he had first exhibited in 1847. Among his works, many of which have been engraved, are: "Cleopatra" (1856); "Evangeline"; "Pocahontas" (1857); "Kittina Van Tassel" (1858); "Washington receiving the News of Arnold's Trespass"; "Consolation"; "After the Crucifixion" (1875); "Nymphs of the Wood" (1879); "Young Franklin and Sir William Keith"; "The Regatta"; "The Pride of the Village"; and: "Captain Kidd and the Governor" and "Baby Mine" (1881). His numerous portraits include those of the Princesses of Wales, the Duchess of Newcastle, the Countess of Portland, Lady Vane Temple, Lord Brougham, John Phillip, R. A., Thomas Carlyle, Lord Tennyson, Mark Lemon, Charles O'Connor, George M. Dallas, James Buchanan, Edwin W. Stanton, Gen. Winfield Scott, John C. Breckinridge, Stephen A. Douglas, and Samuel Houston.—His nephew, Charles Stanley, artist, b. in Pittsburgh, 16 May, 1844; d. in New York city, 29 Aug., 1896. He studied for about a year at the Atelier Suisse. In 1868 he went to Munich, where he became a pupil at the Royal academy. In January, 1870, he entered the establishment of Harper and Brothers, New York, where he remained until July, 1876.
After five years of independent work in New York, during which time he made drawings for various publishing houses, he renewed his contract with the Harper's in 1881. The same year he went to Paris, where he lived for many years. He is well known for his excellent work in black and white for book and magazine illustration. He had exhibited in Paris, Munich, and various cities of the United States, and was a member of the Water-color society and various other art associations. His works in oil include "Clearing Up" and "Caught Napping" (1875); "Re- buke" (1877); "September Morning" (1879); "Old Life Boat" (1880); "Coast of Normandy" (1882); "In a Garden" at Villerville (1884); "Plants at Villerville" (1884); "Sunday" (1885); "English Garden" and "Fishermen of Villerville" (1886); "Washed Ashore" (1887), which gained honorable mention at the salon of 1887 and the Temple gold medal at the academy, Philadelphia, in 1888; and "Tide coming in" (1888). Among his water-colors are: "Gathering Wood" and "Close of Day" (1875); "At the Farm" (1877); "English Barnyard" (1879).

REINKE, Samuel, Moravian bishop, b. in Litzitz, Pa., 32 Aug., 1791; d. in Bethlehem, Pa., 21 Jan., 1875. He was one of the first three graduates of the American-Moravian theological seminary. After serving as pastor of various churches, he was consecrated to the episcopacy in 1858. Two years later he became blind, and was obliged to retire from active service. An operation partially restored his sight, after which he frequently preached and ordained ministers. His last official act, when he was seventy-nine years old, was to assist in the consecration of his son to the episcopacy. He was a powerful and original preacher. —His son, Amadeus Abraham, Moravian bishop, b. in Lancaster, Pa., 13 March, 1822; d. in Herrnhut, Germany, 32 Aug., 1889. He was graduated at Bethlehem, Pa., went as a missionary to the West Indies, and subsequently engaged in a missionary exploratory tour on the Mosquito coast. On his return to the United States he was pastor successively of the churches at Graceham, Md., at New Dorp, Staten island, in Philadelphia, and in New York city, where he resided for twenty years. He died in London, England, 29 July, 1879.

REIS, Francisco Sotero dos (br.-gov.), Brazilian journalist, b. in Maranhao, 22 April, 1809; d. there, 16 Jan., 1871. He studied philosophy and rhetoric in the monastery of Our Lady of Carmo, was appointed professor of Latin, and was director of the orphan asylum of Santa Tereza from 1844 till 1871. He edited the "Argos da Lei" and "Maran- hense" (1825); the "Constitutional" (1831); the "Investigador de Maranhao" (1836); the "Re- vista" (1840); the "Observador" (1854); and in 1856 obtained the editorship of the official paper "Publicador Maranhense." In 1861 he abandoned his journalistic career. He published "Pastilhas de gramatica geral aplicada à lingua Portu- gueza pela analise dos classicos" (Rio Janeiro, 1863); "Grammatica Portugueza accommodada aos principios geraes da palavra seguidos da im- mediata applicacao practica" (1886); "Os com- mentarios de Caius Julius Caesar," translated into Portuguese (1889); and "Curso de Litteratura Portu- gueza e Brazilier" (1879).

RELF, Samuel, journalist, b. in Virginia, 22 May, 1800; d. in Philadelphia, 14 Feb., 1879. He was brought to Philadelphia, when a child, by his mother, and early became connected with the "National Gazette," of which he was for many years the editor and its owner until, in 1819, he became financially involved through friends. His writings were highly esteemed. He was the author of a novel entitled "Infidelity, or the Vic- tims of Sentiment" (Philadelphia, 1797).

REMEAL, Antonio de (ray-may-sul), Spanish evangelist, b. in Marazu, Galicia, in 1570; d. in 1623. During his youth he studied in the University of Salamanca, was graduated as doctor of divinity, and united with the Dominicans. In 1613 he was elected visitor of the missions of Central America, and during his sojourn in the country in 1613-17 collected the materials for his "Historia de las provincias de Chiapa y Guatemala" (Madrid, 1619). He also published purely ecclesiastical works.

REMINGTON, Philo, inventor, b. in Litchfield, N. Y., 31 Oct., 1816. His father, Elihaept Remington (1739-1861), as a boy obtained from a country blacksmith the privilege of using his forge on rainy days and winter evenings, and with such tools and appliances as his own ingenuity suggested produced a gun. It proved so satisfactory that he was encouraged to continue, and he established his own forge, with trip-hammer and lathe, from which has developed the great factory now known as the Remington armory. Philo was educated at common schools and at Cazenovia seminary, after which he entered the factory. Inheriting his father's mechanical genius, he was most carefully trained in the use of every tool that is employed in the manufacture of firearms, and in time became mechanical superintendent of the factory. With his brothers, Samuel and Elihaept, the firm of E. Remington and Sons was established, and for upward of twenty-five years he continued in charge of the mechanical department. In the course of this experience his firm probably manufactured a greater variety of fire-arms than any other like establishment, and their arms have a high reputation. The breech-loading rifle that bears the name of Remington, of which millions have been made and sold, is the best known of the guns that are made under their supervision.
REMINGTON, Stephen, clergyman, b. in Bedford, Westchester co., N. Y., 16 May, 1803; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 25 March, 1889. He held revival meetings when seven years old, and was admitted to the New York M. E. conference in 1823, while preaching to large congregations in Brooklyn and Albany, N. Y., Boston, Mass., and other cities, he pursued the study of medicine, obtained the degree of M. D. from Harvard in 1845, and practised incidentally with success. In 1845, while he was pastor of a church in Lowell, Mass., he withdrew from the Methodist connection. In 1859, he was elected to the New York State legislature. He has been intrusted with special researches by the National board of health, among which were "An Investigation of the Organic Matter in the Air" and "On the Contamination of Air in Rooms heated by Hot-Air Furnaces or byCast-Iron Stoves." He is a member of scientific societies at home and abroad, and in 1882 was elected to the board of visitors of the Charity Organization Society. He has also been intrusted with special researches by the National board of health, among which were "An Investigation of the Organic Matter in the Air" and "On the Contamination of Air in Rooms heated by Hot-Air Furnaces or by Cast-Iron Stoves." He is a member of scientific societies at home and abroad, and in 1882 was elected to the board of visitors of the Charity Organization Society.
REMY, Paul Edouard, French author, b. in La Rochelle in 1711; d. there in 1784. He was for several years in the may department at Paris, and, becoming afterward one of the keepers of the state archives, made historical researches among the state papers there. He was obliged to publish his works in Amsterdam anonymously, as before the French revolution the publication of state papers was an unpardonable offence. They include "Mémoire pour tirer connote l'esprit, la conduite, et les operations de la Compagnie du Mississipi" (Amsterdam, 1759); "Mémoire sur l'établissement du commerce au Canada" (1761); "Détail de la colonie de la Louisiane" (1762); "Considérations sur l'établissement de la Compagnie de la Mississippi" (1711); "Journey to the base of the Mississippi" (r. vols.); "The whole country and its government" (2 vols., 1758); and "Détail sur l'état présent de l'Amazonie" (1783).

REMY, Pierre Francois, b. near Angoulême, 1708. He was superintendent of the missions among the Indians of the basin of the Mississipi river. He published several works, and soon after adopted the name of Remy. It was in 1740 that he was appointed governor of the governments of Lower Louisiana and Veracruz. In 1744, he returned to France.

Renaud, Gustave Henri, French explorer, b. in Eveux, in 1673; d. in Rouen in 1745. He followed the expeditions sent under Duquesne and Hocheligne against the Indians in 1706. He was the first to explore the island of the river Cagou, in 1706. He went to the Grandes Terres Ouvrées, and in the land of the Mississipi, he discovered several islands he named des Cortes. He published several works, and in 1740, he was appointed governor of the governments of Lower Louisiana and Veracruz. In 1744, he returned to France. professor of mathematics at the military academy from January till July, 1849, secretary of a board to prepare a "system of instruction for heavy artillery" in 1849-50, assistant to the ordnance board at Washington arsenal, D. C., in 1851-3, and on topographical duty in Minnesota in 1853-4. He was chief of ordnance in the Utah expedition in 1857-9, and in command of Mount Vernon arsenal. Ala., from 1859 to 1861. While on topographical duty in Minnesota, he led an attack against Fort Bartow, and the battles of New Berne and Camden. From April till August, 1862, he was in command of a division in the Department of North Carolina, and on 18 July he was commissioned major-general of volunteers. In the campaign in northern Virginia, in the following month, he was at the head of the 9th and 12th corps on the Army of the Potomac under John Pope in the battles of Manassas and Chantilly. Still at the head of the 9th corps, Gen. Reno was in the advance at the battle of South Mountain, where he was conspicuous for his gallantry and activity during the entire day. Early in the evening he was killed while leading an assault.

RENO, Marcus Albert, soldier, b. in Illinois in 1837, d. in Washington, D. C., 29 March, 1889. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1857, and assigned to the dragoons. After serving on the frontier and being made lieutenant, he was commissioned captain, 12 Nov., 1861. Subsequently he took part, among other engagements, in the battles of Williamsburg, Gaines' Mills, Malvern Hill, Antietam, and the action at Kelly's Ford, Va., 17 March, 1863, where he was wounded, and was brevetted major for gallant and meritorious conduct. He was also present at Cold Harbor and Trevillian Station, and at Cedar Creek on 19 Oct., 1864, when he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel. From January till July, 1865, as colonel of the 1st U. S. regular dragoons and major-general of a brigade and encountered Mosby's guerrillas at Harmony, Va. On 13 March, 1865, he was brevetted colonel in the regular army and brigadier-general of volunteers for meritorious services during the civil war. After serving as assistant instructor of infantry tactics in the U. S. military academy, and in the Freedman's bureau at New Orleans, he was assigned to duty in the west. On 26 Dec., 1868, he was promoted major of the 5th cavalry, and in 1876 he was engaged with Gen. George A. Custer (q. v.) in the expedition against the hostile Sioux Indians. His conduct in that campaign led to a court of inquiry, but he was held blameless. For other causes he was dismissed the service in 1881.

RENSHAW, William Bainbridge, naval officer, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 11 Oct., 1846; d. near Galveston, Tex., Jan., 1863. He was appointed a midshipman on 22 Dec., 1861, passed the examination for advancement in 1865, and was promoted lieutenant on 8 Sept., 1841, and commander on 26 April, 1861. He was assigned the steamer "Westfield," of Admiral David G. Farragut's squadron, and was by him placed in command of the gun-boats blockading Galveston, which place he captured on 10 Oct., 1862. The city and island were held as a landing-place for future operations by the gun-boats alone, until in the latter part of December, 1862, a detachment of troops arrived. Before others could follow, the Confederate Gen. John B. Magruder attacked and captured the town. As the action began, the "Westfield," in taking position, ran aground on a sand-bank. After the defeat, Commander Renshaw determined to transfer his crew to another of the gun-boats and blow up his own vessel, on which there was a large supply of powder. While the crew was transferred in the boats, he remained behind to light the fuse, but a drunken man is supposed to have ignited the match prematurely, and in the explosion the commander was killed, together with the boat's crew that was waiting for him alongside.

RENWICK, James, physician, b. in Liverpool, England, Dec. 7, 1790; d. in New York city, 2 Jan., 1863. He was born during his parents' return from a visit to Scotland, where his mother, formerly a Miss Jeffrey, the daughter of a Scottish clergyman, had been a famous beauty. Burns celebrated her in three of his songs. James was graduated at Columbia in 1807, standing first in his class, and in 1813 became instructor in natural and experimental philosophy, and assistant in mathematics. In 1820 he was called to the chair of these sciences, which he then held until 1853, when he was made professor emeritus. He entered the U. S. service in 1814 as topographical engineer with the rank of major, and spent his summers in this work. In 1838 he was appointed by the U. S. government one of the commissioners for the exploration of the northern boundary-line between the United States and New Brunswick. From 1817 till 1820 he was a trustee of Columbia, and in 1829 he received the degree of L. L. D. from that college. Prof. Renwick was a vigorous writer and a frequent contributor to the first "New York Review," and on the establishment of the "Whig Review" he became one of its most valued writers, and contributing to the "American Quarterly Review." He translated from the French Lallemand's "Treatise on Artillery" (2 vols., New York, 1820, and edited, with notes, American editions of Parkes's "Rudiments of Chemistry" (1834); Lardner's "Popular Lectures on the Steam-Engine" (1828); Daniel's "Chemical Philosophy" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1831); Paley's "Worship of the Deity" (1828); and "Mechanics" (New York, 1838). His own works include, besides official reports, lives of "David Rittenhouse" (1830); "Robert Fulton" (1845); and "Count Rumford" (1845), in Sparks's "Library of American Biography"; also "Outlines of Natural Philosophy," the earliest extended treatise on this subject published in the United States (2 vols., New York, 1832-3); "Treatise on the Steam-Engine" (1830), which was translated into several languages: "Elements of Mechanics" (Philadelphia, 1832); "Applications of the Science of Mechanics to Practical Purposes" (New York, 1840); "Life of De Witt Clinton, with Selections of his Letters" (1840); "Life of John Jay [with Henry B. Reynolds and Alexander Agnew]," "Principles of Chemistry" (1841); and "First Principles of Natural Philosophy" (1842). Prof. Renwick printed privately for the use of his classes "First Principles in Chemistry" (1858), and "Outlines of Geology" (1858), and a synopsis of his lectures on "Chemistry Applied to the Arts," taken down by one of his class, was printed.—His son, Henry Brevoort, engineer, b. in New York city, 4 Sept., 1817; d. there, 27 Jan., 1895. He was graduated at Columbia, and became assistant engineer in the U. S. service. He served as assistant astronomer of the U. S. boundary commission, and in 1848 was appointed examiner in the U. S. patent-office. In 1853 he became U. S. inspector of steamboat engines for the district of New York, and since his retirement from that office he had devoted himself to consultation practice in the specialty of mechanical engineering, in which branch he was accepted as one of the best authorities in the United States. Mr. Renwick was associated with his father in the preparation of “Life of John Jay” (New York, 1841).—Another son, James, architect, b. in New York city, 3 Nov., 1818; d. there, 23 June, 1865. He was graduated at Columbia in 1836, and inherited a fondness for architecture from his father. At first he served as an engineer in the Erie railway, and then he became an assistant engineer on the Croton aqueduct, in which capacity he superintended the construction of the distributing reservoir on Fifth avenue between Fortieth and Forty-second streets. Soon afterward he volunteered to furnish a plan for a fountain in Union square, which was accepted by the property owners, who had decided to erect one at their expense. When the vestry of Grace church purchased the property on Broadway at 11th street Mr. Renwick submitted designs for the new edifice, which were accepted. The building, which is purely Gothic, was completed in 1847. All of the designs and working drawings were made by him. Subsequently he was chosen architect of Calvary church on Fourth avenue, and he prepared the design of the Church of the Parishes, formerly on Union square, was selected by the regents of the Smithsonian institution to prepare plans for their building, and also built the Corcoran gallery in Washington. In 1853 he was requested to make designs for a Roman Catholic cathedral to be built on Fifth avenue between Fifty-fifth and Fifty-first streets. His plans were accepted, and on 15 Aug., 1858, the cornerstone of St. Patrick’s cathedral, seen in the accompanying illustration, was laid. Its architecture is of the decorated or geometric style that prevailed in Europe in the 13th century, of which the cathedrals of Rheims, Cologne, and Amiens are typical, and it is built of white marble with a base course of granite. On 25 May, 1879, the cathedral was dedicated by Cardinal McCloskey, and in 1887 the completion of the two towers was undertaken. Meanwhile residences for the archbishop and the vicar-general have been built. It is estimated that upward of $2,500,000 will be expended before the group of buildings, as originally designed, will be completed. Later he planned the building for Vassar college, St. Bartholomew’s church, and the Church of the Covenant, New York, and in 1887 the last two in the Byzantine style. Besides churches in various cities, including St. Ann’s in Brooklyn, he planned the building of the Young men’s Christian association in 1869, and Booth’s theatre in the same year, and other public edifices in New York city.

Another son, Edward Sabine, expert, b. in New York city, 3 Jan., 1823, was graduated at Columbia in 1849, and then, turning his attention to civil and mechanical engineering, became the superintendent of large iron-works in Wilkesbarre, Pa., but since 1867 has been engaged mainly as an expert in the trials of patent cases in the U. S. courts. In 1862, in connection with his brother, Henry B. Renwick, he devised methods for the repair of the steamer “Great Eastern” while afloat, and successfully accomplished it, reparing a fracture in the hodge 82 feet long and about 10 feet broad at the widest place, a feat which had been pronounced impossible by other experts. He had also invented a wrought-iron railway-chair for connecting the ends of rails (1850), a steam cut-off for beam engines (1856), a system of side propulsion for steamers (1862), and numerous improvements in incubators and brooders (1857–86), and was one of the original inventors of the self-binding reaping-machine (1851). He has published a work on artificial incubation entitled “The Thermostatic Incubator” (New York, 1883).

REQUIER, Augustus Julian, post. b. in Charleston, S. C., 27 May, 1825; d. in New York city, 19 March, 1887. His father was a native of Marseilles, and his mother the daughter of a French Haytian planter, who fled to the United States during the servile insurrection. The son received a classical education, wrote a successful essay at the age of seventeen, and at nineteen was admitted to the bar. He began practice in Charleston, but soon removed to Marion Court-House, and in October, 1850, to Mobile, Ala. In 1853 he was appointed U. S. district attorney, in which office he was continued by President Buchanan, and at the beginning of the civil war he was judge of the superior courts. He was district attorney at the secession, and in the state government. At the close of the war he settled in New York city, became an active member of the Tammany political society, and was appointed assistant corporation counsel, and later assistant district attorney. He was a frequent contributor to periodicals. His drama of “The Spanish Exile,” in blank verse, after being produced on the stage in Charleston, was transferred to New York and was followed by a romance entitled “The Old Sanctuary,” the scene of which was laid in Charleston before the Revolution (Boston, 1846). While living in Marion and Mobile he composed many pieces in verse and prose, including a tragedy entitled “Marco Bozzaris,” an “Ode to Shakespeare,” and a long poem called “Christalline.” The poems were subsequently published in book-form (Philadelphia, 1859). During the war he wrote many poems in praise of the Confederate cause, including an elaborate “Ode to Victory.” An allegro entitled “The Legend of Trenaine” was composed for an English publication in 1864. “Ashes of Glory,” a martial lyric, was written as a reply to Father Abram J. Ryan’s “Conquered Banner.” His later poems have not been collected. A speculative treatise on the lost science of the races of antiquity was left in manuscript.

RESTREPO, José Manuel (re-stray’-po), Colombian historian, b. in Envigado, Antioquia, in 1789; d. in Bogota about 1860. He studied in Bogota under the direction of his cousin, Dr. Félix Restrepo, and was there graduated in law, but gave himself with enthusiasm to the study of history. In the revolution of 1810 he espoused the patriot cause, and in 1814 was deputy to the congress of the united provinces of New Granada, and elected a member of the executive junta at Tunja. He was appointed in 1819 governor of his native province, in 1821 was deputy to the constituent congress of Cuenca, and in 1822 a member of the cabinet in Bogota as secretary of the interior. Later he was secretary of state and an intimate friend of Simon Bolivar, and after the partition of Colombia into the three republics of Venezuela, New Granada, and Ecuador, was appointed director of the mint in Bogota. In his leisure hours he entirely rearranged his historical work, which had first appeared in 1827. He wrote "Ensayo sobre la geografia, producciones, industria y poblacion de la provincia de Antioquia" (El Seminario, 1819; reprinted in Bogota, 1824), and "Historia de la Revolucion de Colombia" (10 vols., Paris, 1857; Bogota, 1869). Dr. Reuling was George (roy-ling), physician, b. in Remond, Germany, 11 Nov., 1839. He studied medicine at Giessen from 1860 till 1865, and after graduation studied ophthalmalogy at Berlin under Karl F. von Graefe, and in Vienna under Ferdinand von Ardt. He was military surgeon in the Prussian army during the war with Austria, then assistant at the eye hospital at Wiesbaden in 1866-7, and later a year longer at Paris under Liebreich, De Wecker, and Meyer, came to the United States, and established himself in Baltimore, Md., as a specialist in diseases of the eye and ear. In 1889 he was appointed physician-in-chief of the Eye and ear infirmary in that city. He was chosen professor of ophthalmalogy in the University of Baltimore, and in 1873-5 he was professor of eye and ear surgery in Washington University. Dr. Reuling has invented a microscope for microscopical sections, and a ring-shaped silver-sling for the extraction of cataract within the capsule. He has written on "Detachment of the Choroid after Extraction of Cataract" (1886), "Extraction of Cataract within the Capsule," and "Destruction of a Cyst of the Iris by Galvano-Cautery." (1887).

Revere, Paul, patriot. b. in Boston, Mass., 1 Jan., 1735; d. there, 10 May, 1818. His grandfather, a Huguenot, emigrated from Sainte-Poy, France, to the island of Guernsey, whence his father removed to Boston, and there learned the trade of a goldsmith. The son was trained in this business, and became skilful in drawing and engraving designs on silver plates, and he took part in the expedition of 1756 to capture Crown Point from the French, being appointed a lieutenant of artillery and stationed at Fort Edward, near Lake George. On his return to Boston he married, and began business for himself as a goldsmith. He also practiced for a long time as a per-plate engraver, in which he was self-taught, and produced a portrait of Rev. Dr. Jonathan Mayhew, followed in 1766 by a picture emblematical of the repeal of the stamp-act, and next by a caricature entitled "A Warm Place—Hell," in which are represented the seventeen members of the house of representatives who voted for rescinding the circular of 1765 to the provincial legislatures. In 1770 he published a print representing the Boston massacre, and in 1774 one representing the landing of British troops in Boston. He was one of the grand jurors that refused to serve in 1774 in consequence of the act of parliament that made the supreme court judges independent of the legislature in regard to their salaries. In 1775 he engraved the plates for the paper-money that had been ordered by the Provincial congress of Massachusetts, made the press, and printed the bills. He was sent to Philadelphia to learn the process of making gunpowder, and the proprietor of the mill would only consent to show him the works in operation, but not to let him take memoranda or drawings. Nevertheless, on his return, he constructed a mill, which was soon put into successful operation. He was one of the prime movers of the "tea-party" that destroyed the tea in Boston harbor. In the autumn of 1774 he and about thirty other young men, chiefly mechanics, formed a society for the purpose of watching the movements of the British soldiers and detecting the designs of the Tories, which they reported only to John Hancock, Dr. Charles Warren, Samuel Adams, and two or three others, one of whom was the traitor, Dr. Benjamin Church, who communicated the transactions of the society to Gen. Thomas Gage. They took turns in patrolling the streets, and several days before the battle of Lexington they observed suspicious preparations in the British barracks and on the ships in the harbor. On the evening of 18 April they apprised the Whigs that the troops had begun to move. Dr. Warren, sending for Revere, desired him to set out at once for Lexington in order to warn Hancock and Adams in time. Crossing to Charlestown by boat, he procured a horse, and rode through Medford, rousing the minute-men on the way, and, after barely escaping capture by some British officers, reached Lexington and delivered his message. With Dr. Samuel Prescott and William Dawes he pushed on for the purpose of rousing the people of Concord and securing the military stores there. They awakened the minutemen on the route, but at Lincoln they were stopped by a party of British officers, excepting Prescott, who escaped capture by leaping a wall, and rode on to Concord, where he alarmed the inhabitants, while Revere and Dawes were taken by their cap-tors for selling arms. President John Adams, who happened at the time to be at W. Longfellow has made the midnight ride of Paul Revere the subject of a narrative poem. Revere was the messenger that was usually employed on difficult business by the committee of safety, of which Joseph Warren was president. He required the cannon in Port Independence, which the British, on leaving Boston, had sought to render useless by breaking the trunnions, but which he made serviceable by devising a new kind of carriage. After the evacuation a regiment of artillery was raised in Boston, of which he was made major, and afterward lieutenant-colonel. He took part in the unsuccessful Penobscot expedition of 1779. After the war he resumed the business of a gold- and silver-smith, and subsequently erected a foundry for casting cannon and ordnance. He made copper bolts and spikes began to be used, instead of iron, for fastening the timbers of vessels, he experimented on the manufacture of these articles, and when he was able to make them to his satisfaction he built in 1801 large works at Canton, Mass., for rolling copper, which are still carried on by the Revere copper company. He was the first in this country to smelt copper ore and to refine and roll copper into bolts and sheets. As grand-master of the masonic fraternity he laid the corner-stone of the Boston house of worship in 1785. In that year he aided in the establishment of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association, of which he was the first president. He was a prominent contributor to enterprises of benevolence, and at the time of his death was connected with numerous charities.—His grandson, Joseph Warren, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 17 May, 1812; d. in Hoboken, N. J., 20 April, 1880. He was made a midshipman in the U.S. navy, 1 April, 1828, became a passed midshipman on 4 June, 1834, and lieutenant on 23 Feb., 1841, took part in the Mexican war, and resigned from the navy on 20 Sept., 1850. He then entered the business of his father, and was the leader of several Spaniards he was knighted by Queen Isa-belia of Spain. He was made colonel of the 7th regiment of New Jersey volunteers on 31 Aug., 1861, and promoted brigadier-general of U.S. volunteers on 25 Oct., 1862. He led a brigade at Fredericksburg, was then transferred to the command of the Excelsior brigade in the 2d division, fought with it at Chancellorsville, and after the engagement fell under the censure of his superior officer. In May, 1863, he was tried by court-martial, and dismissed from the military service of the United States. He defended his conduct with great earnestness, and on 10 Sept., 1864, his dismissal from the army was revoked by President Lincoln, and his resignation was accepted. His keen and Saddle" (Boston, 1879) makes valiant and after the engagement fell under the censure of his superior officer. Another grandson, Edward Hutchinson Robphins, physician, b. in Boston, Mass., 23 July, 1827; d. near Sharpsburg, Md., 17 Sept., 1862, entered Harvard, but left in 1848, pursued the course in the medical school, and received his diploma in 1849. He practised in Boston, and on 14 Sept., 1862, was made a major in the 2nd Massachusetts volunteers. At Ball's Bluff he was captured by the enemy's cavalry, and was kept as a prisoner at Leesburg, and after release at Richmound, Va., till 22 Feb., 1862, when he was released on parole. He was exchanged in April, 1862, and served with his regiment through the peninsular campaign and Gen. John Pope's campaign on the Rappahanock, was present at Chantilly, and was killed at the battle of Antietam.—A brother of Edward H. R., Paul Joseph, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 10 Sept., 1822; d. in Westminster, Md., 4 July, 1862. He was made a midshipman in the U.S. navy, 1841, and at the beginning of the civil war entered the National army as major of the 20th Massachusetts volunteers. At Ball's Bluff he was wounded in the leg and taken prisoner, and he was confined in Libby prison until he and six other officers were selected as hostages to answer with their lives for the safety of Confederate privatesmen who had been contined of piracy in the U.S. court. They were transferred to the Henrico county prison, and confined for three months in a felon's cell. Maj. Revere was paroled on 22 Feb., 1862, and in the begining of the following May was exchanged. He was engaged in the peninsular campaign until he was taken sick in July. On 4 Sept., 1862, he was made a lieutenant-colonel, and served as assistant major general under Gen. G. H. Sumner and Edwin V. Sumner. At Antietam, where he displayed great gallantry, he received a wound that compelled him to retire to his home. On his recovery he was appointed colonel of his old regiment, 14 April, 1863, and returned to the field in May. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers for bravery at Gettysburg, where he received a total wound in the second day's battle.

REVILLE, Albert (ray-yi), French Protestant theologian, b. in Dieppe, France, 4 Nov., 1826. He studied at Geneva and Strasbourg, was pastor of the Wallon church in Rotterdam in 1851-72; and in 1880 became professor of the history of religions in the College of France. In 1886 he was made president of the section for religious studies in the Ecole des hautes études at the Sorbonne. Besides numerous other works, he has published "Theodore Parker, sa vie et ses oeuvres" (Paris, 1849), and "Les religions de Mexique, de l'Amerique centrale, et du Pérou" (Paris, 1884), an English translation of which was published in the "Hibbert Lectures" (London, 1884).

REVOL, Bénédict Henry (ray-vool), French painter, b. in Reims, Bouches du Rhône, France, 16 Dec., 1816. He is the son of the painter, Pierre Henri Revol, of Lyons, who died in 1842. Bénédict was for several years connected with the department of public instruction and with the manuscript section of the Bibliothèque royale. Just after his father's death he visited the United States, where he remained nine years. During this period he collected the material for many of his works. Among those are "Chasses et pêches de l'autre monde" (Paris, 1896); "La fille des Comanches" (1867); "Les Parias du Mexique" (1868); and many translations from the English and German into French. Of the latter the best known are "Les bœufs du nouveaux monde" (1856); "Les pirates du Mississippi" (1857); "Les prairies du Mexique" (1856); and "Le file de la ville Touras" (1857). During the last years in New York city M. Revol wrote and placed on the stage the plays "New York as it Is and as it Was," "Nut-Yer-Stick," a Chinese "fantasy," and "Horatius Trelaf, ou Forricrism." He also wrote, in French, the libretto of the "Vaisseau Fantome," a two-act opera, and has contributed frequently to both the French and English periodicals.

REXFORD, Eben Eugene, poet, b. in Johnsburg, Warren co., N. Y., 16 July, 1848. He was educated at Lawrence university, Appleton, Wis, and began to write at the age of seventeen, contributing poems and stories to magazines. He has published in book-form a poem entitled “Brother and Lover” (New York, 1885); “Grandmother’s Garden” (Chicago, 1887); and a story entitled “John Fielding and His Enemy” (1888). He has written several popular songs, among which the best-known are “Silver Threads among the Gold” and “Only a Passy-Blossom.” Since 1885 Mr. Reynolds has given much attention to floriculture, conducting demonstrations that are devoted to that subject in several magazines.

REYNOLDS, Elmer Robert, ethnologist, b. in Danville, Livingston co., N. Y., 30 July, 1846. He went to school with his parents in 1848 and was educated in the public schools and at the medical school of Columbian university, Washington, D. C. He served in the 10th Wisconsin battery in 1861-53, participated in the battles of Corinth, Stone River, Knoxville, Resaca, Jonesboro, Atlanta, Bentonville, and numerous minor engagements, and at the end of the civil war entered the U. S. navy as school-teacher, serving in the Mediterranean fleet in 1867, and in the West Indies and Yucatan in 1868. Since 1877 he has been in the U. S. civil service. His last twenty years have been devoted to the exploration of aboriginal remains in the valleys of the Potomac, Piscataway, Wicomico, Patuxent, Choptank, and Shenandoah rivers, his researches having to do with material, social, and political conditions, banks, copper and soapstone mines, cemeteries, burial-places, and ancient camps and earthworks. He was a founder of the Anthropological society of Washington, D. C., and its secretary in 1870-51, received a silver medal from Don Carlos, crown prince of Portugal, in 1886, in recognition of his scientific researches, was knighted by King Humbert of Italy, in 1891, for his distinguished scientific attainments,” and is a member of numerous scientific societies. His publications include “Aboriginal Sapstone Quarries in the District of Columbia” (Cambridge, 1885); “The Cemeteries of the Piscataway Indians at Kittenamandui, Md.” (Washington, D. C., 1886); “A Scientific Visit to the Indians of the Missouri and the Piscataway Indians” (Copenhagen, Denmark, 1884); “The Shell-Mounds, Antiquities, and Domestic Arts of the Choptank Indians of Maryland” (1886); and “Mémoire sur le Piscataway d’Auburn” (Paris, 1885). He has also a large amount of similar material in manuscript.

REYNOLDS, Ignatius Aloysis, R. C. bishop, b. in Nelson county, Ky., 22 Aug., 1798; d. in Charleston, S. C., 9 March, 1855. His parents emigrated from Maryland and settled on a farm near Bardstown, Ky. The son entered the diocesan seminary of St. Thomas, but was transferred to the Sulphur Seminary of Baltimore in 1819. On the completion of his theological course he was ordained priest by Archbishop Marshall on 24 Oct., 1833, and returned to Kentucky, where he was employed till 1827 in teaching and missionary work. In the latter year he was appointed president of Bardstown College, which he held till 1830. In 1830 he was appointed pastor of the cathedral, Bardstown, and in 1834 he was made pastor of the only Roman Catholic church in Louisville, where he remained till 1840, founding an orphanage and parochial schools. He was sent to Europe in 1840 on business relating to the affairs of the diocese, and returned in 1841. In 1842 he was appointed vicar-general and auxiliary bishop. He was named successor to Bishop England in the see of Charleston in May, 1843, by the 5th provincial council of Baltimore, and consecrated by Bishop Purcelll in the cathedral, Cincinnati, on 19 March, 1844. He proceeded at once to Charleston, and made a visitation of every part of his diocese, which he repeated annually. The number of Roman Catholics in the three states under his jurisdiction was not large, but the popularity of Dr. England among all classes and creeds had prepared the way for his cordial reception, and he continued the method he had so successfully pursued. In 1845 he went to England to obtain pecuniary aid, and in 1850 laid the foundation of the cathedral of St. Finbar, which was completed and consecrated in 1854. During the eleven years of his episcopate he took part in all the national and provincial councils of the Roman Catholic church in the United States, and his learning and eloquence counted for much in shaping the decrees of these bodies. But his labors gradually exhausted his constitution, which was never strong, and after a short visit to his native state in 1854 he returned broken in health. In a letter to the councils of the propagation of the faith in Europe in May, 1855, the bishops of the 6th council of Baltimore said that he had "worn himself out in the service of his church." He edited The Works of Bishop John England (6 vols. Baltimore, 1849).

REYNOLDS, John, British naval officer, b. in England about 1713; d. in London, 3 Feb., 1788. He entered the navy at an early age, and rose through successive ranks to rear-admiral of the blue. While holding the rank of captain in the royal navy, he was appointed the first colonial governor of Georgia on 6 Aug., 1754, under the plan for the civil government of the province that had recently been framed by the commissioners for trade and plantations. He landed at Savannah on 29 Oct., 1754, and on 7 Jan., 1755, called together the first legislative assembly of the province. Capt. Reynolds secured the friendship of the Indians, established courts of law, and set in operation the new charter, but resigned in February, 1757, on account of a disagreement with the council, and returned to England, where he soon received command of a frigate. He was promoted rear-admiral, March, 1773, vice-admiral, January, 1778, and admiral in September, 1787.

REYNOLDS, John, governor of Illinois, b. in Mount Vernon, Fed. Pa., 28 July, 1779; d. in Belleville, Ill., 8 May, 1855. He was of Irish descent, and, with his parents, emigrated in childhood to Kaskaskia, Ill., where he obtained a common-school education, and was admitted to the bar. He served as a scout in the campaigns against the Western Indians in 1812-13, subsequently practised law in Cahokia, Ill., became a justice of the state supreme court in 1818, served for many years in the legislature, and was speaker of the house in 1824-4. He was governor of Illinois in 1824-2, commanded the state volunteers during the Black Hawk war in May and June of the former year, and was a member of congress in 1835-7, and again in 1839-43, having been elected as a Democrat. He edited the "Eagle," a daily paper in Belleville, for several years, and is the author of the "Pioneer History of Illinois" (Belleville, Ill., 1848); "A Glance at the Crystal Palace and Sketches of Travel" (1854); and "My Life and Times" (1855).

REYNOLDS, John Parker, agriculturist, b. in Lebanon, Ohio, 1 March, 1820. He was graduated at Miami university in 1838, and in 1850 removed to Winnebago county, Ill., and engaged in farming and thoroughbred stock-raising. In 1860-2 he was secretary of the State agricultural society, and in 1868 he removed from Springfield to Chicago, and the next year he became first editor of the "National Live-Stock Journal." In 1873 he was called upon to assist in organizing an association for the promotion of industry, science, and art, and the erection of an exposition building in Chicago. He was elected secretary of the association, which post he now (1898) holds. On 9 Oct., 1874, in commemoration of the great fire of 1871, the exhibition was formally opened, and every year since that date it has been very successful, largely owing to the efforts of Mr. Reynolds.

REYNOLDS, Joseph Jones, soldier, b. in Flemingsburg, Ky., 4 Jan., 1822; d. in Washington, 26 Feb., 1899. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1843, served in Texas in 1845-6, became 1st lieutenant in 1847, and was principal assistant professor of infantry and artillery and instructor in the U. S. military academy from 1849 until his resignation from the army in 1857. He was then professor of mechanics and engineering in Washington university, St. Louis, Mo., till 1860, returned to the army as colonel of the 10th Indiana volunteers in April, 1861, became brigadier-general of volunteers the next month, and was engaged in various skilled battles and the battle of the Rappahannock river, 3 Oct., 1861. He resigned in January, 1863, served without a commission in organizing Indiana volunteers, became colonel of the 5th Indiana regiment, 27 Aug., 1862, and brigadier-general, 17 Sept., of that year. He was in the campaign of the Army of the Cumberland in 1862-3, became major-general of volunteers in November, 1862, and was engaged at Hoover's Gap, 24 Jan., 1863, and Chickamauga, 19-20 Sept., 1863. He was chief of staff of the Army of the Cumberland from 10 Oct. to 5 Dec. of that year, and participated in the battle of Chattanooga. He commanded the defenses of New Orleans, La., from January till June, 1864, commanded the 19th army corps, and organized forces for the capture of Mobile, Fort Gaines, and Fort Morgan in June and August. He was in charge of the Department of Arkansas from November, 1864, till April, 1866, mustered out of volunteer service, 1 Sept., 1866, and reappointed in the U. S. army as colonel of the 26th infantry, 28 July, 1866. He received the brevet of brigadier-general, U. S. army, 2 March, 1867, for gallant and meritorious service at the battle of Chickamauga, and that of major-general, U. S. army, at the same date at Mission Ridge. During the reconstruction period, in 1867-72, he was in command of the 5th military district, comprising Louisiana and Texas, was elected U. S. senator from the latter state in 1871, but declined, commanded the Department of the Platte in 1872-6, and in June, 1877, he was retired.

REYNOLDS, Joseph Smith, soldier, b. in New Lenox, Ill., 3 Dec., 1839. He went to Chicago in 1856, was graduated at his high-school in July, 1861, and in August of that year enlisted in the 64th Illinois regiment. He was commissioned 2d lieutenant on 31 Dec., and was in active service three years and ten months. He took part in seventeen battles, was wounded three times, and for "gallant and meritorious service" was promoted to a captaincy, subsequently to colonel. On 11 July, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers. He then began the study of law, was graduated at the law department of Chicago university in 1866, admitted to the bar, and has since practised his profession in Chicago. Gen. Reynolds has been elected as representative and senator to the Illinois legislature, was a commissioner from Illinois to the Universal exposition at Vienna in 1873, and has held other offices.

5 Nov., 1879. He was appointed midshipman in the U. S. navy in 1831, served on Capt. Charles Wilkes's exploring expedition in 1838-42, was commissioned lieutenant in 1841, and was placed on the retired list in consequence of falling health in 1851. He was then assigned to duty in the Sandwich islands, where he was instrumental in effecting the Hawaiian treaty of reciprocity. He returned to active service in 1861, was made commander in 1862, with the charge of the naval forces at Port Royal, became captain in 1866, senior officer of the ordinance board in 1869-70, and commodore in the latter year. He served as chief of bureau and acting secretary of the navy in 1873 and again in 1874, became rear-admiral in December, 1874, and in December, 1877, was retired on account of continued illness. His last service was in command of the U. S. naval forces on the Asiatic station. Of Admiral Reynolds's services the secretary of the navy, Richard W. Thompson, in the order that announced his death, said: "In the administration of the duties committed to him, he did much to improve the promptness and efficiency of the enlisted men of the navy, and in the discharge of all the duties devolving on him, during a long career in the service, he exhibited zeal, intelligence, and ability, for all of which he was conspicuous." See "Reynolds Memorial Address" by Joseph G. Rosengarten (Philadelphia, 1889).—His brother, John Fulton, soldier, b. in Lancaster, Pa., 20 Sept., 1839, d. near Gettysburg, Pa., 1 July, 1863, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1841, became 1st lieutenant in 1846, received the brevet of captain in 1862, returned at the end of that year for his service at Monterrey, and was given that of major for Buena Vista in January, 1847. He was breveted major in 1855, was mentioned in general orders for his services in the expedition against the Rogue river Indians in Oregon, took part in the Utah expedition under Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston in 1858, and in 1859 became commander of cadets at the U. S. military academy. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 11th infantry in May, 1861, and on 29 Aug., brigade-general of U. S. volunteers, and was assigned to the command of the 1st brigade of Pennsylvania reserves. He was appointed military governor of Fredericksburg, Va., in May, 1862, and was engaged at the battles of Mechanicsville, Gaines's Mills, and Glendale, where he was taken prisoner. So great was his popularity in Fredericksburg that the municipal authorities went to Richmond and solicited his exchange. During his captivity he prepared a careful report of the operations of his command under Gen. George B. McClellan. He rejoined the army on his exchange, 8 Aug., 1862, was engaged in the campaign of northern Virginia, and commanded his division at the second battle of Bull Run. At a critical time in that battle, when his brigade, unable to hold the enemy in check, fell back in confusion, observing that the flag-staff of the 2d regiment had been broken by a bullet, he seized the flag from the color-bearer and, dashing to the right, rode twice up and down the line, waving it and cheering his men. The troops rallied, and Gen. George H. Gordon, in his "Army of Virginia," says: "Reynolds's division, like a rock, withstood the advance of the victorious enemy, and saved the Union army from rout." He was assigned to the command of the state militia in defence of Pennsylvania during the Maryland campaign, and on 29 Sept., 1862, received the thanks of the legislature for his services. He was commissioned major-general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, succeeded Gen. Joseph H. Bevering as the first colonel of the "Army of the Potomac," was engaged on the left at the battle of Fredericksburg, and was promoted colonel of the 5th U. S. infantry, 1 June, 1863. On the opening day of the battle of Gettysburg, 1 July, 1863, where he was in command of the left wing—the 1st, the 2d, and the 11th corps, and Buford's cavalry division—he encountered the van of Lee's army, and after making dispositions of his army in person, and urging them on to a successful charge, he was struck by a rifle-ball that caused instant death. A sword of honor was awarded him by the enlisted men of the Pennsylvania reserves at the close of the peninsula campaign. The men of the 1st corps erected a bronze heroic statue of him, by John Q. A. Ward, on the field of Gettysburg, and subsequently placed his portrait, by Albert T. Laurie, in the library of the U. S. military academy, and the state of Pennsylvania placed a granite shaft on the spot where he fell at Gettysburg. On 18 Sept., 1884, the Reynolds memorial association unveiled in Philadelphia a bronze equestrian statue of Gen. Reynolds, by John Rogers, the gift of the town of Gettysburg. See "Reynolds Memorial Address" by Joseph G. Rosengarten (Philadelphia, 1880), and "The Unveiling of the Statue of Gen. John F. Reynolds, by the Reynolds Memorial Association" (1884).
and Journal." All these journals were published at Gettyburg, but have long since ceased to exist. Among his numerous published works are "The American Literature," an address (Gettysburg, Pa., 1845); "The Captivity of Plautus," with introduction and notes (1846); "Inaugural Address as President of Capitol University" (Columbus, Ohio, 1850); "Historical Address before the Historical Society of the Lutheran Church" (1848); "Inaugural Address as President of Illinois State University" (Springfield, 1858); and "History of Swedish Life in America, translated, with introduction and notes" (Philadelphia, 1854). He was the chief editor of the hymn-book of the general synod (1850), and for many years an active member of its historical committee.

REYNOSO, Álvaro (ray-no-so), Cuban scientist, b. in Duran, Cuba, about 1820; d. in Havana, 13 Aug., 1888. He went to France in 1847 and 1854, where he was awarded a first prize by the Académie des sciences of Paris for his experiments on chlorof orm. He was graduated as doctor of sciences by the academy, and returned to his native country in 1855. In 1865 he went again to France to make experiments on an apparatus that he had devised for the purpose of making the sugar-cane produce 50 per cent. of sugar. He had published "El cultivo de la caña de azúcar" (Havana, 1861); "Ensayo sobre el cultivo de la caña de azúcar" (1862); "Apuntes de varios cultivos cubanos" (Paris, 1863); "Agricultura de los indígenas de Cuba y Hayti" (1881); "Cultivo de la caña de azúcar en España" (1882); "Memoria sobre la presencia de sanuras en las urines" (1883); and numerous contributions to French and Spanish periodicals. He was a member of various scientific societies.

REZE, Frederic (ray-zay), R. C. bishop, b. in Vincenben, Hanover, 6 Feb., 1791; d. 30 Dec., 1851. He entered the military service at an early age, and fought as a dragoon in the battle of Waterloo. Soon afterward he went to Rome to prepare himself for the priesthood, and, after studying in the College of the propaganda, he was ordained and sent to labor in Africa. On his return to Germany he accepted an invitation from Bishop Fenwick to come to the United States, and was appointed his secretary. He went to Europe in 1825 to procure priests, and was successful in sending several missionaries to the United States. The Leopoldine society for helping poor missions in this country was founded in August, 1846, through his exertions. He returned to Ohio in 1828, and devoted himself with energy and success to the revival of Catholicity among the Indian tribes in that state and in Michigan. On his return he was appointed vicar-general. In 1833 the see of Detroit was created, embracing the present states of Michigan and Wisconsin, and Dr. Reze was named the bishop of this see by Pope Pius VII, 6 Oct. He attended the deliberations of the 2d provincial council of Baltimore a few weeks afterward. There were only about a dozen churches attended by ten priests in the diocese. Bishop Reze founded a college in Detroit and established academies there and in Green Bay, which he placed under the control of the order of Poor Clares. He gave special attention to the education of the Indians, and opened schools for their benefit. But faults of temper prevented his administration from being entirely successful, and he resigned his see in 1837, and lived for several years in Rome, but finally retired to Hildesheim, where he spent the remainder of his days.

RiFFS, Morgan John, clergyman, b. in Glamorganshire, Wales, 5 Dec., 1769; d. in Somerset, Pa., 17 Sept., 1804. He received an excellent education, and devoted himself to teaching, but, after traveling with the Bishop of Lichfield, entered the college of that denomination in Bristol, with a view of preparing for the ministry. On the completion of his course he was ordained over the church of Penny-garn, but, becoming interested in the cause of the French revolution, he resigned his charge and went to France. He soon returned to Wales, and there established "The Welsh Repository," through which he planned and the policy of the English ministry; but, being compelled to give this up, he collected several of his friends and came to this country. At first he travelled extensively through the southern and western states, preaching and searching for a suitable location for his colony, but, finding none, he returned to Philadelphia. Two years after he purchased a large tract of land in Pennsylvania, which he called Cambria. He located and planned the capital, which he called Beulah, and thither in 1798 he removed his own family, accompanied by a body of Welsh colonists. He was occupied for several years with the charge of his pastorate and his duties as a large landed proprietor, but finally was persuaded to settle in Somerset, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was the rector of several parishes that he published in Wales, and of several orations and discourses that appeared in Pennsylvania.—His grandson, William Jones, librarian, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 13 March, 1839, was educated in Philadelphia, and graduated at the Central high-school in 1847. From October, 1850, to June, 1852, he had charge of the social statistics and other duties in connection with the 5th census at the department of the interior, and he was secretary of the central executive committee in Washington of the World's fair in London in 1851. In July, 1852, he became chief clerk of the Smithsonian institution, which office he still (1898) holds, and for several months each year, during 1884-7, he was by appointment acting secretary of the institution, while Prof. Spencer F. Baird was absent on duties connected with the U.S. fish commission. His duties include the general charge of the publications of the Smithsonian institution, and he has been its executive officer, under the secretary, since his appointment. Mr. Riess has been active in educational interests, and was a trustee of the public schools of Washington in 1862-8, 1873-4, and 1886-9, and also became president of the Young men's Christian association. In 1856 he organized a lecture bureau for securing the services of eminent speakers to lecture in different parts of the country, and he had charge of Prof. John Todd's lectures in this country in 1872. He invented and patented, in 1869, the Riess ruler and pencil-case slate, which has received the highest recognition. He has also been president of all of the Smithsonian publications, and has published "Manual of Public Libraries, Institutions, and Societies in the United States and British Provinces of North America" (Philadelphia, 1859); "Guide to the Smithsonian Institution and National Museum" (Washington, 1859); "List of Publications of the Smithsonian Institution, 1846-55" (Philadelphia, 1856); "The Publications of Washington" (1863-66); "The Smithsonian Institution: Documents Relative to Its Origin and History" (1875); "The Scientific Writings of James Smithson," edited (1879); "James Smithson and his Bequest" (1880); and "Catalogue of Publications of the Smithsonian Institution" (1882).

ish, La., 14 Sept., 1856. He was the son of James and Marianna Smith, and in 1857 adopted the name of Rhett, which was that of a colonial ancestor. He studied law, was elected to the legislature in 1826, and in 1832 became attorney-general of South Carolina. During the nullification controversy he was an ardent advocate of extreme state rights views. He served six successive terms in Congress, from 1857 till 1849, having been elected as a Democrat, and on the death of John C. Calhoun he was chosen to fill the latter's seat in the U.S. Senate, which he occupied from 6 Jan., 1851. In Congress he continued to uphold extreme southern views, and in 1851-2, during the secession agitation in South Carolina, he advocated the immediate withdrawal of his state from the Union, whether it should be accomplished by others or not. On the defeat of his party in the latter year, he resigned from the Senate, and after the death of his wife, in the same year, he retired to his plantation, taking no part in politics for many years. He was an active member of the South Carolina secession convention of December, 1860, and prepared the address that announced its reasons for passing the ordinance of secession, and by his address he was a delegate to the provisional Confederate congress at Montgomery, Ala., in 1861, and presided over the committee that reported the Confederate constitution. He was afterward a member of the regular Confederate congress. Mr. Rhett was for some time owner of the Charleston "Mercury," the organ of the so-called "fire-eaters," in which he advocated his extreme views. During the war it was conducted by his son, Robert Barnwell Rhett, Jr. After the civil war Mr. Rhett removed to Louisiana, and was seen no more in public life, except as a delegate to the Democratic national convention in 1868.

RHETT, Thomas Grinké, soldier, b. in South Carolina about 1825; d. in Baltimore, Md., 28 July, 1878. He was graduated at the U.S. military academy in 1845, assigned to the ordnance department, and served at Washington arsenal till 1846, when he was transferred to the mounted rifles and ordered to Mexico. He was brevetted captain, 12 Oct., 1847, for gallantry in the defense of Puebla, and after the war was on frontier duty, becoming captain in 1853, and paymaster, with the rank of major, 7 April, 1858. He resigned on 1 April, 1861, and was commissioned lieutenant in the Confederate government at Montgomery, but, not receiving the recognition to which he thought himself entitled, returned to his native state, and was commissioned major-general by Gov. Francis W. Pickens. He was chief of staff to Gen. Joseph E. Johnston till June, 1862, when he was ordered to the trans-Mississippi department. After the war Gen. Rhett was colonel of ordnance in the Egyptian army from 1870 till 1873, when he had a paralytic stroke, and resigned. He remained abroad till 1876, but found no relief from his malady.

RHIND, Alexander Colden, naval officer, b. in New York city, 31 Oct., 1851; d. there, 8 Nov., 1879. He entered the navy as midshipman, 1858, became passed midshipman 1861, master 21 Feb., 1865; and lieutenant, 17 March, 1874. He served in the "John Adams," of the Pacific squadron, in 1865-6, and in the " Constellation," on the coast of Africa, in 1869-71. At the beginning of the civil war he commanded the steamer "Cruiser," on the South Atlantic blockade, and participated in a series of operations in Florida sound and S.C. for which he received the thanks of the navy department in 1861-2. He was commissioned lieutenant-commander on 16 July, 1862, and had charge of the "Sensa" in 1862, and the monitor "Ko-luk" in 1862-3. Previous to the attack on the forts at Charleston he boarded the channel on the bar, and in the attack the next day, 7 April, 1863, took the "Ko-luk" within 550 yards of Fort Sumter, becoming the special target of all the forts. His vessel was hit ninety times and nineteen shot penetrated at or below the water line. She withdrew from action sinking, but Rhind kept the ship about till next morning, when she sank, but the crew were saved. He was commissioned commander, 2 Jan., 1863, continued on duty off Charleston, commanding the steamer "Paul Jones" and the flag-ship "Crisus," and participated in engagements with Fort Wagner and other forts in 1863-4. In the attack, 18 July, 1863, he commanded the division of gun-boats. He was given the gun-boat "Agawam," of the North Atlantic squadron, in 1864-5, was in James river from May till October, 1864, cooperating with Grant's army, and bombarded forts and batteries, especially Forts Warren and Sherman, for which he received the thanks of the navy department. In the attack on Fort Fisher he was selected to command the "Louisiana" with a volunteer crew from his vessel. She was loaded with 215 tons of gunpowder and bombs, fitted with fuses set to explode by clockwork, and towed to within 290 yards of the beach and 490 yards from the fort. The perils understanding, suggested by Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, was successful, but did not injure the fort. Commander Rhind was recommended for promotion, 2 March, 1870, commanded the "Congress," on the European station, in 1872, was light-house inspector in 1876-8, and was commissioned commodore, 30 Sept., 1876. He was on special duty and president of the board of inspection from 1879 till 1882, became a rear-admiral on 30 Oct., 1883, and on the following day was placed on the retired list.

RHINE, Alice Hyenman, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 31 Jan., 1840. She is a daughter of Leon Hyenman, and has gained a reputation as a writer of prose and verse for the periodical press. She has contributed numerous articles to the "Popular Science Monthly," the "North American Review," and the "Forum," and has edited an illustrated work on "Niagara" (New York, 1885).

RHOADS, Samuel, member of the Continental congress, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1711; d. there, 7 April, 1784. His father, John Rhoads, and grandfather, of the same name, were Quaker colonists from Delaware, England. Samuel was apprenticed to the carpenter's trade, and became a wealthy builder. In 1741 he was chosen a member of the city council, but he does not appear to have held office again till 1761, when he was chosen, with Benjamin Franklin, to the assembly, to which he was again elected in 1762-4 and 1771-4. In 1761 he was chosen by the assembly a commissioner to attend a noted conference with the western Indians and the Six Nations at Lancaster, Pa. In 1774 he was elected by the assembly a delegate to the Continental congress. During this year he was also elected mayor of Philadelphia. He was one of the founders of the Pennsylvania hospital, and became a member of its first board, of which post he held until his death, a period of thirty years. He was one of the early members of the American philosophical society, and for many years a director of the Philadelphia library.

RIHODES, Albert, author, b. in Pittsburg, Pa., 1 Feb., 1840. He was educated mainly at the academy of Elder's Ridge in the village of that name in Westmoreland county, Pa., during most of his time abroad. He was U. S. consul at Jerusalem during the administration of President Johnson, consul at Rotterdam and charge d'affaires at the Hague under President Grant, and consul at Roven, France, and at Elberfeld, Germany, from 1877 till 1885. He has been a frequent contributor to American, French, and British periodicals, largely on the characteristics of life and people on the European continent. Since 1885 he has lived in Paris. His books are: "Jerusalem as it Is" (London, 1867); "The French at Home" (New York, 1875); and "Monseigneur at Home" (London, 1886).

RIHODES, Mosheim, clergyman, b. in Williamsburg, Pa., 14 April, 1847. His educational facilities in early life were limited, but by persevering industry he acquired a fine classical education. He was graduated in theology at Missionary institute, Selinsgrove, Pa., in 1861, ordained to the ministry in 1868, and in 1877 received the degree of D. D. from Wittenberg college, Springfield, Ohio. Immediately after his ordination he became pastor of the Lutheran congregation at Sumbury, and from this date until 1877 he served as pastor in Lebanon and Columbia, Pa., and Omaha, Neb. In 1874 he removed to St. Louis, Mo., where he has built up a flourishing English Lutheran congregation. He was president of the general synod in 1885-7, is the president of that body's board of education, and in 1887 was elected president pro tem of Midland college, Atchison, Kans. Dr. Rhodes is an acceptable pulpit orator and lecturer, and a popular author. He is a frequent contributor to the periodicals of his church, and many of his review articles and lectures have been published separately in pamphlet form. Among his published works are: "Sermon on the Assassination of President Lincoln" (Sumbury, Pa., 1865); "The Proper Observance of the Lord's Day" (St. Louis, 1874); "Life Thoughts for Young Men" (Philadelphia, 1878); "Expository Lectures on Philippians" (1882); "Life Thoughts for Young Women" (1883); "Vital Questions Pertaining to Christian Belief" (1886); and "The Throne of Grace" (1887).

RIALL, Sir Phineas, British soldier, b. in Ireland about 1773; d. in Paris, France, 10 Nov., 1839, and end the British army as ensign in January, 1794, and as lieutenant was brevetted to different grades to that of major in the same year. He was reduced in 1797, and remained on the reserve list till 1804. He commanded a brigade in the West Indies in 1808-10, taking part in the expeditions against Martinique and Saintes, and in the capture of Guadaloupe, became a colonel on 25 June, 1810, and was made a major-general. After serving for a few months as aide-de-camp in Staff in England, he was ordered to Canada to take part in the war between England and the United States. He served on the Niagara frontier, displaying energy and valor, but committing many military mistakes. He was wounded at Chippewa, where he was chief in command, as well as at the battle of Lundy's Lane. On 18 Feb., 1814, he was appointed governor of the island of Grenada, where he remained for several years. He was promoted lieutenant-general in 1825, was knighted in 1833, and became full general in 1837.

RIBAS, Andres Perez de (re-bas), Spanish missionary, b. in Cordova, Spain, in 1576; d. in Mexico, 26 March, 1655. After being ordained priest, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1602, and was sent immediately afterward to Mexico, where he became successively rector of a college and provincial of New Spain. He was a successful and indefatigable laborer in his profession. He wrote the works "Vida, Virtudes y Muerte del Padre Juan de Lasencova" (Mexico, 1636); and "Historia de los triunfos de nuestra Santa Fe entre los barbaros con las costumbres de los Indios" (Madrid, 1645). He left "Historia de la Provincia de la Compania de Jesus en Mexico," and "Historia de Simbal," which remain in manuscript in the Library of Mexico.

RIBAS, Jose Felix (re-bas), Venezuelan soldier, b. in Caracas, 19 Sept., 1775; d. in Tucupido, 18 Jan., 1815. He married a maternal aunt of Simon Bolivar, was one of the most enthusiastic originators of the movement for independence in 1810, and was appointed a member of the supreme junta of Caracas. He organized a battalion, of which he was appointed colonel, and took part in the unfortunate battle against Montevideo. After the capitulation of Miranda, 27 July, 1812, Ribas obtained through family influence a passport from Montevideo, and went to Caracaz. Thence he accompanied Bolivar to Cartagena and in his invasion of Venezuela, being in command of the division that defeated the Spaniards at Niquitao, 23 June, 1813, and at Horcones on 22 July, and was promoted brigadier on 3 Oct., and chief of operations in the central provinces. When Boves, at the head of 7,000 men, attacked Caracas, Ribas, with only 1,500 men, intervened himself at Victoria and, after resisting for a whole day the furious attacks of Boves and Morales, totally routed them in the evening of 12 July, 1814. He defeated Rosete at Charam lake, 20 Feb., was promoted lieutenant-general on 24 March, and took part in the victory of Carabobo on 25 May. After the disaster of La Puerta he was sent to the eastern provinces, and when Bolivar presented himself, after the defeat of Aragua, in Carupano, Ribas's troops deposed Bolivar and Mariño, proclaiming Ribas and Piar first and second chief. But Ribas was totally routed at Urien by Boves on 5 Dec., and in Maturin by the rebels of the San Juan and Trujillo districts, where he was totally dispersed. Ribas was captured in the farm of Tamanaco while awaiting provisions from the neighboring town of Valle de Pascua. He was shot in Tucupido, and his head was sent to Caracas to be exposed in a cage.

RIBAUT, or RIBAUT, Jean (ro-bo), French navigator, b. in Dieppe in 1590; d. in Florida, 23 Sept., 1635. He was a commissioned naval officer when he proposed to Admiral Gaspar de Coligny, the chief of the Protestants in France, to establish colonies in unexplored countries, where they would be at liberty to practise the reformed religion. The admiral obtained a patent from Charles IX., and armed two ships, on which, besides veteran soldiers and sailors, many young noblemen, among whom was Jean Ribaut commander. The latter sailed from Dieppe, 18 Feb., 1562, and, avoiding routes where he might encounter Spanish vessels, as the success of the expedition depended entirely on secrecy, sighted on 30 April a cape which he named Francois. It is now one of the headlands of Matanzas inlet. The following day he discovered the mouth of a stream, which he called Riviere de Mar (now St.
John's river), and on its southern shore he planted a cross bearing the escutcheon of the king of France, and took formal possession of the country. Moving northward slowly for three weeks, they named each stream after some French river, till they saw, in latitude 32° 15', a commodious haven, which received the name of Port Royal. On 27 May they crossed the bar, passed Hilton Head, and landed. Ribaut built a fort six miles north from the present site of Beaufort, and, in honor of the king, named it Fort Charles. He left there one of his trusted lieutenants, Charles d'Albert, with two or three more men, and, on 11 June, sailed for France. His vessels were scarcely out of sight when trouble arose in the colony: Albert was murdered, and the survivors, headed by Nicolas de la Barre, after difficulties with the Indians, who burned the fort and destroyed their provisions, constructed a small bark in which they set sail. They were rescued near the coast of Brittany in extreme misery by an English vessel and carried as prisoners to London. Ribaut, who had meanwhile arrived safely in Dieppe on 20 July, was unable to forward re-enforcements and supplies to his colony, owing to the religious war that then raged in France, in which he was obliged to take part. After the peace he renewed the project of a Huguenot colony in America. A vessel was built at Port Royal in Cape Fear early in April, 1564, received 160 Huguenot landowners (q. e.), with five ships, who built Fort Caroline on St. John's river. Ribaut followed on 22 May, 1565, with seven vessels, carrying 400 soldiers and emigrants of both sexes, with supplies and provisions. They arrived on 29 Aug., and found Landemore's colony starving and on the eve of dissolution. Ribaut assumed command, and, after landing his troops, went to explore the country. On 4 Sept., the French that had been left to guard the ships sighted a large fleet, and asked their object. "I am Pedro Menendez de Aviles," haughtily responded the commander, who has come to hang and behead all Protestants in these regions. If I find any Catholic he shall be well treated, but every heretic shall die." The French fleet, being surprised, cut its cables, and Menendez entered an inlet, which he named San Augustin, and here he began to in- tense himself. Ribaut rallied all his forces and resolved to attack the Spaniards against the advice of his officers, especially Landemore. He embarked on 10 Sept., but was scarcely at sea when a hurricane dispersed his fleet. The Spanish conceived the plan of attacking Fort Caroline by land, and captured it by surprise. Three days later Ribaut's ships were wrecked near Cape Canaveral, and he immediately marched toward Fort Caroline in two divisions. The first one arrived near the site of the fort and surrendered to Menendez, and its members were put to death. Ribaut's party ar- rived next day, when Ribaut, in his word that they should be spared, they agreed to surrender on 23 Sept., but they were likewise mur- dered. Ribaut being killed by Menendez's own hands, and their bodies hung to the surrounding trees with the inscription: "Executed, not as Frenchmen, but as Lutherans." Ribaut's son, Jacques, with all of his followers, found a small boat and escaped to a ship. Ribaut's death was afterward avenged by Dominique de Gourgues. The relation of Ribaut's first expedition to Cobun is now known in the English translation: "The whole and true Discovery of Florida, written in French by Cap- tain Ribaut, the first that wholly discovered the same, containing as well the wonderful strange Natures and Manners of the People, with the mar- vellous Commodities and Treasures of the Country: as also the pleasant Ports and Havens and Wawes thereto, a carpenter never found out before the last year 1562, now newly set forth in English the XXX of May 1563" (London, 1563). This volume is extremely rare, and was reprinted by Richard Hakluyt in his "Voyages" (London, 1582). Landemore's relation contains also an account of Ribaut's death, as also the "Discours de l'histoire de la Floride" (Dieppe, 1566), written by Etienne Charles, a carpenter who had accompanied Rib- aut, and who escaped in the brig "La Perle." served on the committee on naval affairs, and, as chairman of that committee in the 28th congress, introduced in 1846 a bill to incorporate the United States in a naval force, and remain in the United States, and made a speech in the 26th congress. He was a delegate to the Loyalists' convention at Philadelphia in 1866, and to the Republican national convention in 1868. He was governor of Massachusetts in 1856, 1857, and 1878.

RICE, Allen Thordike, editor, b. in Boston, Mass., 18 June, 1833; d. in New York city, 16 May, 1889. At the age of nine years he was taken aboard a sailing-ship, and was sent by his parents to Purit. the United States, and remained there until 1874, when he went to England and was graduated at Oxford in 1875. On his return to the United States he entered as a student at Columbia law-school. In 1876 he bought the "North American Review," of which he was afterward the editor. He organized in 1879 and subsequently directed what is popularly known as the Charmian expedition, which was despatched under the joint auspices of the United States and France, to investigate systematically the remains of ancient civilization in Central America and Mexico. In 1884 he bought a controlling interest in "Le Matin," one of the chief papers of Paris, in which he continued a proprietor. He was actively interested in politics, and in 1886 received a Republican appointment to the diplomatic service, but was expelled by the local political leaders. A controversy succeeded, which resulted in the expulsion of Mr. RICE's opponents from the Republican organization. This event turned his attention to the Australian system of voting, which he was the first to recommend for adoption in the United States, and mainly owing to his advocacy a demand for ballot-reform was incorporated in the platforms of the Republican and United Labor parties in 1887. He edited "Reminiscences of Abraham Lincoln" (New York, 1886), and contributed to "Ancient Cities of the New World" (1887).

RICE, Americus Vespucius, soldier, b. in Perrysville, Ohio, 18 Nov., 1825. He was graduated at Union college in 1849, and began the study of law. On 12 April, 1861, he enlisted in the National army, soon afterward was appointed a lieutenant, and then a captain in the 21st Ohio volunteers, and served in West Virginia. When his term of enlistment expired in August, 1861, he assisted in recruiting the 57th Ohio infantry, returned to the field as captain of a company, and became lieutenant-colonel, and afterward colonel, of the regiment. He was captured and paroled in 1863, but subsequently escaped, and served in several engagements. In Gen. William B. Hazen's division, was wounded several times, and at the battle of Kennesaw Mountain lost a leg. The people of his district gave him a majority of votes as the Democratic candidate for governor in 1864, but he was defeated by the soldiers' vote. He was promoted brigadier-general on 31 May, 1863, and mustered out of service, in 1865, in the capacity of a private banking company in Ottawa, Ohio. He was a delegate to the Democratic national convention at Baltimore in 1872, and was elected in 1874 to congress, and re-elected in 1876. His cousin, Rosella, author, b. in Perrysville, Ohio, 7 Aug., 1857. She began writing for the local press at an early age, publishing "Male or Heaven Stories" (Columbus, 1878), and has since been a contributor of serial stories and humorous articles and of poems descriptive of nature to newspapers and magazines. She is also known as a public lecturer. In 1871-2 she contributed, under the pen-name of "Pippsissaway Potts," a serial entitled "Other People's Windows" to Timothy S. Arthur's "Home Magazine." It attracted attention, and was followed by others with the same signature, "My Girl and I," and other tales signed "Chatty Brooks," and still other stories published under her own name, including "Fifty Years Ago, or the Cabins of the West."

RICE, Benjamin Franklin, senator, b. in East Otto, Cattaragus co., N. Y., 26 May, 1828. After obtaining his education in an academy, he taught for several winters, studied law, and was admitted to the bar at Irvine, Ky. He was a pre-political editor in 1852, and was elected to the Kentucky legislature in 1855. Mr. Rice removed to Minnesota in 1860, enlisted in the National army in 1861, was appointed a captain in the 3d Minnesota infantry, and served in that grade until 1864, when he resigned and established himself in the practice of law at Little Rock, Ark. He was the organizer of the Republican party in Arkansas in 1867, was chairman of its central committee, managed the electoral canvass during the predominance of his party, and was elected to the U. S. Senate, serving from 3 June, 1868, till 3 March, 1873.

RICE, Daniel, showman, b. in New York city in 1822. His name was originally McLaren, but he changed it to Rice after removing to Pittsburg, Pa., and becoming an acrobat. He afterward travelled as a circus-bill, and the most celebrated of his performances was his exhibition of "Resurrection," which was an exhibition of the "one-horse show" because the chief attraction, besides his jays, was a trained Arabian stallion. He soon gathered a large company, and enhanced the reputation of his "great and only show" by munificent gifts for charitable purposes and public monuments. During the civil war he promoted recruiting by delivering patriotic speeches in connection with his comic performances. He met with financial disaster, and performed under the management of others until intemperate habits interfered with his engagements. Having reformed, he occasionally lectured in advocacy of temperance. He resided in Cincinnati, Ohio, and subsequently in Texas, where he became a large land-owner.

RICE, David, clergyman, b. in Hanover county, Va., 29 Dec., 1758; d. in Green county, Ky., 18 June, 1816. He was graduated at Princeton in 1761, studied theology, was licensed to preach in 1762, and was installed as pastor of the Presbyterian church at Hanover, Va., in December, 1763. At the end of five years he resigned on the ground of being unable to spend his time in the communion of the church, and the three years later he took charge of three congregations in the new settlements of Bedford county, Va., where he labored with success during the period of the Revolution. When Kentucky was opened to settlement he visited that country in October, 1783, removed thither with his family, and in 1784 organized in Mercer county a Presbyterian congregation. He opened in his house the earliest school. He was the organizer and the chairman of a conference that was held in 1785 for the purpose of instituting a regular organization of the Presbyterian church in the new territory, and the principal founder of Transylvania academy, which developed into Transylvania university. He was the organizer and the chairman of a convention that framed a state constitution in 1792. In 1798 he removed to Green county, Ky. His wife, Mary, was a daughter of Rev. Samuel Blair. He published an "Essay on Baptism" (Baltimore, 1789); a "Lecture on Divine Decrees" (1791); "Slavery Inconsistent with Justice and Policy" (1792); "An Epistle to the Citizens of Kentucky Professing Christianity," those that Arroir Have been Renowned Preshbytere -VOL. rioters of Kentucky," warning them against the errors of the day (1858); also "A Kentucky Protest against Slavery." (New York, 1852.)—David's grandson, John Holt, clergyman, b. in New London, Va., 28 Nov., 1777; d. in Hampden Sidney, Prince Edward co., Va., 3 Sept., 1831. He was educated at Liberty Hall academy, near Lexington, began the study of medicine in 1799, afterward studied theology, was a tutor in Hampden Sidney college in 1801, was licensed as an assistant pastor on 12 Sept., 1803, and on 29 Sept., 1804, was installed as pastor of a Presbyterian church at Cub Creek, Charlotte co., Va. On 17 Oct., 1812, he was installed as pastor of the first separate Presbyterian church in Rich- mond, the Presbyterians having previously worshipped in a building with the Episcopalians. In July, 1818, Dr. Rice began the publication of the "Christian Monitor," a religious periodical, which he conducted for several years. From 1818 till 1829 he edited a similar publication called the "Virginia Evangelical and Literary Magazine." He was moderator of the general assembly at Phila- delphia in 1829. He was called to be the president of Princeton in 1829, and a few weeks later to the professorship of theology in the Union theological seminary at Hampden Sidney college, which latter post he accepted. He received the degree of D. D. from Princeton in 1819. Dr. Rice was known as a powerful and fervent preacher, not alone in Virginia, but in the northern states, which he often visited, chiefly for the purpose of obtaining an endowment for his seminary. Besides review articles, controversial pamphlets, memoirs of friends, and numerous sermons, his only published work was a small volume entitled "Historical and Philosophical Considerations on Religion" (1852), consisting of letters addressed to James Madison, originally published anonymously in 1809 in the Southern States Telegraph. In this work, he endeavored to show that the propagation of the Christian religion ought to be fostered by statesmen in the interest of national prosperity. See his "Memoir" by William Maxwell (Philadelphia, 1855).—John Holt's brother, Benjamin Holt, clergyman, b. in New London, Va., 29 Nov., 1782; d. in Hampden Sidney college, 21 Feb., 1858, was educated under his brother's direction, taught at New Berne and Raleigh, N.C., was licensed to preach while at Raleigh, 28 Sept., 1810, and was sent as a missionary to the seacoast counties of North Carolina. He removed to Peters- burg, Va., in 1812, and organized a church in that place, of which he was installed pastor in 1814, and with which he remained for the following seventeen years. He was made an assistant professor in 1824, and in 1829 was elected to the presidency of the Presbyterian general assembly in 1829, and in 1832 received from Princeton the degree of D. D. He was pastor of the church in Princeton, N. J., from 15 Aug., 1833, till 26 April, 1817, and thence- forth of the Hampden Sidney college church till his death. His wife was a sister of Rev. Dr. Archibald Alexander. See "Discourse on the Death of Dr. Benjamin H. Rice," by the Rev. William E. Schenck (Philadelphia, 1856).

RICE, Edwin Wilbur, clergyman, b. in Kings- borough, N. Y., 24 July, 1831. He was graduated at Union college in 1854, studied law for one year, and then theology in Union theological seminary, New York city, taught in 1857-8, and became a missionary of the American Sunday-school union in 1859, receiving ordination as a Congregational minister in 1860. In 1854 he was made superin- tendent of the society's missions at Milwaukee, Wis., and in 1871 he became assistant secretary of missions and assistant editor of the periodicals of the union in Philadelphia. In 1882 he was editor of its periodicals and publications. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Union college in 1884. Dr. Rice conceived the idea of the series of lesson-papers that have been issued regularly since 1875, and edited all of these papers. He has also prepared since 1874 the "Scholar's Handbooks on the International Lessons," of which twenty-seven volumes have appeared down to 1888, and several have been translated into Dutch, Italian, Greek, and other languages. He has since 1871 edited the "Sunday-School World" and the "Youth's World," and since 1875 the "Union Companion" and "Quarterly." He contributed the geographical and topographical articles to Philip Schaff's "Bible Dictionary" (Philadelphia, 1875-1878), "Dictionary of the American and English Churches" (1881) and Paxton Hood's "Great Revival of the Eighteenth Century" (1882). His independent publications are "Pictorial Commentary on Mark" (1881); "Historical Sketch of Sunday-Schools" (1886); "People's Commentary on Matthew" (1887); "People's Lesson-Book on Matthew" (1892); and "A Commentary on the Book of Ezekiel." He was also the author of "Nugaments," a book of poems (1859).

RICE, George Edward, poet, b. in Boston, Mass., 19 July, 1822; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 10 Aug., 1861. He was graduated at Harvard in 1842, studied in the Harvard law-school, was ad- mitted to the bar, and practised his profession in Boston until, near the close of his life, he became insane. He contributed to the "North American Review," and other periodicals. Some of his poems, with others by John Howard Wainwright, were pub- lished anonymously in a volume entitled "Ephemer- a" (Boston, 1852). A fanciful adaptation of "Hamlet," under the title of "A New Play in an Old Garb," was published with illustrations (1852), and was acted with applause, as were two other plays which were published subsequently, entitled "The Folly of Forgetting," and "A Historic Fancy" (1844). He was also the author of "Nugaments," a book of poems (1859).

RICE, Harvey, poet, b. in Conway, Mass., 11 June, 1800; d. in Boston, 19 Jan., 1891. He was graduated at Williams, and removed to Ohio, where he opened a classical school, at the same time studying law. He was admitted to the bar and began practice in 1816. In 1828 he purchased a Democratic newspaper, which was called the "Independent News-Letter," and which has since been known as the Cleveland "Plaindealer." He was its editor in 1829, and in 1830 was the first Democrat that was elected to the legislature from Cleveland. In the same year he was appointed agent at Millersburg for the state of Ohio, and later, at the Ohio and Indiana general election in 1832, he was elected a member of the house of representatives. He was appointed clerk of the court of common pleas at Cleveland in 1833, and in 1834 and 1836 was the unsuccessful Democratic candidate for congress. In 1835 he was elected to the state sen- ate, and was the author of the bill for the recon- struction of the common-school system of Ohio, placing the school funds (1850) in the hands of the state, recognizing the expediency of school libraries. He received the degree of LL. D. from Williams in 1871. He had been a frequent contributor to magazines, and in 1848 published "Missionary Notes and Other Poems." In publishing "Natchez," New York, 1841. He had also published "Nature and Culture" (Boston, 1875); "Pioneers of the Western Reserve" (1883); "Select Poems" (1885); and "Sketches of Western Life" (1888).

RICE, Henry Mower, senator, b. in Whitfield, Va., 29 Nov., 1816; d. in San Antonio, Texas, 15 Jan., 1894. He emigrated to Michigan in 1853, and in 1859 went to Illinois, where he was appointed a commissioner of education and secretary of the Grand Trunk Railroad. He also served as a member of the Illinois legislature. In 1863, he moved to Texas, where he became a prominent leader in the struggle for statehood. He served as a member of the Texas legislature and was a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1868. He died in San Antonio, Texas.

RICE, Isaac Leopold, author, b. in Wachenheim, Bavaria, 22 Feb., 1850. He was brought to the United States in 1856, educated at Philadel-

RICE, James Clay, soldier, b. in Worthington, Mass., 27 Dec., 1829; d. near Spotsylvania Courthouse, Va., 11 May, 1861. He was a graduate of the U. S. military academy at West Point, N. Y., in 1851, and served in the Mexican War. He was a member of the 4th New York regiment, and was appointed its lieutenant-colonel. He became colo-

RICE, Luther, philanthropist, b. in Northborough, Mass., 25 March, 1783; d. in Edgefield district, S. C., 25 Sept., 1836. He spent three years at Leicester academy, paying his expenses by his own exertions. While he was at Williams college, which he entered in 1807, he became deeply interested in the subject of foreign missions. Through his instrumentality a society of inquiry on this subject was formed, a branch of which was organized about the same time at Andover seminary. At this seminary, where he became a student, he engaged with Judson, Mills, Newell, and others in bringing the missionary cause to the attention of the association of evangelical ministers in Massachusetts, urging the claims of the heathen upon their attention. The result of their efforts was the formation of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. Rice was not appointed with the first company of missionaries by the board, but, being intent upon going, was allowed to do so on condition that he should raise the money for his outfit and passage. This he did in a few days. He was ordained as a Congregational minister in Salem, Mass., 6 Feb., 1812, and sailed for India on the 18th in the packet "Harmony." Shortly after his arrival in India he united with the Baptists. His associates, Adamton Judson and his wife, had done the same thing a few weeks earlier.

RICE, Nathan Lewis, clergyman, b. in Garrard county, Ky., 29 Dec., 1807; d. in Chatham, Ky., 11 June, 1875. He was educated at Centre college, teaching Latin in the preparatory department, entered Princeton theological seminary in 1829, and was installed as pastor of the Presbyterian church at Bardstown, Ky., on 8 June, 1833. There he established and conducted a seminary for girls, and edited a paper called the "Western Protestant." After resigning his pastorate in 1841 he preached in Paris, Ky., where he held a private debate with the subject of baptism. The Baptists arranged for another debate, choosing Alexander Campbell as their champion. It took place in Lexington, Ky., and excited widespread interest throughout the west. On 12 Jan., 1845, he assumed charge of a church in Cincinnati, where he held public debates, taught candidates in its preparatory society, and wrote several volumes. In 1850 he held a memorable public discussion with Archbishop John B. Purcell on the doctrines of the Roman Catholic church. His activity was as great while filling a pastorate in St. Louis in 1853-7, where he edited the first, Louis Presbyterian. He was moderator of the general assembly at Nashville in 1855. On 20 Oct., 1857, he was installed as pastor of a church in Chicago, where he conducted the "Presbyterian Expositor," and in 1859-61 filled the chair of didactic theology in the theological seminary of the northwest. He entered on the pastorate of the Fifth avenue church in New York city on 29 April, 1861. His health soon began to decline, and on 16 April, 1867, he resigned his charge and retired to a farm near New Brunswick, N. J. After resting from intellectual work for more than a year, he assumed the presidency of Westminster college, Fulton, Mo., and in October, 1874, exchanged this post for the professorship of didactic and polemic theology in the theological seminary at Dunville, Ky., which he held till his death. His last work, "The meaning of "Baptism," was published, as were also debates with E. M. Pingree on "Universal Salvation" (Cincinnati, 1845) and with Jonathan Blanchard on "Slavery" (1845). He was the author of other works, mostly on polemic subjects, including "Romanism the Enemy of Free Institutions and of Christianity" (1851); "The Signs of the Times" (St. Louis, 1855); "Baptism: the Design, Mode, and Subjects" (1856); "Our Country and the Church" (1861); "Preach the Word, a Discourse" (New York, 1862); "The Pulpit: its Relations to Our National Crisis" (1862); and "Discourses" (1862).

RICE, Samuel Allen, soldier, b. in Penn Yan, N. Y., 27 Jan., 1828; d. in Oskaloosa, Iowa, 8 July, 1864. He was educated at the Ohio university and at Union college, where he graduated in 1849. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1852, and began practice at Oskaloosa, Iowa, where he was elected county attorney in 1853. In 1856 he was chosen attorney-general of Iowa, and in 1858 he was continued in that office for a second term. He entered the National army as colonel of the 55th Iowa volunteers, his commission dating from 10 Aug., 1862. For bravery at Helena, Ark., he was promoted brigadier-general of volunteers on 4 Aug., 1863, and served with credit through the campaigns of 1863-'4 in Arkansas until he was mortally wounded at Jenkins' Ferry, 29 April, 1864. His brother, Elliott Warren, soldier, b. in Pittsburg, Pa., 16 Nov., 1835; d. in Sioux City, Iowa, 22 June, 1887, was educated at Ohio university and Union law-school, admitted to the bar, and practised in Oskaloosa, Iowa. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the National army as a private, and first met the enemy at Belmont, Mo., 7 Nov., 1861. He served with his division, his general, his commission dating from 20 June, 1864, fought with distinction in the important battles of the southwest, and in Gen. William T. Sherman's campaign in Georgia and the Carolinas commanded a brigade in Gen. John M. Corse's division. He was brevetted major-general on 13 March, 1865, and mustered out on 24 Aug.

RICE, Thomas D., actor, b. in New York city, 20 May, 1808; d. there, 19 Sept., 1899. He was first apprenticed to a wood-carver in his native place, and received his early theatrical training as a supernumerary. Later he became a stockactor at several western play-houses. About 1832 he began his career in negro minstrelsy at the Pittsburg and Louisville theatres with success, repeating his performances to voluntary subscriptions, which were by some to crowded houses. In 1836 Rice went to England, where he made his début at the Surrey theatre in London. This was followed by prolonged engagements in the British capital and other large cities of the United Kingdom. On 18 June, 1857, he married, in London, Miss Gladstone, and soon afterward returned to his old home. He was for a long time the recipient of a large income, which was squandered in eccentric extravagance. In the days of his prosperity he wore a drest-coat with gauzes for buttons, and his vest-buttons were studded with diamonds. Rice's extraordinary career was suddenly brought to a close by paralysis, which destroyed the humor of his performances. For a short time in 1858 he was with Wood's minstrels, where his name stood for the shadow of an attraction. His life ended in poverty and suffering, and he was buried by subscription. Among his favorite entertainments were "Bone Squash Diavolo," a burlesque on "Fra Diavolo"; "Ghezzo," a burlesque tragedy; and the farces of "Jumbo Jam" and the "Virginia Mummy." He sang "Jim Jim," "Jumbo," "Joe," and "Squash Jim," as farces; "Othello," "The Devil's Stuart," and "Clare de Kitchen," all set off by grotesque dancing, were hummed and whistled throughout the land, and became equally popular beyond the ocean. Rice was, in reality, an accomplished genteel comedian, who elevated negro-minstrelsy to respectability. He was without forerunner or successor. Ethiopian comedy died with him.

RICE, Victor Moreau, educator, b. in Mayville, Chautauqua co., N. Y., 5 April, 1818; d. in Onesta, Madison co., N. Y., 17 Oct., 1866. He was graduated at Allegheny college in 1841, studied law, and was admitted to the bar, though he did not follow the profession. In 1845 he became a teacher of penmanship and of Latin in the schools of Buffalo, N. Y., and for some time was the editor of a journal named the "Tatara," which was afterward called the "Western Temperance Standard." He again became connected with the schools of Buffalo in 1846, and was elected superintendent of the city schools in 1852, and president of the State teachers' association in 1853. The legislature having created a department of internal instruction in 1854, Mr. Rice was elected the first state superintendent for three years. He was three re-elected, filling the office till 1856. In 1861 he was a mem-of the legislature, and served as chairman of the committee on schools. In 1861 he induced the legislature to abolish rates, making all the schools free. During his first term as superintendent he collected and collated the statutes relating to public instruction, and published them by legislative authority under the title of "Code of Public Instruction" (Albany, 1856). He published a "Special Report on the Present State of Education in the United States and Other Countries" (Albany, 1867).

RICE, William North, educator, b. in Marble- head, Mass., 21 Nov., 1845. He was graduated at Wesleyan in 1865, and then, devoting himself to the pursuit of natural history, studied at the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale University, and received the degree of Ph. D. In 1867 he was appointed professor of natural history and geology in Wesleyan, and after spending the first year on leave of absence, studying at the University of Berlin, he continued in the possession of that chair until 1894, when he became professor of geology in the same institution. He is a regularly ordained minister of the Methodist Episcopal church, and a member of the East New York conference, although he has never filled a pastorate. Prof. Rice has spent two of his summers in zoological work with the U. S. fish-commission at Portland, Me., and at Noank, Conn., and was engaged in geological and zoological investigations in the Bermuda islands during the winter of 1876-7. He is at present professor of Science in New York Wesleyan University, in charge of the advancement of science, and a member of other scientific societies, and in 1886 received the degree of LL. D. from Syracuse university. Prof. Rice has published articles in scientific, religious, and other periodicals, chiefly on points in geology and its cognate sciences, and on the relations of science and religion. His works include "Twenty-five Years of Scientific Progress in New York," 1851, and he has edited Dana's "Text-Book of Geology" (1897).

RICH, Charles Alonzo, architect, b. in Beverly, Mass., 22 Oct., 1835. He was graduated at the Chandler scientific department of Dartmouth in 1853, and subsequently devoted his attention to the study of architecture, spending 1858-59 in Europe for that purpose. On his return he settled in New York, and was engaged in practice with Hugh Lamb. The firm has gained a good reputation among those who stand high in the recent development of American architecture. Among the many great buildings that they have designed are the Mount Morris bank in Harlem, the upper part of which is used for apartments, the Astral Flats in Greenpoint, the Pratt industrial institute, Brooklyn, and the East Orange opera-house, as well as many private residences in New York city.

RICH, Isaac, merchant, b. in Welfleet, Barnstable co., Mass., in 1801; d. in Boston, Mass., 13 Jan., 1872. He was of humble parentage, as the age of fourteen assisted his father in the care of a fish-stall in Boston, and afterward had an oyster-stall in Fanueil hall. In the course of years he became a successful fish-dealer, and subsequently a millionaire, gave largely to educational and charitable institutions, and, in addition to numerous bequests, left the greater part of his estate, appraised at $1,000,000, to the trustees of the Boston Wesleyan university.

RICH, Obadiah, bibliophile, b. in Truro, Mass., 24 Nov., under the London England, 20 Jan., 1830. He went to Spain in early years, served as U. S. consul in Valencia from 1816 till 1820, residing at Madrid, and as consul in Port Mahon from 1834 till 1835. He gathered a large collection of rare books and manuscripts relating to the early settlement and history of America, which he took to London, and constantly gave the benefit of his time and scholarship to artists and collectors. He compiled many valuable catalogues, which command high prices, and are of service to the historian and bibliophile. Among these are: A Catalogue of Books relating principally to America, arranged under the Years in which they were printed, 1500-1700 (London, 1832); "Catalogue of Miscellaneous Books in all Languages" (1834); "Bibliotheca Americana" or, a Catalogue of Books in Various Languages, relating to America, printed since the Year 1700" (2 vols, London and New York, 1835); "American Novels" (2 vols, London, 1846); and "List of the "Biblio- theca Americana Vetus," the manuscript of which was accidentally left in a hackney-coach and lost. George Ticknor, William H. Prescott, and George Bancroft testify to Mr. Rich's knowledge and valuable service, and Washington Irving, in a letter under-date of 17 Sept., 1857, says: "He was one of the most indefatigable, intelligent, and successful bibliographers in Europe. This house at Madrid was a literary wilderness, abounding with curious works and rare editions, in the midst of which he lived and moved and had his being, and in the midst of which I passed many months while employed on my work. . . . He was withal a man of great truthfulness and simplicity of character, of an amiable and obliging disposition, and strict integrity." After his death his son continued the business. Their stock of books finally passed into the possession of Edward G. Allen, of London, who issued a series of catalogues. There have been several auction sales of books in London purporting to be selections from the stock of Obadiah Rich, and it is believed that his collection has been dispersed.

RICHARD, Gabriel, clergyman, b. in Saintes, France, 15 Oct., 1664; d. in Detroit, Mich., 13 Sept., 1832. He was related, on his mother's side, to Bossuet, bishop of Meaux. After receiving his preliminary education in the college of his native town, he entered the seminary of Angers in 1784, received minor orders in 1755, and, to qualify himself to become a member of the Jansenist society, he resided at Paris and was one of the leaders of that party. In 1769 he was ordained priest in 1791. He taught mathematics in the college at Issy till April, 1792, when he embarked for the United States in company with Dr. Marechal, afterward bishop of Baltimore. He engaged in missionary work in Illinois, and in 1798 was transferred to Detroit. His jurisdiction extended over the region that is now embraced in the states of Michigan and Wisconsin. He opened a school in Detroit in 1804, but the fire of the following year swept away this and other buildings that he had erected. In 1807 he was invited by the governor of the territory and other Protestant gentlemen to preach to them in the English language, as there was at the time no Protestant clergyman in Detroit. He accordingly held meetings every Sunday at noon in the council house, where he delivered instructions on the general principles on which all Christians are agreed. He established a printing-press in Detroit—the first in the territory—and began the publication of a journal in French, entitled the "Essais du Michigan," in 1808. The irregularity of the mails led to the discussion of all sorts of topics, but he confined his works of piety, controversy, and patriotism from his press, which was for several years the only one in Michigan. His advocacy of American principles and his denunciation of the British at the beginning of the war of 1812 excited great indignnation in Canada, and he was soon afterward seized and imprisoned at Sandwich until the close of the war, but was allowed to labor among the Indian allies of the English, and he saved several American prisoners from torture and death. On his return to Michigan he founded the people in destitution, and collected money with which he purchased provisions for all that were in need. In 1817 he became a member of the Board of School Affairs, which was consecrated in 1819. In 1823 he was elected delegate to congress from the territory of Michigan, being the first Roman Catholic priest to receive this honor. He soon won the esteem of the members, especially of Henry Clay, who, when the abbe did not make his meaning clear, owing to his defective knowledge of English, frequently repeated his arguments to the house. He obtained aid from the Federal government in opening routes, building bridges and quays, and for other works of public utility. He was again a candidate in 1826, but failed of re-election, and then engaged in a great many plans, most of which he was not able to realize for want of resources. He built several churches, established Indian schools at Green Bay, Arbo Creek and St. Ignace, and Sieard's method of teaching the deaf and dumb, and delivered lectures in the normal school of Detroit, but he was never able to open the asylum that he projected. He was about to lay the foundation of a college at the beginning of the epidemic of Asiatic cholera in 1832. During its prevalence for three months he was almost constantly on his feet night and day, until he was prostrated by the disease on 9th Sept. See a life of him by Louis Guérin, entitled "Le martyr de la charité" (Paris, 1850).

RICHARD, Louis François (1771-1843), West Indian physician, b. in the island of St. Martin in 1771; d. in New Orleans, La., in 1843. He studied in New Orleans, and was for many years a marine surgeon. In 1799 he became president of the board of health of French Guiana, and performed remarkable experiments on yellow fever, even sleeping in beds of persons that were affected with the disease, and inoculating himself with their virus. In 1803 he was sent to Louisiana to study the effects of yellow fever; but he was attacked by the disease and died in New Orleans. His works, which were in French, and comprise valuable observations on medicine, include "Recherches générales sur les causes et les moyens de la répugnance causée par les fevres endémiques, et les fevres endémiques (Paris, 1803);" "Traité des simples et des poissons des Indiens" (1803); "Monographie de la fièvre jaune" (1806); and "De la contagion de la fièvre jaune" (1807), in which the author defends the theory that yellow fever is contagious.

RICHARDS, William, educator, b. in New Canaan, Conn., 29 Oct., 1795; d. in Auburn, N. Y., 2 Aug., 1843. He was descended from Samuel Richards, a Welshman, who settled near Stanford, Conn. After studying at Yale in 1799, he taught at Farmington, Conn. He then projected a medical course under Dr. Timothy Dwight in Greenfield, Conn., and was licensed to preach in 1803. He served in the 1st Presbyterian church of Morris-town, N. J., from 1799 till 1805, when he became its pastor, and in 1809 was charged with the Presbyterian church of Newark, N. J. In 1823 he became professor of theology in Auburn theological seminary, which chair he held until his death. He was a trustee of Princeton college and seminary, and received the degree of A. M. from Yale in 1804, and that of D. D. in 1815. A selection of his "Lectures" was published, with a memoir, by the Rev. Samuel H. Grindley (New York, 1846), and a volume of his sermons, with an essay on his character, by the Rev. William B. Syninger (Allan, 1849).

RICHARDS, John William, clergyman, b. at Reading, Pa., 18 April, 1806; d. there, 27 Jan., 1854. His father, Matthias Richards, was for many years an associate judge of the courts in Berks county, and his mother was a daughter of Henry Melcher Muhlenberg. He received his classical training in the academy in his native place, began his theological course under his father, Dr. Henry A. Muhlenberg, in 1811, and in 1824 was licensed by the ministerium of Pennsylvania, with which body he was connected until his death, and in which he held many posts of honor and trust. He

She and the sanitary science were reared, in 1860, in Massachusetts and Vermont. In December, 1819, his wife, Henrietta, a frequent preacher and a forcible writer. His publications include: "The Fruitful Retrospect," a sermon preached at Trappe at the centenary celebration of the laying of the cornerstone of the church (Pottstown, Pa., 1843); and "The Walk about Zion," a sermon delivered at the close of his pastorate (Easton, 1851). Among his unpublished manuscripts is the translation of a large part of "Hallesche Nachrichten," a work published in two volumes (Halle, 1851), which is the primary source of American Lutheran history.—His son, Matthias Henry, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 17 June, 1841, was graduated at Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1865, and at the theological seminary there in 1864, and in the latter year was ordained to the ministry. He has been successively tutor at Pennsylvania college, in 1863-5, pastor at South Tryon, Pa., in 1865-6, and at Greenwich, N.Y., in 1865-8, professor of the English language and literature in Muhlenberg college in 1868-73, pastor at Indianapolis, Ind., in 1873-6, and again professor in Muhlenberg college since 1876, and secretary of the faculty. He has delivered a large number of lectures, and is a frequent contributor to periodicals. Since 1878 he has been editor of "Church Lessons," and as "Helper" (Philadelphia), and since 1886 the managing editor of the "Church Messenger" at Allentown. Of his numerous sermons, addresses, and other literary productions that have appeared in the various periodicals of the church, only three poems have been published separately in pamphlet-form, and "Church Lessons" (Philadelphia, 1878-86).

RICHARDS, Maria Tolman, author, b. in Dorchester, Mass., 8 Oct., 1821. Her maiden name was Tolman. After graduation at the Female seminary in Townsend, Mass., she married, in 1842, the Rev. Samuel Richards, who held pastorates in Eldgatt, Mass., and Providence, R.I. For seven years they conducted in the latter city a school for girls, which was closed, according to the impaired health of Mrs. Richards. His death occurred in 1883. Mrs. Richards has been identified with various departments of philanthropic and missionary work, having served as president of the Rhode Island branch of the Woman's Baptist home mission society and of the Rhode Island branch of the Woman's national Indian aid association, and as a trustee of Hartshorn's memorial college, Richmond, Va. She has given courses of lectures on English and biblical literature in several cities, and is the author of "Life in Judea, or Glimpses of the First Christian Age" (Philadelphia, 1854), and "Life in Israel." (New York, 1857).

RICHARDS, Robert Hallowell, metallurgist, b. in Gardiner, Me., 20 Aug., 1844. He was graduated at Massachusetts institute of technology in 1865, and was an assistant there until 1871, when he was chosen to the chair of mineralogy, and now holds the professorship of mining and metallurgy. His introduction of laboratory methods into the teaching of mining and metallurgy has been the great work of his life. Prof. Richards has invented a jet aspirator for chemical and physical laboratory operations for use in the Lake Superior copper-mills (1883). During 1886 he was president of the American institute of mining engineers, and he is a member of various other scientific societies. He has devoted his attention largely to improved metallurgical processes, especially in copper, on which he is an accepted authority. His papers on that subject have been contributed to the "Transactions of the American Institute of Mining Engineers," but his earlier publications tended more to chemistry and mineralogy and appeared in the "American Journal of Science." His wife, Ellen Henrietta, chemist, b. in Dunstable, Mass., 3 Dec., 1842, was graduated at Vassar in 1870, and at Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1873. She continued at the institution as resident graduate, and married Prof. Richards in 1875. In 1878 she was made instructor in chemistry and mineralogy in the Woman's laboratory of the institute, and in 1885 she became instructor in sanitary chemistry. Mrs. Richards has obtained deserved recognition as a chemist by her original investigations in that science. Her special work has been that of education, and her influence in developing scientific studies among women has been large. The application of chemical principles and knowledge to the better conduction of the home is one of her chosen fields, and she has shown in this subject to women she is probably the pioneer in this country. Mrs. Richards was the first of her sex to be elected a member of the American institute of mining engineers, and she is a member of several other scientific bodies. In addition to various chemical papers, she has published "Chemistry of Cooking and Cleaning" (Boston, 1882); "Food Materials and their Adulterations" (1883); "First Lessons in Minerals" (1885); and with Marion Talbot edited "Home Sanitation" (1887).

RICHARDS, William, missionary, b. in Plainfield, Mass., 22 Aug., 1792; d. in Honolulu, 7 Dec., 1847. After graduation at Williams in 1819, and at Amherst theological seminary in 1822, he was ordained, and on 19 Nov., 1822, embarked as a missionary to the Sandwich islands. In 1828 he became councillor, chaplain, and interpreter to the king, and after the recognition of the independence of the islands by foreign powers was sent as ambassador to England, and to other courts. On his return to Honolulu in 1845 he was appointed minister of public instruction.

RICHARDS, Sir William Buell, Canadian judge, b. in Brockville, Ont., 2 May, 1815; d. in Ottawa, Ont., 26 Jan., 1889. He entered parliament in 1848, and became a member of the executive council in 1851. He was appointed queen's counsel in 1850, puisne judge of the court of common pleas of Ontario in 1857, and chief justice of that court in 1865. Judge Richards became chief justice of Ontario in 1869, arbitrator for that province in the matter of the northwestern boundary in 1874, and chief justice of the supreme court of Canada in 1878. He was deputy to the governor-general of Canada in 1876 and in 1878, was knighted in 1877, and received the confederation medal in 1885.—His brother, Albert Norton, Canadian lawyer, b. in Brockville, Ont., 8 Dec., 1822, after re-receiving his education at the district-school of Johnstown, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Upper Canada in 1848. He was created queen's counsel in 1853, entered parliament, and was a member of the executive council of Canada, and solicitor-general for Upper Canada. In 1856-7 he sat in the Canadian assembly as a representative from South Leeds. He accompanied William McDougall to the northwest as attorney-general in the provisional government in 1869, and for several years was land agent of the Dominion government in British Columbia. He was lieutenant-governor of that province from 1875 till 1881.

RICHARDS, William Carey, author, b. in London, Eng., Feb. 16, 1827. His father removed to this country in 1831, and the son was graduated at Madison university in 1849. He then went to the south, and for ten years was engaged in educational and literary work in Georgia. In 1849 he removed to Charleston, S. C., where he resided for two years. During his life in the south he edited the "Orion" magazine and "The School-fellow." In 1852 he returned to the north, and soon afterward entered the ministry. In 1855 he became associate pastor of the Ist Baptist church in Providence, R. I. From 1855 till 1862 he was pastor of the Brown street Baptist church in the same city, and he subsequently ministered to churches in Pittsfield, Mass., in 1863-9, and Chicago, Ill., in 1869. For two years he has given public lectures in the United States and Canada on the popular aspects of physical science, illustrated by an extensive apparatus. He has received the honorary degree of Ph. D. Prof. Richards has contributed frequently to magazines, and is the author of several college and anniversary poems. His principal works are: Shakespeare's "Cabinet" dramatic criticism, "Literary Life and Philosophy at Home" (1854); "Electron" (1878); "Science in Song" (1865); "Great in Goodness, a Memoir of George N. Briggs, Governor of Massachusetts" (Boston, 1866); "Baptist Banquets" (Chicago, 1878); "The Lord is My Shepherd" (1854); "The Mountain Anthem" (1855); and "Our Father in Heaven" (Boston, 1860).—His wife, Cornelia Revere, daughter of N. V. X., 1 Nov., 1822, after graduation at New Hampton literary and theological institute, married Dr. Richards on 21 Sept., 1841. She has written under the pen-name of Mrs. Manners, and is the author of "At Home and Abroad, or How to Behave" (New York, 1853); "Pleasure and Profit, or Lessons on the Lord's Prayer" (1855); "Aspiration, an Autobiography" (1856); "Sleigh-aksi, or Home Lessons" (1857); "Hester and I, or Beware of Worldliness" (1860); "Springs of Adon" (1863); and "Cousin Alice," a memoir of her sister, Alice B. Haven (1857).—His brother, Thomas Addison, artist, b. in London, England, 3 Dec., 1820, came to the United States at the age of eleven, and from 1838 till 1845 resided in Georgia. Thence he went to New York, where for the next two years he was a pupil at the National academy. He was elected an associate of the academy in 1848, and an academiciain in 1851. In 1852 he became its corresponding secretary, which post he held until 1892. In 1858-60 he was director of the Cooper union school of design for women, being the first to fill the office. Since 1867 he has been professor of art in the university of the city of New York, which gave him the honorary degree of M. A. in 1878. He has resided in New York since 1815, but has travelled much, both at home and abroad. His numerous paintings include "Alastor, or the Spirit of Solitude," and "The Indian's Paradise—a Dream of the Happy Hunting Ground" (1854); "Live Oaks of the South" (1858); "The French Broad River, N. C." (1859); "Sunnside" (1862); "The River Rhine" and "Warwick Castle" (1869); "Chatsworth, England" (1870); "Lake Thun, Switzerland" (1871); "Italian Lake Scene" (1873); "Lake in the Adirondacks" (1855); "Lake Winnipesaukee" (1876); "Lake Brienz, Switzerland" (1879); and "The Edisto River, S. C." (1886). He is also well known as an author and illustrator of books, and has published "The American Artist" (Baltimore, 1838); "Georgia Illustrated" (Augusta, 1842); "The Romance of American Landscape" (1854); "Summer Stories of the South" (Charleston, S. C., 1852); and "Picturesque America." Most of these he furnished both text and illustrations. He was also engaged on Appleton's "Handbooks of Travel."

RICHARDS, William Trost, artist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 Nov., 1833. He had some instruction from Paul Weber, and in 1855 went abroad, remaining about a year. In 1867 he visited Paris, and in 1875 he went again to Europe. During 1878-80 he had a studio in London, and exhibited at the Royal academy and the Grosvenor gallery. Mr. Richards has had his studio in Philadelphia for many years, and is an associate of the Pennsylvania academy, and an honorary member of the National academy and the American watercolor society. He gained a medal at Philadelphia in 1876, and the Temple silver medal in 1881. In his earlier years he was a pronounced pre-Raphaelite, and all of his paintings show a masterly treatment of detail. Of late years his attention has been especially directed to marine painting. Among his works in oil are "Tulip Trees" (1859); "Midsummer" (1862); "Woods in June" (1864); "Mid- Ocean" (1879); "The Mountainside" (1872); "Sea and Sky" (1757); "Land's End" (1858); "Old Ocean's Gray and Melancholy Waste" (1861); and "February" and "A Summer Sea" (1887). His work in water-colors has become widely known, and includes "Cedars on the Sea-Shore" (1873); "Paradise, Newport" (1875); "Sand-Hills, Coast, N. J." (1879); "King Arthur's Castle, Tintagel, Cornwall" (1883); "The seals of the Tintagel, Cornwall" (1882); "The Unresting Sea" (1877); "Cliffs of Morn, Land's End" (1859); "A Summer Afternoon" (1886); and "Cliffs of St. Columb" and "A Break in the Storm" (1887). In the Metropolitan museum, New York, there are forty-seven of his landscapes and marine views in water-colors. His "On the Coast of New Jersey" is in the Corcoran gallery, Washington.

RICHARDSON, Albert Deane, journalist, b. in Franklin, Mass., 6 Oct., 1833; d. in New York city, 2 Dec., 1869. He was educated at the district school of his native village and at Holliston academy. At eighteen years of age he went to Pittsburg, Pa., where he formed a newspaper connection, wrote a farce for Barney Williams, and appeared a few times on the stage. In 1857 he went to Kansas, taking an active part in the political struggle of the territory, attending anti-slavery meetings, making speeches, and corresponding about the issues of the hour with the Boston "Journal." He was also secretary of the territorial legislature. Two years later he went to Pike's peak, the gold fever being at its height, in company with Horace Greeley, between whom and Richardson a lasting friendship was formed. In the autumn of 1859 he made a journey through the southwestern territories, and sent accounts of his wanderings to eastern journals. During the winter that preceded the civil war he volunteered to go through the south as secret correspondent of the "Tribune," and returned, after many narrow escapes, just before the firing on Sumter. He next entered the field as war correspondent, and for years alternated between Virginia and the south-west, being present at many battles. On the night of 3 May, 1863, he undertook, in company with Junius Henri Browne, a fellow-correspondent of the "Tribune," and Richard T. Colburn, of the New York "World," to run the batteries of Vicksburg on two barges, which were lashed to a steam-tug. After they had been under fire for more than an hour, a large shell struck the tug, and bursting in the furnace, threw the coals on the barges and set them on fire. Out of 34 men, 18 were killed or wounded and 16 were captured, the correspondents among them. The Confederate government would neither release nor exchange the "Tribune" men, who, after spending eighteen months in seven southern prisons, escaped from Salisbury, N. C., in the dead of winter, and, walking 400 miles, arrived within the National lines at Strawberry Plains, Tenn., several months before the close of the war. They had had charge of the hospitals at Salisbury, where a dreadful mortality prevailed, and brought with them a complete list, so far as procurable, of the deaths there, which they printed in the "Tribune," furnishing the only information that friends and relatives in the north had. Richardson's death was the result of a pistol-shot fired by Daniel McFarland in the "Tribune" office on 26 Nov., 1869. McFarland had lived unhappily with his wife, who had obtained a divorce and was engaged to marry Mr. Richardson. A few days before his death they were married, the ceremony being performed by the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Richardson's first wife had died while he was engaged on the "Tribune." The last four years of his life were passed in lecturing, travel, and writing. He published "The Field, the Dungeon, and the Escape" (Hartford, 1865); "Beyond the Mississippi" (1869); and "A Personal History of Ulysses S. Grant" (1868), all of which sold largely. A collection of his miscellaneous writings, with a memoir by his widow, Abby Sage Richardson, was printed under the title "The Papers of the W. C. Richardson" (1871).--M. R.

RICHARDSON, Charles Francis, author, b. in Hallowell, Me., 29 May, 1851. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1871, and was editorially connected with the "Independent" in New York city in 1872-8, with the "Sunday-School Times" in Philadelphia in 1878-80, and with "Good Literature," New York city, in 1880-2. Since 1882 he has been professor of the Anglo-Saxon and English language and literature at Dartmouth. His publications include "A Primer of American Literature" (Boston, 1876); "The Cross," a volume of poems (Philadelphia, 1879); "The Choice," a volume of poems (Boston, 1881); and "American Literature" (2 vols., 1887-8).

RICHARDSON, Edmund, merchant, b. in Caswell county, N. C., 28 June, 1818; d. in Jackson, Miss., 11 June, 1886. He attended a common school for several terms, became a clerk in a store in Danville, Va., and at sixteen years of age settled in Jackson, Miss., where he gradually engaged in cotton-planting, shipping, and manufacturing to a large extent. At the close of the civil war he was bankrupt, but he successfully engaged in business again, and became the largest cotton-planter in the world. His fortune was estimated at from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000, and he was the owner of forty cotton-plantations in Louisiana. He was chairman of the board of management of the New Orleans centennial exposition in 1884-5, and gave $25,000 toward pavilions at the fair.

RICHARDSON, Edward, mariner, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1780; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 6 April, 1876. He was a fireman, and for many years was captain of a line of packet ships that plied between New York and Liverpool. He organized the Marine temperance society in 1833, and lived to see 52,000 names signed to its pledge. He retired from sea service about 1857, for several years was superintendent in the New York seamen's home, and was a vice-president of the New York port society. At the age of seventy-three he organized the Water street and Dover street missions for sailors, established day- and Sunday-schools in that vicinity, and was active in religious meetings for seamen and the residents of those streets. Much of his latter life was devoted to the welfare of the poor of New York and Brooklyn.

RICHARDSON, Henry Hobson, architect, b. in Priestley's Point, St. James parish, La., 29 Sept., 1838; d. in Brookline, Mass., 28 April, 1886. His father, Henry D. Richardson, was a planter of American birth, but his father ancestors were Scotchmen, who had moved to England before the family came to this country. His mother was Catherine Caroline Priestley, a granddaughter of Dr. Joseph Priestley. He was at first intended for West Point and the army, but the death of his father changed his plans, and he was graduated at Harvard in 1859. His college career was not remarkable for proficiency or promise; but after his graduation he went to Paris, where he began the study of architecture, and at once developed remarkable powers and capacity for work. The loss of his property during the civil war obliged him to serve in an architect's office for his support while he was pursuing his studies. In 1865 he returned to this country and became a partner of Charles D. Gambrill in the firm of Gambrill and Richardson. His earliest buildings were in Springfield, Mass., where the railroad offices and the Agawam bank at once gave evidence of his power. The Church of the Unity in the same city is a Gothic building, and quite unlike the ecclesiastical structures of his later years. It presents its character from its great central tower, which, both within and without, is the feature of its architecture. Before he had done with Trinity, Mr. Richardson was already at work upon the Cheney buildings at Hartford, Conn., and not much later on the Memorial library at North Easton, the public library at Woburn, and the state capitol at Albany, on which last building he was employed for many years, in connection with Leopold Edlitz and Frederick Law Olmsted, to carry forward the work which had been begun by others. These buildings and others, which belong to the same period, show the full ripeness of his powers. They have the qualities that belong to the future work—breadth and simplicity, the disposition to produce effect rather by the power of great mass and form than by elaboration of detail, the free use of conventional types and models, and a freshness and variety that spring from sympathetic feeling of the meaning and necessities of each new structure. A freely treated R took many forms within the compass of all his style, and was well suited to his own exuberant but solid and substantial nature. His influence began to be felt very soon and very widely. Without any effort or desire to create a school, he drew about him a large number of young men, on whom the impress that he made was very strong. After he came from New York to Brookline, in the neighborhood of Boston, about 1855, his house and working-rooms were throned with students and alive with work. There he prepared his plans for Sever Hall and Austin Hall at Harvard; for libraries at Quincy, Maiden, and Burlington; for railroad-stations along the Boston and Albany and other roads; for the cathedral at Albany, which, however, was not given to him to build; for the Albany custom-house; for dwellings in West Roxbury and Boston; for the two great buildings that he left unfinished at his death, the Board of trade in Cincinnati and the court-house in Pittsburg, Pa.; for great warehouses in Boston and Chicago; and for other structures of many sorts throughout the land. The result of them all has been a strengthening and ennobling of the character and taste of the city which must always mark an epoch in its history. Mr. Richardson was a man of fascinating intelligence and social power. He died in the midst of his work, although his last ten years were a long, brave, cheerful fight with feeble health and constant suffering. His life has been written, in an illustrated quarto, by Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer. Richardson, Israel Bush, soldier, b. in Fairfax, Va., 26 Dec., 1815; d. in Sharpsburg, Md., 3 Nov., 1862. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1841, entered the 3d infantry, and served through the Florida war. He became 1st lieutenant in 1846, participated in the principal battles of the Mexican war, and received the brevets of captain and major for gallantry at Contreras, Churubusco, and Chapultepec. His coolness in action won him the name of "fighting Dick" in the army. He became captain in 1851, resigned in 1853, and settled on a farm near Pontiac, Mich. At the beginning of the civil war he was appointed colonel of the 3d Michigan regiment, and when he reported with his regiment in Washington, D. C., Gen. Winfield Scott greeted him with "I'm glad to have my 'fighting Dick' with me again." A few days afterward he was placed at the head of a brigade with which he covered the retreat of the army at Bull Run, his commission of brigadier-general of volunteers dating from 12 May, 1861. He commanded a division of Gen. Edward V. Sumner's corps at the battle of the Chickahominy, where he acted with great gallantry, became major-general of volunteers, 4 July, 1862, was engaged at the second battle of Bull Run, at South Mountain, and Antietam, receiving fatal wounds in the latter fight. He was a direct descendant of Israel Putnam, Richardson, James, clergyman, b. in Durham, Mass., in 1817; d. in Washington, D. C., 10 Nov., 1863. He was graduated at Harvard in 1837, and during his course aided in collecting Thomas Carlyle's "Miscellanies," which were published under Ralph Waldo Emerson's supervision, Boston, 1836. He afterward became a clerk of a county court, taught in New Hampshire, and was principal of a school near Providence, R. I. He was graduated at the Harvard divinity-school in 1845, ordained in Southington, Conn., and in 1847 became pastor of the Unitarian society in Haverhill, Mass. He took charge of the church in Rochester, N. Y., in 1856, but was compelled by the failure of his health to resign in 1859, and returned to his former home in New Hampshire. He continued his labors in that State for many years, and constantly contributed to the press. During the civil war his services were given to the hospitals in Washington, D. C. He published several discourses, which include two farewell sermons at Southington, Conn. (Boston, 1847). Richardson, Sir John, Scottish naturalist, b. in Dumfries, Scotland, 3 Jan., 1787; d. near Lochmaben, Scotland, 1865. In 1820 he was appointed librarian of the medical department of the University of Edinburgh, entered the navy as assistant surgeon in 1807, and was at the taking of Copenhagen. He was surgeon and naturalist to Sir John Franklin in his arctic expeditions in 1819-22 and 1825-7, and in the latter, with one detachment of the party, explored the coast east of Mackenzie river to the mouth of Coppermine river. He commanded one of the three expeditions that went in search of Sir John Franklin in 1848, and returned in November, 1849. He retired from the navy in 1855. His most important work is the "Fauna Boreali-Americana," in which he was assisted by William Swainson and William Kirby (4 vols., London, 1829-35). He also wrote the author of "Skeuophiles," his "Dedication," and "A Journal of Boat Voyage through Rupert's Land" (2 vols., 1851), and "The Polar Regions" (Edinburgh, 1861). See his Life" by the Rev. John McIlraith (1868). Richardson, John, Canadian author, b. near Niagara Falls, Ont., in 1797; d. in the United States about 1865. He served in the Canadian forces during the war of 1812, and took part as a captain on the American side at the battle of the Thames. After his liberation he entered the British army, and served in Spain, attaining the rank of major. He subsequently resided for several years in Paris, and engaged in literary work. On his return to Canada, in 1840, he established at Brockville, Ont., the New Era, which contained the first of his books to begin to publish a Kingston, Ont., "The Native Canadian." He afterward removed to the United States, continued his literary work, and wrote for the press till his death. Though he was a prolific writer, he does not rank high as an author. His novels are deficient in interest, and his histories are inaccurate. Among other works he published, "Essai, or the Salons of Paris" (New York, 1852); "Wacousta, or the Prophecy," (1833); RICHARDSON, John, Fran., educator, b. in Vernon, Orange, N. J., 1 Feb., 1808; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 10 Feb., 1868. On his graduation from Madison university in 1835 he was made tutor and then professor of Latin, which place he held till 1850. He accepted in that year the same chair in Rochester university, continuing in this relation until his death. Professor Richardson believed he had discovered the true pronunciation of the Latin language in the ancient Romans and in the face of much opposition taught it to his pupils. It has since been adopted by many of the foremost educators. He published "Roman Orthoepy: a Plea for the Restoration of the True System of Latin Pronunciation" (New York, 1859), for which he received an autograph letter of thanks from William E. Gladstone.

RICHARDSON, John Smythe, jurist, b. in Sumter district, S. C., 11 April, 1777; d. in Charleston, S. C., 8 May, 1850. He was educated in Charleston, studied law under John J. Pringle, and was admitted to the bar in 1799. While he was a member of the legislature in 1810 he was the author of the general suffrage bill, which became a part of the state constitution, and was subsequently revised and signed by the state attorney-general. He was appointed law judge in 1818, declined the nomination of the Republican party for congress in 1820, and in 1841 became president of the law court of appeals. He succeeded David Johnson as president of the court of errors in 1846, and the next year successfully defended himself in an attempt to legislate him out of the office on account of his alleged inability to perform his judicial duties.—His son, John Smythe, congressman, b. in Sumter district, S. C., 29 Feb., 1828, was graduated at the College of South Carolina in 1850, admitted to the bar in 1852, and, while practising his profession, also engaged in planting. He served in the Confederate army throughout the civil war, attained the rank of colonel, and, while commander of the department of the Mississippi, was promoted to major-general. He subsequently participated in the defence of Charleston, was made a prisoner of war at its fall, and sent to St. Augustine. Lord Cornwallis made fruitless efforts to win him over to the royalist cause. His health falling from confinement, he was sent home, but died soon afterward. Col. Varlebon subsequently buried his horses and destroyed his papers. —His grandson, John Peter, statesman, b. at Hickory Hill, Sumter district, S. C., 14 April, 1801; d. in Fulton, S. C., 21 Jan., 1864, was the son of James, who was governor of South Carolina in 1802-4. John was graduated at the College of South Carolina in 1819, admitted to the bar at Fulton in 1821, and extensively engaged in planting. He served in the legislature in 1824-30, steadily opposed nullification, and was an active member of the Union party. He was chosen to congress as a Democrat in 1836 to succeed Richard Manning, served till March, 1839, and was governor of South Carolina in 1840-2. He then returned to the practice of his profession, in which he continued until his death. He was a delegate to the southern convention at Washington in 1832, and a member of the Southern rights association in 1851, and a member of the South Carolina convention in 1860, in which he opposed secession.

RICHARDSON, William Adams, jurist, b. in Tisbury, Mass., 2 Nov., 1821; d. in Washington, 19 Oct., 1896. He was graduated at Harvard, and in the law department there, was licensed to practice, and was judge-advocate and governor's aid in Massachusetts. He was president of the common council of Lowell in 1855-6, of the Wamesett bank, and of the Mechanics' association. He was appointed to revise the statutes of Massachusetts in 1855, and subsequently chosen by the legislature to edit the annual supplements of the general stautes, which he continued to do for twenty-two years. He became judge of probate in 1856, and was judge of probate and insolvency from 1858 till 1872. He declined a superior court judgeship in 1860, and the same year became assistant secretary of the U. S. treasury. He went to Europe as a financial agent of the government in 1871 to negotiate for the sale of the funded loan of the United States, and made the first contract abroad for the sale of the bonds. He became secretary of the treasury in 1873, resigning in 1874 to accept a seat on the bench of the U. S. court of claims, of which he became chief justice in 1883. In 1863-4 he was an overseer of Harvard, and he was lecturer and professor in Georgetown law-school, D. C. Columbia university gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1873. His publications include "The Banking Laws of Massachusetts" (Lowell, 1855), "Supplement to the General Statutes of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts," with George P. Sanger (Boston, 1860-82); "Practical Information concerning the Debt of the United States" (Washington, D. C., 1872); and "National Banking Laws" (1872); and he prepared and edited a "Supplement to the Revised Statutes of the United States" (1881); and "History of the Court of Claims" (1882-5).

RICHARDSON, William Alexander, senator, b. in Canterbury, Ky., 11 Oct., 1811; d. in Quay Co., Ill., 27 Dec., 1885. He was born in Transylvania, came to the bar at nineteen years of age, and settled in Illinois. He became state attorney in 1835, was in the legislature several terms, serving as its speaker, and was a presidential elector on the Polk and Dallas ticket in 1844. He entered the U. S. army as captain of an Illinois company of dragoons, and was promoted major for gallantry at Buena Vista. He was chosen as congressman as a Democrat in 1846, served in 1847-56, when he resigned, and in 1863 was chosen U. S. senator to fill the unexpired term of Stephen A. Douglas. He was a delegate to the New York Democratic convention in 1868, but after that date retired from public life.

RICHARDSON, William Merchant, jurist, b. in Pelham, N. H., 4 Jan., 1774; d. in Chester, N. H., 3 March, 1838. He was graduated at Harvard in 1797, studied law, and settled in Groton, Mass. He was elected to congress as a Federalist in 1811, and served one year, when he resigned and removed to Portsmouth. He was at once appointed chief justice of New Hampshire, and discharged the duties of that office for twenty-two years. He was a jurist of great industry, talent, and information, and was highly regarded for his inflexible integrity. Dartmouth gave him the degree of LL. D. He is the author of the "New Hampshire Justice" (Concord, 1824) and "The Town Officer" (1824) and was co-editor of the "New Hampshire Superior Court Cases," of which the reports of several volumes were published in 1861-73. See his "Life." (Concord, 1869).

RICHÉ, George Inman, educator, b. in Philadelphia, 21 Jan., 1833. He was graduated at the Philadelphia high-school in 1851, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia in 1854. During the civil war he was a member of U. S. volunteer corps, and in 1863-7 he was a member of the common council. He was several years president of the Republican Invincibles, a political organization in Philadelphia. Mr. Riché is best known for his educational work. In 1867-86 he was the principal of the Philadelphia high-school.

RICHÉ, Jean Baptiste (tzech), president of Haiti, b. in Cape Haytien in 1786; d. in Port au Prince, 28 Feb., 1847. He was a negro, and began life as a slave, but afterward joined the army of the insurgents, and took part in the struggle for independence that terminated in 1803 after the surrender of Gen. De Rochambeau (q. v.) to the English. He then attached himself to Henry Christophe, who promoted him general in 1807, and made him his lieutenant. Riché also took part in the war against Alexandre Pétion (q. c.), decided the success of the battle of Siebert, 1 Jan., 1807, and commanded the left wing of the army under Christophe that besieged Port au Prince in 1811. By his readiness in executing the sangunary orders of Christophe he won the hatred of the latter who appointed him to the command of the northern provinces. Here he followed a policy of extermination against the mulattoes, and even, to please Christophe, murdered, according to several historians, his own wife and children. Notwithstanding his acknowledged incapacity, he retained his command under the following administrations, which always found him a doleful instrument. After the downfall of the party of Rivière Herard, the chiefs of the oligarchic faction of Boyer (q. v.) established a system of government which continued to elect to the presidency an old negro general, noted for his incapacity, under whose name they could rule, but, as the newly elected president, Pierrot, showed a tendency toward reforming the abuses of the administration, the trust of the people in the provinces of Port au Prince and Artibonite, and proclaimed Riché president, 1 March, 1846. Pierrot endeavored at first to resist, but the defection of his army compelled him to make his submission, 24 March. After re-establishing the constitution of 1816, Riché, invited by the foreign population, proposed thoroughly to reform the administration. Endeavoring to prevent inspection in the department of the north, he died suddenly, poisoned, according to several historians, by the same men to whom he owed his elevation.

RICHÉL, Nicolas Antoine (ri-shel), Haytian naturalist, b. in Jacmel in 1745; d. in Cape Francois in 1790. He was one of the founders of the Academy of Sciences and Arts of the French colony of Cape Francois, the scientific society of Cape Francois, and the privy council of Gov. Blanchelande. He also took an active part in the troubles in Santo Domingo after the revolution of 1789, but was always on the side of the royal authority. At the arrival of the commissioners of the Directory he raised a band of partisans, and once nearly succeeded in kidnapping Etienne Polvéré (q. c.), but was taken prisoner after ward and transported to France, where he was kept in confinement for several years. Toward the close of 1798 he obtained permission to return to his country, where he lived in retirement till his death. His works include "Histoire et description de l'Ile de Saint Domingue" (1783); "Tableau de la flore de Saint Domingue" (1790); and "Exposé de la faclination des plantes Européennes dans les îles Antilles." (1791).

RICHÉPANSE, Antoine (ri-esh-pahnse), French soldier, b. in Metz, 25 March, 1750; d. in Basseterre, Guadeloupe, 8 Sept., 1805. He was a sergeant at the beginning of the French revolution, and soon rose by his valor to high rank. He was appointed colonel in 1792, captain-general of the French possessions in South America, and, landing in Guadeloupe, forced the entrance of Pointe à Pitre, compelled the northern provinces to make their submission, and, after defeating Magloire Pelage (q. c.) restored the exiled governor, Laurcse (q. c.). After suppressing a new insurrection, and compelling the rest of the insurgents to make their submission at Anglemon, he prepared to pass to Santo Domingo to co-operate in the conquest of the island, when he died of yellow fever. Richepanse was held in high esteem by Napoleon, who gave his name to a street in Paris.

RICHERY, Joseph (fresh-red), French naval officer, b. in Alois, Provence, 13 Sept., 1757; d. there, 21 March, 1799. He enlisted as a cabin-boy in 1766, became midshipman in 1774, and lieutenant in 1778, and co-operated in the capture of Newport by Count d'Estaing, taking part in the engagement with the English fleet as commander of the long boats that were ordered to destroy the fire-ships at the capture of the bay. He served afterward at Savannah in October, 1779, was present at the capture of St. Vincent and Grenada, and took part in most of the engagements in the West Indies till 1781, when he was attached to the squadron of Bailly de Suffren, and served in the Indian ocean till the conclusion of peace. He was promoted captain in 1793 and rear-admiral in 1795, and appointed to the command of a fleet to destroy the fisheries of Newfoundland.

Sailing from Toulon, 14 Sept., 1795, with five ships of the line and two frigates, he attacked, on 7 Oct., an English merchant fleet escorted by three ships of the line, took one of the latter and captured thirty other vessels, which he sold at Cadiz. He left Cadiz, 2 Aug., 1796, and arriving on 28 Aug. upon the great bank of Nova Scotia, was ordered to the coast of Labrador, and 5 Nov. in time to take part in the expedition to Ireland. Declining health compelled him to retire from active service in 1797.

RICHER, Jules César (resh-resh), West Indian author, b. in St. Pierre, Martinique, in 1697; d. there, 1756. He was for many years civil judge of the tribunal of St. Pierre, and in 1748 published "Essai sur l’art de la culture de la canne à sucre" (St. Pierre, 1748): "Recueil de jurisprudence, à l’usage des îles du vent" (Paris, 1761); "Traité de législation coloniale" (2 vols., 1766); "Mémoire sur le cannelleur de la Martinique" (1767); "Observations sur la culture du café" (1789); and "Description abrégée de la Martinique" (2 vols., St. Pierre, 1772).

RICHEY, Matthew, Canadian clergyman, b. in Ramelton, Ireland, 25 May, 1806; d. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 24 Oct., 1883. He was educated in Ireland, and afterward came to Canada, where he was principal of the Methodist academy at Cobourg in 1836-39. He was subsequently stationed as a missionary of the Methodist church at various places. Mr. Riches was superintendent of Methodist missions in Canada and Hudson bay in 1846-79, president of Canada conference in 1859, and president of the conference of eastern British America in 1859-60. He was an eminent as a pulpit orator, and published "Memoir of Rev. William Black, including an Account of the Rise and Progress of Methodism in Nova Scotia and Halifax, 1836" and a volume of sermons. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Wesleyan University, Conn., in 1847. — His son, Matthew Henry, Canadian jurist, b. in Windsor, Nova Scotia, 10 June, 1828, was educated at the collegiate school, Windsor, at Upper Canada college, Toronto, and at Queen’s university, Kingston. He studied law, was admitted to the bar of Nova Scotia in 1856, became queen’s counsel in 1873, and received the honorary degree of D. C. L. from Mount Allison Wesleyan college in 1884. He was a member of the Dominion parliament for Halifax from 1875 until 18 July, 1882, when he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia. He was mayor of Halifax in 1881-7 and 1855-8, and had been a member of the senate of the university of that city.

RICHINGS, Peter, actor, b. in London, England, 19 May, 1757; d. in Media, Pa., 18 Jan., 1857. His full name was Peter Richings Pegler, and his father was Vice-Admiral Sir Richard Richings of the British navy. The son was educated for the ministry at Pembroke college. Later he became successively clerk in the India service at Madras, a lieutenant in the British army, and a student of law in Lincoln’s Inn. None of these pursuits proving congenial, he figured for a time as a comedian at several minor theatres in the British provinces. In 1821 he came to this country, where he made his first appearance at the New York Park theatre, on 25 Sept., 1821, as Harry Bertram in Bishop’s opera "Guy Mannering." Here he remained among the stock-company until 1839. In the autumn of that year he became stage-manager of the National theatre, Philadelphia. In 1834 he was lessee of the Holliday street theatre, Baltimore, and from 1843 until 1854 he was both actor and manager of the Philadelphia, both as stage-manager and manager. From that time onward, for about eleven years, he conducted the Richings opera troupe, a traveling company, appearing on frequent occasions as an operatic artist. At the close of this venture he retired permanently to a farm. Richings was one of the time-honored galaxy of the old Park theatre, and in romantic plays and melodrame became a general favorite. Fops, military officers, comic characters, and stage-villains were equally well represented by him, but he had no hold on the legitimate drama. His voice was a baritone, and was used judiciously on many occasions. Dandini in "Cinderella," Epopo in "Fra Diavoli," Pietro in "Mamnoon," and Olifour in "La Bayadère," were among his favorite characters. Caroline Mary, his adopted daughter, came to this country from England in her infancy. She first appeared in public as a pianist, and subsequently became leading soprano of the Richings English opera troupe. In 1867 Miss Richings married Pierre Barnard, and retired from the stage, but returned in 1883. Her later life was spent at Richmond, Va., where she died in 1884.

RICHMOND, Charles Gordon Lennox, fourth Duke of, governor-general of Canada, b. in 1764; d. in Richmond, Lower Canada, 28 Aug., 1819. His father, Lient.-Gen. Lord George Henry Lennox, was a grandson of the first Duke of Richmond, a son of Charles II, and the Duchess of Portsmouth. Charles entered the army in his youth, and in 1806 succeeded his father in that capacity by his uncle. In 1808 he was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, where his administration of affairs was productive of the happiest results in quieting the public discontent. He succeeded Gen. Sherbrooke as governor-general of Canada, 29 July, 1819, and administered his government till his death. He was very popular, and though by nature cold-blooded, was determined and adept in a clever way to draw upon the funds in the hands of the receiver-general when the legislature refused to grant supplies to defray the civil list. While making a tour of Canada he purchased a tame fox, which, becoming rabid, bit him on the hand, and hydrophobia resulted, causing his death. In 1789 he married Charlotte, daughter of the fourth Duke of Gordon. Charles Gordon-Lennox, the present Duke of Richmond, is his grandson.—His uncle, Charles Lennox, third Duke of Richmond (1725-1806), was appointed in 1765 ambassador to France. In 1766 he constituted chief secretary of state, and in 1782 master-general of the ordnance. He was a man of superior talents, a friend of liberty and reform, and in 1778 proposed to recognize the independence of the revolted American colonies.

RICHMOND, Geo., capitalist, b. in Barnard, Vt., 1806; d. in New York city, 25 Aug., 1866. His ancestors were farmers, living in and about Taunton, Mass., but his father, Hathaway, removed to Vermont. In 1812 the family removed again to Salina, N. Y. Business reverses overtook the elder Richmond, and he went to the south and soon afterward died in Mobile. At the age of fifteen years Dean entered upon the business of manufacturing and selling salt at Salina with success. Before he had attained his majority he was chosen a director in a Syracuse bank. In 1842 he established himself in business in Buffalo, N. Y., as a dealer and shipper of western produce, with his residence at Attica, and subsequently at Batavia. He won a reputation for upright dealing and respectability, that was not unsurpassed by any resident in the lake region. He became interested in rail-ways, was a leader in the movement to consolidate the seven separate corporations that subsequently constituted the New York Central railroad, and chieftly by his personal efforts procured the passage of the act of consolidation by the legislature. Upon the organization of the company in 1853 Mr. Richmond was elected president, and in 1854 he was chosen president, which post he held till his death. Mr. Richmond did not have the advantages of an early education, but his extensive and careful reading in later years, and his observation of men and things, made him most intelligent. Early in life he espoused the cause of the Democratic party, and while yet a boy he enjoyed the confidence of the leaders that constituted the "Allany regency." He became the leader of his party in the state of New York, and for several years he was chairman of the Democratic state committee, but he never sought nor held public office.

RICHMOND, James Cook, clergyman, b. in Providence, R. I., in 1806; d. in Providence, R. I., 2 Aug., 1869. After graduation at Harvard, 1828, he studied at Oberlin and Halle, and was ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church in Providence, R. I., on 12 Oct., 1832, and priest on 13 Nov., 1833. In 1834-5 he served as a missionary in Maine and Illinois, subsequently held pastorates in various cities, and succeeded his brother, William, as rector of St. James church, New York, remaining till 1842. He then resided in Milwaukee, Wis., and in 1861, he became chaplain of the 21st Wisconsin regiment. He travelled extensively in Europe, and was the author of a "Visit to Iona in 1846": "A Midsummer Day Dream"; and "Meta- comet," the first cantos of an epic poem.—His elder brother, William, clergyman, b. in Bighton, Mass., 11 Dec. 1797; d. in New York city, 19 Sept., 1868, was rector of various churches in New York city and the Episcopal church and held pastorates in New York city.—William's wife, Sarah Abigail Adams, b. in Maine in 1821; d. in New York city, 1 Jan., 1866, founded the House of Mercy, and the New York infirmary infant asylum.

RICHTER, Henry Joseph, R. C. bishop, b. in Menhenishich, 20th Aug., 1829; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 9 Apr., 1860. He came to this country in 1854, was educated at St. Paul's school and Mount St. Mary's college, Cincinnati, and in 1860 entered the American college in Rome, being graduated at the Propaganda as R. D., and receiving his ordination in 1863. Returning to Cincinnati in that year, he was made vice-president of Mount St. Mary's seminary, where he was professor of dogma, philosophy, and literature until 1870. He founded the Church of St. Lawrence, and was director of the Academy of Mount St. Vincent. On the establishment of the diocese of Grand Rapids he was consecrated its first bishop, on 22 April, 1848, which diocese contains about 160 churches, 60 priests, and 29 parish schools.

RICKETS, James Brewerton, soldier, b. in New York city, 21 June, 1817; d. in Washington, D. C., 22 Sept., 1887. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1839, assigned to the 1st artillery, and served during the Canada border disturbances on garrison duty, and in the war with Mexico, taking part in the battle of Monterey, and holding the Rinconada passes, during the battle of Buena Vista. He had been made 1st lieutenant, 21 Apr., 1846, became captain on 3 Aug., 1852, and served in Florida during the Seminole Indians, and subsequently on frontier duty in Texas. At the beginning of the civil war he served in the defense of Washington, D. C., commanded a battery in the capture of Alexandria, Va., in 1861, was wounded and captured at Bull Run on 21 July, and on that day was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, and made brigadier-general of U. S. volunteers. He was confined as a prisoner of war, and afterward was on sick leave of absence until June, 1862, when he engaged in operations in the Shenandoah valley, and participated with the Army of the Potomac in the northern Virginia, the Maryland, and the Richmond campaigns, fighting in all the chief battles. On 1 June, 1864, he became major of the 1st artillery, and received the brevet of colonel. U. S. army, for gallant and meritorious services at Cold Harbor, Va., 3 June, 1864. He served in the siege of Petersburg, Va., in that year in the defense of Maryland against Gen. Jubal Early's raid, and in the Shenandoah campaign, receiving the brevet of major-general of volunteers on 1 Aug., 1864, for gallant conduct during the war, particularly in the battles of the campaign under Gen. Ulysses S. Grant and Gen. Philip H. Sheridan. He was severely wounded at Cedar Creek, Va., 19 Oct., 1864, and was on sick leave from that date until 7 April, 1865. On 13 March, 1863, he was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, for gallant services at Cedar Creek, and major-general, U. S. army, for gallant and meritorious services at Cold Harbor. On 28 July, 1865, he was assigned to the command of a district in the Department of Virginia, which post he held until 30 April, 1866, when he was mustered out of the volunteer service. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel, 21st infantry, on 28 July, 1866, but declined this post. He was retired from active service on 3 Jan., 1867, for disability from wounds received in battle and served on courts-martial from that date until 22 Jan., 1869.
RICKOF, Andrew Jackson, educator, b. in Mercer county, N. J., 23 Aug., 1824. After receiving his education in Woodward college, Cincinnati, he taught, and has been superintendent of schools in Portsmouth, Cincinnati, and Cleveland, Ohio, and Yonkers, N. Y. The credit is awarded him of reorganizing the schools both of Cincinnati and Cleveland, and largely influencing the school systems in Ohio. The radical changes that he carried into effect in organization and methods of instruction have been widely approved by adoption throughout the country. The first free public schools in Cleveland was commenced by the English commissioners to the International exposition in Philadelphia in 1876, as superior to any other in the United States. At this exposition Mr. Rickoff received a medal as the designer of the best plans for school-buildings. In their report to the government, the French commissioners pronounced these buildings the best in the country. Since 1888 Mr. Rickoff has held charge of Felix Adler's workingman's school, established in 1890. He is the author of many school-books, and has edited a series of six readers, which are extensively used.

RICORD, Jean Baptiste (see-cor), physician, b. in Paris, France, in 1777; d. in the Island of Guadeloupe, French West Indies, in 1851. He was educated in France and in Italy, either having his father during the French revolution, and subsequently accompanied the latter to this country, and settled in Baltimore, Md. After graduation at the New York college of physicians and surgeons in 1810, he went to the West Indies to make researches in botany and natural history, and travelled and practised medicine extensively in the islands until he returned to New York. He was a distinguished scholar, artist, and painter, and a member of various learned societies in France and the United States. Many of his writings were signed "Madama," the name of his homestead in France. In addition to contributions to scientific and other journals, Dr. Ricord published "An Improved French Grammar" (New York, 1819), and "Recherches et observations sur les poissons d'aquaducte et de navigation," engraved and illustrated by his own pencil (Bordeaux, 1826). He left many manuscripts, which have not been published.—His wife.

Elizabeth, educator, b. in New Utrecht, L. I., 2 April, 1788; d. in Newark, N. J., 10 Oct., 1865, was the daughter of Rev. Peter Stryker. She was educated by private tutors, married Dr. Ricord in 1809, accompanied him on his expeditions to the West Indies, and in 1829 she opened a young ladies' seminary in Geneva, N. Y., of which she was principal until 1842. The great religious revival that spread through western New York in 1832 originated in her seminary. In 1845 she moved to Newark, where she became interested in works of charity, and was a founder of the Newark orphan asylum and the New Jersey Home for Aged and Infirm. She contributed largely to magazines and journals, being the author of "Philosophy of the Mind" (Geneva, 1840), and "Zamba, or the Insurrection, a Dramatic Poem" (Cambridge, Mass., 1842).—Their son, Frederick Williams, author, b. in Guadeloupe, W. L., 7 Oct., 1819; d. in Newark, 12 Aug., 1897. He was educated at Hobart and Rutgers, and studied law at Geneva, N. Y. He served in the state legislature one term, and was a presiding judge of the circuit court. He taught for twelve years in Newark, N. J., was a member of the board of education of that city from 1852 till 1869, serving as president 1867-'9. He was state superintendent of public schools of New Jersey in 1869-'70, sheriff of Essex county in 1869-'71, mayor of Newark in 1870-'3, and associate judge of the various county courts of Essex county in 1870-'3. He was long librarian of the New Jersey historical society. Judge Ricord received the degree of A. M. from Rutgers in 1843 and Princeton in 1861. He was one of the editors of the "New Jersey Archives" and had published a "History of Rome" (New York, 1852); "The Youth's Grammar" (1853); "Life of Madame de Longueville," from the French of Victor Cousin (1854); "The Henriades," from Voltaire (1859); "English Songs from Foreign Tongues" (1879); and "The Self-Tormentor, from the Latin of Terentius, with more English Songs" (1853). He was a member of the board of governors of New Jersey, which gives the history of the state from its settlement to the Revolution.—Jean Baptiste's brother, Alexander, physician, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1798; d. in Paris, France, 3 Oct., 1876, was educated in his native city, removed to France in order to study under Cuvier, and received his diploma as doctor in medicine in Paris in 1824. He was assistant surgeon in the French navy, and correspondent of the Academy of Medicine, but devoted his life chiefly to natural history, received the decoration of the Legion of Honor in 1843, and contributed largely to scientific journals. Another brother of Jean Baptiste, Philippe, French surgeon, b. in Baltimore, Md., 10 Dec., 1800; d. in Paris, France, 22 Oct., 1880, was the grandson of a member of the Compagnie des Indes, who came to the United States in 1790 in the hope of retrieving his fortunes. After pursuing a course of scientific studies with his brother, Jean B. Ricord, Philippe began the study of medicine in Philadelphia. In 1829 he visited Paris, taking with him a collection of animals and plants as a present to the National Museum. In 1834 he received the degree of M. D., and began to practise at Olivet, near Orleans, afterward removing to Croissy-sur-Ourq. In 1828 he returned to Paris, and delivered a course of lectures on surgery, and in 1831 he was appointed surgeon-in-chief to the Hôpital des vénériens du Midi. At this hospital, from which he retired on account of age in 1869, he gained a great reputation as a specialist. In 1862 he was named consulting surgeon to Napoleon III., whom he had assiduously attended during a recent illness, and who in return had presented him with a snuff-box and 30,000 francs. He was promoted commander of the Legion of Honor, 12 Aug., 1860, and grand officer, 25 June, 1871. He was chief of the surgical services as president of the ambulance corps during the siege of Paris. He also received many foreign decorations. Besides writing the works mentioned below, Dr. Ricord devised and first performed many surgical operations, several of which have since been "crowned by the Academy of sciences. Dr. Ricord in his eighty-ninth year was still engaged in the practice of his profession, and visited his numerous patients, and during his office hours, receiving the crowds that came to consult him. For many years he was known in Paris as "the great American doctor," and he ever cherished a warm affection for his native land. He published "De l'emploi du specturm, 'treatment of his diseases by the use of the espicule," in his "Traité des maladies vénériennes" (8 vols., 1858; new ed., 1865); "Le specturm, "treatment of the ophthalmia ulcerosa" (1843); "De la blemorrhagie vénérienne" (1844); "Emploi de l'onguent mercurel dans le traitement de l'épisthymite" (1836); "Monographie du chancere," being a thorough explanation of his system (1857); "Théorie sur la nature et le traitement de l'épisthymite" (1838); "Traité des maladies vénériennes" (8 vols., 1858; new ed., 1865); "De l'ophthalmie blemorrhagique" (1845); "Citnique iconographique de l'Hôpital des vénériens" (1842-51); "De la sphytilisation, etc." (1853); "Lettres sur la sphyilis" (1854); 3d ed., 1857; and a great number of "Mémoires, etc.; Observations," "Recherches," "Communications," etc., contributed principally to the "Mémoires" and "Bulletins" of the Academy of medicine (1824-50).

RIDDLE, John Leonard, physician, b. in Leyden, Mass., 29 Feb., 1807; d. in New Orleans, La., 7 Oct., 1865. He was graduated at Rensselaer Institute, in Troy, N. Y., and in 1835 at the Medical College of Cincinnati, where he became professor of botany and anatomy, and afterwards of chemistry. He occupied the chair of chemistry in the medical department of the University of Louisiana from 1836 till 1856. Dr. Riddle was a wholesale grocer and refiner at the U. S. mint in New Orleans, the inventor of a binocular microscope and magnifying-glass, and discovered the microscopic characteristics of the blood and black vomit in yellow fever. He first brought to notice the botanical genus "Ridella," which was named for him. He contributed to the "London Microscopical Journal," the "American Journal of Science and Arts," and other periodicals, and published "Synopsis of the Flowers of the Western States" (Cincinnati, 1855); "Mémorial advocating the Organic Nature of Miasms and Contagion" (1849); "Ridgely's Silver Dollar" (New Orleans, 1855); "A Mémorial on the Constitution of Matter" (1847); and a "Report on the Epidemic of 1853" (1844).

RIDDLE, Albert Gallatin, lawyer, b. in Monson, Mass., 26 May, 1816. His father removed to Geauga county, Ohio, in 1817, where the son received a common-school education, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1839, practised as a legal director, and was elected prosecuting attorney from 1846 to 1848. He served in the legislature in 1848-9, and called the first Free-soil convention in Ohio in 1848. In 1850 he removed to Cleveland, was elected prosecuting attorney in 1856, defended the Ohio slave-rescuers in 1859, and was elected to Congress as a Republican, serving from 4 July, 1861, till 3 March, 1865. He was one of the first to present the question of emancipation of slaves, the first on this subject that were delivered in Congress, and others on emancipation in the District of Columbia and in vindication of President Lincoln. In October, 1863, he was appointed U. S. consul at Matanzas. Since 1861 he has practised law in Washington, D. C., and, under a return of the state department, aided in the prosecution of John H. Surratt for the murder of President Lincoln. In 1877 he was appointed law-officer to the District of Columbia, which office he now (1898) holds. For several years, from its organization, he had charge of the law department in Howard university. Mr. Riddle is the author of "Students and Lawyers," lectures (Washington, 1875); "Hart's Great Lakes and St. Lawrence," "Hart and his Bear," and "Hart of the Woods" (both Cleveland, 1886); "The Hunter of the Chagrin," "Chase," "Great Bear," "Hart and his Bear," "Hart of the Chagrin," "Woe of the Western Reserve," "Old Newberry and the Pioneers," "Speeches and Arguments," (Washington, 1886); and "Life of Benjamin F. Wade" (Cleveland, 1886).

RIDDLE, George, electionist, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 22 Sept., 1836. He was graduated at Harvard in 1874, made his first appearance as a reader in Boston in that year, and in 1875 made his "debüt" as an actor in that city, playing Romeo after which he became connected with stock-companies in Boston, Montreal, and Philadelphia. From 1878 till 1881 he was instructor in elocution at Harvard. He appeared as Edipus in the "Edipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles at Harvard in May, 1881, which was the first production in this country of a Greek play in the original. Mr. Riddle has given readings in the principal cities of the United States, the most successful of which are Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" with Mendelssohn's music, "Hamlet" with Schumann's music, and the "Edipus Tyrannus" with the music of John K. Paine.

the Confederate army as lieutenant of infantry and captain of cavalry. At the close of the war he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began to practise at Woodstock, Va., where he continued to reside. His first civil office was that of kommunal watch's attorney for his county, which he held for two terms. He was then elected and re-elected to the state house of delegates, serving for four years, and subsequently sat in the senate of Virginia for the same period. Since 1850 he edited three local newspapers, "The Tenth Legion," "The Shenandoah Democrat," and "The Virginian." He was a member of the steamboat committee of the Convention, 1853, a presidential delegate on the Democratic ticket in 1856, and on the "Readjuster" ticket in 1860. He was commencement's attorney and state senator when, in 1881, he was elected to the U. S. senate as a Readjuster in the place of John W. Johnston, Conservative. His term of service expired on 3 March, 1889.

RIDGELEY, William Henry, author, b. in Liverpool, England, 17 Feb., 1853. His father was an officer in the service of the Cunard line of steamers. After the death of his mother the son went to Chicago, Ill., where he remained until 1870. He early began writing for the press, and soon became connected with several journals. In 1874 he gave up newspaper work to devote himself entirely to literary and magazine writing. He made several trips to Europe and elsewhere with different artists to obtain material on special subjects. In 1878 he served as special correspondent with the Wheeler surveying expedition in Colorado, New Mexico, Nevada, California, and Arizona. In 1883-3 Mr. Riding edited "Drum, Notes, and News" in London, England. On his return he served as editor of several papers, but he still remains (1888). Among his publications are "Pacific Railways Illustrated" (New York, 1878); "A Saga in the Wild West" (London, 1879); "Stray Moments with Thackery" (New York, 1880); "Boys in the Mountains" (1882); "Boys on the Coast" (1884); "Thackery's London" (London, 1885); "Young Folks' History of London" (Boston, 1886); "Thackery's America" (1887); and "The Boyhood of Living Authors" (1887).

RIDER, George Thomas, clergyman, b. in Rice City, R. I., 21 Feb., 1829; d. in New York, 14 Aug., 1894. He was graduated at Trinity, and took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church. From 1833 till 1855 he was rector of St. John's, Canajohina, N. Y., and from 1856 till 1860 of St. John's, Pittsburg, Pa., which latter church edifice was built under his supervision. In 1860 he removed to Poungkeepsie, N. Y., where he conducted the Cottage Hill seminary for young ladies till 1874. He had since devoted his time to literary labor, and had been a contributor to many journals and periodicals. For many years he was on the editorial staff of "The American Churchman." Mr. Rider had published "Plain Manners for the Book of Common Prayer" (New York, 1854); "Lyra Anglicana, or a Hymnal of Sacred Poetry, selected from the best English Writers, and arranged after the Order of the Apostles' Creed"; and "Lyra Americana, or Verses of Praise and Faith from American Poets" (1855).

Janes" (1882); "Bishop Beverly Wung" (1883); and "Bishop Mathew Simpson" (1885).

RIDGE, Major, was a Cherokee chief, b. in Highwassee valley. In what is now the state of Georgia, about 1771; d. on the Cherokee reservation, 22 June, 1839. From his early years he was taught patience and self-denial, and to undergo fatigue; on reaching the proper age he was initiated as one of the warriors of the tribe with due solemnities. At fourteen he joined a war-party against the whites at Cherokee, and afterward another that attacked Knoxville, Tenn. When he was twenty-one years old he was chosen a member of the Cherokee council. He proved a valuable counsellor, and at the second session proposed many useful laws. Subsequently he won the confidence of his people, and became one of the chief men of the nation. When the question of deporting the Cherokees from the state of Georgia arose, he was opposed to removal, and it was suggested, he found that the nation was divided into two hostile camps, one of which bitterly opposed removal, while the other favored it. The former was headed by John Ross, the principal chief, while the other was represented by Major Ridge, his son John, Elias Boudinot, Charles Vann, and others. Two commissioners on the part of the United States held several meetings with both parties, and finally made a treaty, the negotiations extending over a period of three years. The westward journey of 600 or 700 miles was performed in four or five months, during which time, on account of the intense heat and other discomforts, over 4,000 Indians perished. In June, 1839, Major Ridge, his son John, and Elias Boudinot were assassinated by members of the party that were opposed to removal. Major Ridge was waylaid about fifty miles from his home and shot. His son, John, Indian chief, was the second of five children. He received a good education, being first taught by Moravian missionaries, then at an academy at Knoxville, Tenn., and finally in the foreign mission-school in Connecticut. On returning home he began his career as a public man, and devoted his energies to endeavoring to organize the Cherokee nation into an independent government. Having taken an active part in negotiating the unpopular treaty at New Echota, by which the removal of his nation was finally agreed upon, he was taken from his bed in the early morning and nearly cut to pieces with knives,—John's son, John R., journalist, d. in New York, 1881; and Elias, 1867, was a writer of much ability, and possessed some poetic talent. He was at different times connected with several California journals.

RIDGELEY, Charles Goodwin, naval officer, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1784; d. there, 8 Feb., 1848. He entered the navy as midshipman, 10 Oct., 1799, cruised in the Mediterranean with Preble in the Truxtun war, 1807-8, and received a third thanks and sword for his gallant conduct. He was commissioned lieutenant, 2 Feb., 1807, served on the lakes, was commissioned master-commandant, 24 July, 1813, and commanded the brig "Jef- ferson" on Lake Ontario in 1814, and the "Erie" and "Independence" in Bainbridge's squadron during and after the Algerine war in 1815-17. He was made captain, 28 Feb., 1815, and was flag-officer, commanding the West India squadron, in 1827–30, protecting the commerce of the United States and suppressing piracy. He was in charge of the Brooklyn navy-yard from 1832 till 1839, served as flag-officer, commanding the Brazil squadron from 1840 till 1842, and then on waiting orders until his death in 1848.

RIDGELY, Charles, physician, b. in Dover, Del., 29 Jan., 1758; d. there, 25 Nov., 1804. He received his education at Philadelphia, and studied medicine under Dr. Phineas Bond, and began to practise in 1788 at Dover, Del., where he passed his life. From 1788, with few intervals, till his death he was a member of the Delaware legislature. He was presiding judge in Kent county of the court of common pleas, and before the Revolution of the quarter sessions. He was elected a delegate to the State constitutional convention, and was afterward called again to the bench, which he occupied during the remainder of his life. —His son, Nicholas, jurist, b. in Dover, Del., 30 Sept., 1762; d. in Georgetown, Del., 1 April, 1839, studied law, was admitted to the bar of his native state, and after practising several years became successively attorney-general under Governor Jefferson, in 1801, and was appointed chancellor of the state of Delaware, and held that office for twenty-nine years until his death, that occurring while the court over which he presided was in session.

—His half-brother, Henry Moore, senator, b. in Dover, Del., in 1758; d. there, 7 Aug., 1847, received a good education, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began the practice at Dover. He was elected and re-elected to congress as a Federalist, serving from 4 Nov., 1811, till 2 March, 1815. He then returned to Dover and continued to practise his profession until he was elected U. S. senator from Delaware in place of Nicholas Van Dyke, deceased. He held the seat from 23 Jan., 1827, till 3 March, 1829, when he retired and resumed the practice of his profession.

RIDGELY, Charles, governor of Maryland, b. 6 Dec., 1762; d. at Hampton, his estate, Baltimore co., Md., 17 July, 1829. His name was originally Charles Ridgely Carnan, but he was adopted by his uncle, Capt. Charles Ridgely, who left him a fortune at his death in 1790, on condition that he should change his name to the state senator, of the Maryland legislature, six times successively, in 1813–17. He was also brigadier-general of Maryland militia. Gov. Ridgely was the owner of about 400 slaves, all of whom he manumitted by his will.

RIDGELY, Daniel Boone, naval officer, b. near Lexington, Ky., 1 Aug., 1813; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 3 May, 1888. He entered the navy as midshipman, 1 April, 1828, and was commissioned lieutenant, 10 Sept., 1830. During the Mexican war he was attached to the sloop "Albany," and participated in the bombardment and capture of Vera Cruz, Tuxpan, Alvarado, and Tamuco in 1846–47. He was attached to the naval observatory at Washington in 1850–2, cruised in the sloop "Ossipee" in the West Indies, and was commissioned commander, 14 Sept., 1855. In 1857–8 he commanded the steamer "Atalanta" in the Paraguayan expedition. He was on leave when the civil war began, but volunteered for active service promptly, commanded the steamer "Santiago de Cuba" in the West Indies during the early part of the war, and in May, 1861, was successful in capturing blockade-runners. He was commissioned captain, 16 July, 1862. In 1863–4 he commanded the steamer "Shenandoah" on the North Atlantic blockade, and assisted in both attacks on Fort Fisher. In the year 1865 he was on the "Porpoise" with Admiral Rodgers's squadron in the Pacific ocean, and returned in command of the steamer "Lancaster" in 1867. Capt. Ridgely was promoted to the rank of commodore, 25 July, 1866, and was a member of the board of naval examiners at Philadelphia in the year 1867, and at the time of his death.

RIDGELY, James Lou, author, b. in Baltimore, Md., 2 April, 1804; d. there, 16 Nov., 1884. He was educated at St. Mary's college, Baltimore, and at Mount St. Mary's college, Emmittsburg, Md., studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1828, and began to practise in his native city. He was a member of the city council in 1834–5, of the state house of delegates in 1838, and of the Constitutional conventions of 1849 and 1864. He was for twelve years register of wills for Baltimore county, several years president of the board of education, and aided in establishing the present public-school system in 1848. He was appointed by President Lincoln collector of internal revenue, and for many years was president of a fire-insurance company. He became an Odd Fellow in 1839, was a member of the Grand Lodge of Maryland, and of the Grand Lodge of the United States in 1831. In 1836 he was elected grand sire by the latter, and in 1842 he became grand recording and corresponding secretary. He is the principal author of the various rituals that are now in use. He had also written "Odd-Fellowship—What is It?" "The Odd-Fellow's Pocket Companion" (Philadelphia, 1853); and many other works of a similar character. He was the editor of "The Covenant," the official magazine of the order.

RIDGWAY, Robert, ornithologist, b. in Mount Carmel, Ill., 2 July, 1850. He was educated at common schools in his native town, where he showed a special fondness for natural history. A correspondence with Spencer F. Baird in 1864 led to his appointment, three years later, as naturalist to the U. S. geological exploration of the 40th parallel, under Clarence King. Since that time he has been chiefly occupied in government work, and in 1879 he was appointed curator of the department of birds in the U. S. national museum, which place he now (1889) holds. Mr. Ridgway received the degree of A. B. from the University of the State of New York in 1884, and has been vice-president of the Ornithologists' union since its organization in 1884. He is also corresponding member of the Zoological society of London, and the Academies of science of New York, Davenport, and Chicago, foreign member of the British ornithologists' union, and member of the permanent ornithological committee (Vietnam), also honorary member of the Natural ornithological club of Cambridge, Mass., the Brookville, Ind., society of natural history, and of the Ridgway ornithological club of Chicago, III. His published papers exceed 200 in number. Many of them have appeared in the "Proceedings of the U. S. National Museum" and are descriptive of new species and races of American birds, as well as several catalogues of the pigeon and other birds contained in the museum. He was joint author with Spencer F. Baird and Thomas M. Brewer of "A History of North American Birds" (3 vols., Boston, 1874), and of "The Water Birds of North America" (2 vols., 1884), in which he wrote the technical parts. He is the author of "Report on the Birds of the Philippine Islands" (Washington, 1877); "A Nomenclature of Colors for Naturalists" (Boston, 1886); and "Manual of North American Birds" (Philadelphia, 1887).
RIDPATH, John Clark, educator, b. in Putnam county, Ind., 29 April, 1810. His parents were from West Virginia, and began life under circumstances of great discouragement and hardship. The son had no early educational advantages besides those that he obtained at frontier schools, but his appetite for books was insatiable, and at seventeen he was a teacher. At nineteen he entered Asbury (now De Pauw) university, where he was graduated with the highest honors of his class. Before graduation he had been elected to an instructorship in the College of the Trades, and in 1834 he was made its principal. This office he held until 1867, when he was chosen to fill the chair of languages at Baker university, Baldwin City, Kan. During the same period he served as superintendent of the Lawrenceburg, Ind., public schools. In 1869 he was elected professor of English literature in Asbury university, and two years later he was assigned to the chair of belles-lettres and history of the same institution. In 1879 he was elected vice-president of the university, and he was largely the originator of the measures by which that institution was placed under the patronage of Washington C. De Pauw, and took his name. In 1880 he received the degree of LL. D., from the University of Syracuse, N. Y. He has published "A Grammar-School History of the United States" (1874-5); "Popular History of the United States" (1876); "Grammar-School History" (1877); "Inductive Grammar of the English Language" (1878-9); "Monograph on Alexander Hamilton" (1880); "Life and Work of Garfield" (1881-2); "Life of James G. Blaine," and a "History of Texas" (1884); and "A Cyclopaedia of Universal History" (2 vols., 1889).

RIEDESEL, Baron Friedrich Adolph (redel-seel), German soldier, b. in Lauterbach, Rhine-Prussia, 3 June, 1728; d. in Brunswick, 6 Jan., 1800. His father, John William, was government assessor at Eisenach, and his mother, Sophie Hedwig, was the daughter of Baron von Borcke, a Prussian lieutenant-general and governor of Stettin. He was educated at the law-school of Marburg, but while attending that school became an ensign in a Hessian battalion of infantry in garrison in that city, which soon afterward was received into the English establishment. He served as general aide on the personal staff of Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick in the seven years' war, and, having acquitted himself gallantly in the execution of an important commission at the battle of Minden, was rapidly promoted. He became captain of the Hessian hussars in 1759, lieutenant-colonel of the black hussars in 1762, adjutant-general of the Prussian army in 1767, and colonel of carbiniers in 1772. Soon after the beginning of the American Revolution, England having hired of the petty German sovereigns 20,000 troops, of which 4,000 were from Brunswick, Colonel Riedesel was selected as aide to the British general in command of the hussars, and of the command of the Brunswick. On his arrival at Quebec, 1 June, 1776, he drilled his men to meet the American style of fighting, exercising them on snow-shoes in winter and making them fire at long range and from behind bushes and trees. After spending a year in Canada, he accompanied Burgoyne on his unfortunate expedition. He endured hardship at the taking of Ticoderoche, and, by bringing up reenforcements, in dispersing the Americans at Hubbardston; and, had his advice been followed, the disastrous raid on Bennington would not have occurred. At the battle of 19 Sept., 1777, he alone, by bringing up his Brunswick at a critical moment, saved the English army from a complete rout; and, had his suggestions been carried out after the action of 7 Oct., Burgoyne would, in all probability, have made good his retreat into Canada. He was made prisoner at Saratoga on 17 Oct., exchanged in 1779, and in November of that year received from Gen. Clinton a command on Long Island, with headquarters on what are now Brooklyn heights. He returned to Germany in the summer of 1783, was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-general in 1787, and appointed to the command of the Brunswick contingent that sent into Holland to support the cause of the stadtholder. In 1794 he was appointed commandant of the city of Brunswick, which office he held until his death. His "Memoirs, Letters, and Military Journals," edited by Max von Eichhard, have been translated by William L. Stone (2 vols., Albany, 1868).—His wife, Frederica Charlotte Louisa, b. in Brunswick in 1756; d. in Berlin, 29 March, 1808, was a daughter of von Massow, commissary-in-chief of Frederick II, and married Baron Riedesel, after a romantic courtship, in 1762. She followed her husband to Canada in 1777, and was with him during the Burgoyne campaign of 1777, and wherever he was afterward stationed in this country. She tenderly nursed Gen. Simon Fraser on his death-bed, and, while the British army were besieged by Gen. Horatio Gates, ministered to the sick and wounded after sharing her own scanty rations with the half-starved soldiers and their wives. Her letters to her husband before joining him in Canada, and to her mother while she was in this country, have become classic. She was handsome, and rendered herself an object of wonder by riding in thick boots, and what was then called the "European fashion." She visited some of the principal families near Charlotteville, Va., being always a welcome guest. Of her nine children, three were living in 1856. Frederica, the second daughter of Madame Riedesel, who accompanied her in her wanderings in this country, became one of the most distinguished women of her day. She married Count Reden, who died in 1854, and resided at Buchwald, which was the resort of many celebrated men. After her death the city of Brunswick, Frederick William, caused a beautiful monument to be erected in her memory. She left one daughter, who married Baron von Rotenberg, at Rentweinsdorf, in Bavaria, with whom this branch of the family of Riedesel dies out. Madame Riedesel's letters were published in Berlin, in 1880, and a defective English translation in New York in 1857. A complete translation was made by William L. Stone with the title "Letters and Journals relating to the War of the American Revolution." (Albany, 1867.)

RIEL, Louis, Canadian insurgent, b. in St. Boniface, Manitoba, 23 Oct., 1844; d. in Regina, Northwest territory, 16 Nov., 1885. He was the son of Louis Riel, a popular leader of the Metis race, or Franco-Indians of the northwest, who in 1849 led a revolt against the authority of the Hudson bay company. The son was a protege of Archbishop Taché, and after completing his ed-cation at the Jesuit college in Montreal he returned to Red river. In October, 1839, he became secretary of the "Comité national des Metis," an organization formed in the interests of the native people to resist the establishment of Canadian authority in the territories, which had then been founded by the Hudson bay company. Riel, on behalf of the half-breeds, demanded part of the money that had been paid by Canada to the company and when he was not listened to at the head of a band of his countrymen, the entry of William McDougall, the first lieutenant-gov-erner under the Dominion government. On Dec.
1869, he was elected president of a provisional American government that was established at Fort Garry, after his followers had taken possession of that city, and captured Dr. John Christian Schultz and 44 Canadians. In February, 1870, Archbishop Taché, who had been sent for from Rome, was authorized to promise Riel and his followers a general amnesty. On Feb. 17, Riel captured Maj.
Bolton and 47 men, and on March 1 one of his prisoners, Thomas Scott, an Ontario Orangeman, was executed by his order. On the approach of the expedition under Sir Edward Buller, Riel left Winnipeg. Riel evacuated Fort Garry and escaped from the country. A reward of $3,000 was offered by the Ontario government for his apprehension, for his share in the execution of Thomas Scott.
Riel was afterward returned to Manitoba, but was not arrested, and in October, 1873, he was elected to the Dominion parliament for Providence, but was defeated when he ran for his seat in the election in January, 1874, he was re-elected, and suddenly appeared in Ottawa and signed the roll of membership, after which he disappeared. He was expelled from parliament on 16 April, but was again returned for the same constituency by acclamation on 3 Sept., 1874. On 15 Oct., following a warrant of outlawry was issued against him by the King's Bench of Manitoba, and in February, 1875, he was sentenced to five years' banishment and forfeiture of political rights. In 1877 he was confined for several months in Bon-port lunatic asylum, Quebec, under an assumed name, but whether this was owing to insanity, or for concealment and protection, is doubtful.
He afterward removed to Montana, but in the summer of 1884, a deputation of half-breeds invited him to lead them in an agitation for their rights in Manitoba. On 8 July, 1884, Riel arrived at Duck Lake with his family, and at once began a systematic agitation among the half-breeds and Indians. On 5 Sept., he stated the claims of his followers which were not granted, and in March, 1885, he was expelled from the Legislative Council of the government in the northwest. On the 18th the rebels made prisoners of the Indian agent at Duck Lake and several teamsters, and on the 25th they seized the government stores. The following day a collision occurred between the insurgents and a party of mounted police and volunteers under the command of Maj. G. N. F. Crozier, in which the former were defeated. After the arrival of Maj.
Gen. Frederick B. Middleton with Canadian troops, the rebellion was speedily suppressed. Riel, who had been taken prisoner after the capture of Batoche, was conveyed to Regina, where he was tried and convicted of treason-felony, and sentenced to death. The execution of Riel was followed by great public excitement in the province of thai, and the government was bitterly denounced for not recommending the commutation of his sentence. It also led to a serious, though only temporary, defection of supporters of the administration; but finally Riel's French-Canadian sympathizers generally recognized the justice of his sentence and admitted that his mental aberration was not of such a character as to render him irresponsible.

RIGAUD, Antoine, Baron (re-go), French soldier, b. in Agen, France, 14 May, 1798; d. in New Orleans, La., 4 Sept., 1820. He enlisted in early life in this country under Rochambeau during the Revolution, was promoted a colonel in 1796, and migrated, with Capt. Mathieu, to Tampico, Tex., March, 1808. He served afterward in Spain and Germany, and at Waterloo. After the fall of Napoleon I., he refused to make his submission and tried to incite a rebellion in behalf of his former chief. He was sentenced to death, 16 May, 1816, but escaped to the United States, and was a promoter of the Champlain and Texas that was founded by exiled French officers. In 1828 he removed to New Orleans, and was attached to the U. S. engineering department. He executed some works in Mississippi river, and then went to Mexico, where he took part in a revolution. At the time of his death he was a teacher of mathematics in New Orléans. Napoleon, in his "Memoir de Sainte Holène, died in 1821, left him in his will $20,000.

RIGAUD, Benoit Joseph André (re-go), Haytian soldier, b. in Les Cayes, Hayti, in 1761; d. there in 1811. He was a mulatto, and held a subordinate command in the militia of the colony at the time of the revolution of 1789. At first he bought against the French, but he afterward espoused their cause, was made a brigadier-general and in 1798 became commander against the British.
In association with Alexandre Pétion (q. v.), he defended Dessalines at Grand Gouave, took Jacmel, and defeated Toussaint L'Ouverture near that place;
but, his resources being exhausted and his army reduced to a few hundred men, he abandoned the colony in August, 1800, and passed to France, where he lived in retirement. By 1818 he was found at Port au Prince, and was appointed by Pétion commander of the Cayes; but he had carelessly arrived in the latter place when he proclaimed himself dictator of the southern counties. Pétion's advisers urged an expedition against the rebel, but the President, being afraid of the popularity and military talents of his rival, declined to lead an army. Rigaud died a few months later after thoroughly organizing the administration of his republic. He was noteworthy for his magnanimity in contrast with the usurious cruelties of the other Haytian chiefs.

RIGDON, Sidney, Mormon elder, b. in St.
Clair township, Allegany county, Pa., 19 Feb., 1818; d. in Mentor, O., 26 June, 1884. He worked on a farm till 1837, and after some experience as a printer studied for the ministry, and was licensed to preach by the Baptist church on 1 April, 1839. In January, 1832, he became pastor of the first church in Pittsburg, Pa., where he labored successfully. Following the example of Alexander Campbell, he took hold of the church and assisted in establishing the Disciplists, or Campbell denomination. He began preaching the new doctrine in Bambidge, Ohio, in 1828, and a year later went to Mentor, where he was very successful. In the autumn of 1830 four Mormon elders, Parley P. Pratt, Ziba Peterson, Oliver Cow-dery, and Peter Whittmer, on their way to Missouri, stopped at Mentor. Mr. Pratt, who had been a Baptist clergyman, obtained permission to preach. in Mr. Rigdon's church, and the latter became interested, read portions of the "Book of Mormon," was converted to the doctrine of the Latter-day Saints, and baptized in October, 1830. He at once became zealous, and in December, 1830, met Joseph Smith at Far West, Mo. It has been claimed that, through Rigdon's agency and there is no doubt of their association in the scheme, Smith became possessed of a copy of Solomon Spalding's manuscript, which he read from behind a blanket to his amanuensis, Oliver Cowdery, with such additions as suited the purposes of Rigdon and himself. (See "Sequoyah," "So- moxy.") Rigdon transferred to Smith and his associates as he could influence, and the two men were the foremost partners in all their enterprises, even to the practice of polygamy, and both claimed to have received revelations. When Smith removed to Kirtland, Ohio, in January, 1831, Rigdon went with him, and was his most efficient preacher. Subsequently they preached in Hiram, Ohio, where, on the night of March 29, 1832, they were dragged from their beds by a mob and tarred and feathered. They returned to Kirtland, and a year later a church hierarchy was established, consisting of Smith, Rigdon, and Frederick G. Williams, who were elected presidents and styled "the first presidency." They established a mill and a store, and set up a "well-cast" bank without a charter. Smith appointing himself president and making Smith and Rigdon, in holding the keys of his last kingdom. In 1838, the bank having failed in November, 1837, Smith and Rigdon fled in the night to avoid arrest, pursued by their creditors, and took refuge in Missouri. Large numbers of Mormons had preceded them, and, having become involved in quarrels with the inhabitants, had been driven by mobs from place to place, until they were allowed to escape, and joined the Mormon exodus to Illinois. When the church was established at Nauvoo, Rigdon was still one of its presidents. In the course of his connection with that body he had been twice tarred and feathered, and several times imprisoned for his alleged conspiracies and misdemeanors. When Joseph and Hyrum Smith were shot in 1844, Rigdon, under the purported assumption to the leadership of the sect, but the twelve apostles preferred Brigham Young. Rigdon refused to submit to his authority, and, for his contumacy, was declared to be "cut off from the communion of the faithful, and delivered to the devil, to be buffeted in the flesh for a thousand years." Thus cast out, he left the town of Nauvoo in the autumn of 1844 and went to Pittsburg, Pa., thence to Friendship, N. Y., where he declared dying firm belief in the doctrines and truthfulness of the "Book of Mormon.

Riggs, Elias, missionary, b. in New Providence, Union co., N. J., 19 Nov., 1810. He was graduated at Amherst in 1829, and at Andover theological seminary in 1832. He was a missionary at Athens and Argos, Greece, for the American board, from 1832 till 1838, and in Smyrna, Asia Minor, from 1838 till 1853. Since the latter date he has labored at Constantinople. He visited the United States in 1856, taught Hebrew in Union theological seminary in 1857-58, and was invited to become president of the school but preferred to return to his foreign field. The translation of the Scriptures into the Turkish language was placed in 1853 by the British and Foreign Bible society and the American Bible society in the hands of a committee, of which he was a member. As a result of its labors, the entire Bible was published in both Arabic and Armenian characters in 1878. A revision was made by a larger committee, including Dr. Riggs, and the new work was issued in 1886. In 1881, Riggs received the degree of D. D. from Hanover college, Ind., in 1853, and that of D. D. from Amherst in 1871. He is the author of "A Manual of the Chaldean Language," etc. (Andover, 1872; revised ed., New York, 1879; and several later editions); "The Young Forester, a Brief Memoir of the Early Life of the First Missionary, Frederick Rigdon" (1840); "Translation of the Scriptures into the Modern Armenian Language," completed with the aid of native scholars (Smyrna, 1853; reprinted in many editions in Constantinople and New York); "Grammatical Notes on the Bulgarian Language" (Smyrna, 1844); "Grammar of the Modern Armenian Language, with a Vocabulary" (1847; 3rd ed., Constantinople, 1882); "The Armenian and Turkish Languages as written in the Armenian Character"; "Translation of the Scriptures into the Bulgarian Language" (1871; several editions, Constantinople and Vienna); "Suggested Emendations of the Authorized English Version of the Old Testament" (Andover, 1875); "A Harmony of the Gospels in Armenian" (Constantinople, 1880); "Suggested Modifications of the Revised Version of the New Testament" (Andover, 1883); "A Bible Dictionary," in Bulgarian (Constantinople, 1884); and minor publications, including tracts, hymns, and collections of hymns. In 1866, Riggs, George Washington, banker, b. in Georgetown, D. C., 4 July, 1813; d. at Green Hill, Prince George's co., Md., near Washington, 24 Aug., 1881. He was educated at Yale and in Paris, with William W. Corcoran, formed the banking-house of Corcoran and Riggs, which acquired a national fame during the Mexican war by taking up the entire loan that was called for by the government in 1847 and 1848. This proved a profitable transaction from the large commission that was received and indirectly by bringing the firm into great public favor. When, Mr. Corcoran retired from business Mr. Riggs formed the present firm of Riggs and Co. He also entered largely into the purchase of real estate in Washington and other parts of the District of Columbia. Mr. Riggs took a great interest in the management of the affairs of the District, and in 1873 he acted as chairman of the committee that presented a petition to congress asking for an investigation into the conduct of the board of public works. The result of the investigation was that the congressional committee reported in favor of abolishing the existing territorial government, and a new system was inaugurated, which vested all authority in congress itself. Mr. Riggs possessed literary and artistic taste, and collected a library of valuable books and many works of art.

RIGGS, Stephen Return, missionary, b. in Steubenville, Ohio, 28 March, 1812; d. in Beloit, Wis., 24 Aug., 1883. He was graduated at Jefferson college, Pa., 1835, and in 1837 entered Western theological seminary at Allegheny, Pa., being licensed to preach by the presbytery of Chillicothe. Having been sent out as a missionary by the American board, he proceeded to Lake Huron mission, near Fort Snelling, in 1837. Here he spent several months in studying the Dakota language, and subsequently joined the mission at Lac-epi-par, where, in 1829, he entertained John C. Fremont and Jean Nicolet (q. v.) In 1843 he opened a new mission station at Traverse des Sioux, and was in charge of it until December, 1849, when he returned to Lac-epi-par, and remained there until 1851. In that year he removed to Hazewood station, near the mouth of Yellow Medicine river, and built a boarding house for Dakota children. Here he remained until the summer of 1858, when his work was interrupted by the Indian insurrection of that year, the Little Crow. Mr. Riggs and his family left their home on 19 Aug., and after traveling several days and after many hardships, reached a place of safety. Recrossing to Fort Snelling, Dr. Riggs, as his successors, Captain Ramsey, and Major Winfield, who nominated him chaplain of the military expedition that was sent out to protect the frontier and punish the hostile Indians. After the campaign closed, Dr. Riggs employed his summers in visiting mission stations, and his winters in completing the translation of the Bible into the Dakota language, which was published in 1862. The translations, consisting of translations and original writings in connection with Dakota history, customs, and language, represent the literary work of his lifetime. He received the degree of B.D. from Beloit college in 1853 and that of LL.D. from Jefferson. He also wrote "The Dakota First Reading-Book," with Gibson H. Pond, Cincinnati, 1839; "Wowapi Mitewi, Tamakkee Kuga: My Own Book," Bel- ton, 1842; "Dakota Tawoosite, or Dakota Lessons," Louisville, 1850; and "Dakota Vocabulary" (New York, 1852); and edited "A Grammar and Dictionary of the Dakota Language, collected by the Members of the Dakota Mission" (Washington, 1852, being vol. iv. of "Smithsonian Contributions," revised ed.); "Tahapi Wakan, or the Dakota English-Spartan Dictionary," "The Bible in Dakota," with Dr. J. S. Williamson (1859); and "Forty Years among the Sioux" (1859). He also edited, with Rev. J. P. Williamson, "Hymns in the Dakota Language" (New York, 1859).

RIGHTEST, Chester Newell, missionary, b. in Parsonville, Morris co., N. Y., 29 Sept., 1824; d. in Bataan, Philippines, 18 May, 1878. He was graduated at Yale, 1844, and subsequently studied theology at New Haven and Andover. After traveling in Europe for his health, he was ordained, 22 Sept., 1854, and sailed for the Levant the same year, where, on his arrival, he acted as an agent of the American Bible society. Extracts from his letters and journals will be found in "The Bible in the Levant; or, The Life and Letters of the Rev. C. N. Righter, Agent of the American Bible Society in the Levant," by Rev. Samuel I. Prime, D.D. (New York, 1859).

RIKER, James, historian, b. in New York city, 11 May, 1822; d. in Waverly, N. Y., 15 July, 1886. He traced his lineage from Abraham Rycker, of Amsterdam, who came to this country with Wilhelm Kief in 1638. After receiving his education at Cornelius institute, he taught in 1850-8, and served in the office of the American home missionary society in 1858-65 and in the U. S. revenue service in 1864-5. In 1869 he removed to Waverly, where he resided until his death. Mr. Riker established a library there, which was opened in 1865, and of which he was made librarian. He was a member of the historical societies of New York and Massachusetts, and of other similar associations. In addition to addresses and brochures upon the history of the Dutch settlers of New York, Mr. Riker is the author of "A Brief History of the Riker Family" (New York, 1848); "The Annals of New- town" (1854): "Harlem: its Origin and Early An- nals" (1851); and "The Indian History of Tioga County," in a gazetteer of that county Syracuse, 1889. At the time of his death he was preparing a "Dictionary of the First Settlers of New Nether- land Prior to the Year 1700."—His brother, John Lafayette, a colonel in the National army, was killed at Gettysburg.

RIKER, Richard, lawyer, b. in Newton, Long Island, N. Y., 9 Sept., 1811; d. in New York city, 20 Sept., 1872. He was educated under Dr. John Witherspoon, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1833. From 1832 till 1840 he was district attorney for New York, Westminster, and Queens counties, and in 1845 was elected district attorney for Suffolk county, in which capacity he was re-elected in 1847 and 1848-51. Mr. Riker was an ardent Republican, and on 11 Nov., 1846, was wounded in a judicial duel with Robert Swartwout. He was known for his generosity and patience on the bench, and possessed a profound knowledge of criminal law. Fitz-Greene Halleck made Mr. Riker the subject of his verses on "The Recorder."—W. H. Breckenridge.

RILEY, Bennett, b. in Frankfort, Va., 27 Nov., 1817; d. in Buffalo, N. Y., 9 June, 1853. He entered the army from civil life at an early period, being appointed from Maryland an ensign of rifles, 19 Jan., 1843, and continued in the service until he died. He became lieutenant on 13 March, served in the war of 1812, and was promoted captain, 6 Aug., 1814, major, 26 Sept., 1817, and lieutenant-colonel, 1 Dec., 1829. He served at Chelsea, Mass., 7 Apr., 1833 in an action with the Arickaree Indians, and for his services at Chataqua, Fla., 2 June, 1840, he was brevetted colonel. In the Mexican war of 1846-7 he was given important commands. He led the 2d infantry under Scott, and the 2d brigade of Twiggs's division in the valley of Mexico. He commanded the cavalry in occupation of Monterey, 22 Apr., 1847, for gallantry at Cerro Gordo, and that of major-general, 20 Aug., 1847, for Contreras. After one of his successful engagements with the enemy Gen. Winfield Scott assured him that his bravery had secured a victory for the American army. At the conclusion of the war Gen. Rile was placed in command of the Pacific department. With head- quarters at San Francisco, he was appointed governor of California, and served as the first chief magistrate of the territory and until the admission of the state into the Union. He became colonel of the 1st infantry on 31 Jan., 1859.

RILEY, Charles Valentine, entomologist, b. in London, 18 Sept., 1845; d. in Washington, D. C., 14 Sept., 1886. He attended school at Chelsea until he was eleven, and was then sent to the College of St. Paul in Dieppe, France, and three years later went to Bonn, Germany. In 1860 he came to the United States and settled on a farm in Illinois, where he acquired a practical knowledge of agriculture. Subsequently he became editorially connected with the "Evening Journal" and the "Prairie Farmer" in Chicago. He resigned these appointments in 1864, to serve with the 124th Illinois volunteers; and when his regiment was disbanded, toward the close of the war, he resumed his connection with the "Prairie Farmer." In 1868 he accepted the office of state entomologist of Missouri, which he held until 1867, and then he was appointed chief of the U. S. entomological commission that had been formed under the auspices of the department of interior for the purpose of investigating the Rocky mountain locust. He was made entomologist to the department of agriculture in 1878, but soon gave up this office and returned to his work in the entomological commission, for which he edited and wrote the more important original and practical portions of its four large reports (1877). After his retirement in 1884 he edited the United States department of agriculture division of the department of agriculture, to which the work of the commission was transferred, and he had since continued in charge of that division, also holding the office of curator of insects in the U. S. national museum, to which he presented his private entomological collection of more than 115,000 mounted specimens, including about 15,000 species. This is now the largest general entomological division of the United States. He had lectured on entomology at Cornell university, Kansas state agricultural college, Washington university, and Missouri state university, which institution conferred on him, in 1873, the honorary degree of Ph. D. Prof. Riley's great services to the community have been accomplished by his valuable researches on the insects most injurious to American agriculture, including the Rocky mountain locust, the army worm, the chinch-bug, the canker-worm, the cotton-worm, the potato-bettle, and the phylloxera. His researches on the latter attracted the attention of the French authorities, and in 1873 he was presented by that government with a gold medal that was designed for the occasion. In 1884 he received a gold medal from the international organization at the International forestry exhibition in Edinburgh. He was a member of many scientific societies in the United States and abroad, was general secretary of the American association for the advancement of science in 1881, and vice-president of the section of biology in 1888, president of the St. Louis academy of sciences in 1876-78, and first president of the Entomological society of Washington in 1881. In 1878, with Benjamin D. Walsh, he founded "The American Entomologist," but it was discontinued at the end of its second volume. It was resumed in 1880, but given up again at the close of the volume. Prof. Riley had contributed largely to the press and to cyclopaedia. The titles of his separate papers are about 2,000 in number, and he has published in book-form "Reports on the Noxious, Beneficial, and other Insects of the State of Missouri" (9 annual volumes, Jefferson City, 1869-77); "Potato Pests" (New York, 1876); "The Locust Plague in the United States" (Chicago, 1867); and "Annual Reports as Entomologist of the Department of Agriculture"; also a number of bulletins from the entomological division (Washington, 1881-91).}

RILEY, Henry Channey, P. E. bishop, b. in Santiago, Chile, 15 Dec., 1835. He was graduated at Columbia in 1858, studied theology in England, was ordained in 1866, and went to Mexico, where he labored as a missionary. He devoted his strength and his fortune to building up an Episcopal organization in that country, which was called the Church of Jesus, and was consecrated bishop of the valley of Mexico in 1879. Differences arose between him and other clergy, and he undertook to organize a church; he resigned his office.

RILEY, Henry Hiram, lawyer, b. in Great Barrington, Mass., 1 Sept., 1813; d. in Constantine, Mich., 8 Feb., 1888. He was left an orphan at the age of ten, received a common-school education in New Hartford, N. Y., learned the printer's trade in Hudson, N. Y., worked in New York city as a journeyman printer from 1834 to 1837, then in 1843 edited "The Speculator," a Democratic paper, at Watertown, N. Y., at the same time pursuing the study of law. He sold this and went to Kalamazoo, Mich., where he was admitted to the bar, and entered into practice in Constantine, taking a high rank in his profession. He was prosecuting attorney for St. Joseph county for six years, a member of the state senate in 1850-1, a delegate to the Democratic convention of 1850 at Charleston, where he supported the candidacy of Stephen A. Douglas for the presidency, a state senator again in 1862, an active member of the commission that revised the state constitution in 1867, and afterward judge of the circuit court. He contributed to the "Knickertooker Magazine," under the pen-name of "Simon Oakleaf," a number of humorous pieces, a "Puddletown Humors of the West," which were followed by "Puddletown and its People." The latter was issued in book-form (New York, 1854), and the earlier papers, which were partly humorous and partly descriptive of nature, were subsequently published in a volume in a revised form, and attained popularity (1851).

RILEY, James, mariner, b. in Middleborough, Conn., 27 Oct., 1777; d. at sea, 15 March, 1840. He became a sailor at the age of fifteen, was soon made master of a vessel, and commanded in 1806 the "Two Marys" which was seized and confiscated by the French. In April, 1815, he sailed from Hartford in the brig "Commerce." On the course from Gibraltar to the Cape Verde islands he was shipwrecked on the coast of Africa in August, 1815. He was a cast away on an island for eighteen months, and suffered such hardships and cruelties that his weight was reduced from 240 to 60 pounds. He was finally ransomed, with his companions, by W. Willshire, the British consul at Mogadore, whom the U. S. government reimbursed during the presidency of James Monroe. Riley settled in 1821 in Van Wert county, Ohio, where he founded the town of Willards, and in 1823 was elected to the legislature. During that important session he assisted in maturing the measures for improving the state by navigable canals, establishing an ad valorem system of taxation, providing a sinking fund for the debt, and advancing the common-school system of the state. In 1831 he resumed a seafaring life, and traded between Mogadore and American ports till his death. During his last visit to Morocco he received from the emperors a license to trade with people of the seaports that was more favorable than any that had before been granted to a Christian merchant. After his escape from captivity an "Authentic Narrative of the Loss of the American Brig 'Commerce' on the Western Ocean, by the Africans," written under the name of "Tanbuctoo" was prepared from his journals and log-books by Anthony Bleecker (New York, 1816), and was reprinted in England, obtaining a wide circulation in both countries, though it was supposed to be a fiction until others of the crew arrived.
to corroborate the story. Another survivor of the shipwreck, Archibald Robbins, published a narrative (Hartford, 1842). Riley's son, William Will-smuir, published a "sequel" to his narrative, embracing the story of his life, voyages, and travels after the shipwreck (Columbus, 1851).

RILEY, James Whitcomb, poet, b. in Greenfield, Ind., about 1852. He acquired a knowledge of men and a taste for a wandering life by travelling with his father, an attorney, and early left school and adopted the calling of a vagabond songwriter, sometimes simulating blindness in order to attain to the attention of the passersby. At times he performed in a theatrical troupe and became proficient in recasting plays and improving songs. About 1875 he began to contribute to the local papers verses in the western dialect, which he found more popular than serious poetry. He exhibited his imitative powers also by writing a short piece called "Leomaine," which many literary critics were deluded into accepting as a poem of Edgar A. Poe. He finally attained regular employment in the office of the Indianapolis "Journal," and in that paper, and latterly in the magazines, he has published numerous dialect and serious poems. His collected works are "The Old Sammimi-Hole, and Other More Poems," by "Benj. F. Johnson, of Boone" (1856); The Boss Girl, and other Sketches, consisting of the works of a Cincinnati street girl, "AFTERWHILES" (1857); "Character Sketches and Poems" (1857); and "Armazindy" (1894).

RILEY, John Campbell, physician, b. in Georgetown, D. C., 16 Dec., 1823; d. in Washingnton, D. C., 22 Feb., 1879. He was graduated at Georgetown college in 1848, studied in the National medical college at Washington, taking his degree in 1851, and served several years as a physician. In 1850 he became professor of materia medica and therapeutics in the National medical college. He was secretary to the National commission for revising the pharmacopoeia, and is the author of a "Compend of Materia Medica and Therapeutics" (Philadelphia, 1868).

RIMMER, John, artist, b. in Liverpool, England, 20 Feb., 1816; d. in South Milford, Mass., 20 Aug., 1879. His family emigrated to this country in 1818, and he began early to carve figures in gypsum and to paint. In 1844 he began the study of medicine, going to Bridgewater and then to South Boston, and supporting himself by painting. He remained in the profession sixteen years, and it was not until 1860 that he produced his first important work of art. This was a colossal head of "St. Stephen," carved directly from granite without a model. It was followed by the "Falling Gladiator" (1861), which is now in the Museum of fine arts, Boston, and which attracted wide attention. It was remarkable especially as showing his profound knowledge of the contours of the human body and perfect artistic skill.

He was urged to come to Boston and open an art-school, which he did, lecturer also before the Lowell institute and at Harvard on art anatomy.
In 1862 he became director of the School of design for women in the Cooper institute, New York city, where he remained four years, after which he returned to Boston and opened a studio in the rooms of Alexander Hamilton, in Boston, and "Lions Fighting" (1871). Dr. Rimmer also executed numerous paintings, but he felt too deeply the want of opportunity and of a proper appreciation of his advanced ideas to produce many original works.
His life was mainly devoted to teaching. He published "Elements of Design" (Boston, 1872; revised ed., 1879) and "Art Anatomy" (Boston, 1873).

RINALDINI, Benito (re-nal-dee-ni), Spanish missionary, b. in Brijia, province of Valencia, 15 June, 1685; d. in Michoacan about 1760. He traversed the Jesuit order in 1712, and was sent to Mexico about 1750, and assigned to the missions of the Tepetapan Indians. He wrote "Arte para aprender la lengua Tepehua" (Mexico, 1745).

RINCON, Antonio del (re-on-co), Mexican missionary, b. in Toezoco in 1541; d. in San Marin, Texmelucan, 2 March, 1901. He entered the Jesuit order in Tepotzotlan in 1573, taught in their colleges of Mexico and Puebla, and afterward gave way to life of missioning, and returned there.

Although paralyzed, he continued exercising his ministry, was carried by his converts from one village to the other, and died while preaching to the Indians. He wrote "Gramatika del Arte de la lengua Mexicana," Mexico, 1595; reprinted by Antonio Peinado, 1885.

RINEHART, William Henry, sculptor, b. near Union Bridge, Carroll co., Md., 13 Sept., 1823;
d. in Rome, Italy, 28 Oct., 1874. His youth was spent at the homestead, and he attended school until he was nearly eighteen years of age, when he began to work on his father's farm, but became the assistant of a stone-cutter in the neighborhood.
By strict attention to duty he soon excelled his employer, and in 1844 secured an apprenticeship in Baltimore, Maryland, and was sent to Italy to befit his education. By the study of art, as well by drawing and other studies in his leisure hours.
His energy and talent attracted the attention of his employers, who not only advanced him, but built a studio for him on their own premises. Many of the works that he produced during this time still exist in Baltimore. But after several years he decided to devote himself wholly to the art to which he was devoted, and went to Italy to continue his studies. While there he executed two bas-reliefs in marble, "Night" and "Morning." On his return, two years later, he opened a studio in Boston, where he executed, besides numerous busts, a famous figure for the post-office at Washington, and two figures, "Indian" and "Back-woodmen," for the front doors of the house of representatives. In 1858 he settled in Rome. During the succeeding eight years there came from his studio
"Hero and Leander," "Indian Girl," "St. Cecilia," "Sleeping Babes," "Woman of Samaria," "Christ," and the "Angel of Resurrection" (both now in London cemetery); and the bronze statue, "Love, reconciled with Death," in Greenmount cemetery, Baltimore. He completed also the front doors of the capitol, which Thomas Crawford left unfinished at his death. He made visits to this country in 1866 and in 1872, bringing with him in the latter year his statue of Chief-Justice Roger B.
Taney, which in the same year was unveiled in Annapolis, Md. In 1875 he set sail once more for Italy with a large number of orders. A desire to fill these, as also all his numerous commissions, forced him to remain in Italy for more than the usual length of time, and he fell a victim to consumption. Besides those already mentioned, Rinehart's principal works include: "Antigone";
"Nymph," "Glytie," which he has called his masterpiece, and which is owned by the Peabody institution; "Atalanta"; "Latona and her Children;
"Donna Ana," and "Saint Francis" (both 1877); and
"Rebecca," in the Corcoran gallery at Washington.

RINGGOLD, Samuel, congressman, b. in Chesterton, Kent co., Md., 15 Jan., 1770; d. in Frederrick county, Md., 18 Oct., 1829. He was educated by private tutors, served in the state senate for several years, was elected to congress as a Democrat in 1810 in place of Roger Nelson, resigned, served till 1813, was re-elected in 1816, and served till 1821. After his marriage with his first wife, Maria, daughter of Gen. John Cadwalader, he settled on his estate in Washington county, where he built one of the handsomest residences in the state. His second wife, Elizabeth, was the daughter of Col. Edward Lloyd, of Talbot county, Md.—his son, Samuel, soldier, b. in Washington county, Md., in 1800; d. in Point Isabel, Tex., 11 May, 1846. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1815, served as aide-de-camp to Gen. Winfield Scott, became 1st lieutenant in 1822, and was brevetted captain in 1832. He became captain in 1836, participated in the Florida war, and was brevetted major "for active and efficient conduct" during hostilities. He then organized a corps of flying artillery, and was mortally wounded at Palo Alto, the first battle of the Mexican war. He introduced flying artillery into this country, invented a saddle-tree, which was subsequently known as the McCollum saddle, and a revolving hammer made of brass for exploding the fulminating primers for field-guns, that prevented the blowing away of the hammer.—Another son, Cadwalader, naval officer, b. in Washington county, Md., 20 Aug., 1802; d. in New York city, 27 Aug., 1841. He was called midshipman 4 March, 1819, served in Com. Porter’s "mosquito fleet" in the West Indies in 1823-4 for the suppression of piracy, and was commissioned lieutenant, 17 May, 1828. In 1838 he was appointed to command the brig "Porpoise" in Lieut. Charles Wilkes' exploring expedition, and participated in making the discovery of the Antarctic continent. In August, 1840, he took part in an attack on the natives of Sumbul, Fijian islands, where two of the officers of the exploring expedition had been killed by cannibals. He assisted in the survey of Columbia river, Puget sound, the harbor of San Francisco and Sacramento river, and among the South sea islands. He returned to New York in June, 1842, by way of the Cape of Good Hope, after circumnavigating the globe, and collected valuable scientific information concerning the Pacific and Antarctic oceans. On 16 July, 1849, he was commissioned a commander. He was on special duty in California in 1849-51, and in the bureau of construction at the navy department in 1852, and took command of the North Pacific exploring expedition, sailing in the "Vincennes" on 28 March, 1853, and returning home in 1856. In September, 1855, he was placed on the reserved list, and on 2 April, 1856, he was promoted to captain on the active list. He had special duty in Washington in 1859-60. When the civil war began he was placed in command of the frigate "Sabine." He was commissioned commodore 16 April, 1862, and placed on the retired list, 29 Aug., 1864. He was made rear-admiral on the retired list, 25 July, 1866. Their half-brother, George Hay, soldier, b. in Hagerstown, Md., in 1814; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 4 April, 1864, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1833, and became 2d lieutenant, 6th infantry, on 15 Aug., 1836. He resigned from the army in 1837 and engaged in farming. He was reappointed with the rank of captain in 1845, made major on the staff, and paymaster in 1847. He served in the pay department during the Mexican war, became lieutenant-colonel and deputy paymaster-general in May, 1852, and was in charge of the paymasters of the Department of the Pacific from 1861 till his death. He was an accomplished scholar, draughtsman, and painter, and published "Pountain Rock, Amy Wort, and other Metrical Pastimes" (New York, 1869).
the protection of industrial arts in London a gold medal for his chemical discoveries. He was one of the principal members of the commission for preparing the New Mexican pharmacopoeia (1874). His works include "Introducción al estudio de la Química" (Mexico, 1849): "Estudio sobre el estafante" (1850); "Sobre los pozos artesianos y las aguas naturales de más uso en la ciudad de México" (1854): "Un visillo al lago de Texcoco; su influencia sobre la antigua provincia de México"; his courses and proceedings of the sales that contains; and "El Ahumadero" (1864): "El líquido tinto de la Baja California" and "Dictamina sobre el aéreo de la Descubridora" (1873); and scientific pamphlets.

RIONS, François Charles Hector d’Albert, Count de (recon), French naval officer, b. in Avignon, 10 Feb., 1728; d. in Paris, 3 Oct., 1802. He entered the navy in 1743, served in Canada during the war of 1756-1763, and was placed in charge of the station of Santo Domingo in 1769, where he made a survey of the coast of the Leeeward islands. He served under D’Estaing at Newport, in the campaign of the Antilles in 1778-79, and under Vaudreuil in the engagement with Admiral Arbuthnot in Chesapeake bay. He continued to serve under the famous American commodore, and assisted in the battles off St. Christopher and Dominica in April, 1782, and joined Vaudreuil at Boston. He emigrated in 1792, serving in Germany in the army of Condé, returned to France in 1800, and was pensioned in 1802. His works include "Récits des opérations de l’armée navale du Comte de Grasse pendant les années 1781-1782" (Concord, 1847).

RIORDAN, Patrick William, R. C. archbishop, b. in Chatham, N. B., 27 Aug., 1841. He was taken by his parents to Chicago, Ill., in 1848, and was educated at the University of St. Mary’s of the Lake in that city. He was then sent to the American college at Rome, but, being attacked by malaria, he completed his studies in Paris and Louvain. He was ordained a priest in Belgium in 1865 by Cardinal Sterckx, and on his return to the United States was appointed professor of ecclesiastical history and canon law in the theological seminary of St. Mary’s of the Lake. In 1867 he was transferred to the chair of dogmatic theology. From 1868 till 1871 he was engaged in missionary work at the Missionary Seminary of the Sacred Heart, in St. James’s church, Chicago. There he devoted himself to sustaining and extending the parochial schools under the charge of the Sisters of Mercy. While he was thus engaged he received notice of his appointment as titular bishop of Cabesa, and was ordained, with the right of succession, to Archbishop Joseph S. Aulemany, of San Francisco. He was consecrated at St. James’s, 16 Sept., 1883, arrived in San Francisco in the following November, and at once, by visitations and in other ways, relieved his superior of many of the heavier burdens of the episcopate. After taking part with Dr. Aulemany in the 61 plenary council of Baltimore, he succeeded to the archbishopric on the resignation of the former in 1888.

RIPLEY, Eleazar Wheelock, soldier, b. in Hanover, N. H., 15 April, 1782; d. in West Feliciana, La., 2 March, 1839. His father, Sylvanus, was professor of divinity for many years in Dartmouth, where the son was graduated in 1800. He then began the practice of law, settled in Portland, Me., was a member of the Massachusetts legislature in 1818, and in 1823 he became rector of St. John’s church. At the beginning of the second war with Great Britain he was appointed lieutenant in the 21st infantry, became colonel in March, 1813, and was wounded in the attack on York (now Toronto), Canada, 13 April, 1813. He was then engaged on the frontier till 14 April, 1814, when he was appointed brigadier-general, commanded the second brigade of Gen. Jacob Brown’s army in July following, and led it with gallantry in the battles of Chippewa and Niagara, winning the brevet of major-general for his conduct, and receiving severe wounds in the latter engagement. In the defense of the city of Detroit, 15 Sept., 1814, in which he was shot through the neck, he bore a gallant part, and for his services during that campaign he received a gold medal from congress, on which was inscribed "Niagara, Chippewa, Erie." At the reduction of the army in 1815 he was retained in the service, but he resigned in 1820 and removed to Louisiana, where he practised law, and was a member of the state senate. He was elected to congress as a Jackson Democrat in 1834, and served until his death, which was the result of his old wounds. He published a Fourth-of-July oration (1805).

RIPLEY, Ezra, clergyman, b. in Woodstock, Conn., 1 May, 1751; d. in Concord, Mass., 21 Sept., 1841. He was graduated at Harvard in 1776, studied theology at Cambridge, Mass., and was graduated at Harvard in 1778, was ordained to the ministry in Concord, Mass., where he continued for sixty-three years, preaching his last sermon the day after his ninety-fifth birthday. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1818. Dr. Ripley was a leader in the temperance cause. At the time of his settlement in Concord the town was divided in religious opinions, but he quietly united them in binding them in a union that existed for nearly fifty years. He married the widow of the Rev. William Emerson, and his stepson, Ralph Waldo Emerson, said of him: "With a limited acquaintance with books, his knowledge was an external experience, an Indian wisdom. In him perhaps more personal and local anecdote of Concord and its vicinity than is possessed by any survivor, and in his constitutional leaning to their religion he was one of the rear-guard of the great camp and army of the Puritans." He gave the land in 1836 upon which the monument is built to commemorate the battle of Concord, 19 April, 1775. From the Revolution for fifty years there was a controversy between those who looked to Concord for the birth of the first forcible resistance to British aggression. Dr. Ripley wrote an interesting pamphlet on that subject, entitled "History of the Fight at Concord," in which he proved that, though the enemy had fired first in Lexington, the Americans fired first in his own town (Concord, 1827). He also published several sermons and addresses, and a "Half-Century Discourse" (1828).

RIPLEY, George, scholar, b. in Greenfield, Mass., 3 Oct., 1802; d. in New York City, 4 July, 1889. He was the youngest but one of ten children, four boys and six girls, all of whom he survived. His father, Jerome Ripley, was a merchant, a justice of the peace for nearly half a century, a representative in the legislature, and one of the justices of the court of sessions. His mother was a formal, precise, stately, but kind-hearted woman, a connection of Benjamin Franklin. She was orthodox in religion, and her husband was a Unitarian, which accounts for the singular mingling of conservative feeling with radical tendencies in their child. George loved to hear the old tunes at Brook farm, and often bought and released a copy of Dr. Watts’s hymns, even when he was writing philosophical articles for the "Trilobite," and worshiping in New York with an independent society of.

the most liberal type. He was graduated at Harvard in 1823, the first scholar in a class that included men of some intellectual distinction. His only rival was John P. Robinson, who might have outstripped him, but was suspended for the part he took in a "rebellion," and so lost his degree. At Cambridge young Ripley was known as an excellent scholar, especially in languages and literature. He was also proficient in mathematics, which he taught for some time at the college while it was struggling with theological questions. Three years were spent at the divinity school, and on 8 Nov., 1826, he was ordained pastor of a new religious society in Boston, President of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In 1837, he published "Rationale of Agnosticism," and his aim was to establish an agricultural, literary, and scientific school or college, "in order to live a religious and moral life worth the name." A stock company was formed, and a farm and utensils were purchased. The best minds were attracted, and the plan at first seemed full of promise; but the tremendous labor, the absence of all signs of toil and anxiety, the sense of equality in condition, and the abolition of all class distinctions, made work a delight. There was exhilaration, joy, gaiety. The new earth had come. Wealth was nothing, fame was nothing; natural development was all. Mr. Ripley was over in, and through the whole. He taught intellectual and moral philosophy and mathematics, wrote letters, milked cows, drove oxen, talked, lent a cheerful temper to every part of the arrangement, animated the various groups, and sent his ringing laugh to all corners of the institution. When the Brook Farm undertaking failed, in 1847, from several causes, chief among which were financial embarrassments, infertility of the soil, and want of public interest in the scheme, Mr. Ripley went to Flatbush, L. I., for several months, where his wife taught and he labored at journalism. In 1848 they came to New York. She became an enthusiastic Roman Catholic, and died in 1861, after a painful, lingering illness, arising from an accident that induced cancer. The husband went into retirement, busy in the mean time with various literary enterprises. His visits were too numerous to mention. The "New American Cyclopedia," of which he was joint editor with Charles A. Dana, begun in 1857, was finished in 1863, and under the same editors it was completely revised in 1873-5. Late in 1861 he emerged from seclusion in Brooklyn, came again to New York, went into society moderately, read for the press, wrote for the Tribune, and for some time past a couple of hours daily in his study, worked on, planned, helped edit books. There was the same earnestness in the cause of humanity, but now his aim was to elevate the intellectual standard, refine the taste, purify the sentiments of the community. In 1865 he married Angusta Schlossberger, a young widow, German by birth, Parisian by education. She married Alphonse Pinel after Mr. Ripley's death. He lives in Azen, France. The union with Mr. Ripley was entirely happy; the new life was bright and prosperous. He travelled abroad, saw many people, lived in the world, did a vast amount of literary labor, was hearty and cheerful, the honored centre of a brilliant intellectual circle. The University of Michigan conferred on him the degree of LL.D. in 1874. He died of angina pectoris. Besides his work as a critic, in which he endeavored to raise the level of literary achievement and encourage talent, George Ripley was the friend of aspiring young men, poets, prose-writers, thinkers, without regard to creed or nationality. He was a cheery companion, a warm-hearted, genial, loyal comrade; modest, unassuming, ready to serve. To strangers he seemed reserved, but to his intimates he was frank and jovial, fond of jokes and laughter, responsive, and sympathetic. He left no extended work, though he projected a series of critical and biographical sketches. As a promoter of sound learning he will be gratefully remembered. His "Life" has been written for the "American Men of Letters" series, by Octavius B. Frothingham (Boston, 1882).

RIPLEY, Henry Jones, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 28 Jan., 1798; d. in Newton Centre, Mass., 21 May, 1875. From the Boston Latin School, where he was "a medalled scholar," he passed to Harvard, where he remained from 1814 to 1818, and in 1816, closing his course in Andover theological seminary, he was ordained to the Baptist ministry in Boston in November, 1819. The early years of his ministry were spent in preaching to the colored people of Georgia. In 1826 he was elected professor of biblical literature and pastoral duties in Newton theological institution, where he continued until his resignation in 1839. After his resignation he labored again for some time among the colored people of Georgia. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Alabama in 1844 and from Harvard in 1845. Besides numerous articles for magazines and reviews, Dr. Ripley was the author of "Memoir of Rev. Thomas S. Winn" (Boston, 1824); "Christian Baptism" (1833): "Notes on the Acts of the Apostles" (1844): "Sacred Rhetoric" (1849): "Notes on the Epistle to the Romans" (1857): "Church Polity" (1867) and "Notes on the Epistle to the Hebrews" (1868).

RIPLEY, James Wolfe, soldier, b. in Windham, Conn., 30 Dec., 1794; d. in Hartford, Conn., 16 March, 1859. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1814 and entered the artillery, served in the second war with Great Britain, and participated in the defense of Sackett's Harbor. He became battalion quartermaster of artillery in 1816, 1st lieutenant in 1818, was engaged during the Seminole war in the seizure of Pensacola and the capture of San Carlos de Barrancas, and was commissioned for running the boundary-line of the Florida Indian reservations in 1823-4. He became captain in 1825, was in command at Charleston harbor during the threatened South Carolina nullification disturbances in 1832-3, and became major in 1838. He was superintendent of the Springfield armory in 1841-54, and in May, 1848, was brevetted lieutenant-colonel "for the performance of his duties in connection with the Mexican war." He became full lieutenant-colonel in 1854, was chief of ordnance in the Department of the Pacific in 1855-7, and became colonel and chief of ordnance, U. S. army, which he held till his retirement in 1861. He received the brevet of brigadier-general, U. S. army, in July, 1861, and in August was promoted to the full rank. From his retirement until his death he was inspector of the armament of fortifications on the New England coast. In March, 1865, he received the brevet of major-general, U. S. army, for "long and faithful service."—His nephew, Roswell Sabine, soldier, b. in Worthington, Franklin co., Ohio, 14 March, 1825; d. in New York city, 26 March, 1897, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1846, serving in the Mexican war, where he was engaged at Monterey, Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo, Contreras, Churubusco, Molino del Rey, Chapultepec, and the capture of the city of Mexico, and was brevetted captain for Cerro Gordo and major for Chapultepec. He engaged in the Florida war in 1849, but resigned from the army in 1853 and engaged in business in Cincinnati. He continued in Florida during the civil war he entered the Confederate service, directed the fire on Fort Sumter, 13 April, 1861, and in August of that year was appointed brigadier-general, with command of the Department of South Carolina and its coast defences. He was in charge of the 21st military district of that state from December, 1861, till May, 1862, commanded a brigade that was composed of two Georgia and two North Carolina regiments in the defence of Richmond, Va., in June, 1862, and with it participated in the battles of Mechanicsville, Gaines' Mills, Malvern Hill, South Mountain, Antietam, and Fredericksburg. He rose in command of the 1st military district of that state, constructed the defences of Charleston, and met the naval attack on 7 April, 1863. After the evacuation of that city he joined Gen. Robert E. Lee in Richmond, and continued with him till the surrender. He went abroad after the war, resided in Paris for several years, and subsequently returned and engaged in business in Charloston, S. C. He published a "History of the Mexican War" (2 vols., New York, 1849). was entrusted with important studies connected with the chemistry of wine. In 1885 he was appointed state analyst of California, with charge of the examination of various food-products. Prof. Rising is a member of the Chemical society of Berlin, and of similar societies in this country. His writings include accounts of original investigations in scientific journals, and, in addition to his official reports, he has published the results of his special studies prepared at the instance of the state board of agriculture.

RITCHIE, Samuel Doty (riz'-ly), physician, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 16 Jan., 1845. He entered the National army in 1862 as a private, served three years, and attained the rank of sergeant. He was graduated at the University of Iowa in 1868, at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1870, and settled in Philadelphia. After his appointment as surgeon to the dispensary staff of the Episcopal hospital he abandoned general practice, devoting himself to eye and ear diseases, became chief of the dispensary for these diseases on the opening of the hospital of the University of Pennsylvania in 1873, lecturer on ophthalmoscopy in its medical department in 1877, and subsequently assistant surgeon there in the same branch. He invented a sensitive ophthalmoscope and has invented an optometer with perimeter attachment for measuring errors of refraction in the human eye and mapping the field of vision, and an ophthalmoscope with cylindrical lenses, securing a wide range of spheric-cylindrical lenses. He has published numerous papers on his specialty, which include "The More Frequently Occurring Forms of Conjunctival Disease" (1877), and the "Myriatics Compared" (1884).

RISTORI, Adelaide, Italian actress, b. in Civile, Friuli, 29 Jan., 1822. Her parents, who were comedians, placed her upon the stage at a very early age, and she soon gained reputation in comedy, Soldini's plays being her favorite pieces. She subsequently turned to tragedy, and attained eminence in that line. After her marriage with the Marquis Giuliano Capranica del Grillo she withdrew from the stage for several years. In 1855 she made her début in Paris, where she met with great success. During the succeeding ten years Ristori made various tours in Europe, visiting all of the principal cities. In September, 1866, she began her first American tour, which lasted until May of the following year, and during 1869 she travelled through South America. In May, 1874, she began a journey around the world, in the course of which she appeared again in South America and in Mexico, going thence to the United States. Her last visit to this country was during the season of 1884-5, and lasted seven months. During this time, besides appearing in her principal roles, she played the part of "Potiphar's Wife" in "Joseph," and also a performance of "Mary Stuart" at the Thalia theatre, speaking English, while the other actors spoke German. The tragedies in which she especially excels are "Queen Elizabeth," "Marie Antoinette," "Maria Stuart," "Myrrha," "Francesca de Rimini," "Macbeth," "La Pia del Tolomei," and "Ida." Her biographical works, which is largely made up of analyses of her plays, is her best, and has been translated and published under the title "Studies and Memoirs" (London, England, 1888) and in the "Famous Women" series (Boston, Mass., 1888).

RITCHIE, John Warren, architect, b. in Putnam county, N. Y., 22 June, 1822. He came to New York in 1831, and, after spending eleven years in the office of William Henry, the architect, he established himself in 1846 in the practice of his profession in New York city, where he has since continued. Among his important buildings in New York city are the Bank of commerce, the Union dinners bank, the buildings of the American express company and the merchants' dispatch company, St. Luke's hospital, the State emigrant hospital, the nursery and child's hospital, and the artificial islands and quarantine hospital in the lower bay. He also designed and erected the hurries, the West 10th street bridge from 1867 till its removal two years later. During 1847-8 he edited the "American Architect."

RITCHIE, Alexander Hay, artist, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 14 Jan., 1822; d. in New Haven, Conn., 19 Sept., 1895. He studied under Sir William Allan, receiving a premium during the first year. In 1841 he came to New York, whence, after several years, he removed to Brooklyn, where he afterward resided. He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1863 and an academician in 1871, and had exhibited frequently at the academy since 1848. Mr. Ritchie was known both as a painter and as an engraver. His works in oil include "Mercy knocking at the Gate" (1869); "Fitting out Moses for the Fair" (1862); "Death of Lincoln" (1865); "Death of General Logan;" "Death of the President's Guardsman." His portraits, among which are those of Prof. Charles Hedge (1863) and Dr. James McCosh (1870). Among his numerous engravings, mostly executed in the mezzo-tinta manner, are "Amos Kendall;" "Mercy's Dream" (1859); "George Washington," after a painting by Peter F. Rothermel (1852); and "Lady Washington's Reception-Day," after Daniel Huntington. Among his engravings are Felix O. C. Darley (1868); and "Henry Clay" (1848). "Washington and his Generals," "Death of Lincoln," after his own paintings. He had engraved a large number of portraits.

RITCHIE, David, revenue officer, b. in England in 1859; d. in Bay Shore, L. I., 3 March, 1874. He was appointed to the U. S. revenue service from the District of Columbia in 1862 as 3d lieutenant, and became 1st lieutenant in 1865, and captain in 1871. While in command of the revenue steamer "Moccasin," 30 Aug., 1872, he went to the rescue of the passengers and crew of the steamer "Metis," which was wrecked off Watch Hill, R. I. He and his crew picked up forty-two persons out of a rough and dangerous sea and recovered seventeen dead bodies. For this service Capt. Ritchie and his command received the thanks of congress by joint resolution, 24 Jan., 1873.

RITCHIE, John William, Canadian jurist, b. in Annapolis, 26 March, 1808; d. in Halifax, 13 Dec., 1890. He was the son of Thomas Ritchie, a Nova Scotia judge, of Scottish origin. He was educated at Pictou, and was admitted to the bar of Nova Scotia in 1825. He was called to the bar of the United States in 1836, and in 1836. In 1859 he was a commissioner for consolidating the statutes of Nova Scotia, and subsequent to adjust the tenant's right question in Prince Edward island. In 1864 he became a member of the executive council of Nova Scotia, and in 1867 he was appointed to the Canadian senate. In June, 1870, Mr. Ritchie was appointed judge of the supreme court of Nova Scotia, and in 1877 he became judge in equity. His brother, Sir William Johnstone, Canadian jurist, b. in Annapolis, N. S., 28 Oct., 1833; d. in Ottawa, Canada, 23 Sept., 1892, studied law with his brother, and was admitted to the bar of New Brunswick in 1838. He was appointed queen's counsel in 1854, and was a member of the executive council of the province from Oct., 1809, until he was appointed puisne judge of the supreme court of New Brunswick, 17 Aug., 1855. He held this place on the bench till 6 Dec., 1863, when he became chief justice of New Brunswick. He was appointed a puisne judge of the supreme court of the Dominion, 8 Oct., 1869, and chief justice of Canada, 1 Jan., 1879. He represented the city and county of St. John in the New Brunswick assembly from 1846 till 1851, when he retired, and served again from 1854 till his elevation to the bench. He was knighted by the queen, 1 Nov., 1881. Sir William was deputy governor of Canada during the absence of Lord Lorne in England, from 6 July, 1881, till January, 1882, and again from 28 Feb. to 8 March, 1884, he was appointed deputy of the governor-general, Lord Lansdowne.

RITCHIE, Robert, naval officer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 21 Jan., 1788; d. there, 6 July, 1870. He entered the navy as midshipman, 1 Feb., 1814, and cruised in the sloop "Peaceock," in the Mediterranean squadron, in 1814-18, and in the "Guerrisse," on the same station in 1819-20. In 1821-2 he was attached to the Philadelphia navy-yard. He served in Com. Porter's "mosquito fleet" for the suppression of piracy in the West Indies in 1825-6, and in 1827 was in the "Grampus" on the West India station, and was commissioned lieutenant, 15 Jan., 1833. In 1839 he was on surveying for the first French Mediterranean station, in 1839-40, and commanded the schooner "Grampus" in a cruise in the West Indies in 1833-5. He was commissioned commander, 8 Sept., 1841, assigned to the frigate "Columbia," on the Brazil station, in 1845, and attached to the Philadelphia navy-yard in 1848-51. On 13 Sept., 1855, he was placed on the retirement list, but he was restored to the active list and commissioned captain, 14 Sept., 1855. He was on leave until August, 1859, when he took command of the steamer "Saranac," in the Pacific squadron, until March, 1862. He was retired 21 Dec., 1861, and after his return from the last cruise in the Pacific resided at Philadelphia. He was promoted to commodore, July 1, 1867. He was married, 4 April, 1814, to Elizabeth, daughter of Geo. G. Williams, of Philadelphia.

RITCHIE, Thomas, farmer, b. in Essex county, Va., 3 Nov., 1778; d. in Richmond, Va., 12 July, 1854. His father, a native of Scotland, died when the son was six years old. The latter received an academic education and studied medicine, but abandoned it to become a teacher in Fredericksburg, Va., where he remained till he removed to Richmond in 1804. He became editor in that city of the "Examiner," the same year, whose name he changed to the "Enquirer," and he continued to edit and publish it for forty years, exercising an influence that was not surpassed by any other journal in the Union. At the request of President Polk he resigned the "Enquirer" to his two sons in 1845, and, removing to Washington, assumed the editorship of the "Union," the organ of the administration, but retired in 1849. Mr. Ritchie was a Democrat of the extreme state-rights faction, and believed that nothing so became an editor as to be at war with all his rival contemporaries. He was a well-known figure in social and diplomatic circles, in which he was welcome for his simple and generous though irascible nature and his Virginian pecuarieties of speech and dress.

RITNER, Joseph, governor of Pennsylvania, b. in Berks county, Pa., 25 March, 1780; d. in Carlisle, Pa., 16 Oct., 1889. His father came to this country from Alsace. The son attended school during only six months, but while working on a farm he had access to a good library of German books, by which he profited so much as to supply largely the deficiencies of his early education. In 1820 he was elected to the legislature, and he served there till 1827. He was the unsuccessful candidate of the anti-Masons for governor of Pennsylvania in 1828, but was elected to that office in 1833, and served four years. He was nominated again for governor by the anti-Masons in 1838, but was defeated. Gov. Ritner was one of the originators of the school system of Pennsylvania, and was an earnest opponent of slavery and intemperance. In 1849 he was for a short time director of the mint at Philadelphia, and he was a delegate from Pennsylvania to the National Republican convention that nominated John C. Frémont for president.

RITTENHOUSE, William, paper-maker, b. in the principality of Broich, Holland, in 1644; d. in Roxborough, Philadelphia, Pa., in 1708. He was a Mennonite preacher, and with his sons, Claus and Gerhard, and his daughter, Elizabeth, came to this country from Amsterdam, Holland, and settled at Germantown, Pa., in 1687-8. His ancestors for many generations had been paper-makers in Arnheim, and he built in 1689 the first paper-mill in this country, on Paper-mill run, a branch of Wissahickon creek, in Roxborough township. The mill was owned by a company, among whom were, besides himself, Robert Turner, Thomas Treese, Samuel Carpenter, and William Bradford. It was the first white water-mill in the British colonies south of New England. In 1700-1 this mill was carried away by a flood, but, with the aid of William Penn, was rebuilt of stone in 1702. Rittenhouse became the sole owner of the paper-mill in 1704, and before his death gave it to his son, Claus or Nicholas (1696-1734). The business increased, and soon an additional mill of stone was added. From paper that was made at this place William Bradford was supplied, and Gabriel Thomas writes: "All sorts of very good paper are made in the German Town." The business was carried on by direct descendants of William at the same place until well into the 19th century. William continued his preaching in this country, being the first Mennonite minister in Pennsylvania, and he was one of his son's sons, who was named after Thomas Lloyd, the deputy governor, on 7 May, 1691.

—Among Claus's children was Matthías (1706-1759), who became a farmer and settled in Norriton township, Montgomery co., Pa., and the latter's eldest son was David, astronomer, b. in Roxborough, Pa., 8 April, 1732; d. in Philadelphia, 26 June, 1786. He was early trained to work on a farm, but an uncle, dying when the boy was about twelve years old, left him a chest of tools, together with a book on "ciphering," that contained the elements of arithmetic and geometry, and some mathematical calculations. These seem to have determined the bent of his life, for he covered the handle of his plough, and even the fences around the fields, with mathematical calculations. He was not without considerable mechanical ability, as he had made a complete water-mill in miniature when he was eight years old, and at seventeen he made a wooden clock, and later one in metal. In 1751 he persuaded his father to advance money with which he purchased in Philadelphia an outfit of tools, and then established himself in Norriton as a clock- and mathematical-instrument-maker. His days were spent in following his trade, and his nights were given to study. He solved abstruse mathematical and astronomical problems, and devised the method of fluxions, and for a long time believing that he was its originator. He mastered an English translation of Newton's "Principia," also devoting himself to the study of optics. In 1754 he became acquainted with Thomas Barton (q. v.), who supplied him with books, from which he gained a knowledge of Latin and Greek. His clocks became celebrated for their accuracy; he obtained a local reputation for astronomical knowledge, and through Mr. Barton, who became his brother-in-law, he was introduced to men of learning. In 1763 he was called on to determine the initial and most difficult part of the boundary-line between Pennsylvania and Maryland, and this task was so well accomplished that he was offered extra compensation on its completion. He was instrumental in starting an iron forger's own manufacture, when the official astronomers, Charles Mason and Jonathan Dixon, arrived in 1763, they accepted his observations without change. He was appointed in 1769, at the request of a commission that was selected by New York and New Jersey, to settle the boundary-lines between these colonies. Meanwhile he continued his scientific researches, studying variations in the oscillations of the pendulum that are caused by the expansion and contraction of the material from which it is made, and devised a satisfactory plan of compensation; also about this time he made a thermometer on the principle of the expansion and contraction of metals. Later he constructed an orrery on a new and more perfect plan than had ever before been attempted, which, when it was finished in 1770, was regarded by John Adams as "a most beautiful machine.... It exhibits almost every motion in the astronomical world." Princeton purchased it for £300, and later Rittenhouse made a larger instrument from the same model for the University of Pennsylvania, for which he received £400. In January, 1772, he declined a northern appointment of the American Philosophical Society, and in June of the same year he addressed the society on the transit of Venus that occurred on 3 June, 1769, in consequence of which three committees were appointed by that body to make observations. One of these, under Rittenhouse, was stationed at his observatory in Norriton, and all of the preliminary arrangements were made by him. He set to work with whomever Thomas Penn sent a reflector from Europe, and other apparatus was secured, all of which Rittenhouse mounted. The observations, according to the testimony of the astronomer royal of England, were excellent, and, according to another authority, "the first approximately accurate results in the measurement of the spheres were given to the world, not by this eminent man." A second comet, which was watched from the magnificent royal observatories of Europe, but by unpaid amateurs and devotees to science in the youthful province of Pennsylvania." In 1769 he observed the transit of Mercury, and a year later he calculated the elements of the motion and the orbit of a comet. In 1770 he removed to Philadelphia, where he continued to engage in mechanical pursuits, and also for some years had charge of the state-house clock. He continued his experiments, and in 1771 investigated the electric properties of the gymnotus, or electric eel. In 1772 he was engaged to survey and ascertain the levels of the lands between the Susquehanna and Delaware rivers, and in 1773 he was chief of a commission to make the Schuylkill river navigable. He was commissioner from Pennsylvania in 1774 to determine the northwestern extremity of the boundary between New York and Pennsylvania. In March, 1775, the American Philosophical Society, on the consideration of the Pennsylvania assembly a plan for the erection of an observatory under state control, with a view of tendering the appointment of director to Mr. Rittenhouse. The Revolutionary war prevented the carrying out of this project, and he was ordered "to prepare models for the casting of clock-weights, and send them to some iron-furnace, and order sufficient number to be immediately made for the purpose of exchanging them with the inhabitants of this city for their leaden clock-weights." In October, 1775, he was appointed engineer to the committee of safety, and in that capacity he was called upon to arrange for casting cannon of iron and brass, to view a site for the erection of a Continental powder-mill, to conduct experiments for rilling cannon, to devise means to enable the iron manufacturer to remove the iron from the hot forge, and to superintend the manufacture of saltpetre, and to locate a magazine for military stores on Wissahickon creek. He was appointed one of the committee of safety in April, 1776, its vice-president in August, and in November the proclamations that were issued bore his name as presiding officer. In March, 1776, he was elected a member of the assembly from Pennsylvania, and later he became a member of the convention that met on 15 July, 1776, and drafted the first constitution for the state of Pennsylvania. He was one of the board of war for the state of Pennsylvania, and later one of the council of safety, to whom the most absolute powers were temporarily granted. In January, 1777, he was elected first state treasurer under the new constitution, and he was unanimously elected to the same office for twelve years, until finally, in 1789, he declined to serve any longer. On several occasions he was appointed to act on various boundary commissions, and in 1792 he was appointed first director of the mint, which place he filled for three years. From 1779 till 1782 he was professor of astronomy in the University of Pennsylvania, and was a director and vice-provost of the same institution. In 1783 he received the honorary degree of A. M. from Princeton, and in 1789 the same college conferred on him the degree of L.L. D. He was elected a fellow of the American Academy of arts and sciences in 1782, and in 1791 he was chosen an honorary fellow of the Royal Society of London. In 1774 he was elected one of the seven presidents of the American Philosophical Society, of which he became vice-president in 1786, and, on the death of Benjamin Franklin in 1790, he was chosen its president, which office he then held until his death. The early volumes of the transactions of that society were enriched by his scientific contributions, about twenty in number; his most elaborate paper, "An Observation on Astronomy" (Philadelphia, 1759), was delivered on 24 Feb., 1775. Thomas Jefferson, who succeeded him as president of the Philosophical society, wrote: "We have supposed Mr. Rittenhouse second to no astronomer living; that in genius he must be first, because he is self-taught. See "Life of David Rittenhouse," by James H. Kenrick, in Mark's "An American Biographer," 1890; and "Memoirs of the Life of David Rittenhouse," by William Barton (Philadelphia, 1813).
RITTER, Abraham, author, b. in Philadelphia in September, 1792; d. there, 8 Oct., 1890. His father, Jacob, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and the son became a merchant in his native city. He was for fifty years a member of the board of elders of the Moravian church. He published a "History of the Moravian Church in Philadelphia, 1742-57" (Philadelphia, 1857), and "Philadelphia and her Merchants" (1800).

RITTER, Frederic Louis, musician, b. in Strassburg in 1834; d. in Antwerp, 4 July, 1891. He was of a Spanish family; the name was originally Guerra. He lived for a time in a small town in the province of Cabullera. He was an early age under Hauser and Hans M. Schletter. When sixteen years old he received some instruction from Georges Kastner in Paris, whence he went to Germany to continue his studies there. In 1852 he received the appointment of professor of music in the Protestant seminary of Fene- strange, Lorraine. Later he was also called to Bordeaux to conduct a series of concerts. About 1856 he came to the United States. For several years after his arrival he resided in Cincinnati, doing much to advance the cause of music during his stay in that city. He organized the Cecilia and the Philharmonic societies, and under his leadership many works were produced for the first time in this city. He was a member of the New York and became conductor of the Sacred Harmonic society and of the Arion, a choral society. In 1861 he organized and conducted at Steinway hall the first musical festival that was held in the city. He was appointed professor of music at Vassar college the same year, and after 1874 he had resided in Poughkeepsie. The University of New York conferred the degree of Doctor of Music upon him in 1878. As a writer on musical topics he is well known on both sides of the Atlantic. Besides numerous articles in English, German, and French periodicals, he had written "A History of Music in the Form of Lectures" (Boston, 1870-9; 4 ed., London, 1876); "Music in England" (New York, 1871); "Music in America" (1874); "Manual of Musical Discords" (Philadelphia, 1881); "Dictionary of American Composers" (New York, 1886); and "Musical Dictation" (London, 1888). He edited the English edition of "Das Reich der Töne"—"The Realm of Tones"—(New York, 1883), for which he wrote the appendix, containing sketches of American musicians. He was also well known as a collector of music, and besides his collection of several symphonies and overtures for full orchestra, a septet for flute, horn, and string quintet, string quartets, and compositions for the piano and organ. Many of these have been rendered by the principal orchestral organizations and clubs for chamber music in New York, Brooklyn, and Boston. His sacred music includes the 23d and the 93d Psalm, both in English, and the 4th of the "German chorals," and an "Ave Maria." His compositions for the voice include more than one hundred German songs, and he had published also a "Practical Method for the Instruction of Chorus Classes," and compiled, with the Rev. J. Ryland Kendrick, D. D., "The Woman's College Hymnal," containing many arrangements for female voices only (Boston, 1857).—His wife, Fanny Raymond, who died in 1890, was a writer on musical topics. She had published translations of Louis Ebhert's "Letters on Music to a Lady" (London, 1877) and Robert Schumann's "Music and Musicians" (1877). Her other writings include the pamphlets "Woman as a Musician" (New York, 1877); "Some Famous Songs" (London, 1878); "Troubadours and Minnesingers"; "Haydn's Seasons" (Poughkeepsie, 1881); "Madrigals" (1882); and a volume of poems, "Songs and Ballads" (New York, 1888). She was also known as the possessor of an excellent mezzo-soprano voice, and in the winter of 1869-70 gave a successful series of "Historical Recitals." Agüero re-enforced his army and organized a navy, but the disagreements between the chiefs caused general discontent. He began negotiations with the Spanish authorities, and on 19 Aug. was deposed by congress. By order of Bolivar he was arrested on 3 Nov., sent to Guayaquil and exiled to Europe, whence he began to write hostile pamphlets against Bolivar. In 1831 congress revoked his sentence of exile and he returned in 1833, was elected in 1834 deputy for congress for Lima, and reinstated in his military rank, but did not appear again in politics.

RIVADAVIA, Bernardino (ri-vah-dah-veh-nyoh), president of the Argentine Republic, b. in Buenos Ayres in 1780; d. in Cadiz, Spain, 2 Sept., 1845. After acquiring his primary education he entered the College of San Carlos, and during his studies the first English invasion took place. After the reconquest of Buenos Ayres he took part as a lieutenant in the defence of the city during the second English invasion under Whiteallow. In 1811 he was appointed secretary of war and the treasury, in which place he subdued two revolts against the government. In 1812 the government to which he belonged was deposed, and he retired to private life till 1814, when he was appointed envoy to several European courts, and commissioned to solicit a protectorate from England. From 1814 to 1817 he resided in the United States, in case of need from a prince of the house of Bourbon, in order to found a South American monarchy, as the conservative element did not believe that the country was ready for a republic. After his negotiations for a protectorate had failed he returned in 1820 to Buenos Ayres. In 1821 Gov. Rodriguez appointed him secretary of the interior, in which place he accomplished many reforms and established the university. Rodriguez's successor, Las Heras, offered him the same place, but he refused and went as minister to Great Britain. On 18 Feb., 1826, he was elected president of the Argentine Republic, in which place he greatly aided the material progress of the republic and sustained the war against the Brazilian invaders of Uruguay, contributing to the completion of that republic. When the Federal party began to oppose him, and several provinces rose in arms, Rivadavia resigned on 29 June, 1827, retiring into private life. After the fall of Dorrego and Lavalle, he went to Europe in 1829, but returned in 1834, to answer his impeachment, was exiled to Montevideo, and went in 1842 to England.

RIVA PALACIO, Mariano (ri-vah-pah-lah-the-o), Mexican statesman, b. in the city of Mexico, 4 Nov., 1803; d. there, 29 Feb., 1860. He studied in the seminary of his native city, and, although he was the graduate without honors, never sought admission to the bar, but entered politics. He was chosen deputy to congress for the term of 1833-4, and from that time was almost continually either deputy or senator. In 1849 he was elected governor of the state of Mexico, where he introduced many important reforms, including a new system of direct taxation, which soon put the state treasury in a flourishing condition, and redeemed the credit of the state, by paying all its accumulated debts. He built the new market of Toluca, the prison, the courthouse, and the city sewers, established a savings-bank, and began the penitentiary in Real del Monte. He was re-elected, and, with the greatest difficulty obtained permission from the legislature to resign, when, in August, 1851, he was called by Gen. Arista to form a ministry, in which he took the portfolio of the treasury as his usual department. He was Santa-Anna's administration Gen. Martin Carrera called Riva Palacio to form a ministry on 10 Aug., 1855; but the latter declined and frankly told Carrera that as provisional president he ought not to appoint ministers. In December of that year, together with Luis de la Rosa, he accepted from Gen. Alvarez a commission to form a cabinet, but would not take the portfolio, and retired to private life. In 1857, he was again elected governor of the state of Mexico, established a mounted police to suppress the increasing brigandage, began to drain the lagoon of Lerma, and projected a railroad to connect Toluca with the city of Mexico. Afterward he was president of the municipal council of Mexico, where he introduced gas-lighting, constructed a telegraph line, and reformed many other reforms. When the Republican government abandoned the capital, 31 May, 1863, before the French invasion, Riva Palacio was prevented by sickness from following, but refused to form part of the "junta de notables" that was formed in July of that year. In July, 1864, the emperor Maximilian invited him by a special commission to accept the presidency of the interior, but he declared that as a republican he could never take an office under the monarchical and foreign administration. After the fall of Querejato, in May, 1867, Maximilian appointed Riva Palacio, with Martinez de la Torre, to defend him before the council of war. Without a moment's hesitation, Riva Palacio hurried to Querejato, and, after consultation with the prisoner, went to San Luis Potosi to see him, but, notwithstanding his brilliant defence, he could not save his unfortunate client. Later he received from the imperial family a silver table-service. After the return of the national government to Mexico, Riva Palacio was elected president of the national council, and in 1868 he became deputy to congress, being permitted by a special law to retain his place in the municipality. In August, 1869, he was elected president of congress, and in October of that year he was made governor of the state of Mexico, but returned, in December, 1871, to his seat in congress. In 1876, after the triumph of the revolution of Tuxtepec, he was appointed director of the national Monte de Piedad. He was one of the few public men of Mexico that had no enemy in either of the political parties.

RIVERA, Antonio de (re-vay'-rah), Spanish soldier, b. in Sorin about the end of the 15th century; d. in Los Angeles, Peru, about 1560. He took part in the conquest of Cartagena in 1532 with Pedro de Heredia (q. v.), and in the several expeditions to the interior achieved great renown. In 1538 he went to Peru with the expedition that was commanded by the munificent governor, a prolific writer, and in 1540 he accompanied Gonzalo Pizarro on his expedition to discover the country of the cinnamon-tree. Rivera was a partisan of Gonzalo Pizarro against the viceroy Nuñez Velas, but, when Pedro de la Gasca arrived in 1547, he served under the latter's orders in the battle of Nascaquagnama, and till the country was pacified. and was rewarded with the government of Los Angeles, where he died shortly afterward.

RIVERA, José Fructuoso (rree-vay-roh), president of Uruguay, b. in Paysandú in 1790; d. in Montevideo, 13 Jan., 1854. He was a "gancho," began to serve under Artigas against the Spaniards in 1811, and when, in 1814, hostilities between that chief and the Argentine general, Alvear, began, Rivera, in command of a division, defeated Dorrego, 10 Jan., 1815, at Guayabos, and entered Montevideo, of which he was appointed commander by Artigas. During the Portuguese invasion Rivera was his lieutenant, but in 1829 he capitulated on condition that his rank of colonel should be recognized. After Alvear's death in 1835, Rivera became leader of a regiment of gancho cavalry. On the invasion of the province by José Antonio Lavalleja (q. v.), he was surprised by that chief, on 29 Mar., 1829, but immediately went over to him with all the forces at his command, and took a brilliant part in the battle of Sarandi on 12 Oct., for which he was rewarded by the Argentine congress with a pension.

In 1835, when Gen. Alvear, chief of the Argentine auxiliaries, there were disagreements, and Rivera, refusing his aid, was outlawed and fled to Corrientes. But on 21 April, 1837, he returned with 100 adventurers from Santa Fé, invaded the Brazilian missions, and, gathering and disciplining a force of 1,800 Indians, kept the Brazilian army in check, which forced him and the independence, Lavalleja assumed the provisional presidency, 25 April, 1829, he appointed Rivera commander-in-chief. After the proclamation of the constitution, Congress elected Rivera president, 21 Oct., 1829; but Lavalleja plotted against him, and began an armed rebellion in 1832, but was defeated, 30 Sept., and forced to take refuge in Brazil. As president, Rivera paid little attention to the constitution, introducing a purely personal and arbitrary government. Although he was not dishonest for his own gain, he allowed his friends and former officers to piffer the treasury, yet the commercial prosperity of the country increased greatly. Lavalleja tried the fortunes of war once more in 1834, but was defeated, and withdrew from the elections of that year the opposition or Federal party obtained the victory, and on 1 March, 1835, Gen. Oribe was installed president, but he appointed Rivera commander-in-chief. By instigation of the dictator Rosas (q. v.), Oribe persecuted the unionist chiefs, and finally, being authorized by congress, called Rivera before a court of inquiry for some arbitrary measures. The latter rose in rebellion, 16 July, 1836, declared the president a traitor to the nation for his connivance with Rosas, and, aided by the gauchos, the unionists, and the foreign colony, began a struggle against the government. After a long civil war, Oribe resigned, 20 Oct., 1837, and Rivera was elected president. The former took refuge with Rosas and the command of a column to subdue the revolution of Lavalleja and La Madrid (q. v.), and declared war against Uruguay in 1842. Rivera invaded the province of Corrientes, but was defeated by Oribe at Arroyo Grande on 6 Nov. The victorious army, in its turn invaded Uruguay, and in February, 1843, the famous siege of Montevideo began. Rivera, leaving Gen. Palé in charge, left with the cavalry to open a campaign in the interior, and held part of Rosas's army in check for two years, till it was reinforced by Gen. Urquiza with 40,000 men, and Rivera was defeated at India Muerta, 28 March, 1845. But finally Brazil signed a treaty with Uruguay, 29 May, 1851, Oribe was killed in battle on 8 Jan., 1852, and Rosas was defeated at Monte Caseros on 3 Feb. Juan Francisco Giro was elected president, 1 March, 1852, and Rivera aided Gen. Venancio Flores in an insurrection. President Giro fled to a neutral man-of-war, and Flores, declaring the executive chair vacant, instituted a triumvirate composed of himself, Lavalleja, and Rivera; but the two latter soon died. The two chief towns of the department of Tacuarembó have been named after him, Rivera and San Fructuoso.

RIVERO, Mariano Eduardo de (rree-vay-ro), Peruvian scientist, b. in Arequipa in 1790; d. in Paris, France, 6 Nov., 1857. At the age of twelve he was sent to Europe and entered the college at Montauban, where he studied the classics and was graduated Sir Humphry Davy. In 1816 he went to Paris, where, after many difficulties, he was admitted in 1818 to the Royal college of mines. In 1820 he went to Germany to study the metallurgical district of Freiberg, and discovered a new substance, which he called Humboltina. He made known in Europe the sodium nitrate of Chile, which became one of the capital exports of Peru. Afterward he made a scientific trip to Spain, visiting the mines, especially those of mercury at Almaden. He returned to Paris in 1822, and there met Zea, the Colombian minister, by whom he was commissioned to go to Bogota to establish a mining-school. He selected some of his college companions to aid him in this project, and went to Bogota. After all he was well received by Gen. Bolivar, they began work, obtaining good results and making many discoveries. After three years he was called by his family to Peru, and resigned the charge of director of the school. Gen. Bolivar appointing him instead general director of mines and public instruction of Peru, which appointment was confirmed by Gen. La Mar, president of the Peruvian republic. After the revolt in 1825, he devoted his time to science, and, together with Nicolas de Piedra (q. v.), published, from 1826 till 1828, the "Memorial de Ciencias Naturales." In 1829, during the civil war, he was deposed and obliged to retire to Chili, where he made extensive geological studies. On his return to Peru the government appointed him director of the museum of Lima. In 1832 he was a member of the national congress, as deputy for the province of Callloma; but in 1834, on account of his health, he retired to Arequipa. In 1840 Gen. Gamarra reinstated him in the direction of the museum and public works. In 1851 he accepted the charge of consul-general in Belgium, but he returned to Peru in 1852. In 1854 he again occupied his place in Belgium. Rivera was a member of many foreign scientific societies. He wrote "Memoria sobre las aguas minerales de Yuro y otros puntos cercanos a Arequipa" (Lima, 1827); "Antigüedades Peruanas, with Dr. von Tschudi (Vienna, 1851); "Apuntes estadísticos del Departamento de Junín" (Brussels, 1855); and "Contribución a la colección de plantas y animales, agrícolas e industriales" (2 vols., 1856-7).

RIVERS, Richard Henderson, clergyman, b. in Montgomery county, Tenn., 11 Sept., 1814. He was graduated at La Grange college, Ala., in 1835, the same year he was chosen assistant professor of languages in that institution, and in 1836-41 was full professor. In 1845 he was promoted to the chair of Athens female seminary, and in 1848 became professor of moral science in Centenary college, Jackson, La., and in 1839 was elected its president, which office he held till 1854. In that year he became president of La Grange college, of which he retained charge till the civil war, and he subsequently assumed the presidency of Centenary college, Sum-RIVERS, William James, educator, b. in Charleston, S. C., 18 July, 1822. After graduation at the College of South Carolina in 1841, he conducted a large private school for several years. In 1856 he was elected professor of Greek literature in the College of South Carolina, and, upon the reorganization of that institution in 1863, he became professor of ancient languages and literature, and in 1873 became president of Washington college, Md. He has local reputation as a poet, contributed to the local periodical press of South Carolina, and published "A Catechism of the History of South Carolina" (Charleston, 1850), and "A Sketch of the History of South Carolina to the Close of the Revolutionary Government by the Revolution of 1719" (1856).

RIVES, John Cook (recess), journalist, b. in Franklin county, Va., 24 May, 1795; d. in Prince George county, Md., 10 April, 1864. He removed to Kentucky at eleven years of age, was brought up by his uncle, Samuel Casey, acquired a good education, and in 1824 removed from Edwardsville, Ill. (in which city he had been connected with a bank), to Washington, D. C., where he became a clerk in the fourth auditor's office. During the early part of President Jackson's administration, with Francis Blair, senior, he founded the "Congressional Globe," of which he was sole proprietor till 1891. He possessed much humor, and was generous in the extreme in his public and private benevolences. Altogether he gave, or distributed, $26,000 to the wives of soldiers who had enlisted in the National army from the District of Columbia, besides innumerable smaller amounts to private individuals, and he subsequently gave $12,000 toward the equipment of two regiments in the District of Columbia.

RIVES, William Cabell, senator, b. in Nelson county, Va., 4 May, 1793; d. at his country-seat, called Castle Hill, near Charlottesville, Va., 25 April, 1868. He was educated at Hampden Sidney and William and Mary, and studied law and politics under Thomas Jefferson. He served in the war of 1812 with a body of militia that was called out for the defence of Virginia during the second war with Great Britain, and was a member of the State convention that adopted the Constitution of 1816 and of the legislature in 1817-19. He was elected to congress in 1823 as a Democrat, served three successive terms, and in 1829 was appointed by President Jackson minister to France, where he negotiated the indemnity treaty of 4 July, 1831. On his return in 1832 he was chosen U. S. senator, in place of Littleton Tazewell, as a Van Buren conservative, but he resigned in 1834 in consequence of his unwillingness to participate in the Senate's vote of censure on President Jackson's removal of the U. S. bank deposits, of which he approved, but which the Virginia legislature repudiated. The political character of that body having changed, he was re-elected to the Senate in 1835 in place of John Tyler, who had resigned, and held office till 1845. In January, 1844, he introduced his "motion expunging resolution," which erased from the journal of the Senate the resolution of censure for the removal of the bank deposits. He was again minister to France in 1849-53. In 1861 he was one of the five commissioners to the "peace" congress in Washington. After the secession of Virginia, with which he was not in sympathy, he served in the first and second provisional Confederate congresses. Mr. Rives possessed extensive culture, and a pleasing and popular address. He published numerous pamphlets and addresses, and "Life and Character of John Hampden" (Richmond, 1854); "Ethics of Christianity" (1856); and "History of the Life and Times of James Madison" (4 vols., Boston, 1858-69). In the preparation of this work he had the advantage of a long and intimate acquaintance with his subject, and wrote with the care and ease of one of all his manuscripts and papers. His wife, Judith Page Walker, author, b. at Castle Hill, Albemarle co., Va., 24 March, 1802; d. there 23 Jan., 1882, was educated in Richmond, Va., and at seventeen years of age married Mr. Rives. She accompanied him on both his missions to France, and on her return embodied her recollections of Paris in "Souvenirs of a Residence in Elysium" (Philadelphia, 1842) and "Home and the World" (New York, 1851). Her other publications include "The Canary-Bird" (Philadelphia, 1855) and "Epitome of the Holy Bible" (Charlestown, Va., 1846).—Their son, Alfred Landon, engineer, b. in Paris, France, 25 March, 1839, studied at Virginia military institute and at the University of Virginia, and emerged in 1861 as an officer of the 6th Virginia regiment and chasseuses, Paris. He was an assistant engineer in completing the U. S. capitol building, Washington, D. C., and in building the aqueduct there, in charge of the U. S. survey in improving Potomac river, and designed and constructed the Cabin John bridge, near Washington, which at the time of its completion was the largest single-arch stone bridge in the world. Since the civil war he has been general manager of the Mobile and Ohio railroad, and a vice-president and general manager of the Richmond and Danville railroad, and he was also superintendent of the Panama railroad.—His daughter, Amélie, author, b. in Richmond, Va., 23 Aug., 1843, was educated by private tutors. In June 1868 she married John Armstrong Chamber, of New York city. Her first work was a story in the "Atlantic Monthly," which has since appeared with others in book-form under the title of "A Brother to Dragons, and Other Old-Time Tales" (New York, 1888). Her subsequent work includes stories and poems, and a novel entitled "The Quick or the Dead!" (Philadelphia, 1889).
ary, 1761. In 1773 he published "at his own open and uncontrolled press," the first number of a newspaper entitled "The New York Gazetteer; or the Connecticut, New Jersey, Hudson’s River, and Quebec Weekly Advertiser." He advocated the measures of the British government, with great zeal, and attacked the patriots so severely that in 1775 the Whigs of New-Port resolved to hold no communication with him. In consequence of his repeated attacks upon the Sons of Liberty, and especially Capt. Isaac Sears, that officer came to New York from Connecticut with seventy-five horsemen, and, entering Rivington’s office, destroyed his press and converted the types into bullets. Rivington’s conduct was examined by the Provincial congress, which referred the case to the Continental congress, and which, after considering it, the publisher wrote a remonstrance, declaring "that however wrong and mistaken he may have been in his opinions, he has always meant honestly and openly to do his duty as a servant of the public." He then made his peace with the Whigs, and was permitted to return to his house, but, having incurred suspicion, he afterward went to England, where he was appointed king’s printer. For New York. In 1777, after the British occupation of that city, he returned with a new press, and resumed the publication of his paper under the title of "Rivington’s New York Royal Gazette," which he changed on 13 Dec., 1777, to "The Royal Gazette." On the day when Maj. John André was taken prisoner his "Great Chase" was published. Rivington’s death in 1781, the Whigs considered the British was becoming doubtful, Rivington played the part of a spy, furnishing Washington with important information. His communications were written on thin paper, bound in the covers of books, and conveyed to the American camp by agents that were ignorant of their service. When New York was evacuated, Rivington remained in the city, much to the general surprise, removed the royal arms from his paper, and changed its title to "Rivington’s New York Gazette and Universal Advertiser." But his business rapidly declined, his paper ceased to exist in 1783, and he passed the remainder of his life in comparative poverty. There is a complete set of his journal in the library of the New York historical society. Rivington offended his readers by the false statements that appeared in his paper, which was called by the people "The Lying Gazette," and which was even cen- sured by the royalists for its utter disregard of truth. The journal was well supplied with news from abroad, and replenished with squibs and poems against the leaders of the Revolution and their French allies. Gov. William Livingston in particular was attacked, and he wrote about 1780: "If Rivington is taken, I must have one of his ears; Governor Clinton is entitled to the other; and General Washington, if he pleases, may take his head." Rivington provoked many clever satires from Fran-

ROACH, Isaac, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 24 Feb., 1786; d. there, 29 Dec., 1848. He was commissioned 2d lieutenant in the 3d artillery, 2 July, 1812, and served in the detachment under Capt. Towson in cutting out the British brigs "Caledonia" and "Detroit," lying under the guns of Fort Erie, 8 Oct., 1812. Lieutenant Roach was serving the 2d gun in the "Detroit." He was commissioned 1st lieutenant in the 3d artillery and, in the words of Wm. Scott, "certainly no one surpassed him in intrepidity and efficiency." He was wounded in the assault on Queenstown heights, 13 Oct., 1812, promoted captain, 13 April, 1813, and in this capacity had command of a piece of artillery, and formed a part of the advance-guard in the capture of Fort George, 27 May, 1813, when he was again wounded. On 24 June, following, at the Beaver dam, he held his position for hours against a greatly superior force, which he repeatedly drove back, but toward the close of the day, through the misconduct of his commanding officer, he was obliged to surrender. He was held prisoner until the close of the war, when, after escaping and being captured, he was released. When the Survey of the army upon the peace establishment, he was transferred with his full rank to the corps of artillery. He was brevetted major for ten years’ service, 13 April, 1823, and resigned, 1 April, 1824. In 1838 he was elected mayor of the city of Philadelphia, and he was treasurer of the mint in that city in 1847.

ROACH, John, ship-builder, b. in Mitchell- town, County Cork, Ireland, in 1815; d. in New York city, 10 Jan., 1887. At the age of fourteen he came penniless to New York, and obtained work from John Allaire, in the Howell iron-works, New Jersey. In 1836 he went to Illinois to buy land, but he returned to New York, and worked as a machinist for several years, and then established a foundry with three fellow-workmen. The explosion of a boiler nearly ruined him financially, but he rebuilt his works, which were known as the "Etta iron-works." Here he constructed the largest engines that had been built in the United States at that time, and also the first compound engines. In 1808 he bought the Morgan iron-works in New York city, and established foundries for New York, Franklin, Porzio, and Allaire works, and in 1871 the ship-yards in Chester, Pa., that were owned by Rainer and Sons. He established a ship-building plant that covered 120 acres, and was valued at $2,000,000, under the name of the Delaware river iron ship-building and engine works, of which he was the sole owner, and where he built sixty-three vessels in twelve years, chiefly for the U. S. government and large corporations. Among these were six monitors that were ordered during Gen. Grant's administration. The last vessels that he built for the U. S. Navy were the three cruisers "Chicago," "Atlanta," and "Boston," and the dispatch-vessel "Dolphin." On the refusal of the government to accept the "Dolphin" in 1885, Mr. Roach made an assignment, and closed his works; but they were reopened when the vessel was accepted. He constructed altogether about 114 iron vessels, and also built the sectional dock at Pensacola, Fla., and the iron bridge over Harlem river at Third avenue, New York city, in 1869.

ROANE, John Selden, governor of Arkansas, b. in Wilson county, Tenn., 8 Jan., 1817; d. in Pine Bluff, Ark., 7 April, 1887. He was graduated at Cumberland college, Princeton, Ky., and admitted to the legislature of Arkansas as speaker in 1844. Participating in the Mexican war as lieutenant-colonel of Col. Archibald Yell's Arkansas cavalry, he served with gallantry at Buena Vista, and commanded the regiment after Col. Yell was killed, being made colonel on 28 Feb., 1847. From 1848 till 1852 he was governor of Arkansas. Roane served in the civil war, being appointed brigadier-general in the provisional Confederate army on 20 March, 1862, commanding the district of Little Rock, Arkansas.

ROANE, Spencer, jurist, b. in Essex, Va., 4 April, 1762; d. in Sharon Springs, Va., 4 Sept., 1822. He studied law with George Wythe, and also in Philadelphia, after which he was a member of the council of the Virginia assembly, council, and senate. He was appointed a judge in 1789 of the general court, and in 1794 of the court of errors. In 1819 he was one of the commissioners for locating the University of Virginia. His wife was the daughter of Patrick Henry. Judge Roane was a Jeffersonian Republican, and wrote several essays under the name of "Algernon Sidney," asserting the supremacy of the state in a question of conflicting authority between Virginia and the United States, which were published in the "Richmond Enquirer."

ROANE, William Harrison, senator, b. in Virginia in 1788; d. at Tree Hill, near Richmond, Va., 11 May, 1845. After receiving an academic education he was a member of the state executive council and the house of representatives, was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 4 Dec., 1815, till 3 March, 1817. He was afterward chosen U. S. senator in place of Richard E. Parker, serving from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1841.

ROBB, James, banker, b. in Brownville, Fayette co., Pa., 2 April, 1814; d. near Cincinnati, Ohio, 30 July, 1881. His father died in 1819, and, after receiving a common-school education, the son left his home at the age of thirteen to seek his fortune, walking in the snow to Morgantown, Va., where he was employed in a bank and became its cashier. In 1837 he went to the city of New Orleans, La., where he remained for twenty-one years, during which time he made six visits to Europe and fifteen to the island of Cuba. He built the first gas-works in the city of Havana in 1819 and was president of the Spanish gaslight company, sharing the capital with Maria Christina, the queen-mother of Spain. He publishing eight banking-houses and commercial firms and agencies in New Orleans, Philadelphia, New York, San Francisco, and Liverpool, four of which were in existence in 1857. He was president of the railroad convention that met in New Orleans in 1851, and built the first railroad that connected New Orleans with the north. Mr. Robb was a strong supporter of the Union. In 1859 he removed to Chicago, where he was interested in railroad matters, declined the military governorship of Louisiana which was offered by President Lincoln, and the post of secretary of the treasury, to which Andrew Johnson wished to appoint him. Afterward he established in New Orleans the Louisiana national bank, of which he was president in 1865-69. His residence, standing in the centre of a block, was the finest in that city. In 1871 he retired from business, and from 1873 until his death he resided in "Hampton Place," near Cincinnati, Ohio. He was a regent of the University of Louisiana, and was the author of several reports, essays, and pamphlets on politics and political economy.

—His son, James Hampden, banker, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 27 Jan., 1846, was graduated in 1870 and studied also in Switzerland, after which he engaged in banking and in the cotton business. He was a member of the legislature of New York in 1882 and state senator in 1884-5, where he was active in securing the State reservation at Niagara, of which he was a commissioner from 1883 till 1887. He was also appointed commissioner of the works of the New York city, and he was 1888 president of the board.

ROBB, James Burch, lawyer, b. in Baltimore, Md., 14 April, 1817; d. in Boston, Mass., 3 Nov., 1876. In his early years he removed to Washington, D.C., was graduated at Georgetown college in 1831, and then entered the U. S. military academy, but left, owing to impaired health. He was elected to the state convention of Virginia in 1833, and served in the legislature of that state from 1845 till 1849, when he resigned and became a patent lawyer, in which profession he was successful, practicing in Springfield, Mass., where his father was superintendent of the National army for several years. Mr. Robb prepared and published a valuable compilation of "Patent Cases in Supreme and County Courts of the United States to 1850" (2 vols., Boston, 1854).

ROBBINS, Ashur, senator, b. in Wethersfield, Conn., 26 Oct., 1757; d. in Newport, R. I., 25 Feb., 1845. After his graduation at Yale in 1782, he was tutor at the College of Rhode Island (now Brown University) from 1783 till 1788, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began to practise in Providence. He removed to Newport in 1791, was elected a member of the city council, and was a member of the legislature from 1818 till 1825. He was elected to the U. S. senate as a Whig in place of James D'Wolf, serving from 5 Dec., 1825, till 3 March, 1829, after which he served again in the Rhode Island legislature. Brown gave him the degree of LL.D. in 1836. He was an accomplished classical scholar and orator, and published several addresses and orations. His nephew, Royal, clergyman, b. in Wethersfield, Conn., 21 Oct., 1788; d. in Berlin, Conn., 26 March, 1861, was graduated at Yale in 1806, studied theology, and was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at Kensington parish, Berlin, Conn., in 1810, serving until 1859. He contributed... to the "Christian Spectator" and other journals, to several works compiled by Samuel H. Goodrich, and was the author of brief biographies of the poets James G. Perceval and John G. C. Brainard, prefixed to editions of their writings; many published sermons; a textbook entitled "Outlines of Ancient and Modern History." (Hartford, 1830); and a "History of American Literature," intended as a supplement to Robert Chambers' "History of English Literature." (Hartford, 1837).

ROBBINS, Chandler, clergyman, b. in Branford, Conn., 24 Aug., 1738; d. in Plymouth, Mass., 30 June, 1799. He was the son of Rev. Phineas Robbins, pastor of a church in Branford, Conn., from 1732 till 1751, and was graduated at Yale in 1756, taught in an Indian school in Lebanon, studied theology, and was ordained pastor of the Congregational church in Plymouth, Mass., remaining there until his death. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Dartmouth in 1792, and by the University of Edinburgh in 1793. He published "A Reply to John Cotton's Essays on Baptism" (1757); "A View of Plymouth Church in Thanksgiving," and "An Account of the Inhabitants assembled to celebrate the Victories of the French Republic over their Invaders" (1793); "An Annual Sermon on the Landing at Plymouth" (1793); and other discourses. His brother, Ammi Ruhamah, clergyman, b. in Branford, Conn., 23 Aug., 1704; d. in Norfolk, Conn., 30 Oct., 1813, was graduated at Yale in 1750, on 28 Oct., 1751, was ordained pastor of a Congregational church in Norfolk, Conn., and remained there until his death. In March, 1756, he joined Gen. Philip Schuyler's brigade at Albany as chaplain. He published several sermons, including a "Half-Century Sermon" (1811).—Ammi Ruhamah's son, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Norfolk, Conn., 11 Aug., 1777; d. in Colchester, Conn., 13 Sept., 1856, was graduated at Williams in 1799, had charge of the academy in Danville, Conn., from 1799 till 1802, and labored as a missionary in Ohio in 1806-9. He was then pastor of Congregational churches in East Windsor, Conn., in 1809-27, in Stratford, Conn., in 1827-4, in Mattatuck in 1831, and in Rochester, Mass., from 1832 till 1842. Subsequently he resided in Hartford, Conn. He gave him the degree of D. D. in 1838. He was a founder of the Connecticut historical society, of which he was librarian in 1841, and to which he gave his private library. This was deposited in the Wadsworth Athenaeum at Hartford, and was valued at $10,000. It contains a pine chest that was brought over in the "Mayflower," on the lid of which the passengers signed their compact. His diary has been edited by Increase N. Tarbox (2 vols., Boston, 1860-1). He delivered an oration on the "Death of Gen. Washington" at Danbury on 23rd May, 1800. In addition to many sermons he was the author of a "Historical View of the First Planters of New England," written for the "Connecticut Evangelical Magazine" (Hartford, 1845); revised and continued James Tytler's "Elements of General History" (1815); and edited the first and second American editions of Cotton Mather's "Magnalia Christi Americana" (1820 and 1853). He also issued anonymously a work on "All Religions and Religious Ceremonies" (1823).—Chandler's grandson, Chandler, clergyman, b. in Lynn, Mass., 14 Feb., 1810; d. in Weston, Mass., 11 Sept., 1882, was graduated at Harvard in 1829, and at the divinity-school in 1833, when he was ordained pastor of the Second church in Boston, of which Ralph Waldo Emerson had been in charge. He remained there until his resignation in 1874, when he was the oldest settled pastor in Boston, and during his pastorate a new church edifice was erected in Bowdoin street. It was chartered by the Massachusetts General Court in 1834, and of the state house of representatives in 1845, and was largely interested in philanthropy, and was a founder of the Children's hospital in 1893. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1853. Dr. Robbins was a member of the Massachusetts historical society, an editor of its proceedings, a frequent contributor to periodicals, and one of the authors of "Encyclopedia Americana." He was a member of the Old North Church in Boston (Boston, 1832); "Literary and Historical Society of Pennsylvania" (1834); "University of Pennsylvania" (1835); "History of the University of Pennsylvania" (1838); "Memoir of William Appleton" (1863); "Memoir of the Hon. Benjamin R. Curtis, L.t., D." (1875); and sermons and addresses.

ROBBINS, Francis Le Baron, clergyman, b. in Cambria county, Pa., 31 May, 1820; d. in New Haven, Conn., 18 May, 1850. He was graduated at Williams in 1844, studied theology at Auburn seminary, and in 1860 was ordained to the ministry and installed as pastor of a Presbyterian church in Philadelphia. He founded the Oxford Presbyterian church in that city, which was dedicated in 1869, and became the pastor, resigning the office in 1883. During his pastorate the church edifice was erected in the city, and which had been constructed through his efforts, was destroyed by fire. Through Dr. Robbins' efforts a new building was erected. After resigning he travelled extensively in Europe, and on his return took up the work of founding a church in Kensington, the centre of the manufacturing district of Philadelphia. In this brief period of his labors, and in 1866 the Beacon Presbyterian church was dedicated. Connected with it is a reading-room, and a hall where lectures on travel, art, sanitation, and other popular and timely themes are delivered, and class-rooms for instruction in mechanical arts, music, drawing, oratory, and a dispensary, in which more than 3,000 patients received free medical attention in 1883. He has received from Union college the degree of D. D.

ROBBINS, Horace Wolfeoff, artist, b. in Mobile, Ala., 21 Oct., 1842. He went to Baltimore with his family at the age of six, and eleven years later came to New York, where he studied painting under James M. Hart. In 1865 he made a visit with Frederick E. Church to the West Indies, and thence went to Europe. Here he studied for three years, after which he returned to New York. He was elected an associate of the Academy of design in 1864, and an academician in 1878, and in 1882 he became recording secretary. He is also a member of the Water-color society and the New York etching club, and was president of the Artists' fund society in 1886-7. Many of his works are pictures of mountain and lake scenery, in the delineation of which he has, perhaps, been most successful. His oil-paintings include "Blue Hills of Jamaica" (1874); "Passing Shower, Jamaica" (1875); "Roadside Elms" and "Harbor Islands, Lake George" (1878); "Lake Kathadin, Maine"

ROBERT, Christopher Rhinelander, philanthropist, b. in Brooklyn, Long Island, N. Y., 23 March, 1802; d. in Paris, France, 28 Oct., 1878. His father was a physician, practised for several years in the island of Santo Domingo. The son became a merchant's clerk in New York city, and after five years entered business for himself, carrying it on chiefly in New Orleans, La. In 1830 he became head of the firm of Robert and Williams in New York, and he also held the presidency of a large coal and iron company. He retired public meeting in Philadelphia that had reference to monopolies and the depreciation of the currency. In 1783-'4 he spent a year in England. It is related of Roberdeau that, while travelling in his carriage across Blackheath, near London, he was attacked by highwaymen, who surrounded the carriage. He seized the leader, threw him down in the bottom of the carriage, and called to the coachman to drive on and fire right and left. He drove into London in this manner with the robber's foot hanging out of the carriage, and delivered him up to justice. After the war Gen. Roberdeau removed from Philadelphia to Alexandria, Va., where he often entertained Gen. Washington. A short time before his death he removed to Winchester, Va., —His eldest son, Isaac, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 11 Sept., 1764; d. in Georgetown, D. C., 15 Jan., 1829, was educated in this country and in England. His first public services were at the instance of Gen. Washington assistant engineer in laying out the city of Washington in 1791. In 1792 he was engaged as engineer in building canals in Pennsylvania. He resided at some time in New Jersey, and, as major of brigade, delivered an oration on the death of Gen. Washington, 22 Feb., 1800. Only a few copies of this are known to exist, one of them is in the library of Congress.

On 29 April, 1813, he was appointed major and topographical engineer in the regular army, this corps being then just constituted by the appointment of Gen. James W. Henry; and four captains. At the close of the war with Great Britain he was ordered to survey the boundary between the United States and Canada, under the treaty of Ghent. The treaty of 1783 had fixed the boundary in the middle of the lakes and rivers, and the treaty of Ghent provided for a survey to determine the location of that line. Col. Roberdeau was the engineer in charge of the survey, which was nearly 900 miles in length, through St. Lawrence river and the great lakes. In 1818 Col. Roberdeau was ordered to organize the bureau of topographical engineers in the war department, and was made its chief, which post he held until his death. He was a friend of President John Quincy Adams, and of John C. Calhoun, then secretary of war, and usually travelled with him on his official visits, and consequently was entertained by Lafayette during the latter's visit to this country in 1825. See "Genealogy of the Roberdeau Family," by Roberdeau Buchanan (Washington, 1876). from business in 1862. Mr. Robert gave large sums to Hamilton college and Auburn theological seminary, but his chief benefactions were to the American college in Constantinople, which was named Robert college in his honor. He gave it $20,000 in his lifetime, and left it $25,000 in his will, and endowed it with $20,000. His wife, Ann Maria, b. in New York city, 1 Aug. 1802; d. there, 9 April, 1888, was a daughter of William Shaw, a merchant of New York city. She married Mr. Robert in 1829, accompanied him on his Eastern travels, and aided in the organization and support of numerous orphan asylums, homes for aged colored women, and other religious and philanthropic institutions.

ROBERT. Joseph Thomas, clergyman, b. in Beaufort district, S. C., 28 Nov., 1807; d. in Atlanta, Ga., 5 March, 1884. He was graduated at Brown in 1828 and at South Carolina medical college in 1832, after studying two years at Yale. In 1834 he was ordained pastor of the Baptist church in Roberts ville, S. C., but he soon removed to Kentucky. After several brief pastorates he became in 1864 professor of languages in Iowa state university, and in 1869 he was made president of Burlington university in the same state. In 1871 he took charge of the Augusta institute for the training of colored ministers, and when this institute was removed in 1879 to Atlanta, and incorporated, he became and shortly afterward president, a position which he held until his death. The degree of LL. D. was given him by Denison university in 1880. — His son

Henry Martyn, soldier, b. in Beaufort district, S. C., 2 May, 1837, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1857. He received his commission with the rank of lieutenant in the corps of engineers, and was assigned to duty in the department of practical engineering. In 1878 he was stationed at Fort Vancouver, and during the northwest boundary difficulties between the United States and Great Britain he was in command of the construction of defenses on San Juan island. At the beginning of the civil war, though of southern birth and with all his relatives in the south, Col. Robert unhesitatingly espoused the Union cause. He served on the staff of Gen. McClellan, and assisted in building the fortifications around Washington. He was subsequently employed in similar services at Philadelphia and New Bedford, Mass. He was promoted captain in 1863, and at the close of the war he was placed again at the head of the department of practical engineering at West Point, where he remained till 1867. In that year he was made major, and in 1871, with headquarters at Portland, he had charge of the fortifications, light-houses, and harbor and river improvements in Oregon. In 1876 and has supervised the preparation of an "Index to the Reports of the Chief Engineers of the U. S. A. on River and Harbor Improvements." (vol. i., to 1879. Washington, 1881; vol. ii., to 1887, in preparation).

ROBERTS. Benjamin Stone, soldier, b. in Manchester, Vt., in 1811; d. in Washington, D. C., 29 Jan., 1855. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1835, and assigned to the 1st dragoons, but after several years of frontier service he resigned on 28 Jan., 1839, and as principal engineer built the Champlain and Ogdensburg railroad. He was assistant geologist of New York in 1841, and in 1842 aided Lucet, George W. Whistler in constructing the Russian system of railways. He then returned to the United States, was admitted to the bar, and in 1843 began to practise in Iowa. He became lieutenant-colonel of state militia in 1814, and on 25 May, 1846, was reappointed in the U. S. army as a 1st lieutenant of mounted rifles, becoming captain, 16 Feb., 1847. During the war with Mexico he served at Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo, Colima, and at San Juan Churup. He was commanding an advance party of stormers and for which he was brevetted major, and the capture of the city of Mexico. He then took part in the actions at Mata moras and the Gaharara pass against guerrillas, and was brevetted lieutenant-colonel. At the close of the war he received, 13 Jan., 1849, a sword of honor from the legislature of Iowa. From this time till the civil war he served on the southwestern frontier and on bureau duty at Washington, with frequent leaves of absence on account of feeble health. At the beginning of the civil war he was in New Mexico, and after his promotion to major, on 13 May, 1861, he was assigned to the command first of the northern and then of the southern district of the territory. In the absence of the governor, he was commissioner of affairs of Virginia he served during its campaign in 1862, acting also as inspector-general. In the latter part of the year he was acting inspector-general of the northwestern department, and led an expedition against the Chippewa Indians, and in 1863 he was in command first of the upper defenses of the Washington and Alexandria line, and then in the defense of West Virginia and Iowa. In 1864, after leading a division of the 18th corps in Louisiana, he was chief of cavalry of the Gulf department, till he was ordered, early in 1865, to the charge of a cavalry division in western Tennessee. At the close of the war he was brevetted brigadier-general in the regular army for services at Cedar Mountain, and major-general of volunteers for that action and the second battle of Bull Run. He became lieutenant-colonel of the 3d cavalry on 28 July, 1865, served on frontier and recruiting service till 1868, and then as professor of military science at Yale till his retirement from active service on 15 Dec., 1870. He was the inventor of the Roberts breechloading rifle, to the perfection and introduction of which he devoted many years of his life. In 1878 he formed a company for its manufacture, which finally failed, though Gen. Roberts had secured a contract in Europe.

ROBERTS. Charles George Douglas, Canadian poet, b. in Douglas, Yorke co., New Brunswick, 10 Jan., 1809. He was graduated at the University of New Brunswick, Fredericton, in 1831, became principal of the Chatham grammar-school in 1870, and of the York street school in 1882. He assumed the editorship of the Toronto "Weekly" in December, 1883, and was appointed professor of English and French literature and political economy in the University of King's college, Windsor, Nova Scotia, in October, 1885. ROBERTS, George Washington, soldier, b. in Chester county, Pa., 2 Oct., 1853; d. near Murfreesborough, Tenn., 31 Dec., 1862. After graduation at Yale in 1857, he studied law and practised in his native county, and in Chicago after 1860. He was commissioned major of the 43d Illinois volunteers on 22 July, 1861, and participated in the march of Gen. John C. Fremont to Springfield. He was killed in action with the 43d Illinois, by a shell, at Chickamauga, Sept. 19, 1863. He was the youngest member of the 43d Illinois and the first Illinois volunteer to die.

ROBERTS, Howard, sculptor, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 April, 1843. He first studied art under Joseph A. Bailly at the Pennsylvania academy. When twenty-three years of age he went to Paris, where he studied at the École des beaux-arts, and also under Dumont and Gummer. On his return he opened a studio in Philadelphia, and produced works of which his "Ludwig" and "Pearl," from Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter" (1872). It was exhibited at the academy in Philadelphia, where it attracted much attention, and gained him an election to membership. In 1873 he went again to Paris, and while there modelled "La première pose" (1876), which received a medal at the Philadelphia centennial exhibition in 1876. Among his later works are "Iarus," "Galeria," "Lucille," "La belle," "Lot's Wife," a statuette, and numerous ideal and portrait busts. His statue of Robert Fulton is in the capital at Washington.

ROBERTS, James Booth, actor, b. in Newcastle, Del., 27 Sept., 1818. He was educated at the Newcastle academy, and made his first appearance at the Walnut street theatre in Philadelphia on 18 Jan., 1836, as Richard to Junius Brutus Booth's Richard III. In 1851 he went to England and played at Drury lane theatre, in the characters of Sir Giles Overreach, King Lear, and Richard III. He wrote a version of Goethe's "Faust," which he produced in Philadelphia, playing Mephistopheles.

ROBERTS, Job, agriculturist, b. near Gwynedd, Philadelphia (now Montgomery co.), Pa., 23 March, 1577; d. there, 29 Aug., 1851. From 1791 till 1820 he was justice of the peace. He encouraged mechanical and agricultural enterprise, improved the methods of farming, planted hedges, introduced green fodder in the feeding of cattle, and the use of gypsum as a fertilizer: was among the first to introduce and breed merino sheep in Pennsylvania, and was prominent as a manufacturer of silk. In 1820 he drove to the Friends' meeting in Gwynedd in a carriage that was made by himself, which was said to have been, at that time and for twenty-five years afterward, the only one in that county. He published "The Pennsylvania Farmer, being a Selection from the most approved Treatises on Husbandry," etc., 1821.

ROBERTS, Jonathan, senator, b. in Upper Merion, Montgomery co., Pa., 16 Aug., 1771; d. in Philadelphia, 21 July, 1854. His father, of the same name, served many years in the assembly, and was one of the delegates to the convention that ratified the constitution of 1787. The son developed unusual literary taste, but, on the completion of his education in his seventeenth year, was apprenticed to a wheelwright. On attaining his majority he returned home and assisted his father in the work of the farm, devoting his leisure time to study. In 1763 he was chosen to the assembly, and in 1807 to the state senate. He was then elected to congress, serving from 4 Nov., 1811, till 28 Feb., 1814, and attaining note, particularly in his support of measures relating to the war of 1812. Pending the consideration of a declaration of war he made an able speech, closing with the words: "I repose safely on the maxim, "Never to despair of the republic," and the confidence put in me by Mr. Madison, who availed himself of his services in many important emergencies. During this period he wrote largely for public journals, many of his letters appearing in the "Aurora," his writings, notably a series of letters addressed to John Randolph, of Roanoke, attracting general public attention. When, in May, 1812, the president informed congress that there was no hope that Great Britain would abandon her aggressions, and an effort was made to adjourn congress, it was largely due to Mr. Roberts that an adjournment was prevented, and his call for the previous question forced the vote on the war bill, 18 June, 1812. He urged a vigorous prosecution of the war, was a member of the committee of ways and means, and in 1813 was made a representative of Albert Gallatin, secretary of the treasury, on the floor of the house. While serving his second term he was chosen to the senate, and entered on his duties, 28 Feb., 1814. In the senate he became notable for the part that he took in the famous controversy growing out of the bill to admit Maine into the Union. When the bill was reported, he was opposed to the amendment admitting Missouri, also, Mr. Roberts moved the further amendment that slavery should be prohibited in the latter state. The debate on this motion, which lasted three weeks, is historic. On its defeat came that of Mr. Thomas, of Illinois, known as the "Missouri compromise," which Mr. Roberts ably and determinedly opposed. After completing a full career of public service he was again to the state assembly, and he was subsequently appointed by the governor one of the canal commissioners. For twenty years he took a chief part in Pennsylvania in the opposition to Andrew Jackson, both before and after the latter became president. Mr. Roberts was early and an active supporter of the presidential claim. In 1830 he was a member of the national conventions that met at Harrisburg in 1827 and at New York in 1830. He was a delegate in 1840 to the convention that nominated Gen. Harrison for the presidency, giving his support to Henry Clay, and on behalf of the Pennsylvania delegation he nominated John Tyler for the vice-presidency. When, on the death of Gen. Tyler, March 4, 1841, President Van Buren appointed Mr. Roberts collector of the port of Philadelphia, which post he held from April, 1841, till the following year. In the contest that arose between Mr. Tyler and the Whig party, the president asked Roberts to remove about thirty officials in the customs department and to replace them with partisans of the president. This Mr. Roberts refused to do. In 1848 Mr. Roberts had been a member of the Society of Friends, but was disowned by them because of the part he had taken in furthering the war of 1812.

His son, Jonathan Manning, investigator, b. in Montgomery county, Pa., 7 Dec., 1821; d. in Baltimore, Md., 29 Feb., 1888. He studied law, was admitted to the bar at Norristown, Pa., in 1850, and practised his profession for about a year, but abandoned it and engaged in commercial pursuits. These proving financially successful, he found time to gratify his desire for metaphysical investigations. He also took an interest in politics, being an enthusiastic Whig and strongly opposed to slavery. He was a delegate to the Free-soil convention at Buffalo, N. Y., that nominated Martin Van Buren for president in 1848, and subsequently canvassed New Jersey for that candidate. When the so-called spiritual manifestations at Rochester, N. Y., first attracted public attention, Mr. Roberts maintained that the manifestations were due to having a supernatural origin. After several years of patient inquiry he came to the conclusion that they were facts that could be explained on scientific principles and resulted from the operation of natural causes. This conviction led to his establishing an organ of the new faith at Philadelphia in 1878 under the title of "Mind and Matter." His fearless advocacy of his peculiar views involved him in litigation and caused his imprisonment. Finding the publication of a journal too great a tax on his resources, he abandoned it, and devoted the rest of his life to study and authorship. Among his manuscript, of which he left a large amount, is "A Life of Apollonius of Tyana" and "A History of the Christian Religion," which he completed just before his death.

ROBERTS, Joseph, soldier, b. in Middletown, Del., 30 Dec., 1814; d. in Philadelphia, 18 Oct., 1898. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, and served in the Florida war of 1836-7 as a captain in a regiment of mounted Creek volunteers. From 1837 till 1849 he was assistant professor of natural and experimental philosophy at the U. S. military academy, and he was made 1st lieutenant on 7 July, 1838, and captain on 20 Aug., 1848. In 1850-8 he was engaged in hostilities against the Seminoles in Florida and on frontier duty in Texas, Kansas, and Nebraska, and in 1859 he was assigned to the artillery-school for practice at Fort Monroe, Va., where he was a member of the board to arrange the programme of instruction in 1859-61. He was appointed major on 3 Sept., 1861, became chief of artillery of the 7th army corps on 19 Sept., 1862, and commanded Fort Monroe in 1863-5 and Fort McHenry, Md., in 1865-6, receiving the appointments of colonel of the 3d Pennsylvania heavy artillery, 19 March, 1863, and lieutenant-colonel, 4th artillery, 11 Aug., 1868. He was brevetted colonel of volunteers for his services to date from 13 March, 1865, and brigadier-general of volunteers on 9 April, 1865, for meritorious and distinguished services during the war. On 9 Nov., 1865, he was mustered out of the volunteer service. From 1 May, 1867, till 1 April, 1880, he was acting inspector-general of the Department of Washington, when he was made superintendent of instruction at the military academy at Fort Monroe, Va., serving until 13 Feb., 1877. He was promoted colonel in the 4th artillery on 10 Jan., 1877, and placed on the retired list on 2 July, 1877. Gen. Roberts is the author of a "Hand-Book of Artillery," New York, 1860.

ROBERTS, Joseph Jenkins, president of Liberia, b. in Norfolk, Va., 12 Mar., 1809; d. in Monrovia, Liberia, 24 Feb., 1876. He was a negro and the son of "Auntie Robes," as she was familiarly called in Petersburg, Va., whence she emigrated with her three sons to Liberia in 1829. When the colony of Liberia was founded by the American colonization society he was first lieutenant-governor and then governor of the colony, and, upon the formation of the republic in 1848, he was elected its first president, serving four years. When there was a revolt, against President Edward J. Roye (q. r.) in 1871, he was again made president, serving until 1875. He encouraged agriculture, promoted education, and favored emigration from the United States, and placed his people on friendly terms with European nations. From 1856 until his death he was president of Liberia college.—His brother, John Wright, M. E. bishop, b. in Petersburg, Va., in 1815; d. in Monrovia, Liberia, 30 Jan., 1875, was educated in Liberia, entered the Methodist ministry in 1838, served as pastor, presiding elder, and secretary, and was made bishop in 1866.

ROBERTS, Charles Owen, merchant, b. in New York city, 22 March, 1814; d. in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., 11 Sept., 1880. His father, a physician, came from Wales and settled in New York in 1798. The son received a good education, and would have been sent to college, as his father wished him to adopt his own profession, but the boy preferred a mercantile life. After leaving school he became first a grocer's clerk, but soon afterward secured a place with a ship-chandler. By the time he was of age he had saved enough money to begin business for himself, and in two years he obtained a contract to supply the U. S. navy department with whale-oil, on which he realized a handsome profit. He was among the first to recognize the advantage of finely equipped steamers. He built the "Hendrik Hudson." He next turned his attention to railroads, was one of the early advocates of the Erie, and projected the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western railroad. When the "California fever" began in 1849 he made a contract with the U. S. government to transport the mails to California by the Isthmus of Panama. He owned the "Star of the West" which carried passengers to Panama, and when Port Monroe was threatened in the spring of 1861 he raised 1,000 men at his own expense and sent them in his steamer "America" to re-enforce the garrison. He took a great interest in the Texas Pacific railroad, and invested nearly $2,000,000 in the enterprise, and he was also largely interested in other railroads throughout the West and Canada. He was also one of the earliest friends of the Atlantic telegraph cable. In 1852 he was nominated for congress by the Whig party, but was defeated. In 1856 he was a delegate to the first National convention of the Republican party which met in Philadelphia and nominated John C. Frémont for the presidency. In 1865 he was nominated for mayor of New York by the Union party, but again was unsuccessful. The value of his gallery of pictures was estimated at $750,000.

ROBERTS, Oran Milo, jurist, b. in Laurens district, S. C., 9 July, 1815; d. in Austin, 19 May, 1898. He was graduated at the University of Alabama in 1836, began to practise, and served in the Alabama legislature in 1836-40. Removing to Texas in 1843, he was appointed district judge in 1844 and district judge in 1846, holding this office for five years. In 1857 he was elected to the supreme bench as associate justice, which post he held until the beginning of the civil war in 1861. He was elected president of the Secession convention, and was colonel of a regiment in the Confederate army in 1861, and continued as a soldier till the close of the war. In 1866 he was elected to the U. S. senate, but was not allowed to take his seat. From 1868 till 1874 he taught law in private schools. In 1874 and 1876 he was again elected chief justice of the Texas supreme court. He was governor of Texas from 1875 till 1883, in which year he was made professor of law in the University of Texas, which post he continued to fill. He published a description of Texas entitled "Gov. Roberts's Texas," (St. Louis, 1871).

ROBERTS, Robert Ellis, author, b. in Utica, N. Y., 3 June, 1849; d. in Detroit, Mich., 18 Feb., 1888. He was educated by his father, the Rev. John Roberts, a Congregational clergyman, and in 1827 went to Detroit, where he engaged in business. In 1832 he was a volunteer in the Black Hawk war, after which he again entered mercantile life. He was identified with the interests of Detroit, being active in causing the thoroughfares to be paved, in organizing the fire department, of which he was the first president, and in establishing the water works. He served on the board of education, established the public library, and held local offices. Mr. Roberts contributed to the Detroit "Free Press," and was the author of "Sketches of the City of Detroit" (Detroit, 1855), and "The City of the Straits," illustrated by his daughter, Cornelia H. Roberts (1884).

ROBERTS, Robert Richford, M. E. bishop, b. in Frederick county, Md., 2 Aug., 1778; d. in Lawrence county, Ind., 26 March, 1843. His father was a Welsh and his mother of Irish ancestry, and they were communicants of the Church of England. They removed in 1785 to Ligonier Valley, Westmoreland co., Pa. The son united with the Methodist Episcopal church when he was fourteen years old. Until he was twenty-one he lived a thoroughly frontier life, with few books and simple habits. Being drawn gradually toward the ministry, he began to study, and in 1802 entered upon that work, being made a deacon and at Holmes's meeting-house, near Cadiz, Ohio. About the same time he was admitted to the Baltimore conference and put in charge of a circuit including Carlisle, Pa., and twenty-nine other appointments, requiring a month to visit them all. He studied constantly, and in 1804 a senior colleague reported that "his moral character was perfect and his head a complete magazine." On 11 May, 1816, he was elected bishop, and he passed through all the discussions that culminated in the establishment of the Methodist Protestant church. Bishop Simpson, writing of him, says: "While during these excitements severe and exciting denunciations of the bishops were published—while they were called 'popes' and 'usurpers'—the patriarchal appearance and the humble and loving manner of Bishop Roberts disarmed prejudice wherever he went." He emigrated to Indiana, and accomplished much for the western missions. He was a man of fine presence, simple and benevolent, and an eloquent preacher. He was buried at Greenfield, Ind., on the grounds of DePauw university. See his "Life," by Rev. Charles Elliott (New York, 1859).

ROBERTS, Samuel, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 Sept., 1763; d. in Pittsburg, Pa., 13 Dec., 1830. He was admitted to the bar of Philadelphia in 1785, and after practising law there for a short time removed to Lancaster, and thence to Sumbury.
In 1862 he was appointed president judge of the 5th judicial district of Pennsylvania, which office he held until his death. He published "A Digest of Select British Statutes, etc., which appear to be in Force in Pennsylvania," a work of value (Pittsburg, 1817; 2d ed. Philadelphia, 1818). ROBERTS, Silas White, civil engineer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 2d Aug., 1811; d. in Atlantic City, N. J., 29 March, 1882. He was educated at the Friends' academy in Philadelphia. When he was sixteen years old he became an assistant to Joseph White, who was directing the works of the Lehigh coal and navigation company in the construction of the Mauch Chunk railway, the second line of which was built in the country. He also assisted in the construction of the canal from Mauch Chunk to Easton. Entering the state service, he had charge of building a division of a canal on Conomough river, and then was principal assistant to Sylvester Welch in locating and constructing the Portage railroad over the Allegheny mountains. Mr. Roberts' division was on the west side of the mountain (900 feet long, the first railroad tunnel in the United States), and the fine stone viaduct over Conomough river, near Johnstown, is his design and construction. While this road was in operation it was one of the wonders of the country. David Stephenson, the English engineer, says of it in his "Sketch of the Civilization of Engineering of North America" (1828): "No railroad numbers among its many wonderful artificial lines of communication a mountain railway which, in boldness of design and difficulty of execution, I can compare to no modern work I have ever seen, excepting, perhaps, the passes of the Simplon and Mont Cenis in Sarcdonia."

Remaining in the state service several years, Mr. Roberts became in 1838 chief engineer of the canal. His railroad work in 1842 was president of the Philadelphia, Germantown, and Norristown railroad, and from 1845 to 1846 President of the Schuykill navigation company. During the latter year he was chosen to the legislature, and from 1848 till 1856 he was engaged in locating, constructing, and operating the railroad from Pittsburg to Crestline, in distance 1,300 miles, one of the principal roads of the towns of Crestline and Alliance. In 1856 he was chosen chief engineer and general superintendent of the North Pennsylvania railroad, which post he resigned in 1879. He was a member of many learned societies, contributed numerous papers to the transactions of the American philosophical society and to scientific journals, and wrote "Reminiscences of the First Railroad over the Allegheny Mountains," in the "Pennsylvania Magazine of History" (1878). He also published "The Destiny of Pittsburg and the Duty of Her Young Men" (Pittsburg, 1850).—His wife, Anna Smith, poet, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 25 Dec., 1827; d. there, 10 Aug., 1858, was the daughter of Randal H. Hickel, and married Mr. White in 1857. He contributed poems to the "Columbian and Great West" in 1850-1, which were collected in "Forest Flowers of the West" (Philadelphia, 1851). ROBERTS, William, clergyman, b. in Lanercost, Wex., 25 Sept., 1809; d. in 1892. He was educated at the Presbyterian collegiate institute in Dublin, after which he was pastor and principal of the academy of Holywood, Wigtown, pastor of the Circuit of Huntingdon's chapel in Runcorn, England, in 1848-55, and had charge of Welsh Presbyterian churches in New York city from 1855 till 1868, in Scranton, Pa., from 1868 till 1853, and in Utica, N. Y., since 1875. Several times he had served as moderator of the United States Welsh Presbyterian general assembly, and as a representative in councils of the alliance of the Reformed churches. The University of the city of New York gave him the degree of B. D. in 1863. He edited the "Tractahold" in New York, 1857 till 1861, and had conducted the "Cyclo" in Scranton, Pa., and Utica, N. Y., since 1875. He is the author of the "Abrahamic Covenant" (New York, 1858), and "The Election of Grace" (1859), both of which are written in Welsh.

ROBERTS, William Charles, clergyman, b. in Alltman, near Aberystwyth, Wales, 25 Sept., 1802. He was educated in the Education scheme, and was graduated at Princeton in 1835, at the Theological seminary in 1858, and in that year became pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church in Wilmingont, Del. He was called in 1862 to the 1st Presbyterian church, Columbus, Ohio, to a church in Elizabeth, N. J., in 1864, and to the Westminster church in that city in 1866. He was elected corresponding secretary of the board of home missions in 1851, was chairman of the committee that laid the foundations of Wooster university, Ohio, and declined the presidency of Rutgers college in 1882. In 1887 he became president of Lake Forest university, Ill. He was a member of the first and third councils of the Reformed churches that met in America, from 1839 to 1869, was a trustee of the college in Edinburgh and Belfast. From 1890 to 1895 he was a trustee of the Reformed churches in this country, and held the same relation to Princeton since 1865. He has travelled extensively in Europe, including Palestine, Turkey, and Egypt. Union college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1872, and Princeton that of LL. D. in 1887. Dr. Roberts is the author of letters on the great preachers of Wales (Utica, 1858); a translation of the shorter catechism into Welsh; numerous addresses and sermons; and magazine articles in English, Welsh, and German.

ROBERTS, William Milnor, civil engineer, b. in Philadelphia, 12 Feb., 1810; d. in Brazil, South America, 14 July, 1881. His father was Thomas P. Roberts, treasurer of the Union canal, the first work of that kind undertaken in Pennsylvania. In 1855 the son was engaged in drainage work in Nassau County, L. I. At the age of eighteen he was given charge of the most difficult division of the Lehigh canal, and two years later he was appointed resident engineer in charge of the Union railroad and Union canal feeder. In 1871-4 he was senior assistant engineer on the Allegheny Portage railroad. In 1885 he planned and built the combined railroad and highway bridge in this country. It crossed the Susquehanna at Harrisburg, and was nearly a mile long. The piers are still used to support the great iron bridge of the Cumberland Valley railroad. In 1853 he was made chief engineer on the Harrisburg and Lancaster railroad, and during the same year he was also appointed chief engineer of the Cumberland Valley railroad, which was completed by 1858. After 1856 he was chief engineer in charge of the Monongahela river slackwater navigation, the Pennsylvania state canal, and the Erie canal of Pennsylvania. In 1841-2 he was a contractor on the Welland canal enlargement, in 1845-7 chief engineer and agent for the trustees of the Sandy and Bethel canal company, Ohio, in 1867 chief engineer of the Pittsburg and Connellsville railroad. In 1849 he declined the appointment of chief engineer of the first proposed railroad in South America (in Chili), to take that of the Bollefontaine and Indiana railroad, which he held until 1851. In 1852-4 he was chief engineer of the Allegheny Valley railroad, consulting engineer of the Atlantic and Mississippi railroad, a contractor for the whole Iron Mountain railroad of Missouri, and chairman of a commission of three appointed by the Pennsylvania legislature to examine and report upon routes for avoiding the old Allegheny portage inclined to be abandoned. In 1855, he was contractor for the entire Keokuk, Des Moines, and Minnesota railroad, consulting engineer for the Pittsburg and Erie, and Terre Haute, Vandalia, and St. Louis railroads, and chief engineer of the Keokuk, Mt. Pleasant, and Muscatine railroad. In 1857 he went to Brazil to examine the route of the Dom Pedro II. railroad, and, in company with Jacob Bannister, of Indiana, and other Americans, undertook the construction of that work. He returned to the United States in 1865, and at once took the field in the interests of the Atlantic and Great Western railroad for a proposed extension through northern Pennsylvania. In 1866 he was appointed U. S. civil engineer and given charge of the improvement of the Ohio river, which work he relinquished in 1868 to accept the appointment of associate chief engineer with James B. Eads on the great bridge across the Missouri at St. Louis. During Mr. Eads' absence in Europe of a year and more, Mr. Roberts had entire charge of the work at its most arduous and difficult stage. In 1870 he accepted the chief engineership of the Northern Pacific railroad, and in 1874 was appointed to the same position by the legislature, as a general of the Northern Pacific railroad engineers to examine and report upon plans for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi, visiting the various rivers in Europe where jetties had been constructed. In 1879 he was appointed by the emperor of Brazil chief of the commission of hydraulic engineers to examine and report upon the improvement of harbors and navigable rivers of the empire. He had nearly completed the period of his service when he died of fever on the head-waters of San Francisco river. Mr. Roberts was a contributor, generally anonymously, to newspapers and scientific magazines. In 1879 he was elected president of the American society of civil engineers, and at the same time he became a member of the English institute of engineers and a fellow of the royal society of engineers, and a member of the general assembly of free churchmen of Edinburgh, and in 1836 he married a daughter of Chief-Justice John Bannister Gibson, of Pennsylvania (q. e.).—His son, Thomas Paschal, civil engineer, b. in Carlisle, Pa., 21 April, 1843, was educated at Pennsylvania agricultural college and at Dickinson college, and in 1863 joined his father in Brazil, where he was employed as an engineer on the Dom Pedro II. railroad. He returned to the United States late in 1865. In the autumn of 1866 he was appointed principal assistant engineer on the United States improvement of the Ohio river, which post he retained until October, 1870, when he became assistant engineer of the Montana division of the Northern Pacific railroad. He made the first examination of the route that was finally adopted through Montana for that road, and also examined and reported upon the navigability of the upper Missouri river. His report, with maps, was printed by the war department in 1874. He was appointed in 1855 by the U. S. government to the charge of the surveys of the upper Missouri river in West Virginia, and in 1876-78 was chief engineer of the Pittsburg southern railroad. Subsequently he was engaged as chief engineer in charge of the construction of several southern roads until 1884, when he was appointed chief engineer of the Monongahela navigation company, and he was afterward engaged in the extension of new locks for double locking this important system of steamboat navigation.

ROBERTSON, Archibald, artist, b. in Monymusk, near Aberdeen, Scotland, 8 May, 1753; d. in New York city, 6 Dec., 1835. During 1782-91 he studied and practised art in Edinburgh, Aberdeen, and London. In 1792 he came to this country, and, and after his arrival, went to Philadelphia to deliver to Gen. Washington a box made of wood from the oak-tree that sheltered Sir William Wallace after the battle of Falkirk. It had been committed to his charge by the Earl of Buchan. At the earl's request Washington sat to Robertson, who first painted a miniature, and then a larger portrait, for Lord Bute, which he painted in 1792 till 1821. Robertson followed his profession as a painter and instructor in New York, working mostly in water-colors and crayons. In 1802 he assisted in the project of forming an art academy, and in 1816, on the founding of the American academy, he was elected a director. Though not an architect by profession, he furnished several plans for public buildings. He was also the author of a book on drawing.—His son, Anthony Lischenard, jurist, b. in New York city, 8 June, 1808; d. there, 18 Dec., 1868, was graduated at Columbia in 1825, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and gained a high professional reputation. He was assistant viceregent in 1846-8, surrogate of New York city in 1848, and in 1857 was elected a member of the bar. In 1864 he was elected for a second term, and in 1866 was chosen chief justice by his associates. In 1867 he was a member of the State constitutional convention, and took an active part in its proceedings.—Archibald's brother, Alexander, artist, b. in Monymusk, near Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1768; d. in New York, 27 May, 1841, followed his brother to the United States in 1792, and there in 1808 was elected a member of the Board of Regents, and painting from Shelly in London. He painted landscapes in water-color, and, like his brother, was well known as a teacher.

ROBERTSON, Charles Franklin, P. E., bishop, b. in New York city, 2 March, 1833; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 1 May, 1886. He obtained a good education, and at first intended to enter upon a mercantile career, but during his college years was led directed toward the ministry, he went to Yale, where he graduated in 1859. He then entered the Episcopal general theological seminary, and was graduated in 1862. He was ordained deacon in the Church of the Transfiguration, New York city, 29 June, 1862, by Bishop Horatio Potter, and priest in St. Mark's church, Malone, N.Y., 29 Oct., 1862, by the same bishop. He was rector of St. Mark's church, Malone, from 1862 till 1868, when he accepted a call to St. James's church, Batavia, N.Y. Immediately afterward he was elected second bishop of Missouri, and was consecrated in Grace church, New York city, 25 Oct., 1868. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Columbia in 1868, that of D.D. from the University of the South, Lewan- ton, in 1871, and that of L.L. D. from the University of Missouri, Columbia, Mo., in 1883. Bishop Robertson was vice-president of the St. Louis social science association, and also of the National conference of charities and corrections. He published several special sermons and charges, and was the author of valuable papers on "Historical Societies in Relation to Antiquities," "The Dewey Relief Society" (1877); "The American Revolution and the Mississippi Valley" (1884); "The Attempt to separate the West from the American Union" (1885); and "The Purchase of the Louisiana Territory in its Influence on the American System" (1880).
Robertson in July, 1775, and at its evacuation convoked at acts of ramie and shared in the plunder. He took command of the 60th regiment on 11 Jan., 1776, commanded a brigade at the battle of Long Island, and in February, 1777, returned to England on leave of absence, and intrigued against Gov. William Tryon and Sir William Haliburton. He was commissioned as major-general on 29 Aug., 1777, was appointed civil governor of New York on 11 May, 1779, and arrived in New York city on 21 March, 1780. He brought a letter of instructions from Lord George Germaine, secretary of the colonies, ordering that the deserted property of rebels should be sold and the rents appropriated to a fund for the aid of loyalist refugees. He was directed to restore the civil law; yet, instead of reopening the constitutional courts of justice, he established arbitrary police courts with summary jurisdiction in all classes of cases, first on Long Island, then on Staten Island, and in December, 1780, in New York city, where, however, the new court could not decide civil cases involving more than £10. He ordered the neighboring farmers to deliver up half of their hay, and afterward seized a part of the remainder, had the wood cut on large estates near New York city, sequestrated the revenue of the markets and ferries, and committed many extortioners in connivance with the military authorities, profiting greatly in his purse by all these acts, yet accusing many who might have been won over to the royal cause. When Maj. John Andrè was captured, Gov. Robertson conferred with Gen. Nathanael Greene, but, instead of accepting the release of the British spy in exchange for Benedict Arnold, sealed his fate by showing a letter from Arnold threatening retaliation on Gen. Greene in the death of Gen. William Phillips, who obtained the command in Virginia, and set out for the field, but returned when he heard of the arrival of Lord Cornwallis. He was made a lieutenant-general, 20 Nov., 1782, and returned to England on 15 April, 1783.

Robertson, James, pioneer, b. in Brunswick county, Va., 28 June, 1742; d. in the Chickawinny country, Tennessee, 26 Feb., 1814. He was of Scotch-Irish descent, and his father, a farmer, removed to Wake county, N. C., about 1750, where the son worked on a farm, receiving no education. In 1770 he accompanied Daniel Boone on his third expedition beyond the Alleghanies. He discovered a valley, watered by the Watana river, which he explored while Boone went to Kentucky. He planted corn and then returned to North Carolina, after losing his way and being saved from death by hunters. In the following spring Robertson led sixteen families to the west. The settlers were upon the hunting-grounds of one hundred thousand savages, but they planted and harvested their corn in peace for fully four years. The emigrants supposed they were within the limits of the province of Virginia, but when the line was run in the year 1772 it was found to be thirty miles to the northward, and they were therefore on the land of the Cherokees. A lease was concluded with the Indians, but in the midst of the festivities that followed a warrior was murdered by a white man, and the savages left the ground with threatening gestures. Hostilities were averted by Robertson, who went alone to pacify the savages, and they continued to be friends with the whites until 1776. In July of that year Oconostota (q. v.) invested a fort that John Sevier had built at Watagua; but Sevier and Robertson, with 40 men, withstood a siege of twenty days, and beat him off with a heavy loss in killed and wounded. After the Cherokees were subdued the governor of North Carolina offered Robertson to reside at the Indian capital to hold Oconostota in check and to thwart the designs of the British. In the spring of 1779 he explored the Cumberland region, and afterward emigrated there with others, mostly from the Watagua settlement, of which he left Sevier in charge. One division of the settlers founded Nashville, Tenn., on 25 Dec., 1779, and after several months they were joined by the other division, and organized themselves into a civil and military body with Robertson at their head. The handful of pioneers had a long conflict with four savage nations, outnumbering them more than one hundred to one. Of 256 men, 39 fell within 60 days before the tomahawk of the Cherokee, and in a very few months 67 had perished. The crops were de- stroyed, and the land was abandoned for them. Settlers began to leave, and of the original 250 persons only 134 remained. These tried to induce their leader to abandon his post, but he replied: "Each one should do what seems to him his duty. As for myself, my station is here, and here I shall stay if every man of you deserts me." With his eldest son, Isaac Bleisoe, and a faithful negro, he made his way to Danville, Va., at Roostborn oough, Ky., who gave him powder and shot. On 2 April, 1781, the fort of Nashville was besieged by 1,000 Indians, and Robertson's life was saved by the heroism of his wife. At the close of the Revolutionary war he was able to bring into the field about 500 men experienced in Indian warfare, and by his diplomacy he made friends with the Cherokee nations, opened intercourse with Great Britain, and effected peace with the Cherokees. The half-breed Creek chief, Alexander McGillivray (q. v.) concluded a treaty with the govern- or of Louisiana to exterminate the Americans west of the Alleghenies, and made war against Robertson in 1781, continuing at intervals for twelve years. Robertson constantly performed heroic deeds and beat him back with small num- bers. Robertson was continually offered by the Spanish governor peace and the free navigation of the Mississippi if he would but cut loose from the Union and establish, with Watagua and Kentucky, an independent government. In 1790 he was appointed a brigadier-general by Washington, and his military services did not end till 1796. He served in the campaigns against the Tennesseans, and held the post of Indian commis- sioner until his death. See "The Life and Times of Gen. James Robertson," by Albidge W. Put- nam (Nashville, 1859), and "The Rear-Guard of the Revolution," by James R. Gilmore (New York, 1889).—His wife, Charlotte Reeves, pioneer, b. in Virginia, 2 Jan., 1751; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 14 Jan., 1843, married Robertson in 1776, and accompanied him to Watagua on its first settlement. She was one of the number that made the perilous journey down the Holston and Tennessee in 1780, and was in the fort of Nashville when it was attacked by 1,000 Cherokees, some of whom, in their attempt to capture the horses of the whites, made a gap in their ranks, through which the settlers fled. Robertson's wife, mounted on the lookout, rifle in hand, seeing the stampede of the horses and the break in the Indian line, ordered the men to open the gates and sweep all the Indians upon them. The dogs flew at the savages, who drew tomahawks upon them, and thus the whites were enabled to escape. She is reported to have said to her husband: "Thanks be to God, who gave to the Indians a dread of dogs and a love for horses." She shared all of her husband's perils, and was much esteemed for her noble qualities.—His grand- son Edward White (q. v.) was born in Asheville, Tenn., 13 June, 1823; d. in Washington, D. C., 2 Aug., 1887. His parents removed to Iberville parish, La., in 1825, and he was educated at Nashville university, but not graduated. He began to study law in 1845, but served in the war with Mexico in 1846 as orderly sergeant of the 2d Louisiana volunteers, a six-months regiment. In 1847-9 he was a member of the legislature, and after his graduation at the law department of the University of Louisiana in 1850 he practised in Iberville parish, served in the legislature, and was state auditor of public accounts in 1857-62. He entered the Confederate service in March, 1862, as captain, and participated in the engagements around Vicksburg and the siege of that place, after which his regiment was mustered out. He resumed practice in Baton Rouge, and was elected to congress as a Conservative Democrat, serving from 15 Oct., 1877, till 4 March, 1883. In 1886 he was chosen again, serving until the day of his death.

—Edward White's son, Samuel Matthews, lawyer, b. in Plaquemine, La., 1 Jan., 1832, was graduated at the University of Louisiana in 1854, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and served in the legislature. In 1880 he was made a member of the faculty of the State university and agricultural and mechanical college, where he served as professor of natural history and commandant of cadets until he was elected to the 30th congress as a Democrat, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of his father.

ROBERTSON, John Parish, Scottish author, b. in Kellasker, Scotland, about 1770, and d. in Calais, France, 1 Nov., 1843. He accompanied his father on a commercial voyage to La Plata, and soon returned alone to South America and became a clerk at Rio Janeiro when he was only fourteen years old. At twenty-one he was sent as a mercantile agent to Asuncion. In 1815 Dr. José Fran- cia (q. v.) ordered him and his brother, William P., who had joined him, to leave Paraguay. He re- mained more than a year at Corrientes, and, with the help of an Irish lieutenant of Artagnas, named Campbell, established a large trade in hides, and was thus instrumental in reviving the prosperity of the province. From 1817 till 1829 he was engaged in Great Britain in enlarging his commercial con- nections. He purchased a large tract near Buenos Ayres, and settled on it as a country gentleman. When his political friends had conquered the independence of Peru and Chili, he was the first to open those countries to commerce. He went to England in 1824 in the capacity of a political agent for several of the republics. His large possessions were swept away in the financial crisis of 1826, and after spending four years in South America in the endeavor to recover at least part of his fortune, he entered Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, and passed through the university course. He devoted himself for most of his remaining years to literary labor. He published, jointly with his brother, "Letters on Paraguay" (London, 1839): a continuation entitled "France's Reign of Terror" (1839): and Letters on South America" (1843). "Solomon Sears" (1839) appeared under his name only. His brother, William Purush, b. about 1759, was the author of another book of travel entitled "Visit to Mexico" (London, 1853).

ROBERTSON, John Ross, Canadian journalist, b. in Toronto, Dec. 28, 1841. He was educated at Upper Canada college, and founded the "Upper Canada College Times" in 1859, in connection with this institution. About 1860 he issued "Young Canada," a somewhat similar publication, the name of which he afterward changed to the "Young Canada Shamrock," and still later to "The Sporting Life." At this time he published "Robertson's Railway Guide," the first of the kind that was issued in Canada. In 1862 he published "The Grumbler," a weekly journal of satire which had been issued for some years before by Erastus Wiman. Mr. Robertson was city editor of the Toronto "Globe" from 1864 till 1866, and in May of the latter year, in conjunction with a partner, he issued the "Evening Telegraph," which became the chief-paper in the Conservative interest. In 1872 Mr. Robertson became agent of the Globe printing company in London, England, but he afterward returned to Canada and assumed the management of the "Nation" newspaper. In 1876 he founded the Toronto "Daily Telegram," of which he was the proprietor, managing editor, as well as publisher. He founded an annual prize in connection with Upper Canada college, and was one of the founders of the Lakeside home for little children in 1883. He has written "History of Craft and Capitular Masonry in Canada" (Toronto, 1888), and "History of Cryptic, Templar, and A. &. A. Rite Masonry" (London, 1882). ROBERTSON, Joseph Gibb, Canadian statesman, b. in Stuartsfield, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, 1 Jan. 1826. He was educated in Canada, engaged in business as a merchant, and was made president of the Quebec Central railway company. He was for many years secretary and treasurer of the county of Sherbrooke, Quebec, and was mayor of Sherbrooke from 1861 to 1880. In 1870 he was appointed a member of the executive council of the province of Quebec, and he was treasurer from that date till September, 1874, when he retired from the government. He was reappointed treasurer in De Boucherville's administration, 22 Sept. 1874, and held this portfolio till 14 Jan. 1876, when he resigned. He was appointed justice of the peace in October, 1876, and resigned this office in January, 1882, and was a member of the executive council and provincial treasurer from 1884 till 1897. He held office in the Taffin administration from 25 to 27 Jan., 1887. Mr. Robertson was a delegate to England on public business in 1873. Since he entered public life he has represented Sherbrooke in the legislative assembly.

ROBERTSON, Robert Henderson, architect, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 29 April, 1849. He was educated at Rutgers college, studied architecture, and established himself in New York city. Among many buildings of his design are the Madison avenue Methodist church, St. James' Episcopal church, the Young women's Christian association building, the church in the Holy Spirit, Phillips Presbyterian church, the New York club building, the Railroad men's building, St. Augustine chapel, Grace chapel, and the Mott Haven railroad station, all in New York city.

ROBERTSON, Thomas Bolling, governor of Louisiana, b. near Petersburg, Va., in 1773; d. in White Sulphur Springs, Va., 5 Nov., 1828. He was graduated at William and Mary in 1807, became a lawyer, and removed to New Orleans on receiving the appointment of secretary for the territory of Louisiana. He was elected as the first congressman from that state by the Democrats, and was returned for the three succeeding terms, serving from 23 Dec. 1812, till 1818, in which year he resigned his seat. On returning afterward he was elected governor. Resuming practice in New Orleans on the expiration of his term, he was soon made attorney-general, and shortly afterward appointed U. S. judge for the district of Louisiana. While visiting Paris during the last days of the empire, he wrote letters to his family, which were published in the Richmond "Enquirer," and in book-form under the title of "Kreutzer at Paris" (Philadelphia, 1816). His brother, John, jurist, b. near Petersburg, Va., in 1787; d. in Mount Athes, Campbell co., Va., 5 July, 1833, was educated at William and Mary, studied law, was admitted to the bar, early gained a good position in his profession, and was appointed attorney-general of the state. He was elected to congress for three successive terms, serving from 8 Dec. 1824, till 1829. He was re-elected in 1830. He was judge of the circuit court for many years. Although a strong believer in the doctrines of the Jeffersonian school, he deprecated civil war, and at the beginning of the secession troubles was sent by Virginia to dissuade the southern states from extreme measures at the same time that John Tyler was despatched on a similar errand to President Buchanan. He published a tragedy called "Ringo, or the Spanish Martyr" (Richmond, 1872), and a volume of occasional verses under the title of "Opuscula." Another brother, Wyndham, governor of Virginia, b. in Manchester, Chesterfield co., Va., 26 Jan., 1803; d. in Washington county, Va., 11 Feb., 1888, was educated at William and Mary, studied law, was admitted to practice in 1824, and established himself in Richmond. He was chosen a councillor of state in 1830, and in 1833 was again elected to the council, which was reduced to three members. He became lieutenant-governor on 31 March, 1836, and on the same day succeeded to the governorship for one year through the resignation of Littleton W. Tazewell. In 1838 he was elected to the legislature, and represented the city of Richmond until his removal to the country in 1841. Returning to the capital in 1858, he was again elected to the legislature, and took an active part in its deliberations during the period of the civil war. He resisted the proposal of South Carolina for a southern convention in 1859, and after the secession of that state and others he still urged the fusion of Virginia to join them. As chairman of a committee, he was the author of the anti-coercion resolution, in which Virginia, while rejecting secession, declared her intention to fight with the southern states if they were attacked. He opposed the regulation of the prices of food in 1863, and offered his resignation in 1864 when the public demanded such a measure, but resumed his seat on receiving a vote of approval from his constituents. He was the author of "Pocahontas, alias Matoaka, and her Descendants through her Marriage with John Rolfe." (Richmond, 1884). He left in manuscript a "Vindication of the Course of Virginia throughout the Slave Controversy.

ROBERTSON, Thomas James, senator, b. in Fairfield county, S. C., 3 Aug., 1823; d. in Columbia, 13 Oct., 1897. He was graduated at South Carolina college, and became a planter. He was Gov. Robert W. Allston and de-camp in 1858-'9. During the war he was a decided and open Unionist. He was a member of the State constitutional convention that was held after the passage of the reconstruction acts of congress, and was elected as a Republican to one of the vacant seats in the U. S. senate. He was re-elected for a full term, serving altogether from 22 July, 1868, till 3 March, 1877, and held the chairmanship of the committee on manufactures.

ROBERTSON, William, Scottish historian, b. in Borthwick, Scotland, 19 Sept., 1721; d. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 11 June, 1793. He studied theology at the University of Edinburgh, where he was graduated in 1741. He held various livings, became, in 1762, principal of the University of Edinburgh, and in 1763, professor of natural history and superintendent of Scotland in 1763. He devoted many years to writing a "History of Scotland" (London, 1758-'9), which brought him fame and advancement, and encouraged him to apply the same degree of care and industry to a "History of the Emperor Charles V." (1769). He then undertook a "History of America," and published the first eight books, dealing with the settlement and history of the Spanish colonies (1777), but the Revolutionary war deterred him from carrying out his plan. The ninth and tenth books, containing the history of Virginia until 1784 and that of New England up to 1632, were published from his manuscripts by his son William (1790). Numerous collective editions of Robertson's works have appeared. His biography has been written by Dugald Stewart (1801) and by Lord Brougham in his "Lives of Men of Letters" (1857).

ROBERTSON, William II., jurist, b. in Bedford, N. Y., 10 Oct., 1823; d. in Katonah, N. Y., 6 Nov., 1898. He received a classical education, and was admitted to the bar in 1847. He was elected superintendent of the common schools of Bedford, and in 1850 was appointed a member of the state assembly. In 1854 he was sent to the state senate, and he was elected county judge for three successive terms, holding the office twelve years. In 1869 he was a presidential elector on the Republican ticket. Judge Robertson was a delegate to the Baltimore convention of 1864 and again an elector, and was then elected to congress, and served from 1 March, 1867, till 3 March, 1869. In 1875 he returned to the state senate, and was one of the leaders of that body till 1881, when he was appointed collector of the port of New York. His nomination to the office by President Garfield without consultation with the senators from New York, Roscoe Conkling and Thomas C. Platt, led to the defection of the so-called Stalwart wing of the Republican party.

ROBERVAL, Jean François de la Roque, Sieur de, French colonist, b. about 1500; d. at sea in 1547. He was a nobleman of Picardy, and the first person that attempted to colonize New France after Cartier. He had gained distinction as an officer in the army, and, having obtained the king's consent to colonize Canada, he sailed for that country in 1542. He reached his destination in safety, wintered at Stadacona (now Quebec), and sent two vessels to France for provisions, which he did not receive. He then led an unsuccessful expedition into the interior of the country, losing fifty-eight men at Quebec, and one ship. Instead of sending Roberval aid, the king ordered Cartier to bring him home, as his services would be valuable in the war in Picardy. He performed several gallant exploits, but in 1547 sailed a second time for Canada with a large and valuable expedition, but was savagely attacked and killed by Indians.

ROBESON, George Maxwell, b. in Belvidere, N. J., in 1827; d. in Trenton, 27 Sept., 1897. He was graduated at Princeton in 1847, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1850, and began practice in Newark, N. J., removing afterward to Camden, where he was appointed prosecuting attorney for the county in 1850. He took an active part in organizing the state troops at the beginning of the civil war, holding a commission as brigadier-general under the governor. In 1867 he became attorney-general of New Jersey, but he resigned on receiving the appointment of secretary of the navy in the cabinet of President Grant on 23 June, 1869. He held this office till March, 1877, and was subsequently a member of congress from 18 March, 1877, to 3 March, 1881.

ROBIDAUX, Joseph Emery, Canadian educator, b. in St. Philippe, Laprairie, Quebec, 10 March, 1844. He was educated at the Montreal and Jesuits' colleges, and graduated in law at McGill university in 1866. He was admitted to the bar in that year, was appointed queen's counsel, and has been professor of civil law at McGill university since 1876. In 1876 he was a commissioner to report on the administration of justice in Montreal, and a member of the commission to inquire into matters connected with the building of the parliment house in Quebec. Mr. Robidaux was elected to the Quebec legislative assembly, 26 March, 1884, and re-elected in December, 1886.

ROBIE, Thomas, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 20 March, 1869; d. there, 28 Aug., 1899. He was graduated at Harvard in 1870, studied theology, and afterward took up the study of medicine, and obtained the degree of M. D. He was librarian of the college in 1712-'3, and from 1714 till 1723 was a tutor. He published a book entitled "The Knowledge of Christ" (Boston, 1721), and in the "Transactions" of the Philosophical society a paper "On the Origin of the Venom of the Spider" (1724).

ROBIN, Claude C., French clergyman, b. in France about 1750. He accompanied Count Rochambeau to the American colonies as chaplain. His experiences and observations in this country, with remarks on some of the actors and events of the Revolution, were given in "Nouveau voyage dans l'Amérique septentrionale en 1781 et campagne de l'armée du M. le Comte de Rochambeau" (Paris, 1782; English translation, Philadelphia, 1783). Abbé Robin was the author also of "Voyages dans l'intérieur de la Louisiana" (Paris, 1807).

ROBINS, Henry Ephraim, clergyman, b. in Hartford, Conn., 27 Sept., 1827. His education was received at the Literary institute, Suffield, Conn., and at Newton College. He was graduated in 1841. In the same year he was ordained, and in 1862 he became pastor of the Central Baptist church, Newport, R. I. In 1867 he took the pastorate of the 1st Baptist church, Rochester, N. Y., and he remained there until 1873, when he was called to the presidency of Colby university. For nearly ten years he administered the affairs of the college with success. In 1882 he was elected to the chair of Christian ethics in Rochester theological seminar, ROBINS, Thomas, banker, b. at South Point, his father's plantation, Worcester county, Md., 1 Jan., 1797; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 13 April, 1882. He received an academic education in Maryland, and in 1815 removed to Philadelphia, where he engaged in mercantile pursuits until 1857. Mr. Robins was then called to the presidency of the Philadelphia bank, resigning in 1870, having extricated it almost from bankruptcy, and carried it safely through two panics, and leaving it the most prosperous in the city. He held many places of trust, and was at one time president of the common council of Philadelphia, and at another the author of "Notes of Travel" (printed privately, Philadelphia, 1873).

ROBINSON, Annie Douglas, poet, b. in Plymouth, N. H., 12 Jan., 1842. Her maiden name was Green. Under the pen-name of "Marian Douglas" she has contributed many poems to magazines and newspapers, and published in book-form "Picture Poems for Young Folks" (Boston, 1871) and a story in prose entitled "Peter and Polly, or Home Life in New England a Hundred Years Ago" (1876).

ROBINSON, Beverly, soldier, b. in Virginia in 1725; d. in Thornbury, England, in 1792. He was the son of John Robinson, president of the council of Virginia in 1734, and Frederick Phillips. The son served under Wolfe as a major at the storming of Quebec in 1759, and became wealthy by his marriage with Susanna, daughter of Frederick Phillips. Though he opposed the measures that led to the separation of the colonies from the mother-country, he joined the loyalists when independence was declared, was rewarded to New York, and raised the Loyal American regiment, of which he was colonel, also commanding the corps called the guards and pioneers. Col. Robinson was also employed to conduct several matters of importance on behalf of the loyalists, and figured conspicuously in cases of desertion from the Whig cause. He opened a correspondence with the Whig leaders of Vermont relative to their return to their allegiance, and was concerned in Arnold's treason. His country mansion was Arnold's headquarters while the latter was arranging his plan. (See illustration on page 65, vol. 1.) At a later period Robinson was a victim of Andros. Col. Robinson, as a witness, accompanied the commissioners that were sent by Sir Henry Clinton to Washington's headquarters to plead with him for Andros's life. Col. Robinson had previously addressed Washington on the subject of Andros's release, and in his letter reminded him of their former friendship. At the termination of the war he went to New Brunswick, and was a member of the first council of that colony, but did not take his seat. He subsequently went to England with part of his family, and resided in retirement at Thornbury, near Bath, till his death. His wife was included in the confiscation act of New York, and the whole of the estate that was derived from her father passed from the family. As a compensation for this loss the British government granted her husband the sum of £17,000 sterling. She died at Thornbury in 1832, aged ninety-four years.—Their son, Beverly, b. in New York state about 1755; d. in New York city in 1816, was graduated at Columbia in 1778, and at the beginning of the Revolution, as president of the college, removed to the office of James Duane. He was a lieutenant-colonel in the Loyal American regiment, and at the evacuation of New York was placed at the head of a large number of loyalists, who embarked for Nova Scotia. He afterward went to New Brunswick, and resided principally at and near the city of New Bouctouche. John, as soon as the Revolution was over, was a member of the council of New Brunswick, and on the occurrence of the war between Great Britain and France, was given command of a regiment that had been raised in the colony. Col. Robinson did much to advance the interests of the city of St. John. He died while on a visit to two of his sons that resided residents of New York colonists, the elder of whom was the author of "Beverly." Morris, b. in the Highlands of New York in 1759; d. at Gibraltar in 1815, served as a captain in the queen's rangers during the war of the Revolution, and after the restoration of peace was continued in commission. At the time of his death he was a lieutenant-colonel and assistant to the adjutant-general in the British army.—Another son, John, b. in New York, and presided at the first bank that was chartered in that city and in the colony.—Another son, Sir Frederick Phillips, soldier, b. in the Highlands of New York in September, 1763; d. in Brighton, England, 1 Jan., 1832, was attached to his father's regiment, and in February, 1777, was commissioned lieutenant-colonel. He was wounded at the battle of Stony Point, but was exchanged, and left this country. He was promoted to the rank of captain in 1794, served in the West Indies under Sir Charles Gore, and was present at the siege of Fort Bourbon in the island of Martinique. In 1795 he returned to England, and in 1812 served as brigadier-general in the peninsula. After the termination of the Napoleonic war he went to Canada as commander-in-chief of the troops in the upper province. He commanded the British force in the attack on Plattsburg under Gen. Prevost, and protested against the order of his superior officer when he was directed to retire. From 1 July, 1815, till 1816, he administered the government of Upper Canada during the absence of Francis Gore. He was afterward removed to the West Indies, where he took command of the forces. He became a lieutenant-general in 1825, and in 1841 was promoted to the full rank of general. On 2 Jan., 1816, he was made a knight commander of the Bath. In 1838 he became a knight grand cross of that order.—Another son, Sir William Henry, b. in the Highlands of New York in 1766; d. in Bath, England, in 1836, accompanied his father to England, was appointed to a place in the commissariat department of the British army, and was its head at the time of his death. He was knighted for his long services. His wife, Catherine, daughter of Cortlandt Skin-ROBINSON, attorney-general of New Jersey, d. at Wistar House, Marlborough, England, in 1843.

ROBINSON, Charles, governor of Kansas, b. in Harvard, Mass., 21 July, 1818; d. in Lawrence, Kansas, 15 Aug., 1894. He was educated at Amherst college, but was compelled by illness to leave in his second year. He studied medicine at Woodstock, Vt., and at Pittsfield, Mass., where he received his degree in 1843, and practised at Belchertown, Springfield, and Fitchburg, Mass., till 1859, when he went to California by the overland route. He edited a daily paper in Sacramento called the "Settler's and Miner's Tribune" in 1856, took an active part in the riots of 1850 as an upholder of squatter sovereignty, was seriously wounded, and, while under indictment for conspiracy and murder, was elected to the legislature. He was subsequently discharged by the court without trial. On his return to Massachusetts in 1852 he conducted in Fitchburg a weekly paper called the "News" till June, 1854, when he went to Kansas as confidential agent of the New England emigrants' aid society, and settled in Lawrence. He became the leader of the Free-state party, and was made chairman of its executive committee and commandant of its reserves. He was a member of the Topeka convention that adopted a free-state constitution in 1855, and under it was elected governor in 1856. He was arrested for treason and usurpation of office, and on his trial the latter charge was acquitted by the jury. He was elected again by the Free-state party in 1858, and for the third time in 1861 under the Kansas constitution, and entered on his term of two years on the admission of Kansas to the Union in January, 1861. He organized most of the Kansas regiments for the civil war. He afterward served one term as representative and two terms as senator in the legislature, and in 1882 was again a candidate for governor. In 1887 he became superintendent of Haskell institute in Lawrence.—His wife, Sarah Tappan Donielie, author, b. in Belchertown, Mass., 12 July, 1827, was educated at the New Salem academy, and married Dr. Robinson at Belchertown on 30 Oct., 1851. Her maiden name was Lawrence. She has published "Kansas, its Interior and Interior Life" (Boston, 1856), in which she describes the scenes, actors, and events which were going on between the struggle between the Free-state and the Loyal states of slavery in Kansas during which her house was plundered and burned, and her husband was imprisoned for four months.

ROBINSON, Charles Seymour, clergyman, b. in Bennington, Vt., 31 March, 1829; d. in New York city, 1 Feb., 1890. He was graduated at Williams, studied theology at Union seminary, and in 1850 at Princeton, and on 19 April, 1855, was ordained pastor of a Presbyterian church in Troy, N. Y. In 1860 he took charge of a church in Brooklyn. In 1868-70 he had charge of the American church in Paris. In 1870 he became pastor of a congregation in New York city, which soon afterward erected the Madison avenue Presbyterian church, resigning in 1887. He received the degrees of D. D. at Hamilton in 1867 and of LL. D. from Lafayette in 1885. Dr. Robinson has published volumes of sermons and other works that have passed through several editions, and collections of hymns and tunes that are extensively used. The titles of his publications are: "Songs of the Church" (New York, 1862); "Songs for the Sanctuary" (New York, 1866); "Songs of Tappan School Teachers" (1868); "Bethel and Penuel" (1873); "Church Work" (1873); "Psalm and Hymns" (1876); "Calkavy Songs for Sunday-Schools" (1875); "Spiritual Songs for Church and Choir" (1879); "Studies in the New Testament" (1880); "Spiritual Songs for Social Meetings" (1881); "Spiritual Songs for Sunday-Schools" (1881); "Studies of Neglected Texts" (1883); "James Domini" (1884); "Sermons in Songs" (1885); "Sabbath Evening Sermons" (1887); "The Pharos of the Bondage and the Exodus" (1887); and "Simon Peter, his Life and Times" (1888). ROBINSON, Christopher, soldier, b. in Westmorland county, Va., in 1760; d. in York (now Toronto), Upper Canada, in 1798. He was a descendant of Christopher Robinson (1643-1706), elder brother of Dr. John Robinson, bishop of Bristol and London, who came to America in 1690 and was afterward secretary of the colony of Virginia. The younger Christopher was educated at William and Mary, and early in the Revolution fled to New York, where he received a commission in the Loyal American regiment under his relative, Beverly Robinson. He served at the south, and was wounded, and at the peace went to Nova Scotia and received a grant of land at Wilmot. He soon removed to Upper Canada, was appointed inspector of schools, and located on the reserve near the settlement of York. In 1796 he represented the counties of Lennox and Addington in the assembly.—His son, Sir John Beverly, bart., b. in Berthier, Lower Canada, 26 July, 1791; d. in Toronto, 30 Jan., 1863, studied law, meanwhile serving as a clerk of the assembly, and, on being admitted to the bar in 1812, was appointed attorney-general of Upper Canada, which office he held till 1815. He was solicitor-general in 1815-18, attorney-general in 1818-29, and chief justice of Upper Canada from 15 July, 1829, till his death. He was for eighteen years a member of the legislature, serving about an equal length of time in each chamber. When the war of 1812 began he was one of a company of 100 volunteers that followed Sir Isaac Brock in the expedition that led to the capture of Detroit, and he was present at the battle of Queenstown Heights. In November, 1815, he was appointed a companion (civil division) of the order of the Bath, and he was created a baronet, by patent, 21 Sept., 1854. He was chancellor of Trinity college, Toronto, and the author of several works on Canada.—John Beverly's son, Sir James Lukin, of Toronto, succeeded him in the baronetcy. His other son, John Beverly, Canadian lawyer, b. at Beverly house, Toronto, 21 Feb., 1829; d. 18 June, 1890, was educated at Upper Canada college, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Upper Canada in 1844. He served during the rebellion of 1837 as aide-de-camp to Sir Francis Bond Head, and participated in the expedition that led to the capture of Detroit, and he was present at the battle of Queenstown Heights. In November, 1815, he was appointed a companion (civil division) of the order of the Bath, and he was created a baronet, by patent, 21 Sept., 1854. He was chancellor of Trinity college, Toronto, and the author of several works on Canada.—John Beverly's son, Sir James Lukin, of Toronto, succeeded him in the baronetcy. His other son, John Beverly, Canadian lawyer, b. at Beverly house, Toronto, 21 Feb., 1829; d. 18 June, 1890, was educated at Upper Canada college, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Upper Canada in 1844. He served during the rebellion of 1837 as aide-de-camp to Sir Francis Bond Head, and participated in the engagement near Toronto. He began the practice of law at Toronto, was president of its council, and was elected mayor in 1857. Mr. Robinson represented Toronto in the legislative assembly of Canada from 1857 till 1861, and West Toronto from the latter date till 1865. He was elected for Algoma to the Dominion parliament in 1872, and sat until the dissolution in 1874. Mr. Robinson was also a member of the executive council of Canada, president of the local committee in the Cartier-Macdonald administration from 27 March till 21 May, 1862. He was lieutenant-governor of Ontario in 1880-7.

ROBINSON, Christopher Blackett, Canadian publisher, b. in Thorold, Ont., 2 Nov., 1837. He was educated at the public schools and by private tuition, entering the printery of his uncle, J. P. Robinson, in 1857, and became a partner in the "Canadian Post" in Beaverton. In 1861 he removed this paper to Lindsay, where he published it for ten years. In 1871 he sold his interest in the ROBINSON, Conway, jurist, b. in Richmond, Va., 15 Sept., 1805; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 30 Jan., 1884. The first emigrant of this family was John Robinson, who settled in Virginia, apparently in York county, where his son Anthony was a large land proprietor in 1601. The family is not to be confused with that of the colonial treasurer, or with Christopher Robinson, president of the council. Conway Robinson's father, John, was appointed in 1787 clerk of the superior court, Richmond, and was the author of "Forms in the Courts of Virginia," to which he son received his education at a school in Richmond, and became deputy clerk under his father. Here he studied law and issued a new edition of his father's "Forms" (Richmond, 1826), which is still valued by clerks in Virginia. He secured a large practice soon after entering on his profession. He next issued his "Law and Equity Practice in Virginia," 4 vols. (1829-34), which has been highly praised. In 1832 Mr. Robinson became reporter to the Virginia court of appeals, but, after publishing two volumes of reports (1832-34), he resigned the office in 1843. From 1846 till 1849 he devoted himself, with other eminent lawyers, to a revision of the civil and criminal code of Virginia, which went into effect on 1 July, 1850. In the same year a constitutional convention met in Virginia, some of whose changes, such as the election of all judges by the people, were vainly opposed by Mr. Robinson. Further changes in the code being necessitated by the new constitution, he was chosen by Richmond its representative in the house of delegates in 1852, in order that he might assist in the revision. In 1853 he removed to Washington, D. C., and practised in the supreme court. He had begun in 1854, and in 1874 completed, "The Principles and Practice of Courts of Justice in England and the United States" (2 vols., Richmond, 1856). This work was preceded by careful researches in England, where its value has been recognized by high authorities. Conway Robinson was for many years chairman of the executive committee of the Virginia historical society, which published his "Account of the Discoveries of the West until 1519; and of Voyages to and along the Atlantic Coast of North America, from 1520 to 1573." He made several important discoveries in history, and in 1853 found in the state archives in Richmond MS. journals of the first legislative assembly in Virginia (1619). At the close of the above-named work on the early voyages to America he alluded to a work in preparation, "The Annals of Virginia," but this was not published, as the later years of the author were devoted to his "History of the High Court of Chancery, and other Institutions of Virginia; from the time of Graves to Julius Caesar until the Accession of William and Mary in 1668-79." Of this work the first volume has been published (Richmond, 1882), and the second and concluding volume will probably appear. The first volume possesses a value independent of the second, and has large annotated indices. It is the only work of the kind in Englis h, and is virtually a cyclopaedia of legal history in the eleven centuries that it covers.

ROBINSON, Edward, biblical scholar, b. in Southington, Conn., 10 April 1794; d. in New York city, 27 Jan., 1863. He was brought up on a farm, taught at East Haven and Farmington in 1839-41, entered Hamilton college, where his uncle, Seth Norton, was a professor, and was graduated in 1816. After studying law for a few months, he returned to the college as tutor in mathematics and Greek, and while there married a daughter of Samuel Kirkland. His wife died within a year. In 1821 he went to Andover to superintend the publication of an edition of Homer's "Iliad," with selected notes. He there began the study of Hebrew, aided Prof. Moses Stuart in the preparation of the second edition of the latter's "Hebrew Grammar" (Andover, 1839), and in 1842-6 it was his assistant, and, for part of the time his substitute, in the chair of sacred literature in the theological seminary. In 1826 he went to Germany, and pursued philological studies at Halle and Berlin. He married the daughter of Prof. Ludwig Heinrich von Jakobs, of Halle, in 1828, and after travelling through Europe returned home in 1830, and was appointed extraordinary professor of sacred literature in Andover seminary. In 1831 he began the publication of the "Biblical Repository," which he edited for four years. After spending three years in Boston, engaged on a scriptural Greek lexicon, he accepted in 1837 the chair of biblical literature in Union theological seminary, New York city. He explored Palestine in 1838 with the Rev. Eli Smith, and in 1839-40 remained in Berlin to digest his notes and verify his discoveries. This work gave the first impetus to modern biblical research. He returned to the duties of his professorship, and in 1843 edited the first volume of the "Bibliotheca Sacra," into which was merged the "Biblical Repository." He revisited Jerusalem in 1852, being again accompanied by the Rev. Dr. Sumner. He began in 1856 the revision of his works on scriptural geography, but did not live to complete it. His biblical library and maps were purchased after his death for Hamilton college, with the exception of many volumes that he had given to Union theological seminary. He received the degree of D. D. from Dartmouth in 1832, and from the University of Halle in 1842, that of L. L. D. from Yale in 1841, and received a gold medal from the London royal geographical society in 1842. While associated with Prof. Stuart, he assisted in making a translation of George B. Winer's "Greek Grammar of the New Testament" (Andover, 1825). He published independently a "Greek and English Lexicon of the New Testament," (1825), based on the "Clavis Philologica" of Christian A. Wall; revised Augustine Calvert's "Dictionary of the Bible" (Boston, 1832); translated from the German Philip Bultman's "Greek Grammar" (1833); compiled "Dictionary of the Holy Bible for the Use of Schools and Young Persons" (Boston, 1854); prepared a "Harmony of the Gospels in Greek" (Amsterdam, 1834); translated from the Latin of Wilhelm Gesenius the "Hebrew Lexicon to the Old Testament," including the Biblical Chaldee" (Boston, 1856; 5th ed., with corrections and additions, 1854); and produced a "Greek and English Lexicon of the New Testament" (Boston, 1836; last revision, New York, 1859), a work which superseded his translation of Wahl's work, became a standard authority in the United States, and was several times reprinted. In 1857, during his extensive survey of Palestine and historical study of scriptural toponymy was "Biblical Researches in Palestine, Mt. Sinai, and Arabia Petraea, a Journal of Travels in 1838, by E. Robinson and E. Smith, undertaken in reference to Biblical Geography" (Boston and London, 1841; German translation, Halle, 1841). It was recognized in all countries as the most valuable contribution to biblical geography and archeology that had appeared since the days of Hadian Reland, and invited other students to enter this then neglected field of investigation. A second "Harmony of the Four Gospels in Greek" (Boston, 1854) was followed by a "Harmony of the Gospels in English" (Boston, 1846; London, 1847); also in French (Brussels, 1851). After his second journey to the Holy Land, E. Robinson's Biblical Researches in Palestine and the Adjacent Regions: a Journal of Travels in the Year 1852, by Edward Robinson, Eli Smith, and others, drawn up from the Original Diaries, with Historical Illustrations (Boston and London, 1856; German translation, Berlin, 1856), Revised editions of the Greek and English "Harmonies," edited by Matthew B. Riddle, were published in 1850 and 1860. A "Memoir of Rev. William Robinson, with some Account of his Ancestors in this Country" (printed privately, New York, 1839), is a sketch of his father, who for forty-one years was pastor of the Congregational church in Southington, Conn. Dr. Robinson's last work, "Physical Geography of the Holy Land," a supplement to his "Biblical Researches," was edited by Mrs. Robinson (New York and London, 1863). See "The Life, Writings, and Character of Edward Robinson," by Henry B. Smith and Roswell D. Hitchcock (New York, 1863).

His wife, Therese Albertina Louise von Jakob, author, b. in Halle, Germany, 26 Jan., 1797; d. in Hamburg, Germany, 13 April, 1849, went in 1807 to Russia with her father, who held high posts under the government, and returned to Halle in 1816. In Russia she acquired an intimate knowledge of the Slavic languages and literature, and wrote her first poems. After her return to Germany she translated Walter Scott's "Old Mortality" and "Black Dwarf," which she published under the pen-name of "Ernst Berthold" (Halle, 1822). All her other works were signed "Tulzi," and are often unacknowledged by the translator's name. She wrote many original tales, some of which were collected in a volume bearing the title of "Psyche" (1855). A German translation of the popular songs of the Servians was issued under the title of "Volksseder der Serben" (Halle, 1826; new ed., Leipzig, 1854). After her arrival in the United States she translated into German John Pickering's "The History of the Oldest Orthodoxy, or the Play for the Indian Languages of North America" (Leipzig, 1834). Her other works in the German language that were published during her residence in this country are "Charakteristik der Volkslieder der deutschen Nationen" (Leipzig, 1840); "Die Unerecht der Lieder Ossians" (1840); "Aus der Geschichte der ersten Ansiedelungen in den Vereinigten Staaten," comprising a history of John Smith (1845); "Die Colonisation von Neu England" (1847), which was imperfectly translated into English in William Riddle, Jr., and is the only one of the publications that were originally published in Leipzig and translated into English by her daughter, appearing under the titles of "Heloise, or the Unrevealed Secret" (New York, 1850); "Life's Discipline; a Tale of the Annals of Hungary" (1851); and "The Exiles" (1853), which last was republished as Woodhill, or the Ways of Providence (1856). She contributed to various publications the subjects that engaged her study to the "North American Review," the "Biblical Repository," and other American periodicals. One series of articles was reissued in book-form under the title of "Historical View of the Languages and Literature of the Slavic Nations, with a Sketch of their Popular Poetry" (New York and London, 1836). After the death of her husband, Mrs. Robinson resided in Hamburg, where her son, Edward, was American consul. Her last work was published in the United States under the title of "Fifteen Years, a Picturesque View from the Last Century" (New York, 1870). A collection of her tales, with her biography by her daughter, was published (2 vols., Leipzig, 1874).

ROBINSON, Ezekiel Gilman, educator, b. in Augusta, Me., 26 May, 1813; d. in Port oilton, 13 June, 1894. He was graduated at Brown and at Newton theological seminary in 1842. He was pastor of the Baptist church in Norfolk, Va., during which period he served for one year, by permission of his church, as chaplain at the University of Virginia. After a short pastorate in Cambridge, Mass., he became in 1846 professor of biblical interpretation in Western theological seminary, Covington, Ky. In 1850 he was chosen pastor of the Ninth street Baptist church, Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1853 he was elected professor of theology in Rochester theological seminary, and in 1856 he was made its president. In 1872 he resigned his place at Rochester to become president of Brown university, which office he resigned in 1889. Under his administration this college had advanced its already high reputation. Dr. Robinson was presidiously a teacher, bread and full in his scholarly, stimulating and inspiring in his methods. While he was faithful to his special educational work, his high reputation as a preacher and lecturer had kept him much in the pulpit and on the platform. He had been a trustee of Vassar college from its foundation, and received the honorary degree of D. D. and LL. D. from Brown in 1853 and 1872 respectively. Dr. Robinson's published writings consist chiefly of sermons, addresses, and review articles. For several years he was editor of the "Christian Review." His books include a revised translation of Neander's "Planting and Training of the Church" (New York, 1869); "Yale Lectures on the Christian Religion and the Principles and Practice of Morality" (Boston, 1888).

ROBINSON, Fayette, author, b. in Virginia; d. in New York city, 26 March, 1859. He was the author of "Mexico and her Military Chieftains" (Philadelphia, 1847); "Account of the Organization of the Army of the United States, with Biographies of Distinguished Officers" (2 pts., Philadelphia and London, 1849); "Grammar of the Spanish Language" (Philadelphia, 1850); a romance entitled "Wizard of the Wave" (New York, 1833); a translation of Anthelme Brillat-Savarin's "Physiologie du goût" (Philadelphia, 1854), and novels from the French.ROBINSON, George Dexter, governor of Massachusetts, b. in Lexington, Mass., 20 Jan.
ROBINSON, Horatio Nelson, mathematician, b. in Hartwick, Otsego Co., N. Y., 1 Jan., 1806; d. in Elbridge, N. Y., 19 Jan., 1887. He received only a common-school education, but early evinced a genius for mathematics, making the calculations for an almanac at the age of sixteen. A wealthy neighbor gave him the means to study at Princeton, and at the age of nineteen he was appointed an instructor of mathematics in the navy, which post he retained for ten years. He then taught an academy at Canandaigua, and afterward one at Geneseo, N. Y., until in 1814 he gave up teaching because his health was impaired, and removed to Cincinnati, Ohio. There he prepared the first of a series of works on trigonometry which have been adopted in many of the academies and colleges of the United States. In revising and completing the series he had the assistance of other mathematicians and educators. He removed to Saratoga, N. Y., in 1830, and to Elbridge in 1834. His publications include "University Algebra" (Cincinnati, 1842), with a "Key" (1847); "Astronomy and University Physics" (1839); "Geometry and Trigonometry" (1850); "Trigonometry" (Albany, 1850); "Mathematical Recreations" (Albany, 1851); "Concise Mathematical Operations" (Cincinnati, 1854); "Trigonometry and Navigation" (1854), which, in its revised form, was edited by Owen Read (New York, 1859); "Analytical Geometry and Trigonometric Sections" (New York, 1844); "Differential and Integral Calculus" (1841), edited by Isaac F. Quince (1848).

ROBINSON, James Sidney, soldier, b. in Mansfield, Ohio, 14 Oct., 1827; d. in Toledo, 14 Jan., 1892. He learned the printer’s trade, and established the Kenton "Republican," which he edited for eighteen years. In 1856 he was secretary of the Ohio Republican party; the same office was held in Ohio. He was for two sessions clerk of the state house of representatives. At the beginning of the civil war he enlisted in the 4th Ohio regiment, and was soon made a captain. He took part in the operations at Richmond, Va., in April, 1861, served under Gen. John C. Frémont in the Shenandoah valley, and became lieutenant-colonel in April, and colonel in August, 1862. He was engaged at the second battle of Bull Run, and at Cedar Mountain and Chancellorsville, and was severely wounded at Gettysburg. He commanded a brigade under Gen. Joseph Hooker and Gen. Alpheus S. Williams in the Atlanta campaign and the march to the sea, was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers on 12 Jan., 1863, received the rank of major-general in 13 March, and was mustered out on 31 Aug. On his return to Ohio he became chairman of the state Republican committee. In 1879 he was appointed by the governor commissioner of railroads and telegraphs. He was elected to congress for two successive terms, serving from 5 Dec., 1881, till 12 Jan., 1885. In 1885 he was appointed to the office of secretary of state of Ohio for four years.

ROBINSON, John, clergyman, b. probably in Lincolnshire, England, in 1575 or 1576; d. in Leyden, Holland, about the beginning of March, 1625. He entered Corpus Christi, Cambridge, in 1592, was chosen a fellow, and has appeared to have received the degree of M. A. in 1599. He officiated as a minister of the established church near Norwich, but omitted parts of the ritual, having become inclined toward Puritan doctrines at the university, and was soon suspended from his functions. He removed to Norwich, where he gathered about him a band of nonconformists, who, before he formally withdrew from the national church, received a fellowship, and connected himself with a body of dissenters in Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, and the adjacent district. He was one of ministers of the congregation at Scooby, Nottinghamshire. A part of the flock went with the other minister to Holland. Some months later, Robinson and the rest of the congregation determined to emigrate, in order to escape persecution. After being obtained by the police and enduring various hardships, the entire congregation escaped to Amsterdam, and, after passing nearly a year there, settled in Leyden in the early summer of 1699, where Robinson, with three others, in 1611, purchased a large house with an enclosed court. The church met for worship in the house, and the company seem to have built homes within the court. He was recognized by his opponents as the "most learned, polished, and modest spirit that ever separated from the Church of England," and in Leyden gained a high reputation by his disputations in defense of Calvinism in 1653 with Episcopius, the successor of Arminius. He became also a member of the university of Leyden, and in 1635, his congregation was increased by accessions from England, and when, in 1617, the plan of emigration to America was discussed, he took the heartiest interest in the scheme, and was active in promoting negotiations with the Virginia company. There was difficulty in bringing the matter to a conclusion, and about the beginning of 1620 a party was appointed to certain Amsterdam merchants to remove to New Amsterdam; but the states-general declined to further the plan, and Robinson and his company fell back on their original purpose. And when the younger members of the congregation sailed in the "Speedwell" in July, 1629, he took leave of them in a memorable sermon, intending to follow with the others the next year. A part of the remainder of the congregation died of the plague; as also, in 1631, did his son, Isaac, who has many descendants in the United States. The Leyden pastor was the author of "An Answer to a Censorious Epistle" (1699); "A Justification of Separation from the Church of England against Mr. Bernard’s Injeuctive Entitled ‘The Separatist’s Divine’ " (1690); "Of Religious Communion, Private and Public" (1614); "A Manumission to a Manuduction" (1615); "The People’s Plea for the Exercise of Prophecy" (1618); "Apologia justa et necessaria" (1619), which was translated into English in 1625; "Defense of the Doctrine propounded by the Synod of Dort" (1624); "Letter to the Congregational Church in London" (1624); "Appeal of Truth’s Defenders" (1624); "Of Religious Communion, Private and Moral" (1625); "On the Lawfulness of Hearing of the Ministers in the Church of England" (1630); and "A Brief Certificate concerning Church Government," the earliest known edition of which was printed in 1642. The "Works of John Robinson, Pastor of the Pilgrim Fathers," have been published, with a memoir and annotations, by Robert Ashton, an accurate account of his descendants by William Allen (3 vols., London and Boston, 1851).
ROBINSON, John, clergyman, b. in Cabarrus county, N. C., 8 Jan., 1708; d. in Poplar Tent, N. C., 14 Dec., 1843. He received an academic education at Winnisburn, S.C., studied theology, was licensed to preach on 4 April, 1738, and organized several churches in Duplin county, N. C. He accepted the charge of the Presbyterian church at Fayetteville in 1800, established a classical school, preached in Poplar Tent from 1805 till 1818, when he returned to Poplar Tent. The University of North Carolina gave him the degree of D. D. in 1829. He was one of the most popular and persuasive preachers of his faith, and not less eminent as an instructor. He published only an "Eloge on Washington" (1800).

ROBINSON, John Cleveland, said to be 10, Binghamton, N. Y., 9 April, 1817; d. there, 18 Feb., 1897. He was appointed to the U. S. military academy, left before graduation to study law, but returned to military service in October, 1829, when he was commissioned as 2d lieutenant in the 5th U. S. infantry. He joined the army of occupation in Texas at Corpus Christi in September, 1845, as regimental and brigade quartermaster, being promoted to lieutenanit in January, 1846, was at Páyote and Brea de la Palma, served with distinction at Monterey, and participated in the concluding operations of the Mexican war. He was made captain in August, 1850, was engaged against hostile Indians in Texas in 1853–4, was ordered in 1856 to Florida, where he led expeditions against the Seminole in the Everglades and Big Cypress swamp, and in 1857 took part in the Utah expedition. At the beginning of the civil war he was in command at Fort McHenry, Baltimore, and prevented its capture by the insurgents by means of a successful ruse. Subsequently he was engaged in mustering volunteers at Detroit, Mich., and Columbus, Ohio, and in September, 1861, he was appointed colonel of the 1st Michigan volunteers. He was promoted major in the U. S. army in February, 1862, was commissioned as brigadier-general of volunteers on 28 April, 1862, and commanded a brigade at Newport News. He was soon transferred to the Army of the Potomac, and commanded the 1st brigade of Gen. Philip Kearney's division. He took part in the seven days' battles before Richmond, and commanded a division of General Frederick's troops at Gettysburg, where he earned the brevet of lieutenant-colonel, U. S. army, and in the operations at Mine Run and in the battles of the Wilderness, receiving the brevet of colonel for his services there. At Spottsylvania Court-House, while leading a gallant charge on the enemy's breastworks, he received a bullet in his left knee, necessitating amputation at the knee, and received the brevet of major-general of volunteers on 27 June, 1864. He was unfit for further service in the field, and subsequently commanded districts in New York state, being brevetted brigadier- and major-general, U. S. army, in March, 1863, served as military commander and commissioner of the Bureau of freedmen in North Carolina in 1866, was promoted colonel in the regular army in May, 1867, received the brevet of major-general of volunteers on 1 Sept., 1866, commanded the Department of the South in 1867, and the Department of the Lakes in 1867–8, and on 6 May, 1869, was retired with the full rank of major-general. In 1872 he was elected by the Republicans lieutenant-governor of New York on the ticket with Gen. John A. Dix, then senator from New York, the Grand army of the republic in 1877 and 1878, and president of the Society of the Army of the Potomac in 1887. In his last years he was blind.

ROBINSON, John M., senator, b. in Kentucky in 1763; d. in Ottawa, Ill., 27 April, 1843. When a boy he moved with his parents to Carlin, Ill., where he afterward resided, engaging in the practice of law. He was chosen to the U. S. senate in place of John McLean, deceased, and served from 4 Jan., 1831, till 3 March, 1841. In the year of his death he was elected one of the supreme court judges of Illinois.

ROBINSON, Lucius, governor of New York, b. in Windham, Greene co., N. Y., 4 Nov., 1810; d. in Elmira, 21 March, 1891. He was educated at Delhi, N. Y., and was admitted to the bar in 1832. He became district attorney, and was appointed master of chancery in New York city in 1845 and appointed in 1853. Leaving the Democratic party on the formation of the Republican organization, he was elected a member of the assembly in 1859 and controller of the state in 1861 and 1863. In 1865 he was nominated for the same office by the Democrats, but failed of election. In 1871–2 he was a member of the constitutional commission. In 1875 he was elected comptroller by the Democratic party, but was not elected in 1876. In 1879 he was again nominated by the Democrats for the governorship, but was not elected. One of the entrances to the Niagara Falls park is named in his honor.

ROBINSON, Matthew, Baron Rokery, b. near Hythe, Kent co., England, in 1713; d. 30 Nov., 1809. He was educated at Westminster and Cambridge, and elected to parliament in 1728, served in the House of Commons in 1747 and 1754. He led a life of primitive simplicity, and was an enthusiast for liberty, and the measures for the coercion of the American colonies were especially repugnant to his sense of justice. He succeeded his cousin, Richard Robinson, archbishop of Armagh, as Baron Rokery in the peerage of Ireland on 10 Oct., 1784. He published "Considerations on the Measures Carrying on with Respect to the British Colonies in North America" (2d ed., London, 1774); "Considerations on the British Colonies" (1775); "A Further Examination of our American Measures" (1776); and "Peace the Best Policy" (1777).

ROBINSON, Merritt M., lawyer, b. in Louisiana about 1810; d. there, 5 June, 1850. He was the reporter of the supreme court of Louisiana in 1841 till 1847. He published a useful "Digest of the Penal Laws of Louisiana, Analytically Arranged" (New Orleans, 1841). His "Reports," comprising sixteen volumes, including four that he edited, were enriched with valuable marginal notes (New Orleans, 1842–7).

ROBINSON, Samuel, soldier, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 4 April, 1707; d. in London, England, 27 Oct., 1767. His father, of the same name, was the third son of William Robinson, one of the early Cambridge colonists, and who, it is said, was a kinsman of Rev. John Robinson, of Leyden, pastor to the pilgrims that came in the "Mayflower." In 1736 Samuel settled in Hardwick, Mass., where he was selectman ten years, assessor three years, and town-clerk four years, and a deacon of the church. From 1755 till 1759 he commanded a company in the French war. On his return to Massachusetts from one of his campaigns, mistaking his route, he passed by accident through what is now Bennington, Vt., and, impressed by the attractiveness of the country, determined to settle there. He formed the company with which he purchased the rights of the original grantees of lands, and, taking a colony with him in 1761, settled Bennington, this being the first town in what is now Vermont. He was the acknowledged leader in the band of pioneers in the settlement of the town, and continued to exercise a controlling influence in its affaires during the remainder of his life." Gov. Wentworth commissioned him, 8 Feb., 1762, a justice of the peace, and he was then the first person that was appointed to a judicial office within the limits of that territory. He was chosen to present a petition to the king for relief during the controversy between New York and New Hampshire regarding jurisdiction, and reached London in February, 1767. His mission was partially successful, but it was left incomplete by his sudden death from small-pox. He was buried in the cemetery connected with the church of his favorite preacher, Rev. George Whitefield, and a monument with an elaborate inscription was erected to his memory in the cemetery at Bennington Centre.—His son, Samuel, soldier, b. in Hardwick, Mass., 9 Aug., 1739; d. in Bennington, Vt., 3 May, 1813, at the age of seventeen was a member of his father's company, and the next year was adjutant of Col. Ruggles's regiment. He accompanied his father to Bennington, and was active in the New York controversy and in the affaire of the Connecticut grants. During the battle of Bennington, performed other military services during the Revolution, and rose to the rank of colonel. In 1777-8 he had charge, as overseer, of the Tory prisoners, in 1779-80 he represented the town in the assembly, and he was for three years a member of the board of war. He was the first justice of the peace appointed in town under the authority of Vermont. Vermont was also during the same year one of the judges of a special court. Col. Robinson was one of the few persons who managed a correspondence with the British general Haldimand during the Revolutionary war, securing Vermont from invasion. — Another son, Moses, governor of Vermont, b. in Hardwick, Mass., 17 March, 1774; d. in Bennington, Vt., 29 May, 1813, removed to Bennington with his father, and became one of the foremost citizens of Vermont. He was chosen town-clerk at the first meeting of the town, and served for nineteen years; was colonel of the militia, and at the head of his regiment at Mount Independence on its evacuation by Gen. St. Clair, and was a member of the council of safety at the time of the battle of Bennington. He was the fourth and last governor of that year. He was appointed the first chief justice of the supreme court of Vermont, which office he held for ten years. In 1799 he became the second governor of the state. In 1782 he was one of the agents of Vermont to the Continental congress, and on the admission of Vermont into the Union he became in 1791 the first Usher serving until 1796. He was a warm friend of Madison and Jefferson, and bitterly opposed Jay's treaty. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Yale in 1780, and by Dartmouth in 1789.—Another son, David, soldier, b. in Hardwick, Mass., 3 Nov., 1754; d. in Vermont, 11 Dec., 1813, removed to Bennington with his father in 1781. While his brother Moses was a col. at the Catoctin covey as one of the committee for safety, David and his brothers Leonard and Silas were in the Bennington battle, as members of the company that was commanded by their brother Samuel. Afterward, by regular promotion, David attained to the rank of major-general of Vermont militia, which post he held from 1812 till 1819. He was a member of the county that was called Bennington, and was a member of the legislature thirteen years, chief justice of the state from 1801 till 1807; and, when his predecessor on the bench, Israel Smith, resigned his seat in the U. S. senate, was elected to serve through the unexpired term, and on its conclusion was re-elected, serving from 26 Oct., 1807, till 2 March, 1813. In the latter year he became judge of probate and held the office for four years, and in 1818 again represented Bennington in the legislature. The honorary degree of A. B. was conferred on him by Dartmouth in 1790, and that of A. M. in 1803.—The grandson of Moses, John Staniford, governor of Vermont, b. in Bennington, Vt., 10 Nov., 1804; d. in Charleston, S. C., 24 April, 1860, was graduated at Williams in 1824, studied law in Bennington, was admitted to the bar in 1827, and took a high position among the lawyers of the state. He was a member of the legislature for many terms, and was elected governor in 1855 as a Democrat on joint ballot of the two houses, there serving during the next four years. His party had not elected a candidate before for four years, and he was frequently a Democratic candidate for congress. He was a delegate to the National Democratic convention in 1860, and died during its sessions. ROBINSON, Solon, author, b. near Holland, Conn., 21 Oct., 1803; d. in Jacksonville, Fla., 3 Nov., 1860. He received a common-school education, and began to learn the agent's trade at the age of fourteen, but was not strong enough to continue, and turned to peddling and to other means of gaining a living. He early acquired a literary reputation by contributing graphic papers to the Albany "Cultivator," and became a popular writer on agricultural subjects for newspapers and magazines. About 1840 he removed to Jacksonville, Fla. While conducting the agricultural department in the New York "Tribune," he occasionally wrote sketches of New York city life among the poorer classes, which were printed in the local columns. One of these articles attracted popular attention, and was expanded into a book entitled "Hot Corn, or Life Scenes in New York" (New York, 1856), of which 30,000 copies were sold in six months. It was afterward published as "Hot Corn, or Domestic Economy Illustrated" (1860); "Facts for Farmers; also for the Family Circle," which had an extraordinary circulation (1864); and "Me-won-toe" (1867). ROBINSON, Stillman Williams, civil engineer, b. in South Reading, Vt., 6 March, 1838. He studied at schools in Vermont, and was graduated as a civil engineer at the University of Michigan in 1863. Entering the service of the U. S. lake survey, he continued so engaged until 1866, when he was appointed instructor of civil engineering at the University of Michigan. In 1870-8 he held the chair of mathematics at Illinois industrial university, and he was then appointed professor of physics and mechanical engineering in Ohio state university, which place he has resigned. Among his important inventions are the Robinson photograph-trimmer; the Templet ediotograph; a wire grip fastening machine; a boat and shoe nailing machine; and iron piling and substructure machinery—most of which are in active operation and in the hands of numerous organized corporations. Prof. Robinson is a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, and a member of the American society of civil engineers, and of the American society of mechanical engineers. In addition to chapters in railway reports, and numerous scientific papers in periodicals and transactions, he has published "A Practical Treatise on the Teeth of Wheels" (New York, 1876); "Railroad Economies, or Notes with Comments" (1882); and "Strength of Wrought-Iron Bridge-Beams" (1882).

ROBINSON, Stuart, clergyman, b. in Strabane, County Tyrone, Ireland, 14 Nov., 1814; d. in Louisville, Ky., 5 Oct., 1881. The family settled in New York city in 1836. He moved to Virginia the same year, and the next year removed to Berkeley county, Va. The son was graduated at Amherst in 1836, studied theology at Union seminary, Va., and at Princeton, and was ordained as a Presbyterian minister on 8 Oct., 1841. He preached and taught for six years at Malden, Va. From 1847 till 1852 he was pastor of the church in Frankfort, Ky., where he established a female seminary. He accepted the pastorate of an independent church in Baltimore in 1852, but resigned in 1854, and with a large part of the congregation organized a regular Presbyterian church. He established and conducted a periodical called the "Presbyterian Critic" (1856–6). In 1856–7 he was professor of church government and pastoral theology at Danville seminary. In 1858 he was elected to the legislature in Louisville, but was removed soon afterward into a large new edifice. He purchased the "Presbyterian Herald," changed its name to the "True Presbyterian," and in its columns maintained zeal the doctrine of the non-sectarian character of the church, which brought him into sharp conflict with the section of the Presbyterians in Kentucky who upheld the contrary view. His loyalty being called in question, his paper was suppressed in 1862 by the military authorities, and the editor removed to Canada, where he preached to large audiences in Toronto till the close of the war. In April, 1866, he returned to his church in Louisville, and resumed the publication of his paper, changing the title to the "Free Christian Commonwealth." He was expelled from the general assembly of 1866 at St. Louis on account of his action in signing what was known as the "Declaration and Testimony," which protested against political overreaches by that body. Dr. Robinson and his colleagues of the presbytery of Louisville were, by an order of that body, debarred from seats in the courts of the church, and, after an earnest controversy with the Presbyterian paper in Kentucky, he induced the synod of Kentucky to unite with the general assembly of the Southern Presbyterian church in 1869, of which he was chosen moderator by acclamation. He was instrumental in inducing the Southern church to join in the Pan-Presbyterian alliance at Edinburgh in 1877, which he attended as a delegate, and in securing the adoption of the principle of equal discipline. From the period of his ministry in Frankfort he was accustomed to expound the Old Testament on Sunday evenings. These lectures were widely read in pamphlet-form and subsequently published in a volume. One of these discourses, delivered in Toronto in February, 1885, on the subject of "Slavery as Recognized by the Mosaic Law" was recognized also, and allowed in the Abrahamic, Mosaic, and Christian Church," was expanded and published (Toronto, 1885). He was also the author of "The Church of God as an Essential Element of the Gospel" (Philadelphia, 1858), and of a book of outlines of sermons entitled "Discourses of Redemption" (New York, 1870).

ROBINSON, William Ericena, journalist, b. in Unach, Ireland, 6 May, 1814; d. in Brooklyn, 23 Jan., 1892. He attended Cookstown classical school, and entered the Royal academic institution at Belfast, but was compelled by sickness to leave. He emigrated to the United States in 1836, was graduated at Yale in 1841, and studied in the law-school there. While a member of the college he founded the "Yale Banner," and wrote editorial articles for the daily press. He was engaged as editor of the New Haven "Daily Courier," but left it on account of its known and signed animadversions. He then went to journalist in New York city. His articles, signed "Richelieu," in the "Tribune," established his reputation. He was editor for a time of the Buffalo "Express," and subsequently of the "Irish World." He organized the movement for the relief of Ireland in 1847, and procured the authorization by congress of the sending of the frigate "Macedonian" with provisions to Ireland. In 1847 he edited a weekly paper called "The People." An address on "The Celt and the Saxon" that he delivered before a college society in 1851 at Clinton, N. Y., was published, and provoked animadversions in English newspapers and reviews and in the debates of parliament. In 1854 he entered on the practice of law in New York city. He was appointed U. S. sub-treasurer of the internal revenue, and was re-elected for five years, and held that office for five years. He was elected to congress as a Democrat in 1856, and was again elected in 1859, and continued in his seat by re-election in 1862. His management and persistent advocacy secured the passage in 1859 of a bill asserting the rights of expatriation and naturalization, which resulted in the abandonment of the doctrine of perpetual allegiance by Great Britain and Germany. Besides his political writings in the daily press, he had produced popular poems and delivered lectures and addresses on literary subjects. He was preparing for publication a book on Irish-Amercian genealogies.

ROBINSON, William Stevens, journalist, b. in Concord, Mass., 7 Dec., 1818; d. in Malden, Mass., 11 March, 1876. He was educated in the public schools of Concord, learned the printer's trade, at the age of twenty became the editor and publisher of the "Yeoman's Gazette" in Concord, and was afterward assistant editor of the Lowell "Courier." He was an opponent of slavery while he adhered to the Whig party, and when the Free-soil party was organized he left the "Courier," and in July, 1848, took charge of the Boston "Daily Whig." His journalistical and editorial writings were numerous, and the circulation of the paper, the name of which was changed to the "Republican"; yet, after the presidential canvass was ended, Henry Wilson, the proprietor, decided to assume the editorial management and moderate the tone of his journal. Robinson next edited the Lowell "American," a Free-soil Democratic paper, till it died for lack of support in 1853. He was a member of the legislature in 1852 and 1853. In 1856 he began to write letters for the Springfield "Republican" over the signature "Warrington," in which questions of the day and public men were discussed with such boldness and wit that the correspondence attracted wide popular attention. This connection was continued until his death. From 1852 till 1855 he was clerk of the Massachusetts Historical Society. "Warrington," by his articles in the newspapers and magazines, was instrumental in defeating Benjamin F. Butler's effort to obtain the Republican nomination for governor in 1871, and in 1873 he was Butler's strongest opponent. Besides pamphlets and addresses, he published a "Manual of Parliamentary Law" (Boston, 1854), and published a "Celebrated Reminiscences" from his writings entitled "Warrington Pen-Portraits," with a memoir (Boston, 1877).—His wife, Harriet Hanson, b, in Boston, Mass. 8 Feb., 1825, was one of the intellectual circle of factory-girls that composed the staff of the "Lowell Offering." She is a sister of John W. Hanson. She contributed poems to the Lowell "Courier" while Mr. Robinson was its editor, and from this introduction sprang a friendship that resulted in their marriage on 30 Nov., 1848. She was his assistant in his editorial work, and was as devoted to him as to the anti-slavery cause. She has also taken an active part in the woman's rights movement, and in 1893 was a member of the International council of women at Antwerp, D. C.

Her works include "Massachusetts in the Woman Suffrage Movement" (Boston, 1881); "Early Factory Labor in New England" (1883); and "Captain Mary Miller," a drama (1887).

ROBITAILLE, Theodore, Canadian statesman, b. in Varennes, Quebec, 29 Jan., 1834; d. in New Carlisle, 18 Aug., 1897. He was educated at Laval university, and McGill college, where he was graduated in medicine in 1858. He became a successful physician, and represented Bonaventure in the Canada assembly from 1861 till 1867, and in the Dominion parliament from 1867 till July, 1878. He also represented that place in the Quebec assembly from 1871 till January, 1874, when he retired from the ministry of the health department of the government. He became a member of the privy council of Canada, and was receiver-general from 30 Jan., 1873, till 5 Nov. of that year, when he resigned with the administration. He was lieutenant-governor of the province of Quebec from 26 July, 1879, until September, 1884. He became a member of the Canadian senate, 28 Jan., 1885.--He died in New Carlisle, 18 Aug., 1897. In Varennes, Quebec, 30 Oct., 1836, was educated at the Seminary of Sainte Thérèse and at McGill university, where he was graduated as a physician in 1859. He established himself at New Carlisle, and was successful in his practice. Dr. Robitaille was appointed in January, 1869, surgeon of the regimental division of Bonaventure, in 1871 commissioner for the census for the county of Bonaventure, and in 1875 vice-consul of France for the district of Gaspé. He was collector of customs at New Carlisle in 1875–78, and was a member of the Dominion senate from 8 Feb., 1888, till 25 Jan., 1889, when he resigned. In 1889 he was appointed inspector of customs, and vice-president of the Baie des Chaleurs railway company. In 1890 he accepted the government appointment for Bonaventure, but declined. He has travelled extensively. Both the brothers are Conservatives in politics.

ROBLEDU, Jorje (ro-byay-do), Spanish soldier, b. in Spain in the beginning of the 16th century; d. in Santiago de Armas, Colombia, 1 Oct., 1546. He went to New Granada with the expedition of Pedro de Heredia (q. v.) in 1535, and in 1537 accompanied the expedition of the governor of Cartagena, Pedro Badillo, for the conquest of the province of Antioquia, which had been discovered by Francisco Cesar. After the unsuccessful return of Badillo, Robledo, with part of the former's followers and fresh troops, penetrated again to the interior in 1539, and founded in the valley of Jaruca the city of Cali. In 1541 he led Santa Ana with 150 men for the conquest of Antioquia, and, after defeating the Pastasos and Pijon Indians, founded the city of Santa Cruz de Antioquia. He went to Spain in 1542 to obtain a royal commission as governor, and during his absence Pedro de Heredia and Velardez disputed the title to the province, the latter remaining at last in possession. On Robledo's return from Spain in 1546 he tried to recover the territory, but was surprised by Velardez at Loma de las Colas, carried to Aramas, and executed there.

ROBLES, PEZUELA, Manuel (ro-bles-pay-choo-ay-lay), Mexican soldier, b. in Guanajuato about 1810; d. in Chalchihuites, 24 March, 1862. He entered the Military college in his youth, and in 1832 the engineer corps. In 1842 he became captain, and was appointed professor in the Military college, and in 1846 he became lieutenant-colonel. In the same year he was engineer-in-chief of the fortifications of Veracruz during the siege and bombardment by the Americans. He discovered the passes of Cerro Gordo and Peñon Viejo, and from 11 till 13 Sept., 1847, served under Santa Anna at Chapultepec. After the evacuation of the capital by the Mexican forces he retired with the army to Quito, and in the next year served under Bustamante against the revolution of Parejas in Guanajuato. Afterward he took part in the whole campaign of Sierra Gorda. In 1853 Gen. Arista made him secretary of war, and in the same year he marched to the northern frontier to subdue the revolutionary forces of Carbajal. After the accession of Santa Anna he was banished, and travelled through the United States and Europe to study fortification, being present during part of the American Civil War. On his return to Mexico in September, 1858, joined Gen. Echeagaray against the government of Zibugua, and, after the fall of that president, Robles took charge of the executive. His government was of short duration, as he did not receive the necessary support from the other generals, and resigned the executive, 21 Jan., 1859. In the same year he was appointed by Minamon governor of the province of Guayaquil, which he became an adherent of General Echeagaray, and he took part with that general in the campaign against the constitutional forces until the battle of Capiapulpan, 23 Dec., 1860. He then lived in retirement until the foreign invasion in December, 1861, when, as the Republican government distrusted him, he was confined to the interior and ordered to reside in Zacatecas, but he disobeyed, and was on his way to join the French army when he was arrested at Tuxtepec on 20 March, carried to San Andres, and condemned by court-martial to be shot. The sentence was executed, notwithstanding the intervention of Gen. Prim, and the envos of France, Belgium, and the United States.

ROCAFUERTE, Vicente (ro-cah-foo-air-tay), South American statesman, b. in Guayaquil, Ecuador, 3 May, 1783; d. in Lima, Peru, 16 May, 1847. In 1812 he was elected deputy for his province to the Spanish cortes, where his opposition to the arbitrary government of Ferdinand VII. caused him to be persecuted, and he fled to France. In 1819 he went to Lima and the United States, where he published, by order of the Mexican patriots, a work advocating independence. In 1824 he went to Mexico and became secretary of Gen. Michelson on a diplomatic mission to England. In December of that year the British government recognized the independence of Mexico. Soon afterward Michelson returned, and Rocaferre, remaining as chargé d'affaires, continued in the diplomatic service of Great Britain. In 1830 he returned to Mexico, where he was co-editor of the paper "Péxix de la Libertad," attacking the despotic administration of Gen. Bustamante. For this he was persecuted, and he resolved to return to Guayaquil, where he arrived in 1833. Soon after his arrival he was appointed deputy to congress for the province of Piemehin, but he was excluded on opposition to the administration. The province of Guayaquil now declared against the government. of Gen. Flores, and appointed Roca Fuerte supreme chief. He was taken prisoner by Flores, but they were reconciled, and Roca Fuerte promised to cooperate in the reorganization of the republic.
He was appointed chief of the provinces of Guayaquil and Manabí, and in 1835 was elected constitutional governor of the republic. He introduced many reforms, especially in the public treasury. In 1829 he was appointed governor of the province of Guayaquil, and in 1843 he was a deputy to the convention that was held in Quito. The provisional government of 6 March, 1839, appointed him minister to Peru, whence he sent arms and other implements of war. In 1845 he was elected senator by four provinces, and in the congress of 1846 he became president of the senate. On account of the expedition that Gen. Flores was preparing in Europe, Roca Fuerte was appointed minister to Chili, Peru, and Bolivia, to arrange for means of defence against that invasion. Although he was ill, he accepted this patriotic mission, but died soon after his arrival in Lima. The illustration represents his tomb in Lima. He wrote “Ideas necesarias a todo pueblo independiente, que quiere ser libre” (Philadelphia, 1829); “Brevejo ligerizo de la revolución de Méjico, desde el grito de Iguala hasta la proclamación imperial” (1821); “El sistema Colombiano popular, efectivo y representativo, es el que más conviene a la América independiente” (1823); “Cartas de un Americano sobre las ventajas de los gobiernos republicanos federativos” (London, 1829); “Ensayo sobre cárceles” and “Ensayo sobre tolerancia religiosa, bajo el aspecto político, y como medio de colonización y de progreso” (Mexico, 1831).

ROCHA, Justino José de (ro-chah), Brazilian journalist, b. in Rio Janeiro, 8 Nov., 1812; d. there in 1863. He received his education in France, at the College of Henry IV., and returned to S. Paulo, where he was graduated in law. In 1836 he founded the periodicals “Atlântico” and “Chronista,” the last in opposition to the regent, Diogo Antonio Feijo. In 1839 he became a member of the Conservative party, and, ceasing to publish the “Chronista,” founded the “Brazíla” in 1840, in which he opposed the declaration of the majority of the emperor. When the ministry of the majority was organized on 24 July, his journal became the organ of the opposition. In 1847 he had been appointed professor of ancient history and geography in the Imperial college of Pedro II. In 1841 he obtained the chair of law in the Military college of Rio Janeiro, and in 1850 he taught Latin and French in the same institution. He was also an editor of the “Jornal do Commercio,” and wrote “Considerações sobre a justiça criminal no Brasil” (Rio Janeiro, 1852), in which he demonstrated the defects of the judicial system, and the necessity of a reform. He published “Conciso de geografía elementar” (Rio Janeiro, 1853). He left his quarters, 18 June, 1781, and, marching toward Hudson river, defeated on Manhattan island a detachment of Clinton’s army, and crossed the river as if he intended to enter New Jersey, but, instead, joined Washington’s army at Phillipsburg, nine miles from Kingsbridge. This skilful movement compelled Clinton to abandon his proposed expedition for the relief of Cornwallis, and obliged the latter to retire from Virginia. After crossing Delaware river at Trenton, the united armies were reviewed by congress at Philadelphia, and Rochambeau and Washington, taking the advance with a small escort, arrived at Williamsburg, Va., on 14 Sept., where they met Lafayette and Comte de Saint Simon, who had just landed. They concerted the plan of campaign, and the siege of Yorktown was begun on 29 Sept. Two assaults were led against the place by Saint Simon and Rochambeau, and Comte de Grasse having driven back the English fleet, Sullivan undertook to land the further resistance was impossible, and he surrendered. After returning to his winter-quarters, Rochambeau sent Lanzun's legion to the aid of Gen. Greene, and, in April, 1782, marched to invest New York, but the plan was abandoned. After visiting Washington he went to Providence, R. L., and arranged for the embarkation of his army at Boston. He paid a visit to Washington at New Windsor, and embarked in Chesapeake bay, 14 Jan. 1783, upon the frigate "Emerance," arriving in Brest in March following. After the surrender at Yorktown, congress presented him with two cannons that had been taken from the enemy, upon which were engraved his escutcheon and a suitable inscription. Leclerc, one of the novelists, knighted him at the Saint Esprit, appointed him governor of the French mainland of Virginia, and presented him with two water-color paintings by Van Bierenberghe, representing the capture of Yorktown, and the English army defiling before the French and Americans. Before he left Boston, congress had presented him with resolutions that praised his bravery, the services he had rendered to the cause of independence, and the severe discipline he had maintained in his army, and had also instructed the secretary of foreign relations to recommend him to the favor of Louis XVI. He was deputy to the assembly of the notables in 1788, represented rigorous movements in Alsace in 1790, was created field-marshall, 28 Dec., 1791, and, after refusing to become secretary of war, was appointed to the command of the Army of the North, but resigned, 15 June, 1792, and retired to his castle. He was imprisoned in the Conciergerie at Paris in 1793 and narrowly escaped the scaffold. In 1804 he became a grand officer of the Legion of honor by Napoleon and given a pension. One of the four statues forming a part of the Lafayette monument to be erected in Brest by the French people will be of Rochambeau. Jean de Lanneval wrote his "Memoires du Marechal de Rochambeau" (2 vols., Paris, 1809; translated into English by William E. Wright, London, 1889). His wife died 17 May, 1854.—His son, Donatien Marie Joseph de Vimeure, Viscount de, French soldier; b. in the castle of Rochambeau, near Vendome, 7 April, 1736; d. near Leipsic, Saxony, 18 Oct., 1813, became in 1761 a lieutenant in the regiment of Bourbonnais, was promoted captain in 1773 and colonel in 1793, and in 1780 accompanied his father to the United States as assistant adjutant-general. On 28 Oct., he was sent to France with cipher despatches for the king, and in March following he rejoined his father at Newport, was made major-general in 1790, and lieutenant-general, 9 July, 1792, appointed in August following governor-general of the Leeward islands, and pontific Santo Domingo, but in Martinique he was opposed by the royalist army, under the Comte de Behagne, the former governor-general, who was also supported by the Island of Martinique and the island of Puerto Rico; but they returned, 14 Feb., 1794, with 14,000 men. Although his forces numbered only about 700 men, Rochambeau sustained a siege in the fortress of St. Pierre for forty-nine days, and obtained, on 22 March, an honorable capitulation. In 1796 he was again appointed governor-general of Santo Domingo, but, being opposed by the commissioners of the Directory, he was removed and transported to France, where he was imprisoned in the fortress of Ham. He was appointed in 1802 deputy commander of the expedition to Santo Domingo, and, landing on 2 Feb. at Fort Dauphin, defeated Tonsaint l'Ouverture (q. e.) at Crête de Pierrot, in the valley of Artibonite, and, pursuing his success, destroyed the insurgent army in the passes of the Cobar range. After the defeat of Victor Leclerc (q. e.), 2 Dec., 1802, he continued the war with vigor; but his severity and the heavy taxes he imposed upon the country displeased the wealthy population, and his army diminished daily by desertions, famine, and yellow fever. Nevertheless, he reoccupied Fort Dauphin, defeated Dessalin and Christophe, and twice relieved the garrison of Jacmel, but was besieged at last in Cape Fransais by Dessalin, who was supported by an English fleet. Provisions being exhausted, he evacuated the city, 30 Nov., 1803, and surrendered to the English admiral. He was transported to Jamaica, and in 1815 was sent to England and imprisoned on the island till 1828, when he was freed by his release by exchange. He took part in the campaign of 1813 in Germany, and commanded a division of the corps of Lauriston in the battles of Lutzen and Bautzen, and at Leipzig, where he was killed toward the close of the action.

ROCHE, Alexandre Dal, French colonizer, b. in Dieppe, 1744; d. in Lequipe, Guadeloupe, in 1822. He was the younger son of a wealthy family, early entered the army, and in 1627 joined the expedition of D. L'Étamboule to St. Christopher. He took an honorable part in the contest between the English and the Spanish in that island, and in 1635 accompanied D. Le Parquet to Martinique. He assisted in the reconquest of the colony, and was afterward a lieutenant of Hôtel in Guadeloupe. There he founded the city of Le Moule, in Grande Terre, and built a fort, which he successfully defended against the Spanish. He was granted hereditary letters of nobility by Louis XIV., with a concession of land that now forms the counties of Le Moule and Saint Francois, in the west of the island. He was, for a long time, the colonizer, and in 1847, 21 May, 1847. His parents removed to Prince Edward island when he was an infant, and he was educated in St. Dunstan's college in that province. He went in 1866 to Boston, Mass. In 1883 he joined the editorial staff of the "Pilot," and he is still (1898) connected with that journal. He has contributed to periodicals and published a "Songs and Satires" (Boston, 1887).

ROCHE, Troïlis de Mesqonat, Marquis de la, French colonizer, b. in Nantes, France, in 1549; d. in Paris in 1696. He had already attained fame as a general, when he received a commission from Henry IV., in 1589, by virtue of which he was empowered to found establishments in New France and on the coast of North America, of which he became governor and lieutenant-general. He fitted out three vessels and sailed from Dieppe, bringing with him 120 emigrants, most of whom were drawn from the French prisons. Champigny speaks of this expedition and attributes its failure to the scant knowledge that his pilot, Guillaume Chevalier, had of the American coast. At the suggestion of Louis Zi, he landed a year later on Sable island, where they remained nearly seven years without succor, and then explored the shores of Acadia. After obtaining such information as he desired, he sailed for France, intending to take on board those that he had left on Sable island, but he was prevented by head-winds from landing. On his arrival in France his pilot was ordered by the parliament of Rouen to go in search of his followers, who would have perished of cold and hunger if they had not chanced to discover some wrecked vessels in the harbor. The marquis was imprisoned for a year by the Duke de Mercœur, lieutenant of the king in the provinces of Brittany and Normandy. After his release he endeavored to obtain supplies in Paris for his colony, but the contempt and indifference of the court were insurmountable obstacles to his enterprise, and he is said to have died from vexation at not being allowed to continue his discoveries. Narratives of Roché's expeditions are inserted in the "Voyages" of Champlain and in the histories of Lescault and Charlevoix. Some writers assign an earlier date for the discoveries and imprisonment of the marquis.

ROCHEFORT, César de (rosh-for), French author, b. in Belley in 1693; d. there in 1769. His real name appeared on the stage as de Rochefort. He is best known for some poems in the Antilles, and wrote "Histoire naturelle et morale des îles Antilles, avec un dictionnaire curieux" (Rotterdam, 1658; translated into Dutch, 1662; German, Munich, 1661; and English, London, 1660), and "Tableau de l'île de Tadage, ou de la Nouvelle-Oménie, l'une des Antilles de l'Amérique" (Levillon, 1660).

ROCHEFORT, Claude Lianeurt, D'Estrémadour, Fr., Alexandre Frédéric, Duke de la (rosh-foo-co), French publicist, b. in La Rochefoucauld, 14 Jan., 1747; d. in Paris, 28 March, 1827. He was known in his youth as Comte de la Rochefoucauld, but in 1767 took the title of Duke de Liancourt, and on 25 May, 1783, succeeded his father as a peer. He rose to be a lieutenant-general in 1789, and was knighted in 1794. As early as 1775 he carried on agricultural improvements on his estate of Liancourt, and in 1789 founded there, at his own expense, a school of mechanical arts for soldiers' sons, which has become the school of "Arts et métiers" of France. He was a favorite of Louis XVI., who reposed much confidence in him, and sought his advice before concluding a treaty of alliance with the United States, which the duke opposed to sign. He was deputy to the assembly of notables in 1788, and to the state-general in 1789, presided over the constituent assembly during the night of 4 Aug., 1789, in which the abolition of titles of nobility was voted, was military commander at Rouen in 1792, and endeavored to save the king. He was dismissed, 12 Aug., 1792, and passed to England, where he sojourned till 1794, when he came to the United States. After travelling through the principal states, he devoted himself to the study of the agricultural methods of the country, and bought a farm in Pennsylvania, where he spent some time in experiments. In 1789 he visited Denmark and Holland, and in 1790 he returned to live on his estate of Liancourt, which Bonaparte restored to him; but he steadily refused to accept any office at the imperial court, though he was a member of the corps législatif during the whole of Napoleon's reign. At the restoration of Louis XVIII. he was created a peer, and afterward he devoted himself to the prosecution of useful arts and to benevolent institutions. He established in Paris the first savings-bank, and was instrumental in introducing vaccination in France. Toward the close of his life he became an eager opponent of the government, advocating American principles and American institutions, and acquired through his benevolence and philanthropic actions great popularity, which caused the royalists to give him the mock surname of the "Saint Vincent de Paul of the liberal party." His life has been written by his son (1829). His works include "Études sur les prisons de Philadelphie" (Philadelpia, 1796), and "Voyage dans les États-Unis," Paris, 1795-7.

ROCHESTER, Nathaniel, pioneer, b. in Cople parish, Westmoreland co., Va., 21 Feb., 1752; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 17 May, 1831. He was a descendant of Nicholas Rochester, who came to the colony of Virginia from the county of Kent, England, in 1689, and bought land in Westmoreland county. When he was two years of age his father died, and when he was seven his mother married Thomas Critcher, and the family removed to Granville county, N. C., in 1763. His means of education were limited, but he lost no opportunity of making his leisure time to good account. In 1782 he became a member in Hillsboro, N. C., and in 1785 entered into partnership with his employer. In 1775 he was appointed a member of the committee of safety for Orange county, and in August, 1779, he attended, as a member, the first provincial convention in North Carolina, and was made master, with the rank of major, of the North Carolina Line, consisting of four regiments. On the re-assembling of the convention in May, 1776, the provincial force was increased to ten regiments, and a resolution was passed, 10 May, "that Nathaniel Rochester, Esquire, be appointed a Deputy Commissioner-General of military and other stores in this county for the use of the Continental army." He entered on the duties at once; but his health failed, and he was compelled to resign. The same year he was elected to the legislature of North Carolina. He filled other useful offices, and was a commissioner to establish and superintend a manufactory of arms at Hillsboro, the iron for which had to be drawn from Pennsylvania in wagons. In 1778 he began business again with Col. Thomas Hart, father-in-law of Henry Clay, and James Brown, afterward minister to France, and in 1783, in connection with the former, he began the "manufacture of flour, rope, and nails" at Hagerstown, Md. While living in that place he became in succession a member of the Maryland assembly, postmaster, and judge of the county court, and in 1805 he was chosen a presidential elector, and voted for James Madison. He became the first president of the Hagerstown bank that year, and at that time was conducting large mercantile establishments in Kentucky as well as in Maryland. In 1809 he first visited the "Georgian country," where he had previously bought 640 acres, and in September of that year he made large purchases of land in Livingston county, N. Y., near Dansville, in conjunction with Maj. Charles Carroll, Col. William Fitzbaugh, and Col. Hilton. In 1802 he purchased, jointly with Carroll and Fitzbaugh, the "100-acre or Allan Mill tract," in Falls Town (now Rochester), and in May, 1810, he removed from Hagerstown and settled near Dansville, where he remained five years, building a paper-mill and making various improvements. In 1815 he removed to Bloomfield, Ontario co., and in April, 1818, took up his residence in Rochester, which had been named for him. In 1826 he was a second time chosen a presidential elector, in January, 1827, was appointed Secretary of the convention held at Canandaigua to urge the construction of the Erie canal, and in the course of the year he went to Albany as agent of the petitioners for the erection of Monroe county, but did not succeed in his mission until 1821. He was the first clerk of the new county, and its first representative in the state legislature in 1822. In 1824 he was re-elected, continued representing the Bank of Rochester, and was made its first president. Shortly afterward he resigned the post and retired from active life. He was in religion an Episcopalian, and was one of the founders of St. Luke's church in Rochester.

—His grandson, Thomas Fortescue, physician, b. in Rochester, N. Y., 8 Oct., 1821; d. in Buffalo, N. Y., 24 May, 1887, was graduated M. A. at Hobart (then Geneva) college in 1845, and studied medicine at the University of Pennsylvania. He was graduated M. D. in 1848, and after serving for a year as interne in Bellevue hospital, New York, continued his studies in Europe for a year and a half longer, and then began practice in New York city. He married, on 6 May, 1852, Mary Clawson De Lancey. In 1853 he established himself in Buffalo, where he took the chair of the principles and practice of medicine, together with that of clinical medicine, in the Medical department of the university of Buffalo. From 1853 till 1863 he was attending physician to the Sisters of Charity hospital, and in 1861 he became consulting physician to the Buffalo general hospital. In March, 1863, he was appointed a special inspector of field hospitals. He was president of the New York state medical society in 1852-53, and its delegate to the International medical congress at Philadelphia in 1856. Besides many technical papers on professional topics, he published "The Army Surgeon" (Buffalo, 1857), and "Medical Men and Medical Reformers," 2d ed. (1876). His son, William Beatty, soldier, b. in Angellia, N. Y., 15 Feb., 1826, entered the U. S. service as major and additional paymaster of volunteers on 1 June, 1861. He was transferred to the permanent establishment as paymaster on 17 Jan., 1865, and on 17 Feb., 1882, was appointed paymaster-general of the army, with the rank of brigadier-general. See "Early History of the Rochester Family in America," by Nathaniel Rochester (Buffalo, 1882).

ROCKINGHAM, Charles Watson Wentworth, Marquis of, English statesman, b. in England, 19 March, 1739; d. in Wimbledon, Surrey, England, 1 July, 1782. He attached himself with ardor to the Whig party in his youth, escaping from college at the age of 18, to join the army of the Duke of Cumberland against the last of the Stuarts. The Hanoverian princes rewarded his devotion with distinctions and honors. In 1759 he succeeded his father in the marquisate. The reactionary course of George III. impelled him to resign his office of lord chamberlain, and on the death of the Duke of Devonshire in 1764 he became the recognized chief of the Whig party, and was called on 29 June, 1765, to preside over a cabinet. The principal task that he set before himself was to restore a harmonious feeling between the mother country and the colonies in North America, exasperated as they had been by the measures of the preceding ministry. In this object he was opposed by the king and was not supported by his colleagues. The ministry made a show of carrying the stamp act into execution, but recoiled from the work of enforcing it with the bayonet, and when the manifestations in America had made clear the state of feeling there, Rockingham was able, in March, 1766, to secure the repeal of the stamp duties. Before he succeeded in redeeming his promise to remove the restrictions on commerce or to carry further measures of commerce he was compelled, by the defection of the Duke of Grafton and the ill will of the king, to give up the seals of office in May. During the minor ties of the Duke of Grafton and Lord North he combated the errors of his successors, and led opposition the younger statesmen that finally repaired them. At the height of the war when England, distracted by faction, had to face a coalition of France, Spain, and the United States, Rockingham was again called to direct the affairs of his country, but had scarcely taken up the work when he died. He accepted office on the express condition that peace should be concluded with the United States, and began negotiations with the belligerents. In the earlier stages of the conflict Rockingham and his secretary, Edmund Burke, were not inclined to accept the claims of the colonists to immunity from taxation and from parliamentary control that were supported by William Pitt. Rockingham was the representative of the aristocratic traditions of the Whig party, while Pitt was the precursor of Democratic ideas. He was not an orator, and as a man of affairs was unwarped by a studious disposition. Yet his good sense and his uprightness in a period of corruption and intrigue aided in regenerating the Whig party. Burke, in epitomizing his patron, said that "in opposition he respected the principles of government, and in the ministry protected the liberties of the people." See the Earl of Albemarle's "Memoirs of the Marquis of Rockingham and his Contemporaries" (London, 1852).

ROCKWELL, Alphonso David, physician, b. in New Canaan, Conn., 18 May, 1840. He was educated at Kenyon college and graduated in medicine at Bellevue medical college, New York city, in 1864. Entering the army as assistant surgeon of the 6th Ohio cavalry, he was soon promoted surgeon of the 5th Virginia infantry with the rank of major, and served through the campaigns of 1864 and 1865 in Virginia. In 1866 he associated himself with Dr. George M. Beard for the study of the uses of electricity in the cure of nervous diseases. He was electro-therapeutist to the New York state women's hospital from 1874 till 1884, and has since been professor of electro-therapeutics in the New York post-graduate medical school and hospital. With Dr. Beard, he was the originator of important methods of using electricity, especially general faradization as a tonic agent, and the pioneer in establishing electro-therapeutics upon a scientific basis in the United States, where electricity had been neglected by the profession and had fallen into the hands of RODDEY, Philip Dale, soldier, b. in North Carolina, 1826; in 1861 he was a private in the U. S. navy, and captain of steamboats in the navigation of Tennessee river. He organized a company of scouts early in 1861 for the Confederate service, and sub-

He was elected a member of the Massachusetts legislature in 1834, its speaker in 1855–6, and then served as bank commissioner for three years. He was a representative in congress from 2 Feb., 1844, till 3 March, 1851, having been elected as a Whig for four successive terms. He was a delegate to the Massachusetts constitutional convention in 1853. On Edward Everett's resignation of his seat in the U. S. senate, Mr. Rockwell was appointed to fill the vacancy, and served from 15 June, 1854, till Henry Wilson was elected by the legislature and took his seat on 10 Feb., 1855. He was a presidential elector on the Fremont ticket in 1856, was elected to the 36th congress in 1859, served in 1858, and was chosen speaker, which office he had held when in the legislature before. In 1859 he was appointed one of the judges of the superior court of Massachusetts, serving till 1871, when he resigned. ROCKWELL, James Ofl, poet, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 3 Nov., 1805; d. in Providence, R. I., 7 June, 1831. His family removed to Manlius, N. Y., when he was about fourteen years old. He was apprenticed to a printer in Utica, and soon began to write poems that gained for him more than a local reputation. Going to Boston at the age of eighteen, he worked at his trade, and subsequently obtained editorial employment in the office of the "Statesman." In the autumn of 1839 he became editor of the Providence "Patriot." Some of his poetry is preserved in Rufus W. Griswold's "Poets and Poets of America" (Philadelphia, 1842), and in Charles W. Everest's "Poets of Connecticut" (Hartford, 1843).

sequently a brigade, and was commissioned brigadier-general, 31 Aug., 1863. His command was clothed, armed, and subsisted without cost to the Confederate government. He was one of the most successful of partisan officers, and was engaged in many of the great battles. Since 1870 he has resided chiefly in London, England.

RODENBOUGH, Theophilus Francis, soldier, b. near 10 Nov., 1838, was educated at Lafayette college, engaged in mercantile business, and on 27 March, 1861, was appointed 2d lieutenant in the 2d U. S. dragoons. He was promoted 1st lieutenant on 14 May, was engaged at Gaines's Mills and the subsequent operations of the peninsular campaign of 1862, being promoted captain on 17 July, was captured at Manassas, but was immediately exchanged, and commanded a squadron in Stone's raid and a regiment at Gettysburg. He was engaged in the cavalry operations of 1864, was wounded at Trevilian's Station, and again at Winchester, losing his right arm while leading his regiment in a charge. He was brevetted major for his bravery on this occasion, and lieutenant-colonel for meritorious conduct during the operations of the Pennsylvania cavalry on 29 April, 1865, and received the brevets of brigadier-general of volunteers for services during the war, of colonel, U. S. army, for bravery at Todd's Tavern, and of brigadier-general, U. S. army, for gallant conduct at Cold Harbor. He was mustered out of the volunteer service on 31 Oct., 1865, became major of the 42d U. S. infantry on 3 July, 1866, and was retired from active service on 17 Dec., 1870, on account of wounds received in the line of duty, with the full rank of colonel of cavalry. He became secretary of the Military service institution in 1879, and as assistant inspector-general of the state of New York in 1880-7, was efficient in improving the militia organization. Gen. Rodenbough is the author of "From Everglade to Cañon with the Second Dragoons" (New York, 1875); "Afghanistan and the Anglo-Russian Dispute" (1886); and "Uncle Sam's Medal of Honor" (1887).

RODES, Robert Emmott, b. in Lynchburg, Va., 29 March, 1829; d. in Winchester, Va., 19 Sept., 1864. He was graduated at Virginia military institute and entered the New Jersey military institute for several years. He then moved to Mobile, Ala., entered the Confederate army as colonel of the 6th Alabama infantry in 1861, and was promoted brigadier-general, 21 Oct., 1861, and major-general, 2 May, 1863. His brigade was composed of six Alabama regiments of infantry, in Gen. Daniel H. Hill's division, Jackson's corps, Army of Northern Virginia. His division was composed of the brigades of Gen. Doles, Daniel, and Ramseur. He was killed at the battle of Winchester.

RODGERS, John, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 5 Aug., 1727; d. in New York city, 7 May, 1841. His parents removed in 1728 to Philadelphia, Pa. He was fitted for the ministry by Rev. Samuel Blair at New Londonery, Pa., and on 16 March, 1747, was installed as pastor of the Presbyterian church at St. George's, Del. In September, 1753, on the death of David Bostwick, he assumed the pastoral charge of the latter's congregation in New York city, which rapidly grew in numbers, and in 1755 erected a second building, on the corner of Beekman and Nassau streets. In 1758 he received the degree of D. D. from Edinburgh University. He was an antagonist of the Episcopalians, through whose influence an act of incorporation was refused to his society, and throughout the Revolution he was an ardent and active patriot. Near the close of February, 1776, he removed his family from New York, and did not return till its evacuation by the British at the end of the war. During the summer of 1776 he acted as chaplain to Gen. William Heath's brigade. The following winter he spent in the south, and was reported as engaged in an attempt to win over the Regulators of North Carolina to the American cause. He was chaplain of the New York provincial congress, and afterward of the council of safety, and of the first legislature in 1777. During the war he preached at Ameena, N. Y., Danbury, Conn., and Lamington, N. J. The British took possession of the town and church in Wall street for barracks, and the brick church on Beckmann street for a hospital, and left both in ruins. While they were rebuilding, the vestry of Trinity church permitted the Presbyterians to worship in St. Paul's church and St. George's chapel. The united Presbyterian congregations decided to employ but one minister, and he remained the sole pastor till a coadjutor was engaged in 1789. Dr. Rodgers was moderator of the first general assembly held in 1789. He was vice-chancellor of the New York state university from its creation in 1785, and was chosen president of the Missionary society, which was established in 1796. A contemporary says: "Dr. Rodgers is certainly the most accomplished gentleman for a clergyman, not to except even Dr. Cooper, that I have ever been acquainted with. He lives in elegant style, and entertains company as genteelly as any gentleman in the city."

RODGERS, John, naval officer, b. in Hartford county, Md., 11 July, 1771; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 Aug., 1838. His father was a Scotchman, and was a soldier of the war of independence. The son entered the merchant marine when he was thirteen years old, and was a captain in 1799. He entered the navy as lieutenant, 9 March, 1798, and was executive of the "Constellation" at the capture of the French frigate "L'Insurgente" off Naves, W. L. 9 Feb., 1799, receiving a silver medal and vote of thanks to Capt. Truxton and his officers for this capture. He took the "Insurgente" to port and suppressed an attempt of the captured crew to rise against his prize crew of eleven men. Obtaining leave, he bought a vessel and sailed to Santo Domingo, where he saved many lives in an insurrection of slaves. He was promoted to captain, 5 March, 1799, and in March, 1801, carried despatches to France. He was assigned the "John Adams" in 1802, sailed to Tripoli, and in May, 1803, captured the Moorish ship "Meschonza" in an attempt to run the blockade. On 21 July, 1803, he destroyed a Tripolitan corsair, after engagement with nine guns-boats, in which the "Enterprise" co-operated. He returned home in December, 1803, but in July, 1804, again sailed to Tripoli in command of the "Congress," joining the squadron under Com. Barron, whom he succeeded in command on 22 May, 1805. Rodgers continued the operations, and on 3 June, 1805, obtained a treaty with Tripoli abolishing the tribute. that had been exacted of European powers and forbidding slavery of Christian captives. In September 1835, he pulled the key of Tripoli to sign a similar treaty, after which he returned home.
He was then in charge of gun-boats at New York and, in charge of a squadron on the Atlantic coast, preventing impressment of Americans by British cruisers. At 8 p.

On 16 May, 1841, in his flagship, the "Perry," he sailed from New York, in company with a dashing young vessel, which repeated the hail and fired a gun, the shot from which struck the "President's" main-mast. The shot was answered and several broadsides were exchanged, which demonstrated the stranger's inferiority.
At daylight Rodgers boarded the crippled vessel, which was the British ship "Little Belt," whose captain declined assistance. This episode widened the breach between the countries, and contradictory reports were made, but a regular court acquitted Rodgers of all blame. The British made no investigation. Three days after the decla-rating of war in 1812 he sailed in the "President," in command of a squadron, to intercept the British fleet, and on 23 June, 1812, he met the British frigate "Belvidere," which escaped after a meeting of eight hours. Rodgers was wounded in the engagement by the bursting of a gun on the "President." The captain himself fired the first gun—the first shot in the war. He made four cruises, searching for British men-of-war, in the "President," and on the third visited Irish channel, capturing twelve vessels, including the "Highflyer." His prizes numbered twenty-three in all, and applause and honors greeted his return.
In June, 1814, he went to assist in the defence of Baltimore, where he rendered valuable service in command of the sailors and marines that, cooperating with the military, defeated the British in the battle of North Point and the attack on Fort Mchenty. The naval forces under Rodgers de-defended the water battery, the auxiliary forts Con-ington and Balcock, and the barges of the naval flotilla.
At a critical moment several vessels were sunk in the channel to prevent the larger British frigates from passing. After the war he declared the office of secretary of the navy, but was appointed president of the naval commissioners, which office he held from 1815 till 1837, except for the years 1824–7, when he commanded the Mediterranean squadron. The grand navigators and adventurers are numerous, and, as a rule, have entered the army or navy. —His son, John, naval officer, b. in Harford county, Md., 8 Aug., 1812; d. in Washington, D. C., 5 May, 1882, entered the navy as midshipman, 18 April, 1828, served in the "Constellation" in the Mediterranean in 1829–32, attended the naval school at Norfolk in 1832–4, and became a midshipman in the last-named vessel.
After a year's leave, during which he attended the University of Virginia, he was in the brig "Dolphin," on the Brazil station, in 1835–'6, and commanded the schooner "Wave" on the coast of Florida in 1839. He was commissioned lieutenant 23 Jan., 1840, had charge of the schooner "Jeffersen," in surveying the Florida Keys and fertilizing the coasts of the Florida Keys and Cuba in 1840–43, and was again surveying on the coast of Florida in 1849–'52. The charts and sailing directions for this coast bear witness to his faithful work. He commanded the steamer "John Hancock" and the U. S. surveying and exploring expedition in the North Pacific and China seas in 1852–'5. In April, 1853, he took the "Vincennes" into the Arctic ocean, and obtained valuable commercial and scientific information. He was commissioned commander, 14 Sept., 1855, and commanded on special duty in command with the report of the exploring expedition.
In 1861 he was among the first to ask for duty in the civil war, and in May, 1861, was ordered to superintend the building of the "Benton" class of western river iron-clads. In November he joined the expedition to Port Royal, where he hoisted the flag on Fort Walker after the engagement. In May, 1862, he commanded an expedition to James river, leading in the attack on Fort Darling, 15 May, 1862, during which his vessel, the "Gallena, "an iron-clad steamer, was hit 120 times, two thirds of his crew were killed or wounded, and all his am-umnition was expended, when he withdrew. He was commissioned captain, 16 July, 1862, and in 1863 sailed in command of the monitor "Weehawken,
"from New York, encountering a heavy gale off the Delaware breakwater, where he declined to take refuge because he wished to test the sea-going qualities of monitors. On 17 June, 1863, he fought the powerful Confederate iron-clad "Atlanta, "which he captured, after an engagement of fifteen minutes, in Warsaw sound, Ga., during which the
"Weehawcen" fired only five shots. Congress gave him a formal vote of thanks for his "eminent zeal and ability" and he was promoted to commodore from 17 June, 1863, the date of his victory. He commanded the monitor "Dictator" in 1864–'5,
on special service. In 1866 he took the double-turreted monitor "Monadnock" through the Straits of Magellan to San Francisco. He stopped at Valparaiso just before its bombardment by the Spanish, which, with Gen. Kilpatrick, the U. S. minister, he was ordered to prevent. He passed the joint armed interference to the English admiral, but the latter refused to cooperate. These negotiations added to his reputation as a diplomatist. He had charge of the Boston navy-yard in 1866–'9, was commissioned rear-admiral, 31 Dec., 1869, and commanded the Asiatic fleet in 1870–'2, when he rendered great service by suppressing outrages on American vessels by the Coreans. Admiral Rodgers was commandant of Mare island navy-yard, Cal., in 1873–7, and superintendent of the U. S. naval observatory at Washington from 1 May, 1857, until his death. His services at the observatory contributed to the advancement of science, and under his administration Prof. Asaph Hall discovered the moons of Mars. Admiral Rodgers was also successful in his efforts to have a new site selected for a future observatory. He was president of the transit of Venus commission.
In 1863 he had been one of the fifty corporate members of the National academy of sciences that were named by congress in that year. On 25 June, 1878, he was elected to succeed Prof. Joseph Henry as chairman of the light-house board, and personally superintendent and participated in experiments in optics and acoustics to improve the service. His able counsels were in constant demand on advisory boards, especially for reconstructing the navy, and for the "Jeanette" relief expedition, for which his personal knowledge of the Polar sea was valuable. See a memoir by Prof. J. Russell Soley, U. S. navy (printed privately, Annapolis, 1882).—The first John's brother, George Washington, naval officer, b. in Hartford county, Md., 22 Feb., 1857; d. in Buenos Ayres, South America, 21 May, 1859, entered the navy as midshipman, 2 April, 1860, was commissioned lieutenant, 24 April, 1861, and served in the sloop "Wasp" in the capture of the "Frolic." 18 Oct., 1862, for which he was included in a vote of thanks by congress, and received a silver medal. He commanded the brig "Firefly" in the Algerine war in 1855, was commissioned master-commandant, 27 April, 1868, and had charge of the ship "Peacock" in 1868-18 in the Mediterranean. He was commissioned captain, 3 March, 1855, was on the board of examiners in 1828-39, and at his death was commodore commanding the Brazil squadron. His wife, Anna Maria, sister to Com. He was appointed a midshipman on 5 Oct., 1838, and was placed aboard the schooner "Fleet" in 1839 and in command of the "Phoenix" in 1840-1, in the Seminole war. He was promoted lieutenant commanding 4 Sept., 1844, was engaged in blocking the coast of Mexico in 1847, and was in the trenches at the siege of Vera Cruz and the capture of Yebes and Tuxpan. In 1856-7 he commanded the steamer "Bibb" and the schooner "Gallatin" in the coast survey. He was commissioned commander on 15 Oct., 1858, and was placed in command of the 3d division of the 9th corps, on 28 April, 1863, and still commanding the "Catskill," he was distinguished by the cool and deliberate manner in which he fought his ship. In the attack on Fort Wagner, 17 Aug., 1863, he took command of his vessel as usual, and while in the pilot-house he was instantly killed by a shot that struck the top of the house and broke it in. It was of Commander Rodgers that Mr. Mice O'Reilly wrote one of his most admired stanzas:—

"Ah me! George Rodgers lies With dim and dreamless eyes,
He airly won the prize
Of the stripped and shorn shroud."

RODMAN, Isaac Peace, soldier, b. in South Kingston, R. I., 18 Aug., 1822; d. in Sharpsburg, Md., 30 Sept., 1862. He received a common-school education, entered into partnership with his father, and became a prominent woolen-manufacturer. He sat in both houses of the legislature for several terms. At the first call for troops in 1861 he raised a company, which was incorporated in the 3d Rhode Island regiment, and was engaged at the battle of Bull Run. For gallantry in action he was made lieutenant-colonel of the 4th Rhode Island volunteers, 25 Oct., 1861, and soon afterward was promoted colonel. He served with great credit at Roanoke Island and New Berne, and in the capture of Fort Macon, in July, 1862, was commissioned as brigadier-general of volunteers, to date from 28 April. At the Antietam he commanded the 3d division of the 9th corps, and was mortally wounded while leading a charge.
command of the arsenal in 1854, and of the one at Baton Rouge, La., in 1855-6. Although cumbriads made by his method showed greater power of resistance than those that were cast solid, yet they failed at different points. He devised a new form of cumbriad which was determined on the hypothesis that the pressure is inversely as the square root of the space behind the shot. The first 15-inch Rodman gun was completed in May, 1869. In the trials, mammoth (or very large-grained) powder, and powder in perforated cakes, were also tested, and in the following year the mammoth powder was adopted for heavy ordnance. The perforated cake powder for rilled cannon of large calibre was at once adopted by the Russian government, which obtained specimens from Fortress Monroe in 1860, and soon afterward came into use in Prussia, and more recently the military authorities in England decided on using the mammoth powder, there called pebbles powder, in their big rilled guns. Rodman, on the 12-inch Rodman gun, first assumed head of ordnance on 1 July, 1855, and was promoted major on 1 June, 1863, was in command of Watertown arsenal during the civil war, being detached at intervals for various services, especially to supervise the manufacture and trials of 12-inch riddled and 20-inch smooth-bore cannon. Many 13- and 15-inch Rodman guns were made during the war for the monitors and other vessels using the monitors. More than covering a hollow core and cooling the metal from the inside was applied to shields as well as to cannon, and from 27 Sept., 1864, he was engaged in supervising the manufacture of ordnance and projectiles by this method. He originated the idea of making heavy guns without preponderance at the breech, on which plan all the heavy cast-iron cannon made by the government were constructed. ware preparing the people for a change of government. His colleagues, Thomas McKean and George Reed, were divided on the question, and the former, knowing Rodney to be favorable to the declaration, urged him by special message to hasten his return. He did so, and by great exertion arrived just in season for the final discussion. His affirmative vote secured the consent of the Delaware delegation to the measure, and thus effected that unanimity among its members which was so essential to the cause of independence. The opposition of the royalists, who abounded in the lower counties, prevented his election the succeeding year; but as a member of the councils of safety and inspection he displayed great activity in collecting supplies for the troops of the state that were then with Washington in Morristown, N. J. He went to Trenton, where Lord Stirling made him post-commandant, and then to Morristown, but, by Washington's permission, he returned home in February, 1777. He refused the appointment as a judge of the supreme court, organized in February, 1777, and on 5 June, 1777, was chosen judge of admiralty, but retained his military office, suppressed an insurrection among the Delaware Indians, and in August, the British advanced into Delaware, he collected troops, and, by direction of Gen. Washington, placed himself south of the main army to watch the movements of the British at the head of Elk river, Md., and, if possible, to cut them off from their fleet. During this period he was in correspondence with Gen. Washington, with whom he had long been on terms of friendly intimacy. In September he became major-general of militia, and in December he was again elected to congress; but he did not take his seat, as in the mean time he had been elected president of Delaware, which office he held for four years, till January, 1782, when he declined re-election. He was then chosen to congress, and again in 1783, but did not take his seat. He had been suffering for many years from a cancer on the face, which ultimately caused his death. As a public man he displayed great integrity and elevation of character, and, though a firm Whig, never failed in the duties of humanity toward those that suffered for adhering to opinions that differed from his own.—His brother, Thomas, jurist, b. in Sussex county, Del., 4 June, 1744; d. in Chester, Pa., 1811, was a judge of the superior court of Delaware, 1768-73, and of the Supreme court of the state, 1774-97. He retired from the latter in 1797, and in 1798 was a member of the committee in the Continental congress to revise the state constitution, and in 1799 a member of the council of safety. He was colonel of the Delaware militia and rendered important services to the Continental army during the Revolutionary war. In 1780 he was chief justice of Kent county court, in 1781 register of bills, and was a delegate from Delaware to the Continental congress in 1781-3 and in 1783-4. In 1787 he was made speaker of the assembly, and in 1799 was appointed superintendent of the Kent county almshouse and penitentiary post-stations. He was appointed in 1803 C. S. judge for the territory of Mississippi, and became a land-owner in Jefferson county, where the town of Rodney was named in his honor.—Thomas's son, Cesar Augustus, statesman, b. in Dover, Del., 4 Jan., 1772; d. in Buenos Ayres, South America, 10 June, 1824, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1790, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1794, and practised at Wilmington, Del. He was elected to congress from Delaware as a Democrat, serving from 12 Oct., 1801, till 3 March, 1805, was a member of the committee of ways and means, and one of the managers in the impeachment of Judge Samuel Chase. In 1807 he was appointed by President Jefferson attorney-general of the United States, which place he resigned in 1811. During the war with Great Britain in 1812 he commanded a rifle corps in Wilmington which was afterward changed to a light artillery company, which did good service on the frontiers of Canada. In 1813 he was a member of the Delaware committee of safety. He was defeated for congress and in 1815 was state senator from New Castle county. In 1817 he was sent to South America by President Monroe as one of the commissioners to investigate and report upon the propriety of recognizing the independence of the Spanish-American republics, which course he strongly advocated on his return to Washington. In 1820 he was re-elected to congress, and in 1822 he became a member of the U. S. senate, being the first Democrat that had a seat in that body from Delaware. He served till 27 Jan. 1823, when he was appointed minister to the United provinces of La Plata. With John Graham he published "Reports on the Present State of the United Provinces of South America" (London, 1819). ROSEY, Daniel, senator, b. in Delaware in 1764; d. there, 2 Sept., 1846. He was the great-grandson of Rodney, the first of the family to come to this country, and a second cousin of Cesar Augustus Rodney. He was a presidential elector in 1800, and governor of Delaware in 1814-17. He received the electoral vote of that state for vice-president in 1824, was elected to congress, serving from 2 Dec., 1822, till 3 March, 1824. He was appointed United States senator from Delaware, to fill the uncompleted term of Nicholas Van Dyke, deceased, and served from 4 Dec., 1826, till 23 Jan., 1827.

ROSEY, George Brydges, Baron, English naval officer, b. in Walton-upon-Thames, Surrey, 19 Feb., 1718; d. in London, 21 May, 1792. At the age of twelve he left Harrow school and entered the navy becoming a lieutenant in 1730, captain in 1742, and in 1748 governor and commander-in-chief of the station of Newfoundland. On his return to England in 1752 he was elected to parliament for Saltash, and he was returned to parliament as admiral in 1759, and appointed in 1761 commander-in-chief of Barbadoes and the Windward islands, capturing St. Pierre, Granada, and St. Lucia. He was promoted vice-admiral in the following year, created a baronet in 1764, appointed master of Greenwich hospital in 1765, and returned to parliament for Northampton in 1768. He resigned his governorship of Greenwich in 1771, on being appointed commander-in-chief at Jamaica, which post he held till 1774, when he returned to England, but, failing to make arrangements with his creditors, he sought refuge from them in France. Obtaining money to pay his debts, he returned to England in 1779, was promoted admiral, and when Spain joined France in the war against England he sailed to the West Indies as commander-in-chief of the station, with a fleet of twenty-two ships-of-the-line and eight frigates. On 16 Jan., 1780, off Cape St. Vincent he fell in with a Spanish division of eleven ships and two frigates under Juan de Sangara, and after an obstinate action captured five vessels and destroyed two. After relieving Gibraltar and Minorca, he sailed again for this country, and met the French fleet, under Count de Guichen, near Martinique, 13 and 17 April. Although no general battle was fought, he broke through the enemy's line and was rewarded by parliament with a vote of thanks and a pension of £2,000. He was elected to parliament for Westminster, created a K. B., and in December, 1789, was made a vice-admiral of England, and assigned to command in the West Indies. In April, 1782, he met, in the channel of Dominica, with Count de Grasse, who was escorting a convoy of 150 sail that carried an invading army to Jamaica. On 9 April a partial engagement was fought, and on 12 April Rodney, having the advantage of the wind, attacked the French. The battle lasted nearly twelve hours, and was one of the most obstinate that was ever fought in those waters. As Vandeuren's division was unable, on account of the wind, to co-operate in the action, and de Grasse's flag-ship was sinking, the latter was compelled to lower his flags. After several hours, he sent frigates, and two frigates, and the English three vessels, Vandeuren abandoned the expedition to Jamaica, owing to subsequent orders, and a truce was signed, which led to the peace of 1783. The Whigs, who had meantime come into office, and despatched, before the victory was known, an officer to supersede Rodney, who arrived in England, 21 Sept., 1782. He was greeted with a resolution declaring him to be the peerage as Baron Rodney, and received an additional pension of £2,000, made revetible to his heirs. Owing to infirmities, he retired from active service. Jamaica, which he saved, voted £1,000 for the erection of a monument over his grave, and his portrait, by Sir Joshua Reynolds, is at Green-wich. Rodney's son-in-law, Gen. Godfrey Basil Murray, published "Life and Correspondence of Lord Rodney" (2 vols., London, 1830).

RODRIGUEZ, Cayetano José (ro-dre-geth), Argentine clergyman, b. in Ricon de San Pedro in 1761; d. in Buenos Ayres, 21 Jan., 1823. He entered the Fransican order in 1777, and was ordained priest in 1783. During twenty years he was a preceptor at the convents of Santa Catalina and Santa Clara, and he also taught philosophy and theology in the convents of Buenos Ayres and the University of Cordova. From the beginning of his career as a teacher he foresaw the future independence of his country, and when the Spanish yoke was thrown off in 1810 he was one of the most ardent followers of the patriotic cause. As a Franciscan he had a notable position, he was a member of the congress of Tucuman in 1816, and as secretary of that body signed the act of independence on 25 July of that year. When, in 1822, the ecclesiastical reform was initiated, Rodriguez defended the rights of the church in the paper "Oficial del Dia," with great force, and he is considered one of the most powerful writers of his time. His political writings also obtained great merit, and many of his compositions appeared in magazines, but no collection has been issued.

RODRIGUEZ, Diego, Mexican mathematician, b. in Atitlal in 1597; d. in Mexico in 1668. He entered the military order of Merced, in Mexico, on 8 April, 1613, and rose to be commander of that order and professor of theology in its college. In 1657 he was appointed professor of mathematics in the Literary academy. He wrote "Tratado eterologico sobre el Cometa aparecido en Mexico en 1652" (Mexico, 1664); "Libro de la naturaleza del dis- linum disciplinarium Mathematicarum et de Com- mendatione Elementorum Encidis"; "Geometria especulativa"; "De Arithmetic"; "Tratado de Equaciones, con Tabe Algebraica discursiva"; and "Arte de fabricar Religes horizontales, verticelles, etc., con declinaciones y sin ellas." All but the last are in manuscript. They were taken from the "Libro de la Reyna," by the National Library, and they are to be published soon to give an early development of mathematics in Mexico.

RODRIGUEZ, Manuel, Chilian patriot, b. in Santiago in 1786; d. in Titril, 26 May, 1818. In 1811 he began to take part in the struggle for in- dependence, and during the government of Gen. Carrera in 1814 he served as secretary of the latter. After the disaster of Rancagua he emigrated to the Argentine, and was secretly sent to Chili to foment the revolution there. The province of Col- chagua was the centre of his operations, and the Spanish government vainly tried to surprise him, offering large rewards for his capture. After the triumph of San Martin in Chacabuco, Rodriguez continued to serve the cause of the republic till the defeat of Cochrane at Chacabuco, when he proclaimed himself chief of the cause of Bolivar. The Chief of the Government, therefore, obtained the victory of Maypun, in which Rodriguez took part as chief of the Husares de la Muerte. The other chiefs, especially O'Higgins, began to be jealous of the popularity of Rodriguez, and, in order to remove him, he was offered the mission to the United States. On his refusal his death was decreed by the Lantaro secret society, and soon afterwards he was despatched to Quillota, to be tried by a court-martial. He was delivered to an officer, Navarro, who on the road ordered him to be shot without any trial. On the place of his execution a granite column has been erected, which was dedicated on 26 May, 1863.

RODRIGUEZ, Manuel del Socorro, Cuban scientist b. in Bayamo, Cuba, in 1798; d. in Bego- na, Colombia, in 1858. He was engaged in cattle and sheep raising, and he was obliged to work for a living from early life, and received only a scanty education; but he sup- plied this deficiency by his energy and love for study, and without any teacher obtained a profound knowledge of science, history, and literature. He followed Jose de Espededa in 1789 to New Granada, and, being appointed director of the public library of Bogota, began at once to aid the in- tellectual development of the country, associating his name with many literary and scientific enter- prises for that purpose. At his suggestion the viceroy founded the "Papel periodico de Santa Fe de Bogota," the first newspaper in the colony, the editorship of which was assigned to Rodriguez in January, 1791. He suggested also the idea of establishing a meteorological observatory, and was appointed one of its directors. He founded several scientific and literary newspa- pers and reviews. When the country revolted against the Spanish rule in 1810, Rodriguez sided with the patriots and shared their fortunes. Al- though he wrote much, especially on scientific sub- jects, many of his writings are lost. The principal manuscript that is preserved is his "Histo- ria de la Fundacion de la Enseñanza." Humboldt praises him in several parts of his numerous writings.

RODRIGUEZ, Manuel Domingo, Argentine statesman, b. in Buenos Ayres in 1780; d. there in 1849. He served in the war of independence, and was a colonel at the time of the establishment of the republic by the congress of Tucuman, 9 July.
1816. After the fall of the last director, Bondean, in January, 1829, the municipality of Buenos Ayres gave the military command successively to various chiefs, but ultimately resigned everywhere, so that the governors of Santa Fe and Entre Rios easily routed the forces of Buenos Ayres in Canada de la Cruz, and occupied the city. In this emergency Rodriguez was elected governor of Buenos Ayres, 9 May, 1829, and, re-establishing order, signed a treaty of peace with Lopez, governor of Santa Fe, by which the independence of the provinces was recognized. In 1821 he called to his cabinet Bernardino Rivadavia, c.t. as secretary of the interior, and Dr. Manuel Garcia as secretary of the treasury, and with their cooperation many reforms were introduced in the administration. Liberty of the press and separation of church and state were decreed, convents were suppressed, with the exception of two in Buenos Ayres, the emigration of foreigners was promoted, and numerous savings-banks, the national bank, an academy of sciences, and the University of Buenos Ayres were established in 1823. Rodriguez was a member of the cabinet of both his successors. When, after the proclamation of a unitarian conquest, by Congress, 1 Dec., 1829, there was general discontent and revolt in the interior provinces, President Rivadavia resigned with his cabinet, 29 June, 1827, and Rodriguez retired to private life.

ROE, Azel Stevens, author, b. in New York city, 16 Aug., 1799; d. in East Windsor Hill, Conn., 1 Jan., 1866. He received an academic education, and after serving as a clerk in a mercantile house in New York, became a wine-merchant in that city. He finally retired from business and settled at Windsor, Conn. Having lost most of his property by freely incurring for persons that subsequently failed, he applied himself successfully to literature. He published "James Menton, or I've Been Thinking" (New York, 1836); "To Love and be Loved" (1832); "Time and Tide, or Thrive and Win" (1832); "A Long Look Ahead" (1855); "The Star and the Cloud" (1856); "True to the Last" (1859); "How could He Help it?" (1860); "Looking Around" (1855); "Woman our Angel" (1866); "The Cloud in the Heart" (1869); and "Resolution, or the Seal of Power" (1871). Most of his works were reprinted by Longfellow.

ROE, Francis Ashbury, naval officer, b. in Elmira, N. Y., 4 Oct., 1823. He entered the navy as midshipman, 19 Oct., 1841, and was at the naval academy at Annapolis, 1841-2. He left the service for eleven months from June, 1848. In 1851-2 he served in the mail-steam "Georgia," on the New York and West India line. He was attached to the brig "Porpoise" in the North Pacific exploring expedition. He was commissioned master, 8 Aug., 1855, and lieutenant, 14 Sept., 1855. In 1857-8 he served in the coast survey. In 1862 he was executive officer of the "Pensacola" in Farragut's squadron, and, on account of the illness of his commanding officer, took charge of the ship in passing Fort Jackson and Fort St. Philip. He was commissioned lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, had charge of the steamer "Kahcdn" in 1862-3 in the operations on Mississippi river, defeated Gen. C.M. Pemberton, and took advantage of the situation to assist in the destruction of the Confederate ram "Arkansas," 7 Aug., 1862. He was commissioned commander, 25 July, 1866, and in 1866-7 commanded the steamer "Sassacus" in the North Atlantic blockading squadron, and captured and destroyed several blockade runners in the sounds of North Carolina, and co-operated in the defeat of the Confederate iron-clad ram "Alabmarie," 5 May, 1864. In this engagement Roe gallantly rammed the ironclad, which then fired a 100-pound rifle-shot through the "Sassacus," killing and wounding many of the crew by exploding in the boiler. In the confusion that was caused by escaping steam, Roe skillfully handled his ship and compelled the "Alabmarie's" consort, the "Bombshell," to surrender. After the war he commanded the steamer "Hickory" on the Dan River, in 1864-5. He was commissioned commander, 25 July, 1866, and in 1866-7 commanded the steamer "Tacony" on a special mission to Mexico. His firmness as senior officer prevented a bombardment of Vera Cruz. On 3 Aug., 1867, he was detached, and in recognition of his services was ordered as fleet-captain of the Asiatic station. He was ordered to South America in 1872. He was commissioned captain, 1 April, 1872, and was attached to the Boston navy-yard in 1872-3. His last cruise was in command of the "Lancaster" on the Brazil station in 1873-5. He was attached. to the naval station at New London in 1875-6, on special duty at Washington in 1879-80, and promoted to commodore, 26 Nov., 1880. In 1883-4 he was governor of the Naval asylum at Philadelphia. He was commissioned rear-admiral, 3 Nov., 1884, and placed on the retired list, 4 Oct., 1885.

ROE, Henry, Canadian educator, b. in Henryville, Mississauga co., Quebec, 22 Feb., 1829. He was educated at McGill college and Bishop's college. He ordained a priest in the Anglican church in 1852, became rector of St. Matthew's church, Quebec, in 1853, and of St. Ann's, Richmond, in 1868, and was appointed examining chaplain to the bishop of Quebec in 1864. He became professor of divinity in the University of Bishop's college in 1873, and is now vice-principal and dean of the faculty of divinity in that institution. In 1879 he received the degree of D. D. from Bishop's college. Dr. Roe has been for twenty-five years the Canadian correspondent of the London "Guardian." Besides sundry sermons, he has published "Pamphlet on Episcopal Veto" (1859); "Treatise on Purgatory, Transubstantiation, and the Mass" (1862); "Pamphlet on Clerical Studies" (1864); "The Church and the State" (Richmond, 1865); "Christian Economy" (1880); and "Pamphlet on the Place of Laymen in the Spiritual Work of the Church" (1887).

ROEBLING, John Augustus (ray-bling), civil engineer, b. in Mühlhausen, Prussia, 12 June, 1806; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 22 July, 1860. He was graduated at the Royal polytechnic school in Berlin with the degree of C. E. in 1826, and received special attention to suspension-bridges during his course, and wrote his graduating thesis on this subject. After spending the three years required by law in government service, during which time he was engaged chiefly as an assistant on the construction of military roads in Westphalia, he came to the United States. He settled near Pittsburg, Pa., where he devoted himself to agricultural pursuits, and determined to build a village of frontiersmen. The various systems of canal improvements and slack-water navigation were then in course of development, and to these his services were attracted. Later his attention was given to new railroad enterprises. One of his earliest engagements was in surveying the lines of the Pennsylvania railroad across the Allegheny mountains from Harrisburg to Pittsburg. He then entered upon the manufacture of iron and steel wire, from which he gained the valuable knowledge of the nature, capabilities, and requirements of wire that enabled him to revolutionize the construction of bridges. The first specimen of that wire that was ever produced in the United States was made by him, and his belief in its efficiency was soon put to the test. During the winter of 1844-5 he had charge of the building of a wooden aqueduct across the Allegheny river at Pittsburg, and proposed that it should consist of a wooden trunnk to hold the water, supported on each side by a continuous wire cable seven inches in diameter. In spite of ridicule from the engineering profession, he succeeded in completing his bridge, which comprised seven spans, each of 162 feet. His next undertaking was the construction in 1846 of a suspension-bridge over Monongahela river at Pittsburg. In 1848 he built four similar works on the line of the Delaware and Hudson canal. On the completion of these bridges he settled in Trenton, N. J., whether he removed his wire-manufactory. In 1851 he was called to build a suspension-bridge across the Niagara river to connect the New York Central railroad with the Canadian railway systems. This structure, the first of the great suspension-bridges with which his name is connected, was built in four years, and, when it was finished, was regarded as one of the wonders of the world. It was the first suspension-bridge that was capable of bearing the weight of railroad-trains. The span was 825 feet clear, and it was supported by four 40-inch cables. His next undertaking was a wire-bridge built for the New York Central railroad over the river at Pittsburg, which is considered one of the best pieces of bridge engineering in existence. In 1856 he began the building of the great bridge between Cincinnati and Covington, but the work was not finished until 1867. Its success showed engineers throughout the country that the problem of suspension-bridge making was solved upon a principle that could not be superseded. According to Gen. John G. Barnard, "to Mr. Roebling must be conceded the claim of practically establishing the sufficiency of the suspension principle for railroad bridges and of developing the manner of their construction." His eminent success in this line of work led in 1868 to his being chosen chief engineer of the East river bridge, connecting Brooklyn and New York. He at once prepared plans for his new structure, which received the approval of the National authorities, and in 1869 the company for the construction of the bridge was duly organized and work was at once begun. While he was making observations his foot was crushed between the pilings and rack of one of the ferry-slips during the abrupt entry of a ferry-boat. Mr. Roebling was then removed to his residence, but, in spite of medical skill, his death occurred from leech-jaw sixteen days later. Mr. Roebling published "Long and Short Span Railway Bridges" (New York, 1869).

His son, Washington Augustus, civil engineer, b. in Saxenburg, Pa., 26 May, 1837, was graduated as a civil engineer at Koenischer polytechnic institute in 1857, and began his professional work at once under his father on the Allegheny suspension-bridge. In 1861 he enlisted as a private in the 6th New York artillery, and served a year with that battery in the Army of the Potomac. In 1862 he was transferred to the staff of Gen. Irvin McDowell, and assigned to various engineering duties, notably the construction of a suspension-bridge across Rappahannock river. Later he served on Gen. John Lieb's staff in his capacities of chief of staff, 9th Mountain, Antietam, and the campaign that ended in the second battle of Bull Run, during which time he built a suspension-bridge across Shenandoah river at Harper's Ferry. He was also engaged on balloon duty, and was in the habit of ascending every morning in order to reconnoitre the Confederate army. By this means he discovered, and was the first to announce, the fact that Lee had been moving toward Pennsylvania. From August, 1863, till March, 1864, he was attached to the 21st corps, serving on engineering duty and then on staff duty with the 5th corps during the overland campaign. He attained the rank of major on 20 April, 1864, also receiving three brevets, including that of colonel, and resigned in January, 1865. Col. Roebling was chief engineer in charge of the construction of the Washington bridge, of which he had almost entire charge. He then went abroad to study hydraulic foundations before sinking those of the East river bridge, to the charge of which he was called on the death of his father, but before any of the details had been decided on. In 1869 he settled in Brooklyn, and gave his attention almost exclusively to the sinking of the caissons. His devotion to his work, with the fact that he spent more hours of the twenty-four in the compressed air of the caissons than any one else, led to an attack of caisson fever early in 1872. He soon rallied and resumed his work, but he was so weak that he was unable to leave his room. Nevertheless, he prepared the most minute and exact directions for making the cables, and for the erection of all the complicated parts of the superstructure. In 1873 he was compelled to give up work entirely, and spent several months in Europe, but on his return he resumed the charge of the bridge, which he held until its completion in 1883. The structure he built, which is the longest-sus- pension bridge in the world, cost about $13,000,000. The picture shows it before completion. Its total length, including approaches, is 5,969 feet, of which the middle span takes up 1,996 feet, while the length of the suspended structure from anchorage to anchorage is 3,456 feet. He has since spent his time in directing the wire business in Trenton, N. J., and in the recuperation of his health.

He also wrote a number of pamphlets and books on professional subjects. He is the author of "Military Suspension-Bridges" (Washington, 1862).

ROEBUCK, John Arthur, English politician, b. in Madras, India, 29 Dec., 1802; d. in England, 30 Nov., 1879. His grandfather, Dr. John Roe buck, wrote "An Inquiry on the Red Indians of North America" (London, 1766). From 1815 till 1824 the son resided in Canada; then going to London, England, he studied law, and in 1831 he was admitted as a barrister. In 1832 he was elected to parliament, and became prominent as a radical reformer. In 1833 he was appointed agent for the Lower Canada assembly during the contest between that house and the executive. His advocacy of the Confederate states and his opposition to trade-unions led to his defeat in 1838. In 1877-8 he vigorously supported the policy of Earl Beaconsfield, and was sworn a privy councillor in 1878. He was one of the staunchest supporters of the rights of Canada against what he regarded as the aggressions of the crown. Besides numerous articles in the "Westminster Review," and the "Edinburgh Review," he wrote "Existing Difficulties in the Government of the Canadians" (London, 1836); "Plan for the Government of the English Colonies" (1849); and "History of the Whig Ministry of 1830" (1852).

ROEILKER, Bernard, lawyer, b. in Osnaubrick, Hanover, Germany, 24 April, 1848; d. in New York city, 5 March, 1888. He was graduated in 1863 at the University of Bonn, where he had devoted himself to the study of law and philology. Later he came to this country, and after teaching German and music in Bridgeport, Conn., was appointed to a tutorship at Harvard in 1867, was admitted to the bar, and practised for several years in Boston. In 1856 he removed to the city of New York, and entered the firm of Larue and Roeilker. He soon established a large practice among the Germans, and when his partner died he had gained a reputation as an authority on wills and contracts. In 1869 he won the suit of Meyer vs. Roosevelt, the first of the legal-tender cases before the U. S. Supreme court, which attracted general attention. He continued to practise until advancing age compelled him to relinquish a large part of his business. His last important argument was made before the New York court of appeals in October, 1887. Mr. Roeilker was a personal friend of Samuel J. Tilden, and was associated with him in the organization of the Prairie du Chien railroad. He wrote "Constitutions of France" (Boston, 1848); "Argument in Favor of the Constitutionality of the Legal-Tender Clause in the Act of Congress, Feb. 25, 1862" (New York, 1863); and "Manual for the Use of Notaries Public and Bankers" (3d ed., 1869), edited by J. Smith Romans, New York, 1865. He also translated from the Swedish "The Magic Goblet," a novel, and made a German adaptation of Cushing's "Manual of Parliamentary Practice."

ROEMER, Jean, author, b. in England about 1815; d. in Lenox, Mass., 31 Aug., 1892. He was taken in infancy to Hanover, and afterward to Holland. His early education was conducted under the guardianship of William L. King of the Netherlands, and his later studies were made at the Royal Military Academy, the Hague, and wife of Charles George Augustus, heir-apparent of the crown of Brunswick. He was destined for the army, and served on the Dutch side throughout the war of secession between Holland and Belgium, at the close of which he visited the great military establishments of France, Prussia, and Austria, and completed his duties in aid of the United States. Radezky. Subsequently he resided in Naples, where a close intimacy with the Prince of S恭喜, ex-vicecyo of Sicily, and some articles that were attributed to him, caused much comment. They gave umbrage to King Ferdinand II., whose distrust of the liberal tendencies of his brother lent to this frank method of expression. He came the subject of diplomatic correspondence, and led to the visitor's recall from Italy early in 1845. Some time after the death of William L., whose successor on the throne appears to have been influenced by a different spirit from that of his father concerning Mr. Roemer, the pretensions of the latter began to take a definite form, so much indeed that he was denied him on special grounds, which ever since have been maintained against him. Strong efforts made in his behalf did not avail, and even at the congress of German sovereigns, held in Frankfort in 1863, a well-supported attempt at compromise and conciliation continued to remain without results. From 1868 he was professor of French language and literature in the New York free academy, and in 1889 he was appointed vice-president of the college of the city of New York, which place he occupied while he lived. In addition to articles and pamphlets on agriculture, education, and insurance, he published a "Dictionary of English-French Idioms" (New York, 1853); "Polyglot Readers" (5 vols., 1858); "Cavalry: its History, Management, and Uses in War" (1863); "Course de lecture et de traduction" (3 vols., 1884); "Thoughts on the History of English"; and "History of the English People and of the English Language" (1889).
ROGERS, Juan, Spanish missionary, b. in Pamplona, Spain, about 1540; d. in Vera Cruz, Mexico, in 1618. He was a Jesuit, and sailed from San Lucar for this country in 1566. The vessel on which he had embarked was driven on the coast of Florida and several of his companions were killed by the natives, but he escaped and went to Havana, where he spent several months in studying the language of the part of Florida near Cape Canaveral. With the aid of natives who were then in Havana, whom he converted, he drew up vocabularies and then returned to the province. The Indians among whom he lived were a branch of the Seminole, a very degraded type, and, not meeting with much success, he went to Havana, where he established an Indian school. In 1569 he sailed again for Florida, landing at the post of Santa Helena, on Port Royal harbor, and he was the first resident priest in South Carolina. Here he attended to the religious wants of the garrison for some time, and then advanced about forty miles into the interior, finding a race of Indians that were superior to any he had previously encountered, probably the Cherokees. He entered their town of Ori sta and was well received; but, although he persuaded the natives to plant corn, which he distributed among them, and to build houses, he did not make many converts. His visits to other tribes were equally fruitless. Returning to Havana, he re- turned to Santa Helena in 1570. He then went to Havana to obtain relief for the colony, which was suffering from hunger, taking with him Indian boys from the various tribes to educate. He was again in Florida in 1572, and his last missionary act in the country was to convert eight Indians that had been condemned to death for murder. He then returned with the other missionaries of his order to Havana and afterward went to Mexico, where he labored for many years with great success.

ROGERS, Ebenezer Platt, clergyman, b. in New York city, 18 Dec., 1817; d. in Montclair, N. J., 23 Oct., 1881. He was graduated at Yale in 1837, and, after spending a year at Princeton theological seminary, finished his studies in Harvard. Ordained a deacon in the Second Parish of Medford, Massachusetts, he was ordained in November. He held Congregational pastorates in Chicopee Falls, Mass., in 1840-3, in Northampton in 1843-6, and had charge of Presbyterian churches in Augusta, Ga., till 1854, and Philadelphia till 1856. He then became pastor of the 1st Reformed Dutch church of Albany, and in 1862 accepted the charge of the South Reformed church in New York city, where he continued until a few months before his death. He received the degree of D. D. (from Oglethorpe college in 1853. Besides various minor publications, he was the author of "Earnest Words to Young Men in a Series of Discourses" (Charlestown, S. C., 1857), and "Historical Discourse on the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church of Albany" (1855). He was a devoted friend of the "American.&"

ROGERS, Ezekiel, clergyman, b. in Wethersfield, Essex, England, in 1599; d. in Rowley, Mass., 23 Jan., 1661. He was graduated at Cambridge, England, in 1614, and became chaplain to Sir Francis Barrington, who bestowed on him the benefice of Rowley in Yorkshire. He exercised his ministry there for about twenty years, when he was silenced for non-conformity, and in 1633, came with many of his Yorkshire friends to this country. He was urged to settle in New Haven, but preferred to begin a new plantation, which he named Rowley. He was ordained in December, 1639, and attained great reputation as a preacher. In 1643 he delivered a sermon on election that, according to Cotton Mather, made him "famous through the country." It advocated that the same man should not be chosen chief magistrate for two successive years; but, in spite of his efforts, Gov. John Winthrop was re-elected. The demands on his time were so great that he soon received an assistant. He bequeathed his library to Harvard college, and his house and lands to the town of Rowley.

ROGERS, Fairman, civil engineer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 Nov., 1833. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1853, and two years later became professor of civil engineering, which chair he held till 1871. He lectured on mechanics in the Franklin Institute from 1853 till 1865. Prof. Rogers served as a volunteer in the National cavalry in 1861, and then became a volunteer officer in the U. S. engineers. Under the auspices of the U. S. coast survey in 1862 he completed the survey of Potomac river northward from Blakiston island. In 1871 he was elected a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania, and he is a member of the American society of civil engineers and of the American philosophical society. He was one of the original members of the National academy of sciences, and has served on its committees and its council. Among his more important scientific papers are "Combinations of Mechanism representing Mental Processes," "Difference of Efficiency Engine," (1871); and "Terrestrial Magnetism and the Magnetism of Iron Ships" (New York, 1883).

ROGERS, Franklin Whiting, artist, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 27 Aug., 1854. He became a pupil of J. Foxcroft Cole in 1874, and later studied also with Wm. M. Hunt and Thomas Robinson. He has devoted himself especially to the painting of nudes. Among his best works are "Deadly" "Resignation," "Loo," and "Mischief." ROGERS, George Clarke, soldier, b. in Piermont, Grafton co., N. H., 22 Nov., 1838. He was educated in Vermont and Illinois, whither he removed in early life, began the study of the law while teaching, and was admitted to the bar in 1860. He earnestly supported Stephen A. Douglas, and when that statesman was assassinated he made a reputation as an extemporaneous speaker. He was the first to raise a company in Lake county, Ill., at the opening of the civil war, became 1st lieutenant, 29 April, 1861, and soon afterward captain. At the battle of Shiloh he received four wounds, but refused to leave the field, and led his regiment in the final charge. He was at once promoted to lieutenant-colonel for his gallant conduct, and soon afterward was commissioned colonel for gallantry at the battle of the Hatchie. At Champion Hills he received three wounds, from one of which he has never fully recovered. To the engineering skill of Col. Rogers were due the works at Allatoona, Ga., where Gen. John M. Corse (q. c.) checked Gen. J. C. Gordon in his operations for the capture of Atlanta. He commanded a brigade nearly two years, including the Atlanta campaign, and on 13 March, 1865, was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers. He has practised law in Illinois and Kansas since the war, and was three times a delegate to National Democratic conventions. He was made chairman of the board of probation and relief in 1885.

ROGERS, Henry J., inventor, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1811; d. there, 20 Aug., 1859. He devised the code of signals by means of flags that is known by his name, which was adopted by the United States navy in 1846 and modified in 1861. Mr. Rogers also devised a code of signals by means of colored lights, which was the first pyrotechnic sys-ROGERS succeeded in disturbing the Maryland line, close evidence, paper 1859, March, the high line, 1844, In 1819 a Rhode natural Rogers, the (1847): several errors with great States. He spent his life, and afterward to the volunteer navy, and he afterward returned to Baltimore, where he spent the remaining years of his life. Mr. Rogers published "Telegraph Dictionary and Seaman's Signal-Book" (Baltimore, 1845); "American Semaphore Signal-Book" (1845); "A Treatise on Telegraphy" (1884); and, with Walter F. Larkins, edited "Rogers' Commercial Code of Signals for all Nations" (1859).

ROGERS, Horatio, lawyer, b. in Providence, R. I., 15 May, 1836. His grandfather, John Rogers, and two of his great-uncles, were officers in the Revolution. The grandson was graduated at Brown in 1859, admitted to the bar, served with great distinction during the Civil war, and was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1863. Gen. Rogers has served for several years as attorney-general of Rhode Island. He is a prolific newspaper and magazine writer, and has delivered several orations on public occasions, the most notable being at the unveiling of the equestrian statue of Gen. Burnside in Providence, R. I., 4 July, 1887. He also published "The Private Libraries of Providence" (Providence, 1877), and annotated and published the "Journal of Late, James M. Hadden, Chief of the English Artillery during the Burgoyne Campaign" (Albany, 1834), the prefatory chapter and the notes to which work are characterized by great research.

ROGERS, James, Canadian R. C. bishop, b. in Montreal, Quebec, 11 July, 1826. He was ordained a priest in 1851, became professor at St. Mary's college, Halifax, in 1859, and was consecrated the first Roman Catholic bishop of Chatham, New Brunswick, in 1860.

ROGERS, James Blythe, chemist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 11 Feb., 1802; d. there, 15 June, 1872. He was the eldest son of Patrick Kerr Rogers, who was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1802, and in 1819 was elected professor of natural philosophy and mathematics at William and Mary, where he remained until his death. James was educated at William and Mary, and, after preliminary studies with Dr. Thomas E. Bond, received the degree of M. D., from the University of Maryland in 1822. Subsequently he taught in Baltimore, but soon afterward settled in Little Britain, Lancaster co., Pa., and there practised medicine. Finding this occupation unremunerative, he returned to Baltimore and became superintendent of a large manufactury of chemicals. He devoted himself assiduously to the study of pure and applied chemistry, and became professor of that branch in Washington medical college, Baltimore, also lecturing on the same subject at the Mechanics' institute. In 1835 he was called to the same chair in the medical department of Cincinnati college, where he remained until 1839, spending his summer vacations in field-work and chemical investigations in connection with the geological survey of Virginia, which was then under the charge of his brother William. In 1840 he settled permanently in Philadelphia, where he became an assistant to his brother Henry, at that time state geologist of Pennsylvania, and in 1841 he was appointed lecturer on chemistry in the Philadelphia medical institute, a summer school. He was elected professor of general chemistry at the Franklin institute in 1844, and held that chair until his election in 1847 to succeed Robert Hare as professor of chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania. Prof. Rogers was a representative at the National medical convention in 1847, and a delegate to the National convention for the revision of the U. S. Pharmacopoeia in 1859, and a member of various learned societies. He contributed papers to scientific journals, and with his brother Robert prepared the seventh edition of Edward Turner's "Elements of Chemistry" and William Gregory's "Outlines of Organic Chemistry," in one volume (Philadelphia, 1846). His "Memoir of the Life and Character of James B. Rogers" by his brother, William Barton, geologist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 Dec., 1804; d. in Boston, Mass., 30 May, 1882, was educated by his father and at William and Mary. In 1857 he delivered a series of lectures on science before the Maryland institute, and in 1858 he succeeded his father in the chair of physics and chemistry at William and Mary, where he remained for seven years. At this time he carried on investigations on dew and on the volatile battery, and prepared a set of papers on the green sand and the mineral of eastern Virginia and their value as fertilizers. He then accepted the professorship of natural science and geology in the University of Virginia, where he remained until 1856, attaining a high reputation as a lecturer. In 1856 he was called upon to organize the geological survey of Virginia, mainly in consequence of his printed papers and addresses. His brother, Henry B. Rogers, was at that time state geologist of Pennsylvania, and together they unfolded the historical geology of the great Appalachian chain. Among their joint special investigations were the study of the solvent action of water on various minerals and rocks, and the demonstration that coal-beds stand in close genetic relation to the amount of disturbance to which the incoalescent strata have been submitted, the coal becoming harder and containing less volatile matter as the evidence of the disturbance increases. Together they published a paper on "The Laws of Structure of the more Disturbed Zones of the Earth's Crust," in which the wave theory of mountain chains was first announced. This was followed later by William B. Rogers' statement of the law of distribution of faults. In 1842 the work of the survey closed, and meanwhile he had published six "Reports of the Geological Survey of the State of Virginia" (Richmond, 1836-40), which have since been edited and issued in vol. 2, "Reports on the Geology of Virginia" (New York, 1884). He resigned his professorship at the University of Virginia in 1853, and removed to Boston, where he became active in the scientific movements under the auspices of the Boston society of natural history and the American academv of arts and sciences, in whose proceedings and the "American Journal of Science" his papers of this period were published. About 1859 he began to interest the people of Boston in his scheme for technical education, in which he desired to have associated, on one side research and investigation on the largest scale, and on the other agencies for the popular diffusion of useful knowledge. This project continued to occupy his attention until in 1865 it culminated in the organization of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, of which he became first president. Three years later, failing health made it necessary for him to relinquish that office, which he resumed in 1878; but he gave it up again in 1881, and was made professor emeritus of physics and geology, which chair he had held in connection with the presidency. He delivered a course of lectures before the Lowell Institute on "Science for the People" in 1867, and in 1861 he had been appointed inspector of gas and gas-meters for the state of Massachusetts. Harvard gave him the degree of L.L. D. in 1866, Prof. Rogers was chairman of the American association of geologists and naturalists in 1845 and again in 1847, also calling to order the first meeting of the American association for the advancement of astronomy, of which he was president in 1875, and elected its first honorary fellow in 1881, as a special mark of distinction. He was active in founding the American social science association and its first president; also he was one of the corporate members of the National acadamy of sciences, and its president from 1878 until his death. Besides numerous papers on geology, technical, or connected to the proceedings of societies and technical journals, he was the author of "Strength of Materials" (Charlottesville, 1838) and "Elements of Mechanical Philosophy" (Boston, 1852).—Another brother, Henry Darwin, geologist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 Aug., 1808; d., near Glasgow, Scotland, 29 May, 1856, was educated in Baltimore, Md., and Williamsburg, Va., and in 1830 was elected professor of chemistry and natural philosophy at Dickinson college, Pa. In 1831 he went to Europe and studied science in London. During the winter of 1832-3 he delivered a course of lectures on geology at the Franklin institute, and in 1835 he was elected professor of geology and mineralogy at the University of Pennsylvania, where he remained until 1846. In 1835 he was called upon to conduct the geological and mineralogical survey of New Jersey, and, in addition to a preliminary report in 1836, he published "Description of the Geology of the State of New Jersey" (Philadelphia, 1840). On the organization of the geological survey of the state of Pennsylvania in 1836, he was appointed geologist in charge, and engaged in active field-work until 1839, when the appropriations were discontinued. During the ten ensuing years his services were retained as an expert by various coal companies, but the field-work of the survey was resumed in 1851 and continued until 1854. Six annual reports were published between 1836 and 1842, and in 1855 the preparation of a final report was confided to him. Finding that the work could be done less expensively abroad, he transferred his residence to Edinburgh and issued "The Geology of Pennsylvania," Government Series, volume II, Edinburgh, 1856. In 1858 he was appointed professor of paleontology in the University of Glasgow, and he continued in that chair until his death. Prof. Rogers also delivered a series of lectures on geology in Boston during 1854. He received the degree of A.M. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1834, and that of LL.D. from the University of Dublin in 1857. During his residence in Edinburgh he was active in the American philosophical society and in the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences, and he was a member of other American societies, and of the Geological society of London, a fellow of the Royal society of Edinburgh, and president of the Philosophical society of Glasgow in 1864-6. He edited "The Messenger of Useful Knowledge" in 1861-71, and later was one of the conductors of the "Edinburgh New Philosophical Journal." His published papers are about fifty in number, and pertain chiefly to geology. In addition to his geological reports, he published "A Guide to a Course of Lectures in Geology," and is the author of a geological map of the United States and a chart of the arctic regions in the "Physical Atlas," in conjunction with William and Alexander Johnstone. He was elected to the Geological society of the United States (Edinburgh, 1857).—Another brother, Robert Empie, chemist, b. in Baltimore, Md., 29 March, 1818; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 6 Sept., 1884, was educated first under the care of his father, and then by his elder brothers. It was intended that he should be a civil engineer, and for a time he acted as assistant in the survey of the Boston and Providence railroad, but he abandoned that work, and was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1836, where he followed a full course of chemistry under Robert Hare. The active practice of medicine not being congenial to him, he was appointed chemist to the geological survey of Pennsylvania in 1836, and continued so for six years. In 1841-2 he was temporary inspector of mints, where he was in charge of the U.S. mint in Philadelphia, and was elected, in March, 1832, to the chair of general and applied chemistry and materia medica in that institution. He continued in this place until 1852, when he was called to succeed his brother James as professor of chemistry at the University of Pennsylvania, where he became dean of the medical faculty in 1856. In 1877 he resigned these appointments to accept the professorship of chemistry and toxicology in Jefferson medical college, which he then retained till 1884, when he was made professor emeritus. During the civil war he served as acting assistant surgeon, in 1862-3, at the West Philadelphia military hospital. Prof. Rogers was appointed in 1872 by the U. S. treasury department one of a commission to examine the conductors of the U. S. mint in Philadelphia. He visited the mint in San Francisco in 1873, and in 1874 the assay-office in New York, and subsequently until 1879 he was frequently engaged on government commissions for the various mints, making valuable reports, in addition to which he served on the annual assay commissions in 1874-9. From 1872 until his death he was secretary of the professors of chemistry employed by the gas-trust of Philadelphia to make analyses and daily photometric tests of the gas. The degree of LL.D. was conferred on him by Dickinson in 1877. He was a fellow of the College of physicians and surgeons, member of various scientific societies, one of the incorporators of the National academy of sciences, and president of the Franklin institute in 1857-9. Besides various articles in the transactions of the societies of which he was a member, and in scientific journals, he was associated with his brother James (q. q.) in editing "Elements of Chemistry" (Philadelphia, 1840), and edited Charles G. Lehman's "Physiological Chemistry" (2 vols., 1853). See "The Brothers Rogers," by William S. W. Riesenschneider (Philadelphia, 1885).

ROGERS, James Weeb, lawyer, b. in Hillsborough, N. J., 17 July, 1829; died 2 Jan., 1896. He was graduated at Princeton, and studied for the ministry. After taking orders in the Protestant Episcopal church, he became pastor of St. Paul's parish in Franklin, Tenn., and while in that state was instrumental in building six churches. He was a partissm of the south at the beginning of the civil war, and served in the Confederate army under Gen. Leonidas Polk. Subsequently he went to England, remaining there for some time, and in 1858 he became a Roman Catholic, but could not be admitted to the priesthood on account of his being married. On his return to the United States he settled at first in New York city, afterward in Indianapolis, Ind., where he edited "The Central Catholic," and then removed to Washington, where he studied law. After being admitted to practice he became associated with his son as attorney in the protection and sale of the latter's inventions.
His publications include "Lalitri, or the Greek Slave" (Boston, 1870); "Madame Surraut, a Drama in Five Acts" (Washington, 1870); "Arlington, and other Poems" (1881); and "Partisan" (Baltimore, 1883). Mr. Harris, besides being an electrician, b. in Franklin, Tenn., 13 July, 1830, was ded in this country and abroad. In 1857 he was appointed electrician at the U. S. capitol in Washington, D. C., and he continued in that office until 1886. He was the inventor of the secret telephone that was sold in New York for $800,000, also of the national improved telegraph, and of the pan-electric system, comprising patents on electric mototors, lights, telegraph, telephones, and telese"m which attracted greater attention from the circumstance that Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, Senator Augustus N. Garland, Senator Isham G. Harris, and other government officials capitalized the inventions at $15,000,000, and secured, it was alleged at the time, the exclusive right of the government to defend some of the patents. He has lately devised what he calls "visual synchronism."

ROGERS, John, founder of a sect, b. in New London, Conn., in 1644; d. there in 1721. He came a dissenter from the Congregational church, assumed the ministerial offices of preaching and baptizing, and, having gained a few disciples, founded a sect whose members were called Rogerences, and also Regenerate Baptists or Quakers.
He and his followers were frequently fined and imprisoned for proclamation of the Sabbath, for, though they worshipped on that day, they regarded themselves free to labor. Rogers was put in the stocks for an insult to the assembled congregation, and upon its release from prison rushed into the street, seized a man, and reproached him with which he was sent to Hartford for trial and was seated on a gallows with a halter around his neck for several hours. He frequently came into collision with the town authorities, and his aggressive spirit did not cease with his old age, for in 1711 he was fined and imprisoned for misdemeanor in court, convicted for defects in law, and afterwards by judges. Upon his release he was charged with insanity and confined in a dark prison. The populace became enraged, and several English officers appli"d to the town authorities to mitigate his treatment. He finally escaped in a boat to Long Island, went to New York, and beggared the privilege of Gov. Hunter. On his return to New London he prosecuted his judges, but was nonsuited and charged with a heavy fine. He wrote many books on theology, including "The Midnight Cry." to visit a relative in another part of the city. She requested her accepted suitor, who beared with her mother, to come for her in the evening; but, as it rained, he concluded that she would remain over night, and did not call for her. The next day she failed to return, and it was ascertained that she had not visited her relative. Four days later her body was found floating in Hudson river, near Weehawken, with marks that showed beyond doubt that she had been murdered. Every effort was made to determine by whom she had been killed, but without success. The body was found in a cupboard on the New Jersey shore, part of her clothing was found, with every evidence that a desperate struggle had taken place there; but these appearances were believed, on close inspection, to have been arranged to give it that aspect. Subsequently it was shown that she had been in the habit of meeting a young naval officer secretly, and it was alleged that she was in his company at the time of her first disappearance. He was able to account for his whereabouts from the time of her leaving home until the finding of her body, and the murder would have been forgotten had not Edgar Allan Poe revived the incident of the crime in his "Mys-ty of Marie Roget." With remarkable skill he analyzed the evidence, and showed almost doubtlessly how the victim's body was dismembered by one familiar with the sea, who had dragged her body to the water and therewith deposited it. Many persons were suspected of the crime, and, among others, John Anderson, whose last years, he claimed, were haunted by her spirit.

ROGERS, Nathaniel, clergyman, b. in Haver-sham, England, in 1709; d. in Ipswich, Mass., 5 July, 1783. He was the son of the Rev. John Rogers, Dorchester, who has been supposed, but on insufficient evidence, to have been a grandson of John the martyr, was educated at Cambridge, and preached in Bocking, Essex, and Assington, Suffolk. Through the influence of Thomas Hooker he came to Massaechusetts, 16 Nov., 1636. In 1637 he was a member of the synod that met in Cambridge to settle the Antinomian controversy. He was called to Ipswich and Dorchester, but found his followers could not be accommodated there, and went to Ipswich, where he was ordained on 20 Feb., 1638, with Rev. John Nort as colleague, serving until his death. Cotton Mather said that Mr. Rogers "might be compared with the very best of the true ministers which made the best days of New England," and his son-in-law, Thomas Hubbard, said "he had eminent learning, singular piety, and zeal." He published a letter on the "Cause of God's Wrath against the Nation" (London, 1644), and left in manuscript a vindication in Latin of the Congregational form of church government, of which Cotton Mather has preserved a considerable extract. His son, John, clergyman,
b. in Congesshall, England, in January, 1671, d. in Ipswich, Mass., 27 July, 1745, who, according with his father to New England, was graduated at Harvard in 1694, and studied both medicine and theology.
He first preached in Ipswich in 1656, and subsequently shared the duties of the ministry there.
From 1682 till 1684 he was president of Harvard.
The provincial records say that in December, 1706, the legislature ordered two pamphlets to be sent to the New England presbyters, and his son John, to be burned by the hangman in Boston. These probably expressed disapproval of the opposition of the legislature in regard to the governor's salary.

ROGERS, Nathaniel, artist, b. in Bridgehampton, L. I., in 1788; d. 6 Dec., 1844. He was apprenticed to a ship-carpenter when he was a boy, but, having been disqualified by an accident for such a trade, turned his attention to art, for which he had always had a predilection. After painting for himself for some time, he went to New York in 1811 and became a pupil of Joseph Wool. Not long afterward he opened a studio for himself, and soon took high rank as a painter of miniatures. Among these were admirable portraits of the friends and literary partners, Fitz-Greene Halleck and Joseph Rodman Drake. His professional life was spent principally in New York, and he was one of the founders of the National academy in that city.

ROGERS, Nathaniel Peabody, editor, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 3 June, 1794; d. in Concord, N. H., 16 Oct., 1846. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1816, and practised law until 1838, when he established in Concord, N. H., the " Herald of Freedom," a pioneer anti-slavery newspaper. He also wrote for the New York "Trilobite" under the signature of "The Old Man of the Mountain." His fugitive writings were published, with a memoir, by the Rev. John Pierpont (Concord, 1847).

ROGERS, Randolph, sculptor, b. in Waterloo,
N. Y., 6 July, 1825; d. in Rome, 15 Jan., 1892.
Until twenty-three he was engaged in mercantile purports in Ann Arbor, Mich., and in New York city.
He then went to Italy, studied with Bartolini, at Rome, from 1848 till 1850. On his return he opened a studio in New York, where he remained until 1855. In that year he returned to Italy, where he had resided since that time. Among his earlier works are "Ruth," an ideal bust (1851); "Nydia" (1856); "Bay Skating," "Isaac," full-length, and the statues of John Adams, in Mt.
Ipswich cemetery (1857). One of his best-known works, the bas-reliefs on the doors of the capitol at Washington, representing scenes in the life of Columbus, was designed in 1858, and cast in bronze at Munich. In 1861 he completed the Washington monument at Richmond, which had been unfinished by Thomas Crawford, adding the statues of Marshall, Mason, and Nelson, for which Crawford had made no design, as well as some allegorical figures. His other works include "Angel of the Resurrection," on the monument of Col. Samuel Curt, Hartford, Conn. (1861-2); "Isaac," an ideal bust (1865); memorial monuments for Cincinnati (1863-4); Providence (1871), Detroit (1872), and Worcester, Mass. (1874); "Lost Pleiad" (1875);
"Genius of Connecticut," on the capitol at Hurl-burd, I. (1875); "The Spirit" of the city of Indi-ablanca, bronze (1881). He had also executed portrait statues of Abraham Lincoln, for Philadelphia (1874), and William H. Seward, for New York (1876).

ROGERS, Robert, soldier, b. in Londonderry, N. H., in 1727; d. in England about 1800. He entered the military service during the old French war, for which he raised and commanded the Rogers's rangers," who were with him at the battle of the Monongahela, in July, 1758. He was the recipient of the medal of honor, and of the badge of the Legion of Honor. On his return home in 1759, he was given the command of the English forces in Canada, particularly in the region of Lake George.
His name is perpetuated there by the precipice that is known as "Rogers's slide," near which he escaped from the Indians, who, believing that he had slid down the steep declive of the mountain under the protection of the Great Spirit, made no attempt at further pursuit of him. On 17 Oct., 1768, he led 100 French and 400 Indians, and, after losing 100 men and killing 150, he retreated. In 1759 he was sent by Sir Jeffrey Amherst from Crown Point to destroy the Indian village of St. Francis near St. Lawrence river, which service he performed, killing 200 Indians, and in 1760 he was ordered by Amherst to take possession of Detroit and other western posts that were ceded by the French after the fall of Quebec.
the St. Lawrence with 200 sailors, he visited Fort Pitt, had an interview with Pontiac, and received the submission of Detroit. He visited England, and suffered from want until he borrowed money to print his journal, which he presented to the king, who in 1765 appointed him governor of Mackinaw, Mich.; but while holding this office he was accused of having printed libels against the king and to deliver it to the French, and was consequently sent to Montreal in irons and tried by court-martial. In 1769 he revisited England, but was soon imprisoned for debt. Afterward he returned to this country. Dr. John Wheelock, of Dartmouth college, wrote at this period: "The famous Maj. Rogers came to my house from a tavern in the neighborhood. He wore a simple suit of clothes and had never before seen him. He was in but an ordinary habit for one of his character. He treated me with great respect; said he came from London in July, and had spent twenty days with the congress in Philadelphia, and I forget how many at New York; had been offered and urged to take a commission in the officers of the colonies, but, as he was on half-pay from the Crown, he thought proper to accept it; and also that he had got a pass, or license to travel, from the Continental congress." Maj. Rogers' accounts of himself were probably not accurate, but he had been a prisoner of congress, and was released on parole, promising that he would bear no arms against the American colonies under the care of an officer. That bore to Gen. Washington: "I love America; it is my native country, and that of my family, and I intend to spend the evening of my days in it." It is believed that at this very moment he was a spy. Being suspected by Washington, he was secured in 1776, and during his examination, pretending that he had business with congress, was sent to Phila- delphia under the care of an officer. That bore decided that he should be disposed of by the Provincial congress of New Hampshire. Not with- standing his parole, he accepted the commission of colonel in the British army, for which he raised the Queen's rangers, a corps that was celebrated throughout the contest. To encourage enlistments he issued a printed circular promising to the re- cruited "their freedom, and a passport to India." On the 21 Oct., 1776, he escaped being taken prisoner by Lord Stirling at Manron. Soon afterward he went to England, and in 1778 he was proscribed and banished. His subsequent history is lost. Rogers was the author of "A Concise Account of North America" (London, 1756): "Journals," giving an account of his early adventures as a ranger (1755; Dublin, 1787); "An Admonition to Pontoosh, or the Savages of America," a tragedy in verse (1766). This was printed anonymously, and is now very rare. His "Diary of the Siege of Detroit in the War with Pontiac" was published, with other narratives and with notes, by Franklin B. Hough (Albany, 1869; new ed., 1883). The names of the officers and Rogers' rangers are given in the "Ri- minisces of the Adjutant General of New Hampshire," and his exploits are chronicled in Gen. John Winslow's unpublished "Journal," and in manuscript letters in the Massachusetts archives. The "Jour- nals" mentioned above are condensed in "Reni- missces of the French War," edited by Caleb Stark (Concord, 1834), and also appear in an abridgment in "Memoirs of John Stark" by the same author (1890). The best edition is that edited by Franklin B. Hough (Albany, 1865).

ROGERS, Thomas J., congressman, b. in Waterford, Ireland, in 1781; d. in New York city, 7 Dec., 1882. He came to the United States in 1874, learned printing, and for many years published and edited a political newspaper. He was elected to congress from Pennsylvania as a Demo- crat, serving from 24 March, 1818, till 26 April, 1824, when he resigned, having been appointed recorder of deeds for Northampton county, Pa. He was the author of "A New American Bio- graphical Dictionary: or, Remembrancer of the Departed Heroes, Sages, and Statesmen of America" (Easton, Pa., 1813; last ed., 1882).

ROGERS, William, clergyman and educator, b. in Newport, R. I., 22 July, 1751; d. in Phila- delphia, Pa., 7 April, 1824. He was graduated in 1769 at Rhode Island college (now Brown), where he was the first and for several days the only student. He then joined the corps of an academ- y at Newport, and in 1772-5 was pastor of the 1st Baptist church in Philadelphia. In April, 1776, he was chosen chaplain to Col. Samuel Miles's Pennsylvania rifle regiment, and served until June, 1778, when he was made brigade chap- lain in the Continental army, retiring from the service in June, 1781. After quitting the army he was received on the st. and became a member of the Baptist denomination, to settle in the ministry. In 1789 he was chosen professor of oratory and English literature in the College of Philadelphia, and in 1792 to the same post in its successor, the University of Pennsylvania, which place he resigned in 1811. He was chosen in 1790 vice-president of the Pennsylvania society for the gradual abolition of slavery, in 1799 vice-president of the Phila- delphia society for alleviating the miseries of public prisons, in 1802 one of the correspondents and editors of the London "Evangelical Magazine," in 1805 chaplain to the Philadelphia militia legion, in 1816-17 to the legislature of Pennsylvania, and in 1819 vice-president of the Religious historical society of Philadelphia. He received the degree of A. M. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1778, Yale in 1780, and Princeton in 1786, and in 1790, from the first named, the degree of D. D. He published "A Circular Letter on Justification" (1785; reprinted in London, 1786): "An Introductory Prayer," at the request of the Pennsylvania society of the Cincinnati (1789): "A Sermon on the Death of John Quincy Adams": "A Chap- tory Prayer, occasioned by the Death of General Washington" (1800): "A Circular Letter on Christian Missions"; and various moral, religious, and political articles in newspapers and magazines.

ROGERS, William Augustus, astronomer, b. in Waterford, Conn., 15 Nov., 1852; d. in Water- ville, Me., 1 March, 1898. He was graduated at Brown in 1875, taught in Alfred academy, and in 1882 was given its chair in mathematics and astronomy, which he held for thirteen years. Meanwhile, during leaves of absence, he passed a year at the Sheffield scientific school of Yale as a student of theoretical and applied mechanics, one year as a special student of astronomy in the Harvard observatory, which was followed by six months' experience as an assistant, and spent four months in the U. S. naval service during the civil war. The observatory at Alfred was built and equipped by him. In 1870 he was appointed assistant in the Harvard observatory, and he be- came in 1877 assistant professor of astronomy. In 1886 he was called to the chair of astronomy and physics at Colby university. His special work at the Harvard observatory consisted in observing and mapping all the stars down to the ninth mag- nitude in a narrow belt, a little north of our zenith. The observations on this work extended over a period of eleven years, and required fifteen years for their reduction. The published results of these observations appeared in several volumes which he prepared. While Prof. Rogers had severed his connection with Harvard, he still retained supervision of his unfinished work at the observatory. One of the earliest difficulties that he met with was the finding of micrometer spiderwebs that were suitable for his work. After numerous experiments he succeeded in etching glass plates by means of lines of silver fumes so satisfactorily that the U.S. government ordered the plates, which were used by the expeditions that were sent out from this country to observe the transit of Venus. His study of this subject, extending over sixteen years, had made him a universally acknowledged authority in all that pertains to micrometrical work. He had studied the construction of comparators for the determination of differences in length, and had established useful working standards of measurement for practical mechanical work, resulting in the Rogers-Bond universal comparator, built by the Pratt and Whitney company of Hartford, who were thus enabled to make their system of standard gauges. In 1880 he was sent abroad to obtain authorized copies of standards of English and French standards of length. These were used as the basis of comparison for the bars that he constructed and that now serve as standards of length for Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Princeton, the U.S. signal service, the Lick observatory, and other important institutions. Prof. Rogers's micrometer rulings, both on metal and glass, are known to microscopists for their accuracy as regards divisions, and also for the character and beauty of the lines. In 1886 he was a fellow of the Royal society of London, and he had since been advanced to the grade of honorary fellow. He was elected in 1886 to the National academy of sciences, and was vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science in 1882–3, presiding over the section in mathematics and astronomy. In 1886 he was chosen president of the American society of microscopists. The degree of A.M. was conferred on him by Yale in 1880, and that of Ph.D. in 1886 by Alfred university. His published papers, nearly fifty in number, relate to his specialties, and have been published in scientific journals or in the transactions of the learned societies with which he was a member.

ROGERS, Woodes, English navigator, b. in Derbyshire, England, about 1663; d. in Nassau in 1732. He was a commander in the navy when he was chosen in 1708 as captain of an expedition that was sent by merchants of Bristol, at the suggestion of William Dampier, to explore the Pacific coast of New Guinea, and to make surveys of the coast of China, Japan, and the islands of the Pacific. He was also to attend his two ships, Dampier as pilot. After advancing far to the south, disappointed in not finding a great southern continent, they steered to the north, and landing, 1 Feb., 1709, at Juan Fernandez island, rescued Alexander Selkirk (q. v.). On the southern coast of Peru, Rogers secured some rich Spanish prizes, attacked the city of Guayaquil, exacting from the citizens 3,000,000 ducats ransom, and, when along the coast as far as Cape San Lucas in Lower California. After visiting Batavia he passed the Cape of Good Hope, and anchored in the Downs, 2 Oct., 1711. In 1717 he was commissioned governor of New Providence in the Bahamas, and was sent with a division against the pirates that had ravaged the neighboring islands. He published "Narrative of a Cruise around the World" (London, 1712). Edward Cook, who commanded one of the ships in Rogers's expedition, published "Voyage in the South Sea and Around the World, made in the years 1708-3-10. 11" (1712).

ROHDE, Lewin Jørgen (ro-del), West Indian naval officer, b. in St. Thomas, 28 Oct. 1786; d. in Copenhagen, Denmark, 2 Aug., 1857. He was the son of a governor of St. Thomas, entered the Copenhagen naval school in 1803, and served creditably at the bombardment of that city. In 1821 he was promoted to the rank of captain, and was sent to make a nautical survey of the coast of the colony. His charts are still considered standards. In 1835 he was retired with the rank of captain. His works include "Historie og følgeløft af Oen St. Thomas" (2 vols., Copenhagen, 1822), and "Fulstanægt Signal System til Brug for alle nationers Skibe" (1837; revised ed., 1840), which has been translated into all European languages.

ROJAS, Gabriel de (ro-hass), Spanish soldier, b. in Cuenca in the 15th century; d. in Chacras, Peru, 17 Dec., 1548. He came to South America in 1514 with Pedrarias Davila, in 1524 took part in the conquest of Nicaragua with Cordova, commanded in the campaign against Gil Gonzalez Davila, and assisted in the discovery of the Desangadero, and the foundation of Guatemala. In 1536 Francisco Pizarro solicited his aid, and Rojas armed two ships and 200 men; but Pedro Alvarado, who was planning an expedition of his own, took possession of the ships and the forces. Rojas escaped with only a few followers and sailed to Peru, landing at San Miguel de Punta. With an escort that was provided by Sebastian de Velazquez, he joined Pizarro in the valley of Paracacari, took part in the foundation of Jumana, and was appointed lieutenant-governor of the town. He assisted afterward in the defence of Cuzco, during the siege by Manco Inca Yupanqui (q. e.), and in the civil wars between the Pizarros and the Almagres. He was then commissioned by Vaca de Castro to settle Chacras, and when, on his return to Cuzco, he found Gonzalo Pizarro at the head of a rebellion, he fled to Lima. On his arrival the viceroy Nuñez de Vela was already imprisoned, and Rojas narrowly escaped being killed by Francisco de Carvajal, but Gonzalo Pizarro pardoned him on account of his former services. When President De la Gasca arrived, Rojas joined the royal forces, and was appointed commander of the artillery, which he directed at the capture of Lima in 1548. In recompense he was appointed magistrade of potosí, but he died shortly afterward.

ROJAS, Juan Ramon, Argentine poet, b. in Buenos Ayres in 1784; died at sea, 9 Sept., 1824. He studied in the College of San Carlos, and as an officer of artillery was present at the siege of Montevideo in 1812 and 1816. In 1819 he was promoted colonel and appointed commander of the garrison of Buenos Ayres; and as such took part in the battle of Sipe-Sipe. He served in the staff of the armies of the United Provinces in 1818. In the first days of the revolution he began to write poetry, and published "Canzon heroica del sitio de Montevideo" (1811), and "La apertura de la Sociedad patriótico" (1812). In the collection of "Poesias patrias" (Buenos Ayres, 1826) his poems and new editions of the poems were published. He perished in a shipwreck.

ROLANDER, Daniel (ro-lan-dar), Swedish naturalist, b. in the province of Smaaland in 1729; d. in Lund in 1774. After receiving his education in Upsala he became preceptor of the children of Linnæus, and engaged later in botanical researches under the direction of the great naturalist. In Linnæus's "Systema Naturae" his name, that of a wealthy citizen of the colony, on his arrival, 20 June, 1755, began immediately to explore the country. After studying the flora of the province of Paramaribo, he sojourne several months on the banks of Commewyn river, where he engaged in geological and botanical researches. Being defeated in an attempt to explore the interior of Guiana, through an uprising of the slaves, he went to St. Eustatius in February, 1796, and made a thorough study of the flora of the island, returning to Stockholm, 20 Oct., with rich collections and a herbarium of 1,500 plants. As he had difficulties with Linnaeus, who wished to make free use of the collections, and the privilege of printing his works having meanwhile been refused by the government, Rolander sold his manuscripts and collections to a private individual for a considerable sum of money. He spent his private life. His works include "Descrip- tion et Iconom rario rariarum plantarum," (1776); "Observationes ad genera quadratae plantarum," (1776); "De descriptions rario rariarum plantarum in Guiana crescunt," (1776). The two last works were published in the Biblical class of the Royal Society of Copenhagen. The Danish government afterward bought, from the heirs of Prof. Rottboell, Rolander's manuscripts and collections, which are now preserved in the museum. His journal has been published, "Diurnum Surinamense," (2 vols., 1840).

ROLFE, William James, editor, b. in New- burough Falls, N. Y., 1827; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 1897. His youth was spent in Lowell, Mass., and in 1845 he entered Amherst. Although he was not graduated, the college authorities afterward enrolled his name among the regular graduates of 1849. On leaving college he taught in Maryland and Massachusetts, finally settling in Cambridge, Mass., in 1862, as master of the high-school, which post he resigned in 1868. Since then he has been an editor of "Science News," formerly the "Boston Journal of Chemistry," and for several years he has had charge of the Shakespearean in the "Literary World." The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Harvard in 1859 and by Amherst in 1863, and that of Litt. D. by Amherst in 1881. With Joseph H. Hanson he published a "Hand-Book of Local History," (1871); "Geology," (1876); "The Ovid and Virgil," (1876; 2d ed., 1877); and with Joseph A. Gillet "The Cambridge Course of Physics," including "Chemistry," "Natural Philosophy," and "Astronomy." (4 vols., 1867-8). In 1867 he published an edition of George L. Craig's "English of Shakespeare," which led to the preparation of "The Friendly Edition" of Shakespeare (4 vols., New York, 1868-80). Mr. Rolfe has also edited "Select Poems of Goldsmith" (1855); "Select Poems of Gray" (1876); Tennyson's "Select Poems" (1884); "Young People's Tennyson" (1886); "Select Poems of Browning" (1887); "Enoch Arden," and other Poems" (1887); Scott's "Complete Poems" (1887); "Plutarch's Lives," (1887); "LittleMISS Poems of Milton," (1887); "Tales of Chivalry, from Scott" (1888); "Tales from English History" (1888); "Select Poems of Wordsworth" (1888); and Thomas Babington Macaulay's "Lays of Ancient Rome" (1888).

ROLLE, Dennis, colonist, b. in Devonshire, England, about 1579; d. in England in 1797. In 1710 he purchased a district in Florida, and led there 1,000 persons to form a colony: but, owing to the unhealthy climate of the desert and the descent of those that escaped, he was soon left without colonists and without money, and was compelled to work his passage back to England in an American vessel. He then settled on his inherited estate, was elected to the house of commons, was high sheriff, and devoted much time to improving the condition of the lower classes.

ROLLIN, Ambroise Lucien (roll-lang), West Indian historian, b. in Trois Rivieres, Guadeloupe, in 1692; d. in Pointe a Pitre in 1749. His family was among the early settlers in Guadeloupe and contributed much to the improvement of the colony. In 1725 he was appointed deputy lieutenant of the king in the colony, which post he retained till his death. Devoting his leisure time to researches upon the Caribes and other Indians, who formerly inhabited the West Indies, he wrote some remarkable works, which are yet considered as among the most remarkable contributions to the knowledge of the American Indians. His works include "Histoire et description des Caraibes" (2 vols., Paris, 1739); "Les Indiens et la conquête Espagnole" (1740); "Histoire et description des Caraibes, leur condition avant la conquête" (1743); "De la civilisation Indienne comparée à leur état social" (1745); and "Les mœurs du Pérón et la conquête Espagnole" (1748).

ROLLINAT, André (roll-nah), French historian, b. in Bordeaux in 1714; d. in Nantes in 1783. He was early appointed librarian of the city of Nantes and devoted himself to researches upon the early navigators that have been credited with the discovery of America before Columbus. His works include "Recherches sur les precoureurs de Christophe Colomb en Amérique" (Nantes, 1785); "Les sagas norvégiennes et les navigateurs scandinaves," (1783); and "Le traité de la conquête du Canada par le duc de Montcalm" (Paris, 1783).

ROLLINS, Alice Wellington, author, b. in Boston, 1 December, 1847; d. in Concord, N. H., 5 December, 1899. She was brought up by her father and completed her studies in Europe. She taught for several years in Boston, and married Daniel M. Rollins, of New York, in 1876. She is the author of "The King of Amethyst," poems (New York, 1878); "The Story of a Ranch" (1883); "All Sorts of Children" (1886); and "The Three Tetons" (1887).

ROLLINS, Edward Henry, senator, b. in Somersworth (now Rollinsford), N. H., 18 Oct., 1812; d. in Somersworth, N. H., 30 Aug., 1897. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1839, studied law at Harvard, and practised in Portland, Me., but afterward removed to New York City. He was assistant U. S. attorney for the southern district of New York in 1866-9, assistant district attorney of New York county in 1874-80, then district attorney till Jan., 1882, and then surrogate of the county till Jan., 1888. In 1887 he was Republican candidate for a supreme court judgeship. Mr. Rollins had won reputation as a lawyer, and had been associated in practice for some time with James C. Carter.
CONVENTION OF 1860. He served in congress from 4 July, 1861, till 3 March, 1867, and was a firm opponent of the measure that was adopted in July, 1864, doubling the land-grant of the Union Pacific railroad company, and making the government secure a first instead of a second mortgage upon the road. From 1868 till 1876 he was secretary and treasurer of the company, and from 4 March, 1877, till 4 March, 1888, he was U. S. senator. He was a founder of the First national bank in Concord, an owner of Fort George island, Fl., and was for seven years president of the Boston, Concord, and Mountain Valley Railroad.

ROLLINS, Ellen Chapman, author, b. in Wakefield, N. H., 30 April, 1834; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 29 May, 1881. Her maiden name was Hobbs, and in 1855 she married Edward Ashton Rollins (brother of Daniel G.), who was U. S. commissioner of internal revenue from 1864 till 1869, and afterward president of the Centennial national bank of Philadelphia. She wrote under the pen-name of "E. H. Amy," and her chief publications are "New-England Bygoes" (Philadelphia, 1859), and "Old-Time Child Life" (1881).

ROLLINS, James Sidney, lawyer, b. in Richmond, Madison co., Ky., 19 April, 1812; d. near Columbia, Mo., 9 Jan., 1888. After graduation at the University of Indiana in 1830 and at the legislature, he entered the law, and practised law in Boone county, Mo. He served on the staff of Gen. Richard Gentry during the Black Hawk war, and in 1836 became an editor of the Columbia "Patriot," a Whig journal. From 1838 till 1844, and again in 1854-6, he served in the Missouri house of representatives, and he was a member of the state senate from 1846 till 1850, holding the office of abrogating governor of the Territories. He was defeated as the Whig candidate for governor in 1848 and 1857. Mr. Rollins was a delegate to the Baltimore convention of 1844, which nominated Henry Clay for president, and was active in the canvass that followed. He was elected to congress as a Conservative, taking his seat in the special session that was called by President Polk to consider the extension of 1842, till 3 March, 1863. In 1862 he introduced a bill to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific, which, with a few amendments, became a law in July, 1862, and under its provisions the Union Pacific, Central Pacific, and Kansas Pacific railroads were built. He voted for the adoption of the thirteenth amendment to the constitution, although at the time he was one of the largest slave-owners in Boone county. He was a delegate to the Philadelphia Union convention in 1866, and in that year served again in the legislature of Missouri, where he introduced and secured the passage of a bill to establish a normal department in the state university. He was appointed a director of the Union Pacific railroad company, but resigned, and again served in the state senate, introducing a bill to establish an agricultural and mechanical college. He was also the author of many important measures that were passed by the legislature to advance the interests of the state university, and from 1869 till 1887 was president of its board of curators, which in 1872 declared him "Pater Universitatis Missuriae.

ROLPHE, John, Canadian physician, b. in Thornbury, England, 4 March, 1792; d. in Toronto, Canada, 19 Oct., 1870. He emigrated to Canada, practised as a physician in Toronto, and took part in the insurrection of 1837. On 18 Nov. of that year Rolph, William L. Mackenzie (q. v.), and others determined at a secret meeting to capture Toronto on 7 Dec., and then to summon a popular convention to which would be submitted a constitution that had already been drafted. In carrying out these plans Dr. Rolph was to be the sole executive authority, while Mackenzie was to arrange the details. Rolph, fancying that the government had heard of the proposed attack on Toronto, changed the date to 4 Dec., which so disarranged Mackenzie's plans that the attack on the city utterly failed. In the mean time Dr. Rolph, though suspected, was sent by the governor as one of the officers of a flag of truce, and at the same time Rolph induced Mackenzie to delay the attack until nightfall, when he promised that the disaffected in the city would join them. After the failure of the attempt upon Toronto, Dr. Rolph, despairing of success, fled to the United States, and subsequently went to Russia, where he resided for several years. He returned to Canada after the amnesty had been declared, and practised law and medicine in Toronto. He was a member of the Canadian parliament, and founded the "People's school of medicine," which is now (1898) a department of Victoria college, Cobourg.

Rolph, Thomas, Canadian author, b. about 1820; d. in England in 1888. He practised as a physician at Amherst, Upper Canada, and was appointed curator of the province of Upper Canada in 1855. He was the author of "The History of Canada," which formed the basis of his "A Brief Account of the West Indies and United States" (Dundas, 1856); "Emigrant's Manual" (1843); and "Emigration and Colonization" (1844).

ROMAN, Andrew Bienvenue, governor of Louisiana, b. in Opelousas, La., 5 March, 1787; d. in New Orleans, La., 26 Jan., 1859. He was a native of France. After his graduation at St. Mary's college, Md., in 1815, he settled as a sugar-planter in St. James's parish, and represented it many years in the legislature, of which he was speaker for four terms, and parish judge in 1826-8. He was governor of Louisiana in 1831-3, and again in 1839-41, and during his administration founded Jefferson college, cleared the state of debt, and established a state printing-office. He consented that the state company to drain the swamps around New Orleans and protect it from overflow. He was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1835, and was sent to Europe in 1848 as agent of a financial company. He was a member of the Constitutional convention of 1852, and of the Secession convention of 1861. He had been a Whig in politics throughout his career, and used all his influence to prevent disunion. With John Forsyth and Martin J. Crawford he was appointed by the Confederate provisional congress to confer with the U. S. government in Washington for the purpose of securing a peaceable separation.

ROMANS, Bernard, engineer, b. in Holland about 1727; d. probably at Amsterdam, 22 July 1784. He was educated in England, and sent to this country by the government as a civil engineer about 1755. He was also its botanist in Florida, receiving a pension of £50 a year for his services. He was early imbued with the Revolutionary spirit, and enjoyed the acquaintance of Washington, who enjoyed the committee of safety engage him in their employ. Rolph entered that service in 1775 in the hope of obtaining a commission in the Continental army, and on 18 Sept. submitted his plans and estimates of the expenses of erecting the proposed fortifications on the Highlands, opposite West Point, offering to complete the same for $75,000, the ordinance only excepted. The committee decided to employ him at a salary, and his application for a colonelcy was subsequently refused. He succeeded in entering the Pennsylvania artillery with the commission of captain in February, 1776, and with his regiment invaded Canada. In May of the same year he was tried for various alleged offences, but was acquitted, and remained in the Continental service till 1779, when he was captured by the British and taken to England. Although his exchange was refused, he pursued his profession there with great success. He set out to return to this country in 1784, but is supposed to have been murdered at sea for a large sum of money which he carried with him. In a diary of the principal part of his life, Romans claims to have been the first surveyor in Florida. He was a mathematician, an artist, and an author. In 1774 he became a member of the American philosophical society, to which he contributed various papers. His publications include "A Concise Natural History of East and West Florida," which, though it contains curious typographical errors, such as printing the pronoun he as a small letter, and is composed in a grandiloquent style, is full of minute and well-assorted facts illustrated with two large copper-plates and two whole-sheet maps, and is rare and valuable (New York, 1775). His other works are "Map of the Seat of War" (1775); "Annals of the Troubles in the Netherlands" (English translation, 2 vols., Hartford, 1778); and "Compleat Pilot of the Gulf Passage" (1779).

ROMAY, Thomas (romay'), Cuban physician, b. in Havana, Cuba, Sep. 25, 1840. He studied in his native city, was graduated in medicine in 1861, and soon afterward was appointed to a professorship in the University of Havana. In 1863 he published an interesting memoir on the yellow fever, which was soon translated into English and French and is still one of the best essays on the subject. The Madrid academy of medicine made him one of its honorary members. In 1892 he published a memoir against the custom of burying the dead in churches and cities, and advocated the establishment of a public cemetery outside of Havana, which was carried into effect soon afterward. In 1894 he published another memoir advocating the introduction of vaccine virus in the island of Cuba. In 1878 he entered the service of the army, which was vaccinated, and during forty-five years he was one of the most constant advocates of vaccination. In 1898 he published also an extensive memoir on the malaria and the propagation of aparianies, contributing in great part to the development of this industry in the island. During the first cholera epidemic in Havana, in 1853, Romay devoted all his time and energy to the extermination of that disease, and published several pamphlets upon the subject. The Madrid government rewarded his services by appointing him honorary physician of the royal chamber, a distinction that was very seldom conferred in those times. He was also elected director of the Royal economical society of Havana, and in this capacity gave his attention to the promotion of agriculture by the establishment of public schools. Besides the publications noticed above, he was the author of "Conjunción de Bonaparte" (1808), and his complete works were published after his death (Havana, 1858).

ROMERO, Matías (ro-may'-ro), Mexican statesman, b. in Oaxaca, 24 Feb., 1857; d. in Washington, D. C., 20 Dec., 1889. He was educated at the institute in his native town, where he studied philosophy and then law. He settled in the city of Mexico, and through the influence of Benito Juárez was enabled to enter the foreign office. Meanwhile he continued his legal studies at the Academy of theoretical and practical law, and was admitted to the bar in 1857. In the revolution of that year he sided with the government, and after the abandonment of Mexico he retired to Guadalajara, where Juárez appointed him to an office in the department of foreign affairs. He continued to follow the fortunes of the constitutional government in its migrations, and at Vera Cruz served as secretary to Melchor Ocampo (q. v.), and chief clerk of the several departments under that statesman's charge. In December, 1859, he was appointed secretary of the Mexican legation in Washington, and he was subsequently charged with the same duties when the legation was transferred to Paris in 1868. The period during which he was in office at the legation was probably the most difficult of the annals of Mexican diplomacy, involving grave and complicated questions from the capture of the Spanish vessel "Maria Concepcion" down to the French intervention in Mexico. On his return to Mexico in 1863 he resigned his diplomatic post, and, soliciting an appointment in the army, was commissioned colonel, and became chief of staff to his college friend, Gen. Porfirio Diaz. He was employed on several military missions of diplomatic nature, and in September returned to Washington as minister to the United States. This place he then held until July, 1878, and afterwards served in several important treaties with this country after the downfall of the empire in Mexico. He accepted the treasury portfolio in Juárez's cabinet in August, 1868, and for five years administered the finances of his native country with skill and judgment. His health failing, he retired to the Soconusco district and engaged in agricultural pursuits, being a member of congress from that part of Mexico. In 1876 he was a member of the senate, and on the election of Gen. Diaz to the presidency he returned to his post in the treasury department, which he then held until 1 April, 1879. He was appointed postmaster-general in February, 1880, but on the inauguration of Gen. Manuel Gonzalez he was retired from that office. In the spring of 1881 he became interested in the Mexican Southern railway company, and accompanied Gen. Grant on his visit to Mexico. From May, 1881, till February, 1882, he was general superintendent of the company in Mexico. During President Garfield's administration the boundary question between the United States and Mexico became a matter of public consideration, and also that between Mexico and Guatemala, and he was again sent as minister from Mexico. Both difficulties were adjusted by him and a treaty of reciprocity between the United States and Mexico was signed. He resigned his post at Washington on the expiration of Gonzalez's presidential term, but was reappointed by Gen. Diaz in 1884, and continued to fill the office. Romo published upward of fifty volumes, but they are chiefly official reports. Among the more important are "Circulars and other Publications made by the Mexican Legation at Washington during the French Intervention," 1862-7 (2 vols., Mexico, 1868); "Coffee-Culture on the Southern Coast of Chiapas" (1857); "Correspondence of the Mexican Legation at Washington during the French Intervention" (2 vols., 1870–85; "Historical Sketch of the American Indians and Secession to Mexico" (1877); and "Coffee and India-Rubber Culture in Mexico" (1898).

ROMEYN, Theodoric (called Dirck) (re-mine), clergyman, b. in Hackensack, N. J., 12 June, 1744;
d. in Schenectady, N. Y., 16 April, 1804. His an-ccestor, Claes Janse, a native of Holland, emigrated to this country from Rotterdam in 1661.

Dirck was graduated at Princeton in 1765, studied theology, and was ordained in 1766; subsequently becoming pastor of the Reformed Dutch churches in Hackensack and Schraalenburgh, N. J. During the Revolution he suffered from the depredations of the British, but continued to serve his congregation at great personal risk. He declined the presidency of Rutgers in 1784, and again in 1791, became pastor of the church in Schenectady, N. Y., in May of the former year, and continued in that charge until his death. He was the founder of the family that subsequently became

Union college, and from 1797 till 1804 was professor of theology in the general synod of the Reformed Dutch church. Rutgers gave him the degree of D. D. in 1790.—His brother, John Brodhead, clergyman, b. in Marbletown, N. Y., 22 Feb., 1823, was graduated at Columbia in 1795, and in 1796 was licensed to preach. He became pastor of the Reformed Dutch church in Rhinebeck, N. Y., in 1799, and of the Presbytery church in Schenectady in 1803, was in charge of the church in Albany for the succeeding four years, and then acccepted the charge of the Cedar street church in New York City, which he held until 1810, when Princeton gave him the degree of D. D. in 1809.

Dr. Romeyn was one of the most popular preachers of his day, and an able theologian. He declined calls to numerous wealthy parishes, and the presidencies of Transylvania university and Dickinson college.

He was one of the founders of Princeton theo-cological seminary, a trustee of that institution and of Pringmont. He was long at the head of the thirty-three men who were the general assembly of the Pres-buryterian church. He published a large number of circular letters and other communications, which were collected and republished (2 vols., New York, 1816). —Dirck's nephew, Nicholas, physician, b. in Hackensack, N. J., in September, 1756; d. in New York city, 21 July, 1847, wrote his family name Romeyn. He was the son of a silversmith, and received great educational advantages. At the beginning of the Revo-lation he went to Edinburgh, where he was known as an able scholar, and took the degree of M. D.

presenting a thesis entitled "De Generatione Paris," which was at one time famous. He subsequently studied in Paris, London, and Leyden, and on his return settled in Philadelphia, where he became in New York city, one of the Königsberg professors. He embarked in the William Blount conspiracy in instituting the Cherokee and Creek Indians to aid the British in their attempt to conquer the Spanish territory in Louisiana in 1797, was seized and imprisoned, and subsequently again visited Europe.

He was the first president of the New York medical college, where he held the chair of the New York college of physicians and surgeons, of which he was a founder, and in which he taught anatomy and the institutes of medicine. Dr. John W. Francis says of him: "He was unwarried in toil and of mighty energy, dexterous in legislative bodies, and at one period of his career was vested with almost all the honors the medical profession can bestow." He published an address before the students of the New York col-dlege of physicians and surgeons on "The Ethnol-gy of the Red Man in America" (New York, 1808).

Nicholas's brother, Jeremiah, clergyman, d. in New York city, 24 Dec., 1768; d. in Woodstock, Ulster co., N. Y., 17 July, 1818, was educated by Dr. Peter Wilson in Hackensack,

N. J., studied theology under Dr. Dirck Romeyn, and was pastor successively of Dutch Reformed churches in Livingston Manor and Red Hook,

N. Y., from 1788 till 1801, and finally at Harleton till 1818. He was an eminent linguist, and from 1797 till his death was professor of Hebrew in the Dutch Reformed church.—Another nephew of Dirck, James Van Campion, clergyman, b. in Minisink, N. Y., 14

Nov., 1765; d. in Hackensack, N. J., 27 June, 1840, was educated at Schenecdady academy, studied theology under his uncle Dirck, and was ordained in 1787. From 1788 till 1799 he was pastor of the Reformed Dutch church of Greenbrush, N. Y., having charge also of the churches of Schoesack and Wynantskill, N. Y., at different periods. In 1799–

1834 he was pastor of the united congregations of the Dutch Reformed church in Hackensack and Schenectady, N. J. He was a trustee of Rutgers from 1807 till his death, and one of the most wealthy benefactors of that institution for a number of years.

He published an "Address to the Students of the Theological Seminary." —James Van Campen's son, James, clergyman, b. in Greenbrush, N. Y., in 1797; d. in New Brunswick, N. J., 7 Sept., 1869, was graduated at Columbia in 1816, licensed to preach in 1819, and was successively pastor of Reformed Dutch churches in Nassau, N. Y., Six Mile Run and Hackensack, N. J., 29 Aug., 1869, was graduated at Rutgers in 1846, and at the New Brunswick theological seminary in 1849. He was pastor of the Reformed Dutch church in Blaw-enburg, N. J., in 1859–65, and from the latter date until his death at the 1st Reformed church at Hackensack. Rutgers gave him the degree of D. D. in 1869. He contributed regularly to the religious press, and, besides sermons and addresses, published "Historical Discourse on the Reopening and Dedication of the 1st Reformed (Dutch) Church at Hackensack, N. J., May 2, 1869" (New York, 1870), and "The Adaptation of the Reformed Church in America to American Character" (1876). See "Memorial," published by the consistory (New York, 1880).

ROMEYN, Maurice, clergyman, b. in Castle-monty, County Cork, Ireland, in 1828. He was educated by private tutors, and at Carlow college, and entered the ecclesiastical college of Maynooth, but left before completing his course in theology, and became a Jesuit in 1853. He finished his theodological studies in Laval seminary, France, and came to the United States in 1865. He was in St. John's college, Parkmen, and in St. Francis

Xavier's, New York, up to 1868; and then went to Rome, returning in the following year. He is at present (1898) professor of history in St. Francis Xavier's college. He has written articles in Roman Catholic publications, and especially in the Philadelphia "Catholic Quarterly Review," principally on the labor question, and on the social and moral RONCKENDORFF, William, naval officer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 Nov., 1812; d. in New York, 27 Nov., 1860. He entered the navy, became passed midshipman, 23 June, 1838, was commissioned lieuten-ant 26 March, 1840, and died of apoplexy in the British Har-bor of Despatches to the commander-in-chief of the Pacific squadron, with which he served during the Mexican war. He was in the "Savannah" at the capture and occupation of Monterey and points on the coast of California, and returned to New York in September, 1847. He commanded the steamer "M. W. Chapin" in the Paraguay expedition of 1859 and on coast survey duty in 1860, was commissioned commander, 29 June, 1861, and had charge of the steamer "Water Witch" from 1 March till 12 Oct., 1861, in the Gulf squadron. On 27 Dec., 1861, he took command of the steamer "San Jacinto," with which he was present in Hampton Roads to fight the "Merrimac," and partici-pated in the attack on Sewall's Point, 15 May, 1862. He commanded a squadron of Norfolk on 18 May. He was in the "Ticonderoga," searching for privateers in 1863, and in February, 1864, he commanded the monitor "Monadnock" in operations in James river until the evacuation of Richmond, when he cruised to Havana in search of the "Stonewall." In July, 1866, he was transferred to the monitor "Baltimore." In 1866 and 1867 he commanded a steamer of the coast survey, and was at Philadelphia until 1 Oct., 1870, when he took charge of the iron-clads at New Orleans until 8 April, 1872. He commanded the steamer "Camadigum," of the North Atlantic squadron, in 1872-3, was promoted commodore, 12 Sept., 1874, and was placed on the retired list on 1 Nov., 1874, by reason of his age.

RONDE, Lambertus de, clergyman, b. in Holland in the 18th century. He was pastor of Dutch Reformed churches in Surinam, British Guiana, in 1746, New York and Harlem in 1751-54, and Schaghticoke in 1784-95. In 1749 he proposed to the classis to publish a book of first truths in Neutro-English and Dutch. The classis requested him to transmit it to them for approval, and in 1758 it was published by the classis at Amsterdam. The book was printed in 1789 at New York without their knowledge, and that he had signed the letter of the coetus without any explanation of his new relationships. He became a member of the conferentie party after the disruption in 1559, and was never absent from their meetings. Though he was one of the committee that procured Dr. Laidlie to preach in English, he afterward turned against him, and was the leading spirit in the "Dutch party" in the famous lawsuit that grew out of this matter. Many were determined not to submit to the innovation of English preaching. The "Dutch party" lost the suit and paid £300 costs. During the Revolution, De Ronde preached in Schaghticoke, N. Y., and in 1780 represented the church of Red Hook and Sargentville in the classis of Kingston. His publications are "De gerekuisige Christen, als het voornaamste toelag van Gods getrouwhe Krisigesanten, in hunne predicking," or "The Christ Crucified as the Principal Subject of God's Faithful Servants of the Cross in their Sermons" (New York, 1751); "Gesegnet Gott," and "Gesegnet Gott!" an acco-tent of the course of the Dutch Reformed Church (New York, 1751): "A System containing the Principles of the Christian Religion Suitable to the Heidelberg Catechism" (1763). This is the first book published in the English language by a member of the Reformed Dutch church in America. It was prepared before the call of Laidlie to the ministry in the growing necessity for instruction in English, and De Ronde offered to preach in English if the consistory thought him qualified. He also published "True Spiritual Religion" (New York, 1767), and numerous "Letters to Holland." Roosevelt, a mercurial air-pump giving an exhaustion of \( \frac{3}{2} \) million of an atmosphere, a degree that has not been attained by other pumps up to the present time (1865). The methods of photometry that he has originated, and his investigations of phenomena that depend on the physiology of vision, are very ingenious, and he was the first to make quantitative experiments on colors-contrast. Although not an artist by profession, he paints in water-colors, is frequently represented at the annual exhibitions, and has been a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences since its foundation in 1865. He was elected to the National academy of sciences in 1865, and in 1867 was vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science. The results of his various researches are included in about sixty memoirs that have appeared in scientific journals, both in the United States and abroad, and chiefly in the "American Journal of Science." Sixteen of his most important memoirs were originally read before the National academy of sciences. Prof. Rodd has published "Modern Chromatics," a work that, besides presenting the fundamental facts as to perception of color, contains the results of numerous original investigations on the subject (New York, 1881).

RORbach, Orville Augustus, b. at Roebuck, N. C., 1820; d. in Schenectady, N. Y., 21 June, 1861. He was educated at Albany, opened a book-store in Charleston, S. C., about 1826, and was engaged in business there till 1845. During the latter part of that time he also carried on the book trade in New York city, whither he removed in 1845, and continued in that business till 1855, when he began to publish books. He subsequently compiled and arranged the "Bibliotheca Americana," a catalogue of American publications, including reprints and original works from 1820 till 1861 (4 vols., New York, 1852-61).

Roosa, Daniel Bennett St. John (ro-zah), physician, b. in Bethel, Sullivan co., N. Y., 4 April, 1838. His ancestor, Isaac, was a captain in the Continental army during the Revolution. Daniel entered Yale in 1856, but left on account of the failure of his health, subsequently studied chemistry under Dr. John W. Draper in New York city, was graduated at the medical department of the University of New York in 1869, and became resident physician in the New York hospital in 1882. He studied abroad in 1863, devoting himself especially to ophthalmology and otology, and in 1864 settled in practice in New York city. He was professor of the diseases of the eye and ear in the medical department of the University of the city of New York from 1863 till 1882, occupied the same chair in the University of Vermont in 1853-59, was a founder of the Manhattan eye and ear hospital, and is now (1898) professor of these diseases in the New York post-graduate medical school, of which he is president. Dr. Roosa is a successful practitioner, eminent as a surgeon, and an acknowledged authority in the branch of his profession to which he has devoted himself, having performed the most difficult and delicate operations that occur in the prosecution of his specialty. He was president of the International ophthalmological congress held in New York in 1877 and of the "American Society of the Medical society of the city of New York" in 1879. Yale gave him the honorary degree of A. M. in 1872, and the University of Vermont that of LL. D, in 1880. He has translated from the German "Trätschen on the Ear" (New York, 1863), and, with Dr. Charles E. Hasley, "Stellwag on the Eye" (1867); and is the author of "Vest-Pocket Medical Lexicon" (New York, 1865); "Treatise on the Ear," republished in London and translated into German (1865); "A Doctor's Suggestions" (1880); and "On the Necessity of Water-works in New York City" (1869).

Roosevelt, Nicholas L., inventor, b. in New York city, 27 Dec., 1577; d. in Skaneateles, N. Y., 30 July, 1854. His ancestors were early citizens of New York. His father, Isaac, was a member of the New York provincial congress, the legislature, and the city council, and for many years was president of the Bank of New York. Nicholas was carefully educated at home and resided in the vicinity of New York, where he became interested in the invention of vertical steamboat paddle-wheels. It is described by John B. B. Latrobe in his "Lost Chapter in the History of the Steamboat" (Baltimore, Md., 1878). Mr. Latrobe's investigation show that, soon after the evacuation of New York by the British, Roosevelt returned to New York from Esopus, where he then resided, and where he had made a small wooden boat, across which was an axle projecting over the sides with paddles at the ends, made to revolve by a tight cord wound around its middle by the reaction of hickory and whalebone springs. In New York he engaged in manufacturing and inventing in that city, subsequently became interested in the Schuyler copper-mines in New Jersey on the Passaic river, and from a model of Josiah Hornblower's atmospheric engine communicated to the various times for gas-works purposes, and constructed those for the water-works of Philadelphia. He was also at the same time under contract to erect rolling-works and supply the government with copper drawn and rolled for six 32-gun ships. In 1851, with Robert R. Livingston and John Stevens, he agreed to build a boat on joint account, for which the engines were to be constructed by Roosevelt, and the propelling agency was to be that planned by Livingston. This experiment failed, the speed attained being only equivalent to about three miles an hour in still water. On 6 Sept., 1798, Roosevelt had fully described to Livingston a vertical wheel, which he earnestly recommended. This is the first practical suggestion of the combination that made steam navigation a commercial success, although four years later Robert Fulton believed that chains and floats were alone to be relied on. Livingston, however, had replied to Roosevelt's proposition on 28 Oct., 1798, that "vertical wheels are out of the question." But in the spring of 1802, Livingston having communicated Roosevelt's plan to Fulton, they adopted the former's view, and in January of the next year launched the boats propelled by Roosevelt's vertical wheels. Roosevelt in the mean time became greatly embarrassed financially, the government failed to fulfill its contract with him, and he was unable to put his plans in operation. In 1809 he associated himself with Fulton in the introduction of steam-boats on the western rivers, and in 1811 he built and navigated the New York, which, with the Ohio boat, the York, and the Ohio and Mississippi rivers from Pittsburgh to New Orleans in fourteen days, he having previously descended both rivers in a flat-boat to obtain information. In January, 1815, he applied to the legislature of New Jersey for protection as the inventor of vertical wheels, for which he had obtained letters-patent from the United States in December, 1813, and the state legislature decided that "it was inexpedient to make any special provision in connection with the matter in controversy before the body," and there the matter rested. Roosevelt's papers came into the possession of Richard S. Cox, his executor, from whom they were obtained in 1828, and from these, with others from the papers of Chancellor Livingston, a case was prepared and submitted to Roger B. Taney, which had been already submitted to William Wirt, and, with both opinions being favorable, a suit was about to be begun when the consideration of the great expense involved in its prosecution caused the whole matter to be abandoned. Roosevelt had by this time retired from active life, residing with his family at Skanneateles. In the case submitted for Mr. Wirt’s opinion, it is said that Fulton never made oath to the application for a patent for vertical wheels over the sides; and that the application itself was signed by another person—a statement that would seem to be corroborated to a great extent by Fulton’s own account of his invention in an interview with B. H. Latrobe on 7 Feb., 1809, when the latter was endeavoring to bring about what subsequently took place—a terms between Fulton and Roosevelt in regard to the introduction of steamboats on the western waters. “I have no pretensions,” said Fulton, “to be the first inventor of the steamboat. Hundreds of others have tried it and failed. Neither do I pretend to the right to navigate steamboats, except in New York.”... That to which I claim an exclusive right is the size proportioning the boat to the power and the engine and the velocity with which the wheels of the boat, or both, move with the maximum velocity attainable by the power, and the construction of the whole machine.” In the same conversation Mr. Fulton said: “As to Mr. Roosevelt, I regard him as a noble-minded, intelligent man, and would do anything to serve him that I could.” —His nephew, Cornelius Van Schaik, merchant, b. in New York city, 30 Jan., 1794; d. in Oyster Bay, L. I., 17 July, 1871, inherited a large fortune, studied at Columbia, but was not graduated, and, engaging in business, was a successful merchant for forty-seven years. During the latter part of his life he devoted a portion of his large income to charity.—Cornelius’s son, Robert Barnwell, congressman, b. in New York city, 7 Aug., 1829, was admitted to the bar in 1859. While in practice he also contributed to the magazines, was a strenuous advocate for sport, and organized several clubs to restrain the indiscriminate slaughter of game. During the civil war he was an active Democrat, and a founder of the allotment commission and the Royal national league. He founded the New York state fishery commission in 1867, and was appointed one of the three fish commissioners, on which he has served without a salary. The reports of that body were prepared chiefly by him, and have led to the appointment of similar commissions in other states. His first experience in politics was in the organization of the Citizens’ association at the time of the Tweed ring administration in New York city. He was a founder of the Committee of safety, and first vice-president of the Reform club. With Charles G. Halpine he edited the “Citizen,” the organ of that association, and after Halpine’s death succeeded to the sole charge of the paper. In 1870 he was chosen to congress as a Democrat. Although the pressure of anti-Tammany Democratic organizations forced Tammany Hall to approve his nomination, he denounced the measures of the corrupt clique. In May, 1888, he was appointed U. S. minister to the Netherlands, whereupon he resigned the office of fish commissioner, giving, in his letter to the governor, a review of what had been accomplished during his twenty years of service. He was instrumental in establishing police, fire and health departments in New York city, was a commissioner of the Brooklyn bridge, and for many years served as president of the Fish culture association, of that for the protection of game, of the New York sportsman’s club, of the International association for the protection of game, of the Holland hunting company, a founder of the Lotus and Arcadian clubs, and a member of the American association for the advancement of science. He has published “The Game Fish of North America” (New York, 1860); “The Game Birds of the North” (1860); “Superior Fishing” (1868); “Florida and the Game Water Birds” (1868); “Five Acres too Much,” a satire on amassing farm implements; the circus artist Wirt’s “Ten Acres Enough” (1869); “Progressive Petticoats,” a humorous illustration of modern medical habits (1871); and edited the “Political Works of Charles G. Halpine,” with a memoir (1890).—Another son of Cornelius, Theodore, merchant, b. in New York city, 22 Sept., 1831; d. there, 9 Feb., 1878, joined the firm of Roosevelt and Co., glass importers, and continued in that business until 1876, when he established a banking-house. President Hayes appointed him collector of the port of New York, but he was not confirmed by the senate. For many years he devoted much of his fortune to charity, contributed large sums to the Newsboys’ lodging-house and the Young men’s Christian association, was a founder of the Orthopedic hospital, under the care of the Children’s aid society, organized the Bureau of united charities, and was a commissioner of the State board of charities. He was a director of the Metropolitan museum of art and of the Museum of natural history.—Theodore’s son, Theodore, author, b. in New York city, 27 Oct., 1858, was graduated at Harvard in 1880, and the next year was elected to the lower house of assembly as a Republican. He led the minority during the session of 1882, was active in reform measures, and on his re-election in 1883 was largely instrumental in carrying out the state civil-service reform law, and an act for regulating primary elections. As chairman of the committee on cities in 1884, he succeeded in abolishing the fees of the county clerk and register, and in providing for their payment by salaries, curtailing abuses in the sheriff’s and surrogate’s offices, and securing the passage of a bill that deprived aldermen of the power to confirm appointments to office, and centred in the mayor the responsibility of administering municipal affairs. He was chairman of the New York delegation to the National Republican convention in 1884, and was an unsuccessful candidate for mayor of New York in 1886. He has spent much of his time in the west, exploring the country and hunting big game. Roosevelt was president of the New York board of police commissioners, assistant secretary of the navy in McKinley’s administration, which he resigned to accept the position of colonel of cavalry in the war with Spain, and, in July, 1898, was promoted colonel for gallantry at the battle of La Quina. He has published “History of the Naval War of 1812” (New York, 1882); “Hunting Trips of a Ranchman” (1885); “Life of Thomas H. Benton” (Boston, 1831; and "Life of Governor Morris," in the "American Statesmen Series" (1888); also "Ranch Life and the Hunting Trail" (New York, 1888).

James John, jurist, b. in New York city, 14 Dec., 1795; d. there, 5 April, 1875, was graduated at Columbia in 1815, admitted to the bar in 1818, and became the partner of Peter Jay. He early identified himself with the Democratic party, and was active in the canvass of Gen. Jackson for the presidency in 1828. He retired temporarily from professional life in 1830, went to Europe, and was in Paris during the disturbances that followed the revolution. He resumed practice on his return in 1831, was a member of the legislature in 1835 and 1839-40, and in 1841-3 sat in congress, but declined nomination in 1844. He then went abroad again and studied foreign law in the courts of England, Holland, and France. He became a justice of the state supreme court in 1851, during one term was ex-officio judge of the state court of appeals, resigned in 1859 to become U. S. district attorney for southern New York, and retired in 1860.—His wife, Cornelia, was the daughter of Cornelius P. Van Ness, of Vermont, and a member in New York society. She did good service in organizing hospital and charitable associations for the aid of the National troops during the civil war, and was subsequently active in benevolent enterprises in New York city.—Cornelius's cousin, James Henry, philanthropist, b. in New York city, 10 Nov., 1800; d. there, 30 Nov., 1863, was graduated at Columbia in 1821, and studied law, but was prevented by delicate health from practising. He never married, and the fortune that he inherited was not large, but by investments in real estate, and a simple and unostentatious manner of living, he accumulated the sum that he desired from his early manhood to leave for some charitable object. By the terms of his will he left the principal part of his estate to found a noble hospital in New York city which bears his name, and was formally opened, 2 Nov., 1871. The property left by him was valued at about $1,000,000, but, in the interval of eight years between his death and the opening of the hospital, the estate had been so administered as to place the trustees that the principal aggregated at least $1,000,000 exclusive of the ground upon which the buildings were erected in West 39th street, and, as the buildings themselves represented an expenditure of about $500,000, the property is now (1900) worth $2,000,000. On the tablet that is placed to his memory in Roosevelt hospital is inscribed: "To the memory of James Henry Roosevelt, the true son of New York, the generous founder of this hospital, a man upright in his aims, simple in his life, and sublime in his benefaction."—Cornelius's grandson, Hilborne Lewis, organ-builder, b. in New York city, 21 Dec., 1849; d. there, 30 Dec., 1886, entered an organ-factory in early youth, and subsequently studied his trade in Europe from an artistic standpoint, especially in regard to electric inventions as applied to organ-manufacture. On his return to New York he engaged in business to a large extent established factories in that city, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and built some of the largest organs in the United States, including that in Garden City cathedral. Long Island, Grace church, New York city, each of which contains twenty miles of electric wire, that in Trinity church, New York, and the organ in the main building of the Philadelphia centennial exposition. He was widely known among musicians, invented several important details of the telephone, enjoyed a royalty for many years in the telephone-switch, and was largely interested in the Bell telephone company.

Root, David, clergyman, b. in Pemont, N. H., 17 June, 1791; d. in Chicago, Ill., 30 Aug., 1875. He was graduated at Middlebury, entered the ministry, and was pastor successively of Presbyterian churches in Georgia and Cincinnati, Ohio, and of the Congregational church in Dover, N. H. In the latter city he identified himself with the Anti-slavery party, which he served with such devotion that he suffered persecution both there and in Waterbury, Conn., whence he subsequently removed. He then held pastorates in Guilford and New Haven, Conn., till 1872, when he retired. He gave $10,000 to endow a professorship in Beloit college, Wis., $20,000 to Yale theological seminary, and $30,000 to the American missionary society.

Root, Elihu, lawyer, b. in Clinton, Oneida co., N. Y., 15 Feb., 1845. His father, Oren, was professor of mathematics in Hamilton college. The son was graduated there in 1864, adopted the profession of law, and settled in New York city, where he has attained high reputation, and is president of the Union League club. In 1883-5 he was U.S. district attorney for the southern district of New York.

Root, Erastus, congressman, b. in Hobron, Conn., 16 March, 1773; d. in New York city, 24 Dec., 1846. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1793, studied law in his native town, and in 1796 settled in practice in Delhi, N. Y. He was in the legislature in 1789-1791; and a member of congress in 1803-5, in 1809-11, in 1812-15, and in 1831-3. For many years he was mayor and general of the militia. Mr. Root was an ardent Democrat of the George Clinton school and an able and popular politician. Haleck celebrated him in one of the "Croters." Mr. Root published "Addresses to the People" (New York, 1824).

Root, George Frederick, musician, b. in Sheffield, Mass., 30 Aug., 1820; d. 6 Aug., 1895. While working on his father's farm he found opportunity to learn unaided to play several musical instruments, and in his eighteenth year he went to Boston, where he soon found employment as a teacher of music. From 1839 till 1844 he gave instruction in the public schools of the city and was also director of music in two churches. He then went to New York and soon was occupied in teaching music at various educational institutions. In 1850 he went to Paris, where he spent a year in study. After his return he published in 1853 his first song, "Hazel Dell," which became very popular. It appeared as the work of "Wurzel," the German equivalent of his family name, and the same pen-name appeared on many of his later pieces. Many of the numerous songs that Dr. Root had written for church and school use, among them are "Rosalia, the Praise-Flower" (1855); "Battle Cry of Freedom" (1861); "Just Before the Battle, Mother" (1863); "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys are Marching" (1864); "The Old Folks are Gone" (1864); "A Hundred Years ago"; "Old Potomac Shore"; and the well-known quartet, "There's Music in the Air." His cantatas include "The Flower Queen" (1852) and "The Damoness" (1854). He was the founder of the normal musical institutes, and when the first one was held at New York in 1852 was one of the faculty. Since 1860 he has resided in Chicago, where in 1872 the degree of Doctor of Music was conferred on him by the university of that city. By his compositions and his work as a teacher he has influenced and enlivened the teaching of music in this country. Besides his many compositions he has composed much sacred music and published many collections of vocal and instrumental music. He is also well known as an author, his work in that line comprising "methods" for the piano and organ, handbooks on harmony and teaching, and innumerable articles for school papers. His son, Frederic Woodman, musician, b. in Boston, 13 June, 1846, began his musical education under his father, and studied also with William Mason and James Flint, and took vocal lessons with Carlo Rassini of New York, and Vanucenti, of Florence. During 1869-70 he studied and traveled in Europe, and since his return he has been occupied in teaching, composing, and conducting. From 1866 till 1871 he was in the employ of Root and Cady, the Chicago music publishers. His compositions include songs, cantatas, an operetta, and other pieces. He has been very successful as a teacher of vocal music, and has published "Root's School of Singing" (Cincinnati, 1873). From 1871 till 1875 he edited "The Musician." ROOT, Jesse, member of the Continental congress, b. in Coventry, Conn., 28 Dec., 1736; d. there, 29 March, 1822. He was graduated at Princeton in 1756 and preached several years, but in 1763 was admitted to the bar and settled in Hartford, Conn. Early in 1777 he raised a company, with which he joined Washington's army at Peekskill, and was made lieutenant-colonel. He was a delegate to the Continental congress in 1778-83; was appointed a judge of the superior court in 1789, and was chief justice of Connecticut in 1796-1807. He subsequently was a member of the legislature and of the American and Connecticut academies of arts and sciences. He published "Reports of Cases Adjudged in the Courts of Errors of Connecticut" (2 vols., Hartford, 1806-1807). ROPES, John Codman, author, b. in St. Petersburg, Russia, 28 April, 1836; d. in Boston, 27 Oct., 1899. His father resided in St. Petersburg in 1812-7. The son was graduated at Harvard and at the law-school, and later practised his profession. Mr. Ropes was much interested in military history, and wrote the "History of the Conspiracies of the Military Historical Society of Massachusetts," and was the author of "The Army under Pope" (New York, 1881); "The First Napoleon" (1885); "The Campaign of Waterloo" (1890); and "The Story of the Civil War" (2 vols., 1894-96; left unfinished). ROSA OF LIMA, Santa, Peruvian nun, b. in Lima, 30 April, 1586; d. there, 24 Aug., 1617. Her secular name was Isabel Flores, and she was the daughter of a member of the eiveroyal guard of argemasters. She showed great piety in early life, and, to avoid hearing the praises of her beauty, disguised her face with oil of vitriol. By her exemplary conduct she won the admiration of the church authorities and was permitted to enter a convent without the usual cedar. She united with the Dominican order in 1602, and led for fifteen years an austere life, which brought about her early death. Her funeral was attended by all the authorities of Lima, and the archbishop pronounced a panegyric on her in the cathedral, 26 Aug., 1617. After her death, efforts were made by the Peruvian church to push claims for her canonization, and it was decreed by Clement X. in 1671. See "Vita Sanctae Rosa," by the Dominicans (2 vols., Rome, 1648); and "Concensus Dominican, Bononiensis ecclesiæ in aliam Sanctorum Ludovici Bertrandii et Rosa de Sancta Maria, ordinum praestantiorum," by Vicente Orsini, afterward Bishop of Arequipa. ROSAS, Juan Manuel de (ro-sas), Argentine dictator, b. in Buenos Ayres, 30 March, 1793; d. in Swathling, Southampton, England, 14 March, 1857. He belonged to a noble family that owned large cattle farms, but he received only a limited education, and from his youth took part in the work of his father's farm. During the English invasion he served until the capitulation of Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, when he returned to the country to take charge of his father's property. When Gov. Rodriguez of Buenos Ayres was threatened with invasion in 1829 by the governors of Santa Fe and Entre Rios, he appointed Rosas captain of militia, and the latter, with a force of 600 gauchos, assisted in the battles of San Nicolas and Pavon. Afterward he was appointed commander-in-chief of the southern frontier against the Pam pas Indians. Under President Rivadavia he was appointed commander-in-chief of all the forces of the province of Buenos Ayres, but later he joined the insurrectionary forces against the government, and Rivadavia resigned in consequence. He was then established in the Federal administration, and when the government of the latter was overthrown by Lavalle, Rosas joined the forces of Gov. Lopez against Lavalle. The legislature of Buenos Ayres appointed Rosas governor on 6 Dec., 1829. Although nominally he sustained the Federal principle, his government soon became arbitrary, and numerous executions of his political enemies took place for his orders. At the expiration of his term in December, 1832, he resigned in the expectation of being re-elected, but the legislature took him at his word and chose Gen. Balcarce. Rosas immediately began an active opposition, and, tired of continual strife, Balcarce resigned in 1833, as also did his successor, Col. Viamonte, soon afterward. Several other governors were elected by the legislature, but, fearing the consequences of Rosas, were afraid to accept, so that the president of the legislature, Manuel Vicente Maza, took charge provisionally of the executive. The representatives of the province elected Rosas governor in 1835 with extraordinary powers, and on 13 April he began a tyrannical dictatorship, which ended only with his flight in 1852. Soon he formed alliances with some of the governors of the interior, and those that resisted his authority he vanquished, so that he became arbiter of the destiny of all the Argentine Republic. Two of the principal Federal chiefs, Quiroga and Lopez, died suddenly, and it was suspected that Rosas caused their death. He now remained undisputed chief of his party, and turned his attention against the Centralization party, or Unitarians, whom he persecuted cruelly. When O'Farrell's government fell there, in October, 1838, and President Rivera favored the Augustinians, Rosas declared war against him, and in July, 1839, invaded the territory of that republic with 7,000 men. Although his army was at first defeated, and Gen. Lavalle invaded the Argentine at the head of an army, Rosas organized a force the command of which he gave to Gen. O'Farrell, and began a war against the Unitarian chiefs of the interior, and a price was set on their heads. A law was promptly enacted that every one of male and female, should use a red ribbon as the badge of the Federal party, and all political documents were headed with the words “Long live the holy federation: death to the savage Unitarians.” In January, 1843, Gen. Orbe, at the head of an Argentine army of 14,000 men, invaded the republic of Uruguay again, and the siege of Montevideo, which lasted for nearly nine years, resembled that of England interfered, and the blockade of Buenos Ayres began on 18 Sept., 1845, but Rosas resisted the demands of the allies until, in November, 1849, a treaty favorable to the dictator was signed. This treaty left the navigation of La Plata, Uruguay, and upper Panama rivers entirely in the hands of the province of Buenos Ayres, excluding even the interior provinces, Rosas’s army in Uruguay, and faction, especially in the river provinces of Entre Rios and Corrientes. The governor of the former, Gen. Urquiza, published a manifesto on 1 May, 1851, inviting all the provinces to throw off the yoke of the dictator, and on 29 May he concluded an offensive and defensive alliance with Brazil and Uruguay. Assisted by the money and army of Brazil, he marched against Rosas’s army in Uruguay, and after he had defeated Orbe the troops of the latter joined him. Re-enforced in this manner, and assisted by the Brazilian fleet, he marched with 30,000 men against Buenos Ayres. Rosas, with an army of about equal force, was intrenched at Palermo and Sanos Lugas, but at the first attack of Urquiza his troops wavered. They were defeated on the 30th of May, 1852, at Montevidio. Rosas escaped on board a foreign vessel to England, where he afterward lived in retirement. In 1859 the Argentine congress ordered proceedings to be instituted against him, and on 17 April, 1861, sentence was pronounced, condemning him to death as a “professional murderer and famous robber.” In this trial 2,061 assassinations, by his personal orders, were proved against him; it was the historian, Jose Rivera Indarte (q. v.), who gave a detailed account of 22,105 victims of Rosas’s policy.

Rosiatti, Joseph, R. C. bishop, b. in Sora, Italy, 12 Jan., 1789; d. in Rome, 25 Sept., 1843. He became a member of the Lazarist order, and studied philosophy and theology in their seminary of Monte Citorio, Rome, where he was ordained to the priesthood of the Church, at Montevidio, Nov. 9, 1821.
